[S] If it be true that part of that Pope's books was burnt . . . . and that they would have been all deſtroyed, had it not been for an incident.] Joannes Diaconus, in the 69th chapter of the fourth book of St Gregory's life, ſays (92), that Italy was afflicted with a horrid famine the ſame year that Pope died. ‘The poor, who had been partakers of the liberalities of that common father of the faithful, not receiving the ſame aſſiſtance from Sabinian, his ſucceſſor, becauſe it was ſaid, Gregory had conſumed the wealth of the church by his prodigality, ſome perſons were ſo paſſionate as to diſcharge their fury upon the works of that holy doctor, not being able to do it upon him, and burnt a great part of them. But as they were ready to burn the reſt, Peter the deacon, a diſciple of that holy man, repreſented to them, that it was to no purpoſe to throw thoſe books into the fire, in order to eclipſe the memory of that Pope, whom they hated, becauſe they had been already diſperſed all over the world. He added, that it was a ſacrilege to treat ſo unworthily the writings of that holy father, over whoſe head he had often ſeen a dove, * repreſenting the Holy Ghoſt, and familiarly converſing with him. Peter, in order to confirm the truth of what he ſaid, went up to the lobby, holding the goſpel in his hand; upon which he ſwore, that what he had been ſaying was true; adding, that he had begged of GOD to make him die on the ſpot, if he had ſpoken the truth. The thing happened according to his wiſhes; for he expired at that very moment without any pain, and was buried under the lobby, where this ſurpriſing thing came to paſs.’ The author, who furniſhes me with this paſſage, cannot believe, that any one would have ſhewed ſuch a rage againſt the works of ſuch a biſhop of Rome; and he obſerves, that cardinal Baronius rejects this ſtory as a meer fable, grounded only upon a falſe tradition, becauſe no author more ancient than Joannes Diaconus makes mention of it (93). Theophilus Raynaud oppoſes this opinion of Baronius in the following manner. He obſerves, in the firſt place, that the ſilence of Paterius, Iſidorus, and Ildephonſus, is a negative argument, and that the ſtrength of ſuch arguments is inſufficient, and weak, as every body acknowledges (94). In the ſecond place, that the authority of Sigebert, alledged by Baronius, cannot ſerve for a proof againſt Joannes Diaconus. That cardinal ſays, that Sigebert poſitively denies, that any work of St Gregory was deſtroyed on ſuch an occaſion, all of them having been preſerved at the requeſt of Peter the deacon. The Jeſuit Raynaud affirms, that Sigebert ſays the quite contrary, in the 41ſt and 43d chapters of his book De Viris illuſtribus. He obſerves in the third place, that St Gregory had written ſome books, of which nothing remains. ‘Præſertim cum idem Joannes ſequenti capite 70. ex ipſiſmet Sancti Gregorii Epiſt. ad Joannem Ravennæ Subdaiconum, demonſtret, pleroſque libros à Sancto Gregorio fuiſſe conſcriptos, quorum nullibi extant veſtigia; ut expoſitionis in Proverbia, & in Prophetas, & in libros Regum, neque enim pauca quæ habemus in 1. Regum, & Ezechielem, menſuram implent titulorum illorum (95). —— Eſpecially ſince the ſame John in the ſeventieth chapter which follows, demonſtrates, from the letter of the ſame St Gregory to John ſub-deacon of Ravenna, that Gregory wrote many books, of which there remain no traces; as, an Expoſition on the Proverbs, the prophets, and the books of Kings; nor do the few we have left, on Kings 1. and Ezekiel, come up to the title of them.’ He makes uſe, in the fourth place, of an argument ad hominem, grounded upon Baronius's confeſſing, that the writings of that great Pope run a great hazard; and that the mutineers not being able to vent their fury upon Gregory, who was dead, diſcharged it upon his books in the middle of the great place of Rome. It is certain, that Baronius, by owning ſuch a thing, deſtroys his own aſſertion: for, then, what does it ſignify to ſay, no book of Gregory's was burnt? have we not a ſtrong proof of the contempt or hatred of the Romans againſt that pontiff, ſince they reſolved to burn his books publickly, which they were ſo obſtinately bent upon, that nothing but a great miracle could prevent it (96).

GREGORY VII.

GREGORY VII, called Hildebrand before he was raiſed to the papal ſee. Of all the Popes, who went about to increaſe the pontifical power, none has been ſo bold and ſucceſsful in it as he (a). He was without doubt a wicked man; but it cannot be denied that he had the qualities of a great man [A], as well as ſome conquerors, who are otherwiſe guilty of many crimes [B]. He was born at Soana, a ſmall town of Tuſcany, and rendered himſelf ſo conſiderable in the monaſtery of Clugny, that he was made prior of it. He negotiated ſeveral affairs with, and for the Popes, and was at laſt raiſed to the pontificate in the year 1073. He reſolved, without any loſs of time, to deprive the emperors of their right of giving the inveſtiture to the biſhops; but, being afraid of meeting at firſt with unſurmountable obſtacles, if it could be objected to him, that he had acted as a Pope, before his election had been approved by the emperor (b), he wrote to that prince in very ſubmiſſive terms, and declared to him, that he would not be conſecrated nor crowned, till he knew his will about it. The German biſhops adviſed the emperor to diſapprove that election; but the only thing they could obtain was, that he would get himſelf informed of the manner how it was made; and he approved of it, as ſoon as he heard the good anſwers his envoy received from Hildebrand. He had quickly occaſion to repent of it; for the new Pope, in the firſt council he held at Rome, renewed the ancient decrees againſt Simoniſts, and ſuch eccleſiaſtics as kept concubines [C]; and made a new one, whereby he declared both thoſe to be excommunicated, who ſhould receive the inveſtiture of any benefice from a layman, and thoſe who ſhould give it. He excepted no body: Hence it was, that his legates declared to the emperor, who went to meet them as far as Nuremberg, that they had expreſs orders to treat him as an excommunicated perſon, and not to confer with him, till he had received from them the abſolution of the excommunication he had incurred for the crime of ſimony, of which he had been accuſed to the late Pope (c). He did what they deſired of him; he received the abſolution, and wrote to Gregory, that he would be always very ſubmiſſive

(a) For though he was at laſt expelled from Rome by the emperor, he put the Popes, who ſucceeded him, in a capacity of triumphing on many occaſions.

[A] It cannot be denied, that he had the qualities of a great man.] A modern author gives us the following character of him. 'He was a man of ſmall 'ſtature, but he had a very great ſoul, a quick and 'penetrating wit, an undaunted courage, and never 'gave over his enterprizes, whatever difficulty he met 'with in the execution of them. He was fiery, im'perious, haſty, bold, and daring, too forward in the 'execution of his deſigns, and carrying things to the 'laſt extremities, without being afraid of the ill con'ſequences that might attend his vigorous, but too 'violent, reſolutions. He was, otherwiſe, a man of 'an unblameable life, notwithſtanding all the calum'nies of his enemies. He gave firſt the example of 'what he required from others *; and was very 'learned, eſpecially in the divine ſciences †, the 'laws, and the rules and cuſtoms of the church, as 'the hiſtorians, and even the Germans, who have 'no reaſon to favour him, acknowledge. Laſtly, if 'his fiery and inflexible humour could have per'mitted him to temper his zeal with the noble 'moderation of his five predeceſſors .... it is cer'tain, that he would have prevented many evils, and 'the ſhedding of a great deal of chriſtian blood, and 'the hiſtorians would have beſtowed none but great 'encomiums upon him (1).' If you conſider well the following words of Naudé you will find in them the idea of a great man. He was one of the greateſt pillars of the church, and, to ſpeak of him ſincerly and impartially, he was the firſt, who put her in poſſeſſion of her franchiſes, and who freed the ſovereign pontiffs from the ſlavery of the emperors (2). Some may ſay, that purchaſing liberty, ſhaking off the yoke, making one's ſelf independant, and ſubduing one's own maſters, are wicked actions; but they cannot ſay, that ſuch things can be performed without noble endowments, and a great courage.

[B] ..... as well as ſome conquerors, who are, otherwiſe, guilty of a great many crimes.] I am the more willing to uſe this compariſon, becauſe I am perſuaded, that the conqueſt of the church was a work, that required no leſs courage and ability, than the conqueſt of an empire. The power the Popes have attained to is more to be wondered at, than the vaſt monarchy of ancient Rome; ſo that it may be ſaid, that this great city was to be, in two different manners (3), the ſpring of the moſt ſublime qualities, that are requiſite for the foundation of a very great ſtate. If this does not prove, that the Romans equalled other nations in moral virtues, it proves at leaſt, that they had more courage and induſtry. It is an amazing thing, that a church, which pretends to have no arms but the ſpiritual ones of the word of GOD, and which grounds her rights only upon the goſpel, that teaches every where humility and poverty, ſhould have been ſo bold as to aſpire to an abſolute dominion over all the kings of the earth: but it is ſtill more amazing, that ſhe ſhould have been ſo ſucceſsful in ſuch a chimerical deſign. If ancient Rome, which pretended only to conqueſts and military virtue (4), ſubdued ſo many nations, it is a noble and glorious thing in the eyes of the world; but any one, who reflects upon it, will not wonder at it. It is a much more ſurpriſing thing to ſee new Rome, pretending only to an apoſtolical miniſtry, arrive to ſo great a power, that the greateſt monarchs have been forced to ſubmit to it; for it may be ſaid, that there is hardly an emperor, who oppoſed the Popes, but found himſelf the worſe for it at laſt. At this very day, the quarrels of the moſt potent princes with the court of Rome do generally end to their own confuſion. We have ſo freſh inſtances of it (5) that I need not mention them. In the eyes of the world, ſuch a conqueſt is a more glorious work than thoſe of the Alexanders and Cæſars; and therefore Gregory VII, who was the chief promoter of it, ought to be placed among the great conquerors, who had the moſt eminent qualities.

You will ſee in the remark [S] my anſwer to an objection, publiſhed againſt what I ſay here.

[C] He renewed the ancient decrees againſt ſimoniſts, and ſuch eccleſiaſtics as kept concubines.] No Pope had ever been ſo ſevere as our Hildebrand againſt the prieſts, who did not obſerve celibacy; and therefore he was very much hated. Here are the words of Lambertus Schaffnabergenſis: 'Pope Hildebrand, hav'ing called ſeveral ſynods of the biſhops of Italy, 'ordered, that, according to the ancient canons, 'prieſts ſhould have no wives, and thoſe, who had, 'ſhould part with them, or be depoſed, admitting 'none into the prieſthood, but ſuch as ſhould pro'miſe to live in perpetual continency. This decree 'being publiſhed all over Italy, he wrote to the 'biſhops of Gaul, enjoining them to do the ſame in 'their churches, and that the prieſts ſhould leave their 'wives, upon pain of excommunication. The whole 'faction of the clergy roſe up immediately againſt 'that decree, ſaying, that it was heretical, and con'tained ſenſeleſs doctrine, contrary to the word of 'GOD, which ſays, all men cannot receive this ſay'ing; he that is able to receive it, let him receive 'it: and likewiſe contrary to the apoſtle, who com'mands, that thoſe, who cannot contain themſelves, 'ſhould marry, it being better to marry than to 'burn. They farther added, that this man, by a 'violent exaction, would have men to live like an'gels, and would occaſion all manner of filthineſs, 'by ſtopping the courſe of nature. Theſe factious ſubmiſſive to him. Nevertheleſs he did not permit the legates to call a council; and he kept with him thoſe miniſters of his, who had been excommunicated by the Pope. For which reaſons, and ſeveral others, the Pope ſummoned him to appear at the next Synod of Rome; in default of which, he threatened to excommunicate him. The emperor ſlighted his threatenings, and offered all ſorts of indignities to the legates, who had been ſo bold as to threaten him; and he convoked a council at Worms, wherein cardinal le Blanc ſet up for an informer againſt Gregory. He charged him with ſo many crimes [D], that the aſſembly declared the election of that Pope to be void, and wrote to him letters full of injurious words, to acquaint him with their determination. Thoſe, who preſented the letters, did it with great brutality; and yet that Pontiff, who, notwithſtanding his haſty and fiery temper, had a great command of himſelf, took them unconcernedly, and without ſaying any thing (d): But, the very next day, having imparted them to his ſynod, he pronounced (e) in a ſolemn manner an anathema againſt the emperor [E], and declared I know not how many prelates of Germany and Lombardy excommunicated. The latter were ſo little concerned at it, that they quickly aſſembled at Pavia, and excommunicated him. As he had foreſeen, that his conduct would draw upon him very potent enemies, he omitted nothing to ſtrengthen his party; and, in the firſt place, he brought over three princeſſes to his intereſt [F]; one of which, called Mathilda, adhered to him in ſuch a manner as was much talked of [G]. Beſides, he excited the Saxons ‘ prieſts concluded, that, if he obſtinately perſiſted in his reſolution, they had rather renounce the prieſthood, than forſake their wives; and he might then ſee where he could find angels to govern the churches, ſince he would not make uſe of men (6).’ Coëffeteau adds, according to the teſtimony of Marianus Scotus, that many clergymen choſe rather to be excommunicated by the Pope, than to part with their wives; but the Pope ordered, in a ſynod, that no Chriſtian ſhould hear the maſs of a married prieſt (7).

I ſhall obſerve a thing, which ſeems to deſerve attention. viz. That the Popes have found it incomparably more difficult to bring the clergy of the northern countries under the law of celibacy, than thoſe of the ſouthern. When thoſe of Italy and Spain had been for a long time ſubjected to that yoke, thoſe of Germany, and other cold countries, held out ſtill, and diſputed the ground for marriage, tanquam pro aris & focis: nay, I do not know but it may be ſaid, that, in Luther's time, the concubinage of prieſts was more apparent and ſcandalous in Germany than in Italy. It ought not to be inferred from thence, that the inhabitants of the ſouthern countries are more chaſte: on the contrary it ſeems, that the northern prieſts choſe rather to keep to certain concubines, than to diſguiſe their incontinence by a vague leudneſs. They acted therefore with greater fairneſs, and perhaps they believed it was a leſs crime.

[D] Cardinal le Blanc charged him with ſo many crimes.] In order to know his accuſations, we need only read the ſentence pronounced againſt the Pope by the aſſembly of Worms. I ſhall ſet it down as I find it in du Pleſſis Mornai (8). ‘ Hildebrand, who calls himſelf Gregory, is the firſt, who, without our conſent, againſt the will of the Roman emperor, appointed by GOD, and againſt the cuſtom of our anceſtors, and contrary to the laws, has invaded the papal ſee by his ambition, which he has made known for a long time. He will do any thing that comes into his head, per fas nefaſque, whether it be lawful or unlawful. He is an apoſtate monk, who corrupts the holy theology by a new doctrine, adapts the holy ſcripture to his affairs by falſe and ſtrained interpretations, diſturbs the peace of the college, pollutes ſacred things, and lends an ear to the devils, and to the ſlanders of the wicked, being at the ſame time a witneſs, a judge, and an accuſer. He parts husbands from their wives, and prefers whores to honeſt women, fornication, inceſt, and adultery, to a chaſt marriage. He ſets the people againſt the prieſts, and the mob againſt the biſhops; and would make every body believe, that none is rightly ordained, unleſs he begs the prieſthood of him, or buys it, ab ejus Auriſugis, of his blood-ſuckers. He deceives, impoſes upon, and bubbles the vulgar by a meer ſhew of religion. He handles the holy myſteries of religion, in ſenatulo muliercularum, among ſilly women: he diſſolves the law of GOD, and encroaches upon the papacy and the empire. He is guilty of high-treaſon divine and humane, deſiring to deprive a ſacred emperor and a good prince of his life and ſtates. For theſe reaſons, the emperor, the biſhops, the ſenate, and chriſtian people, declare him to depoſed, and will no longer leave CHRIST'S flock to the keeping of ſuch a wolf.’

[E] He pronounced an anathema againſt the emperor.] ‘ And, what had never been done yet by any Pope, he deprived him of the imperial dignity, and of his kingdoms of Germany and Italy; declared all his ſubjects abſolved, by the pontifical authority, from the oath of fidelity they had taken to him; and wrote ‡ afterwards circular letters to all the biſhops and princes of Germany, whereby he permitted them, in caſe Henry ſhould obſtinately perſiſt in his revolt againſt the holy ſee, to proceed, by the ſame authority, to the election of another king, who might receive the imperial crown, and govern the empire juſtly, and according to the laws (9).’

[F] He brought over three princeſſes to his intereſt.] ‘ Viz. The empreſs Agnes his mother (10), the ducheſs Beatrix his aunt, and the counteſs Mathilda his couſin-german. As for the empreſs, ſhe might be of great uſe to him by her intreaties and remonſtrances. And indeed *, ſhe took a journey into Germany, with the legates that Gregory ſent thither the firſt time; and the emperor promiſed to grant all the requeſts ſhe made in the Pope's name, but performed nothing. The counteſſes Beatrix and Mathilda being very powerful in Italy, where they had vaſt eſtates, were able to aſſiſt him more effectually than the empreſs Agnes by her remonſtrances, which Henry made no great account of. Theſe two princeſſes, who were very devout, had a great opinion of Gregory's virtue, who was looked upon as a holy man, and very auſtere; nay, he was ſaid to have revelations and extaſies, with the gift of prophecy and miracles, which are powerful motives to make one a ghoſtly father. Afterwards they reſolved to be intirely governed by him; and he, on his part, anſwering the confidence they repoſed in him, took a particular care to direct them by his letters in the way to virtue, and expreſſed a great affection for them, and a mutual confidence: ſo that, when this great rupture between the Pope and the emperor divided the empire into two parties, they did not in the leaſt waver, but openly declared for Gregory, and reſolved to aſſiſt him with all their power, eſpecially the counteſs Mathilda (11).’ I uſe the words of this Jeſuit on purpoſe, leſt the readers ſhould ſuſpect that I deſign to impoſe upon them by artificial tranſlations. It muſt be confeſſed, that this Pope was a very cunning man, and that, notwithſtanding his fiery and violent temper, he knew very well how to make uſe of the moſt effectual devices: he made ſure of the female ſex, and pitched upon the ladies, who had the greateſt power.

[G] Mathilda adhered to him in ſuch a manner as was very much talked of.] A Pope, though never ſo peaceable and well-beloved, could not have avoided the ſatirical ſtrokes of ill tongues, had he been ſo intimate with a lady, as Hildebrand with Mathilda. You may therefore judge, whether a Pope, ſo violent as he was, and who had many enemies, could avoid being defamed on account of the mutual affection between him and that counteſs. I ſhall ſet down another paſſage of a Jeſuit, who cannot be ſuſpected upon this occaſion. ‘ The

Saxons to a revolt; he made a league with the duke of Suabia (f); and diſperſed ſeveral circular letters, which had a good effect; for he declared all thoſe to be excommunicated, who ſhould correſpond with the emperor; he forbad all biſhops to abſolve him; and enjoined all princes to force him to ſubmit to the holy ſee, or to proceed to the election of another emperor. What is very remarkable, is, that he durſt maintain, that, in depoſing him, he had only conformed to the practice of the court of Rome [H]. The league, that was formed in his favour in Germany, was ſo powerful, that, after a long deliberation, it was declared, that they ought to elect another king by the Pope's authority, who ſhould give him the imperial crown (g). The emperor, notwithſtanding his mean condeſcenſion to the confederate princes, could obtain but very hard conditions; which obliged him to go and beg the Pope's abſolution; and, in order to obtain it, he was forced to ſubmit to the moſt unheard-of indignities [I]. His excommunicated

‘The counteſs Mathilda finding herſelf alone, and being abſolute miſtreſs of her ſtates, becauſe the ducheſs Beatrix, her mother, died much † about the ſame time that the death of Godfrey (12) came to be known, reſolved to be directed by Gregory more than ever, made him intirely maſter of her mind, her conduct, and eſtate: and therefore, according to the uſual cuſtom of thoſe devout women, who would think themſelves undone if they were far from their directors, for whom they have ſometimes too great a fondneſs, ſhe did whatever ſhe could not to loſe the ſight of him ⸸. She conſtantly followed him, and did him a thouſand ſervices with an incredible affection. She only acted by his orders, which ſhe executed with a wonderful exactneſs; and though ſhe was the greateſt princeſs of Italy, ſhe preferred to that title that of his moſt humble ſervant, and dear daughter, looking upon him as her father and maſter, for whom ſhe expreſſed a great deal of reſpect, zeal, and devotion; though perhaps ſhe did it with leſs prudence and diſcretion than ſhe ſhould have done, if I may ſay ſo, without pretending to leſſen the honour that is due to the memory of ſo illuſtrious a princeſs. For, in ſhort, the partiſans of the emperor, and the enemies of Gregory, eſpecially the clergy of Germany, whom he abſolutely reſolved to deprive of their wives, whom they had impudently married againſt the moſt holy laws of the church, took occaſion from thence to inveigh againſt him in a ſtrange manner, to accuſe him of too great a privacy with that counteſs ‡, and to tell many ſcandalous ſtories of him, and ſuch as cannot be credited in the leaſt, as being contrary to truth, and the known virtue of both. And therefore the German hiſtorian, who lived at that time, and who relates this, adds, that all judicious perſons, and ſuch as were not blinded and prejudiced by an unjuſt paſſion, were fully ſenſible, that they were meer impudent calumnies, which, like thin clouds, ſo vaniſhed away by the apoſtolical life the Pope led in the ſight of all the Roman court, that thoſe, who knew him, did not entertain the leaſt ſuſpicion of him (13).’

I am obliged in equity to mention, in this place, a complaint of Coëffeteau againſt du Pleſſis Mornai. That monk was angry with du Pleſſis, becauſe he quoted only the firſt part of a paſſage of Lambertus Schaffnaburgenſis: And therefore ſhe cannot avoid being ſuſpected of inceſtuous love, ſince the king's friends gave out every where, eſpecially the clergy, whom he forbad to marry contrary to the canons, that he ſpent nights and days in her embraces, and that ſhe, being extreamly fond of that Pope, would not marry again after the death of her huſband (14). Du Pleſſis goes no farther; whereupon Coëffeteau makes the following complaint. But, reader, what will you ſay, if I ſhew you, that this author, this grave hiſtorian, as he calls him, confutes this impudent calumny in that very ſame place . . . How then can he be ſo unfair and ſo bold as to alledge it to defame his life and domeſtic converſation (15)? This monk makes too great a noiſe for a ſmall matter: I confeſs, that du Pleſſis had not done amiſs, to obſerve by the bye, that Lambertus Schaffnaburgenſis confutes this; but, after all, his chief deſign being to tell what judgment was made of Pope Gregory, it is not very ſtrange, that he ſhould quote only the words of that hiſtorian, whereby it appears, that many ſcandalous ſtories were told of that Pope. Note, that he calls this Lambert, abbot of Hirtzaw. His adverſary reproves him for it, and ſays, he was only a monk at Hirtzaw; but they are both miſtaken; for he was a monk of Hirsfeld in the dioceſe of Mentz.

I ſhall conclude with a thought of Father Maimbourg. ‘Though, ſays he (16), thoſe reports were plainly falſe; yet, becauſe men, through a malignity natural to them, are more inclined to give credit to ill reports than to good ones, eſpecially with reſpect to thoſe, who are in ſome reputation for their virtue, it produced an ill effect, and did Gregory ſome prejudice. From whence the directors of conſciencies ought to learn, that the ſhorteſt converſations they have with devout women are always the beſt; and that long and frequent diſcourſes with them are always more dangerous, than uſeful, to thoſe of their profeſſion.’

[H] He durſt maintain . . . . . that he had only conformed to the practice of the court of Rome.] This ſhews how little thoſe are to be depended on, who boaſt of doing nothing but in imitation of the ancients: the greateſt innovators have been ſo bold as to boaſt of ſuch a thing. We have here a very remarkable inſtance of it, which I ſhall ſet down in the words of a Jeſuit, leſt any one ſhould be apt to think, that I exaggerate things (17). ‘I find alſo, that Heriman, biſhop of Metz, having propoſed to Gregory, in writing, his difficulties upon this ſubject, and asked, among other things, what anſwer was to be made to thoſe, who maintained, that the Pope could not depoſe the king, nor diſpenſe his ſubjects from their oath of fidelity, as he had done in the laſt ſynod at Rome; he anſwered him plainly, and without any heſitation , that he had done it very juſtly, according to the cuſtom and practice of his predeceſſors, who had excommunicated kings and emperors, depriving them of their empire, and of their kingdoms. And yet Otho Friſingenſis, a very learned and moſt holy biſhop, and a man well affected to the Pope, and often commended by Baronius aſſures us, with great ſincerity, that having been an exact †† reader of hiſtories, he had never found, that any Pope, before him, ever attempted ſuch a thing (18).’

[I] He was forced to ſubmit to the moſt unheard of indignities.] He ſet out in the beginning of the winter, with his wife, one of his children, and a very ſmall retinue, and paſſed the Alps in the worſt time of the year, being expoſed to great inconveniencies, which might raiſe compaſſion for a meer traveller, and much more for ſo great a prince, reduced to ſo miſerable a condition (19). Nevertheleſs, his arrival in Italy gave ſome uneaſineſs to the Pope; and therefore Mathilda carried him to her caſtle of Canoſſa, that he might be ſafe whatever ſhould happen (20). Many princes intreated him to abſolve the emperor, but he continued a long time inexorable; and then, being rather overcome by importunities, than moved with the continual and earneſt ſollicitations of thoſe princes, he told them at laſt, that he would abſolve him, according to their deſires; but upon condition, that, in order to make it appear to all the world that he truly repented of his revolt, he ſhould firſt ſend him his crown, and all his other royal ornaments, to diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; and that he ſhould publickly confeſs, that, after what he had done in his infamous conventicle at Worms, he was unworthy of being a king or an emperor. The princes threw themſelves at the Pope's feet, beſeeching him for God's ſake to be contented with ſomething more tolerable: and they obtained, with great difficulty, that he might come then, in GOD's name, if he had a mind to be abſolved; but that, in order to obtain that favour, he muſt reſolve to do whatever ſhould be enjoined him for a penance (21). The emperor ſubmitted to thoſe terms (22). ‘He went to the firſt gate of the caſtle, expecting with great ſubmiſſion what ſhould be required of him. Firſt, he was obliged to go in alone, a excommunicated friends were treated much in the ſame manner [K]. This made the Lombards leſs zealous for him; and he could not recover their eſteem, but by expreſſing a great deſire of revenging himſelf. The wars he had upon his hands in Germany, where Rodolphus duke of Suabia had been made king, prevented his attacking the Pope; but, having obtained great advantages over his rival, he ſhewed himſelf but little diſpoſed to perform what Gregory required of him. Wherefore this Pope, in a council held at Rome in the year 1080, excommunicated and depoſed him anew [L]. This laſt ſtroke brought things to the laſt extremities. The emperor called an aſſembly firſt at Mentz, and then at Brixen (b), wherein Gregory was declared to have forfeited the pontificate, and Guibert of Parma, archbiſhop of Ravenna, was elected in his room, and took the name of Clement III. This aſſembly, among other crimes, charged Hildebrand with magic [M]. The emperor, having gained two battles, one in Germany over Rodolphus, notwithſtanding the Pope's prophecies [N]; the other, near

‘ to leave all his attendants without doors to wait for him, and go back with him at his coming out from thence; which was certainly a very nice point, and no ſovereign prince but he would have ſubmitted to it. For, in ſhort, he delivered himſelf, as it were, bound hand and foot, into the hands of thoſe, who might have abſolutely diſpoſed of him as they pleaſed, and kept him priſoner in a place that was thought to be impregnable, and out of which his attendants had never been able to reſcue him. Beſides, when he got out of the firſt incloſure, they ſtopped him in the ſecond; where he was obliged to lay down all the enſigns of the royal majeſty, to pull of his cloaths, and put on a woollen tunic, like a hair-cloth (23), and to ſtay there bare footed in the coldeſt time of the winter; (for it was about the latter end of January), and faſting from morning till night, imploring with deep ſighs GOD's and the Pope's mercy. And what is moſt ſtrange, is, that this poor prince was forced to continue in this ſad and pitiful condition three days together, whilſt the Pope could not be moved with tears and intreaties to admit him ſooner into his preſence, in order to comfort him: and the thing went ſo far, that as he himſelf confeſſes, boaſting of his extream ſeverity in his letter to the princes of Germany, all thoſe, that were with him, murmured at it, being amazed at his hard-heartedneſs; nay, ſome made no ſcruple to ſay, that ſuch a behaviour was more like the barbarous cruelty of a tyrant, than the juſt ſeverity of an apoſtolic judge ‡‡. They are the very words of Gregory, mentioned by cardinal Baronius. . . . (24). That prince was like to loſe his patience, about the end of the third day of ſo ſevere a penance . . . . when the counteſs Mathilda undertook this buſineſs with more earneſtneſs than before: and then Pope Gregory, who could not deny any thing to ſo great a princeſs, to whom he was ſo much indebted, reſolved at laſt to receive Henry on the fourth day in the morning, and to reconcile him to the church upon theſe terms: The he ſhould ſubmit to the judgment, which the Pope, in the time and place appointed for it, ſhould give upon the accuſations brought againſt him . . . . and that, in the mean time, he ſhould not exerciſe any act of ſovereignty.’ I omit the other conditions, which were all very ſevere.

[K] His excommunicated friends were treated much in the ſame manner.] ‘ He did not uſe much more gently the German biſhops and others, both eccleſiaſtics and laymen, who came a little before to throw themſelves at his feet, in order to be abſolved from the excommunication, which they had incurred. For, before he abſolved them, he cauſed each of them to be ſhut up in little cells, as in priſons, and made them faſt a conſiderable time, againſt the cuſtom of their country, where, by reaſon of the cold, faſting is with more difficulty obſerved than in Italy (25).’ Faſting is without doubt one of the greateſt mortifications, that can be laid upon the northern nations, eſpecially upon rich people, who are uſed from their younger years to feed well, and to make long meals, where, if they eat a great deal, they drink ſtill more. If the Chriſtian religion had been firſt planted in that country, I do not think they would have ſent into the eaſt the ſame canons about abſtinence and vigils, which came from the eaſt to the northern nations. See the complaints, which were made againſt cardinal Alamandus (26).

[L] He excommunicated and depoſed the emperor anew.] By this thundering decree, he * deprived him of the empire, and of the kingdoms of Germany and Italy, abſolves all his ſubjects from their oath of allegiance; and, what he would not do till then, confirms Rodolphus's election, to whom he ſent a rich crown of gold, about which there was an inſcription, contained in one verſe, importing that CHRIST, who is the myſtical ſtone, gave the diadem to Peter, and in the perſon of Gregory to Rodolphus †. They are father Maimbourg's words (27). If it be true, that Gregory's father was a carpenter, we have here an inſtance, that men of the moſt lofty courage may be born among the dregs of the people. Can any body be more haughty than our Hildebrand was? did not he make it his buſineſs to humble kings, becauſe, ſaid he, they carried it too high, and he was reſolved to bring down their pride by his ſevere uſage. ‘ Imperatoribus & regibus, cæteriſque principibus ut elationes maris, & ſuperbiæ fluctus comprimere valeant, arma humilitatis, Deo auctore, providere curamus: proinde videtur utile, maximè Imperatoribus, ut cùm mens illorum ſe ad alta erigere, & pro ſingulari vult gloriâ oblectare, inveniat quibus ſe modis humiliet, atque unde gaudebat, ſentiat plus timendum (28). —— To humble the pride of kings and princes, we take care, by GOD's aſſiſtance, to provide the arms of humility: eſteeming it uſeful to ſhew monarchs the way to humble themſelves amidſt their greatneſs, and diſcover to them the danger of the ſituation, they ſo much pride themſelves in.’ Obſerve, that the Jeſuit Maimbourg rejects what has been ſaid of Gregory's father. Theſe are his words. What is commonly ſaid, that he was a carpenter's ſon, and that playing with ſhavings, when he was but a child, he accidentally formed ſome letters out of them, which were ſo diſpoſed as to make this verſe of the Pſalmiſt, Dominabitur à mare uſque ad mare; He ſhall rule from one ſea to another; is a meer ſtory (29).

[M] Among other crimes, they charged him with magic.] This appears from the ſentence pronounced againſt him. Du Pleſſis Mornai mentions it at large. And likewiſe, ſaid he (30), in the year 1080, the biſhops of Italy, Germany, and Gaul, met at Brixen in Bavaria (31), and condemned Hildebrand a ſecond time as guilty of ambition, hereſy, and ſacrilege: ‘ Becauſe, ſay they, he is a falſe monk, a magician, a diviner, an interpreter of dreams and prodigies, a deſpiſer of the Chriſtian religion, who has bought the pontificate, contrary to the cuſtom of our foreſathers, againſt the will of all good men, &c. A ſworn enemy to the emperor and the empire, a corrupter of divine and human laws, teaching falſhood inſtead of truth, evil inſtead of good, &c. An inſtigator of all manner of wickedneſs, the abettor of a tyrant, a lover of diſcord between brethren, friends, and relations; occaſioning divorces among married people; denying that prieſts, who have lawful wives, are true prieſts, and yet bringing fornicators, adulterers, inceſtuous people, &c. to the altars, &c. We, by the authority of Almighty GOD, declare him to have forfeited the pontificate? and if he does not voluntarily reſign it, we ordain that he be for ever deprived of it. Sigonius, who alſo mentions this decree, uſes theſe words, manifeſtum necromanticum, Pythonico ſpiritu laborantem: A plain necromancer, poſſeſſed by the ſpirit of Pytho’

[N] The emperor gained two battles . . . . notwithſtanding the Pope's prophecies.] Hildebrand, in order to encourage Rodolphus and the Saxons, aſſured them, that he knew, by revelation, That a falſe king was near Mantua, over the counteſs Mathilda's troops, reſolved to go and ſettle his Anti-Pope at Rome. He effected it after many difficulties, and had the ſatisfaction of forcing his enemy to fly from Rome, and to retire to Salerno. Pope Gregory VII died there the 24th of May 1085 (i). It is no eaſy thing to give a particular account of his actions with any certainty; for, beſides that the writers, who ſpeak of him, confute one another [O], it cannot be denied, that his enemies appear too paſſionate, and that what they ſay of his being a magician, looks altogether like a fiction [P]. to die that very year, which he underſtood of the emperor Henry IV; and if it be not true, added he, I deſire to be no longer Pope; nay, if it does not happen before St Peter's day. Du Pleſſis Mornai (32), who had this from Sigebert, obſerves, that Rodolphus, depending on that oracle, renewed the battle four times, others ſay ſix times, and not only loſt it, but alſo his right hand, wherewith he had ſworn to the emperor, and alſo his life. Coëffeteau anſwers (33), that cardinal Baronius had prevented that calumny, and ſhewed that Gregory never pretended to the revelations, his enemies fathered upon him; but only that he affirmed in general, truſting to GOD's mercy, and the juſtice of his cauſe, that GOD would deſtroy his enemies, and that his friends would ſhortly be uppermoſt; but without fixing any day, as he had been falſly charged with it by the ſchiſmatics. ‘ From whence, ſays Baronius, ‘ Gregory's enemies took occaſion to calumniate him, ‘ and to call him a falſe prophet, as if he had foretold that Henry ſhould quickly die, and many other ‘ things of that nature. Though, the truth is, he ‘ never pretended to ſay that by a prophetic ſpirit, ‘ but according to the uſual courſe of things; for it frequently happens, that men reap according as they have ‘ ſowed. And therefore Gregory, relying upon the ‘ juſtice of his cauſe, was confident that God would ‘ make it prevail; which, ſays he, all things duly conſidered, will be found to be true; for Henry and his ‘ adherents came to a miſerable end.’ The reply, that ‘ was made to Coëffeteau, was this: He ſhould have conſidered, that Baronius ſays this, upon occaſion of a letter † written by Gregory to his fellow biſhops, and other faithful; and it is true, that the words of that letter may bear ſuch an interpretation. But this does not prove that the Pope did not ſpeak otherwiſe elſewhere. And, indeed, the charge laid upon him concerns quite another thing, not contained in a letter, but ſpoken in a public ſermon, which he preached in his pontifical habit. The words run thus: Do not look upon me hereafter as a Pope, but turn me out from the altar, if this prophecy be not fulfilled on St Peter's day. It fell out, that the aſſaſſins, who had been bribed, could not ſtrike the intended blow, in order to fulfil the prophecy; ſo that, to juſtify himſelf, he pretended that his words were only to be underſtood of the death of the emperor's ſoul, becauſe he had not been able to kill his body (34).

It is plain, that du Pleſſis's objection remains in it's full force, ſince Coëffeteau's anſwer, taken from Baronius, is altogether inſignificant. We may therefore affirm, that Hildebrand pretended to foretel things, which quickly proved falſe by the event. Mind theſe words of Father Maimbourg (35). He wrote circular letters ‡ to all the faithful, particularly to thoſe of the province of Ravenna, to perſuade them to engage in a confederacy with the Norman princes againſt the anti-Pope. He alſo wrote to the princes of Germany, and exhorted them to make war againſt Henry, promiſing all of them, that they ſhould obtain a glorious victory. But it fell out unluckily for him, that the ſucceſs proved quite contrary to what he had ſo confidently aſſured them of; for, three weeks after he wrote thoſe letters, bearing date the twenty ſecond of September, the armies of Henry and Rodolphus came to a furious engagement * on the fifteenth of October, upon the banks of the river Elleſtre near Mersburg in Saxony (36). Here is a dilemma: either Hildebrand believed, that his prediction would come to paſs, or he did not believe it. If he believed it, he muſt be called a falſe prophet; if he did not believe it, but only deſigned to encourage the rebels, he ought to be called an impoſtor, who, by an execrable policy, ſacrificed the ſacredneſs of prophecy, and the honour of the holy name of God, to his temporal intereſt. We have ſeen, in our days, ſome interpreters of the Apocalypſe, who may be confounded by a like dilemma. Hildebrand's craft puts me in mind of the article DEJOTARUS (37). Thoſe, who pretend to foretel things to come, take care above all things to have a brazen face, and an inexhauſtible ſource of equivocations, in order to explain events in their favour, though they be never ſo contrary to them. If the enemies meet with worldly proſperity, they ſay, they grow more obdurate, and that it is the true miſery, that was foretold by them. See how Hildebrand applies to the death of the ſoul, what he ventured to foretel concerning the emperor's death. Of what uſe could it be to Rodolphus, that the emperor Henry IV ſhould be damned after a certain number of years, if, before that, Rodolphus was to be killed in a battle gained by that emperor? what ſenſe was there in foretelling the damnation of Henry IV, a prince, who was quickly to triumph over his rival? if Gregory VII had been a true prophet, that triumph would have been the firſt thing foretold by him. This I obſerve, to ſhew the vanity of that Pope's ſubterfuge.

[O] The writers, who ſpeak of him, confute one another.] It is certain, that they run into extreams, ſome againſt Pope Gregory VII, and others againſt the emperor Henry IV. The modern hiſtorian, I have often cited, deſcribes this ſo happily, that I rather chooſe to uſe his expreſſions, than my own. ‘ That ‘ quarrel, ſays he (38), which divided all Europe, and ‘ armed one part of it againſt the other, did ſo prepoſſeſs ‘ and heat the authors, that wrote of it, that I may ‘ very well affirm, there never was ſeen ſo much ‘ animoſity, bitterneſs, and rage, as appears in the ‘ works of thoſe, who have undertaken to vindicate ‘ either of thoſe parties, and who, by reaſon of their ‘ paſſion and prejudices, run into extreams. For, ‘ beſides that they are not ſparing of the moſt injurious words, againſt all the rules, I will not ſay ‘ of Chriſtianity, but of common morality, and even ‘ humanity; ſome, after the ſchiſmatical cardinal Benno, ‘ revile in a moſt horrid manner the memory of ‘ Gregory VII, and repreſent him as the moſt wicked and execrable of all men: and others, on the ‘ contrary, will have it, that he had all the perfections requiſite in a pontiff, and beſtow upon him ‘ the greateſt encomiums they can think of.’ The better to judge of the hiſtorians of that time, it will not be improper to conſider what was written for or againſt the league under Henry III, and Henry IV. How many falſe ſtories and calumnies were then publiſhed? I forbear alledging any inſtance of a later date; and I am perſuaded, that thoſe, who are moſt prepoſſeſſed, will grant me, that future ages would be very unjuſt, ſhould they judge of our principal actors by the libels daily printed on both ſides, in which every body vents, with the utmoſt confidence, not what he knows, but what he forges and takes up in the ſtreets. I write this in the year 1695.

[P] What they ſay of his being a magician has all the air of a fiction.] Cardinal Benno ſays (39), that he learned magic of Theophilactus, who was Pope Benedict IX, of Laurence his companion, of the archbiſhop of Melfi, and of John arch-prieſt of San Giovanni Porta Latina, who was Pope Gregory VI, ‘ who, by converſing with devils, and the flying ‘ and ſinging of birds (40), pretended to know what ‘ paſſed in the remoteſt countries, the ſucceſs of wars, ‘ and the death of princes. That, as long as they ‘ lived, even when they were Popes, he was the ‘ chief miniſter and accomplice of their faſcinations. ‘ . . . . That, one day, coming from Alba, he left ‘ behind him a book of necromancy, he uſed to ‘ carry about him, which perceiving, when he came ‘ to the gate of the Lateran, he ſent back two of ‘ his truſty friends to fetch it, ſtrictly forbidding ‘ them to look into it: but their curioſity prompted ‘ them to read it, and immediately the angels of Satan appeared to them in great numbers, who frighted ‘ them almoſt out of their ſenſes, &c. That it was ‘ an uſual thing with him, when he ſhook his ſleeves, ‘ to ſend out fire and flames, and the like.’ Coëffeteau complains (41) of Du Pleſſis's et cætera.

Then ſome of them went thither, and found the thing as he had ſaid.

However it be, I can affirm, that no Pope was ever ſo well or ſo ill ſpoken of as our Gregory VII. Many miracles are aſcribed to him, and he has been placed in the catalogue of ſaints (k). It is ſaid, that his body was found almoſt entire five hundred years after his death [Q]; and we may very well wonder at the uncertainty of hiſtory, when we read the apologies publiſhed by his favourers [R].

The

‘He forgets the beſt, ſays he; for Benno adds, that the wicked ſpirits urged thoſe two ſervants to tell them why they had called for them, and given them ſo much trouble: command us quickly to do what you deſire we ſhould do, ſaid thoſe devils to the ſervants, otherwiſe we will fall upon you, and torment you. Whereupon the youngeſt ſaid to them, pull down thoſe walls quickly; pointing at the high walls of Rome, which was near: at the ſame inſtant thoſe ſpirits threw down the walls of Rome, and the two young men, making the ſign of the croſs, returned to their maſter in a great fright.’ Coëffeteau will have it, that Du Pleſſis was aſhamed to inſert this laſt ſtory in his book, no author of that age having mentioned this overthrow of the walls of Rome. GOD forbid that I ſhould ſuſpect Du Pleſſis of having deſignedly left out the moſt fabulous part of Benno's paſſage; but I dare ſay, he had not done amiſs, if he had omitted his Et cætera upon ſuch an occaſion. His apologiſt charges Coëffeteau with a falſification. He ſhould not, ſays he (42), have put in the margin, that no author of that age mentions the overthrow of the walls of Rome. Benno does not mention it neither; he only ſays of that young man, oſtendit illis muros altos vicinos Romæ, quos in momento maligni ſpiritus dejecerunt; that he ſhewed them ſome high walls near Rome, which were immediately pulled down by thoſe evil ſpirits; and therefore he ſaid nothing of the walls of Rome, near which ſome old walls might fall down, though the hiſtorians do not mention it. The ſincerity I pretend to does not allow me to declare againſt Coëffeteau; for I am perſuaded he is wrongfully cenſured: Muros altos vicinos Romæ are the very walls of Rome, from which thoſe two men were at a ſmall diſtance, and not ſome other walls, that were in the neighbourhood of Rome. This is an inſtance of the equivocations of the Latin tongue. How many diſputes do they not occaſion?

Here follows the judgment Naudé made of cardinal Benno's narrative. ‘I can hardly believe, ſays he, that ſuch ſtrange things can be ſaid of the moſt profligate man in the world, as this author relates of that Pope, and occaſionally of Sylveſter II, John XX, XXI, and Benedict IX, who, as he ſays, by virtue of his magic, made women run after him through woods and mountains, and foretold things to come. But theſe ſtories are nothing, if compared with what he adds concerning archbiſhop Laurence, who very well underſtood the language of birds, and Gregory VII, who threw the holy hoſt into the fire, attempted upon the emperor's life, cauſed ſix Popes to be poiſoned by his confident Gerard Brazutus, and had ſo well learned magic of Theophylactus and Laurence, Sylveſter's diſciples, that he ſent out fire by ſhaking his arms, and a thundering noiſe out of his ſleeves. But this author is too full of ſuch ſtories to be credited; and ſince he had a mind to ſlander the Popes, he ſhould have done it with more modeſty and judgment (43).’ Satirical writers ſhould continually think upon theſe laſt words. They will do too much, and do not enough, Ipſa ſibi obſtat magnituao (44): they diſcredit true matters of fact by mixing ſeveral falſe ſtories with them. It were better for them to leave out ſome things, than to add needleſs ones (45). The maxim, dimidium plus toto (46), ſhould be their conſtant rule. Father Maimbourg (47) obſerves, that the calumnies, publiſhed againſt Gregory VII, came to nothing, becauſe they were too heinous, too groſsly invented by men blinded with paſſion, and highly improbable.

[Q] It is ſaid, that his body was found almoſt entire five hundred years after his death.] He was buried at Salerno in St Matthew's church, which he conſecrated not long before he died. [R] The apologies publiſhed by his favourers.] He who moſt ſignalized himſelf for this Pope was a German Jeſuit (50): he produces fifty holy and learned authors, as he calls them, who gave a good character of Gregory VII. Amongſt whom he reckons Paulus Bernriedenſis, and Gerochus, or Gerhohus Reicherſpergenſis. Du Pleſſis thought (51), that this Gerochus wrote the Life of Gregory VII, and has quoted ſomething from him upon the credit of Aventinus. But he is charged with a double miſtake: His adverſaries maintain (52), 1. That Gerochus did not write that life, but only mentioned (53) ſeveral things relating to that Pope's quarrel with the emperor. 2. That he does not ſay what du Pleſſis quotes him for. Gerochus's book, publiſhed at Ingoldſtadt in the year 1611, is alledged in order to prove it. Rivet replies (54), that one is not obliged to depend on that edition, as being procured by the Jeſuit Gretſer, who perhaps left out what he thought fit. This Jeſuit maintains (55), that the Words, aſcribed to Gerochus, are Aventinus's. He talks in a very haughty ſtrain againſt thoſe, who ſhall be ſo bold as to doubt ſtill of that Pope's innocence, after his apology, and the pieces publiſhed by Sebaſtian Tegnagel, the emperor's library-keeper. ‘Quid Benno & Sigebertus, Gregorii VII calumniatores, ſi conferantur cum tot ſanctiſſimis & doctiſſimis ſcriptoribus à parte Gregorii VII ſtantibus, quorum in apologia pro eodem pontifice, quinquaginta protulimus, recitatis eorum verbis; ex quibus nonnulli interea integri in lucem venerunt, ut Paulus Bernriedenſis, & Gerochus, ſeu Gerhohus Reicherſpergenſis, ut taceam præclara illa antiquorum monumenta, quæ in defenſionem Gregorii VII. jam olim ſcripta, nuper ex tenebris eruit vir clariſſimus dominus Sebaſtianus Tegnagel, J. U. D. Cæſareus Viennæ bibliothecarius, quorum fulgore tam priſcorum, quàm recentium in Gregorium VII convicia adeo obnubilantur, ut jam non niſi à noctuis, ululis, veſpertilionibus & nycticoracibus, & ſi quæ ſunt aliæ hujus generis caliginis patientes, lucis impatientes aves, conſpiciantur (56).—— What are Benno and Sigebert, the calumniators of Gregory VII, when compared with ſo many holy and learned writers, favourers of that Pope, fifty of whom I have produced, in my apology for him: Among whom, ſome have come to light entire, as Paulus Benriedenſis, and Gerochus, or Gerhohus Reicherſpergenſis; to ſay nothing of thoſe excellent remains of antiquity, which, having been formerly written in defence of Gregory VII, were lately brought to light by Sebaſtian Tegnagel, doctor of the laws, the emperor's librarian at Vienna; by the luſtre of which, both ancient and modern, the calumnies againſt Gregory VII are ſo darkened, that, at preſent, they are viſible only to owls, and bats, and ſuch like birds of the night.’

AVENTINUS diffamed.

Is it poſſible that Aventinus ſhould be guilty of what is laid to his charge? It is affirmed, that, in order to abuſe the Popes more maliciouſly, he pretended to have found in old books the ſatirical reflexions, he had himſelf forged. ‘Quis vel obiter in Aventino verſatus neſcit, Aventinum ſine fronte in pontifices maledicta jacere, & ne impudentiæ accuſetur mentiri talia à veteribus vel dicta vel prodita de pontificibus,

The anonymous writer of a book, intituled, l'Eſprit des cours de l'Europe (l), which comes out monthly, has made a reflexion, which I ſhall examine. It concerns what I have ſaid in the remark [B], concerning the Popes conqueſts. He thinks they were not ſo difficult as I imagine [S], and that one ought rather to wonder they have not been

'cum ipſe ex hæretico ſuo cerebro omnia hujus generis exſculpſerit, & quæ olim dicta vel ſcripta voluiſſet, dicta vel ſcripta fuiſſe, cynico prorſus ore affirmet (57). —— Who is there ſo little converſant in Aventinus, as not to know, that he impudently ſlanders the Popes, and, to avoid the charge of impudence, pretends, that ſuch and ſuch things were ſaid of the Popes, when he himſelf forged all thoſe things in his heretical brain, and whatever he would have to have been ſaid or written, affirms to have been ſaid or written, with the aſſurance of a Cynic?

To prove this it is alledged, that he quotes Gerochus for ſome matters of fact, that are not to be found in the manuſcript of that author. This ſeems to be a ſtrong objection; but then Aventinus's favourers may ſay, that Gretſer falſified his edition of Gerochus (58). It may be ſaid in anſwer to Gretſer, that it is not very likely Aventinus ſhould have vented his own ſlanders under the name of an ancient author, ſince he might have found many ancient writers, who did not ſpare the court of Rome. It was but naming thoſe authors: the zealous Papiſts take care to complain, that the enemies of the holy ſee, 'are daily buſy in looking out for the proofs and calumnies, which they cannot find in good writers among the tombs and old ſhores of ſchiſmatics; and, as the civilian Michael Ritius has well obſerved *; 'Antiquos & manuſcriptos libros in latebroſis lucis laborioſe evolvunt, & ex fœtido pulvere auctores quoſvis excitant, quos licentioſe in ipſos Pontifices ſcripſiſſe deprehendunt. —— They, with great pains, turn over ancient manuſcripts in obſcure holes and corners, and diſturb the duſt of old authors, whom they find to have written freely againſt the Popes. Witneſs the collection of Matthias Flaccius Illiricus, intituled, Catalogus teſtium veritatis, which cannot be better compared than with Poneropolis, a town built by Philip of Macedonia; for, as it was only inhabited by people baniſhed for their crimes, and by villains, and in general by all the raſcals of that country, ſo it may be truly ſaid, that, excepting the paſſages corrupted out of the fathers and councils, that large catalogue is only ſtuffed with fragments and ſcraps of thoſe, who formerly ſet up againſt the church, or were cut off from the body of it as rotten members; ſuch as was, among a great many others, the falſe cardinal Benno (59).'

[S] The author of l'Eſprit des Cours de l'Europe pretends, that the Popes Conqueſts were not ſo difficult as I imagine.] His reflexion may be divided into two parts: in the firſt, he pleaſantly and ingeniouſly jeſts upon the Popes power; and in the ſecond, he plainly and ſeriouſly affirms, that it was an eaſy thing for them to aggrandize themſelves. The ingenious ironies, contained in the firſt part, are ſuch, that an Ultramontane doctor might well be deceived by them, and ſeriouſly make uſe of them as good proofs; and therefore it will not be improper to bring them to a diſcuſſion. 'Is it not ſaid, that every knee ſhall bow before the inviſible head? how can the viſible head want power to overthrow all his enemies? how could he miſs confounding all thoſe, who durſt oppoſe him? the viſible head acts only by the power of the inviſible one: if the maſter is always victorious, the vicar muſt needs be ſo too. This miracle is an article of faith, nay, it is the great ſpring of religion: religion ought to ſubdue the body as well as the mind; no body denies it: It has a power over the whole man: ſince rewards are propoſed to the material ſubſtance as well as to the ſpiritual one, both of them ought equally to undergo the yoke of the laws, and threatenings concern both of them alike. This principle being once overthrown, what would become of the holy inquiſition? that divine tribunal would then have no other foundation but a barbarous cruelty, and all the arms of that ſacred arſenal would have been forged in the fire of hell. The Pope is therefore maſter both of the bodies and ſouls; and becauſe his authority over the conſcience is unlimited, his power over the body ought to be invincible. Beſides, did not the oeconomy of ſalvation require, that power ſhould be no leſs extenſive than knowledge? what would it avail a head divinely eſtabliſhed to know every thing, if he had not the power of diſpoſing of every thing? It were to no purpoſe for that Hercules to cruſh the monſters of error, if he had not the right of deſtroying the monſters of impiety. This right takes in kings and princes, who, though they command whole nations, are neverthele ſs the ſubjects of the church. The Popes oppoſed thoſe great ſubjects, whenever they revolted againſt that good mother: they made uſe of an infinite power againſt them; how then could they be worſted? this is the true unravelling of the glorious and wonderful ſucceſs of the new Roman monarchy (60).' This diſcourſe, being ſeriouſly underſtood, would afford this argument, that as ſoon as the biſhops of Rome were looked upon as the vicars of JESUS CHRIST, whoſe power over the body and ſoul is unlimited, they could not fail eaſily to eſtabliſh their empire over the people, and even over the temporalities of ſovereigns. A diſtinction will be ſufficient to reſolve this difficulty. Tho' it be ſuppoſed, that CHRIST eſtabliſhed a vicar in his church; yet common ſenſe and reaſon will teach us, that he eſtabliſhed him, not as he is the ſupream maſter and creator of all things, but as he is a mediator between GOD and men, or the founder of a religion, which ſhews men the way to ſalvation, and promiſes a glorious reward to the faithful, and threatens the impenitent with ſevere puniſhments. If CHRIST had eſtabliſhed a vicar upon earth, his power would be confined within thoſe bounds; and the moſt that vicar could do, were only to determine which is the doctrine of ſalvation, and which is that of damnation. After having declared to men future rewards and puniſhments, after having inſtructed and cenſured them, he would be obliged to leave to GOD the execution of the threatenings, not only with reſpect to the torments of another life, but alſo with reſpect to the corporal puniſhments inflicted in this world. CHRIST himſelf acted in the ſame manner: he exactly conformed to the true ſpirit of religion, which conſiſts in inſtructing and ſanctifying the ſoul, and leading it to ſalvation by way of perſuaſion, without aſſuming the authority of corporally puniſhing the obſtinate and unbelievers, who were ſo many; for it is not true, that in this reſpect the head and maſter of the church is always victorious (61). And therefore thoſe, who were moſt fully perſuaded, that the Pope is CHRIST's vicar, ſhould have looked upon his pretending to a temporal juriſdiction, and to the authority of puniſhing the body, as an ill uſe he made of his vicarſhip. This ſhould have naturally produced many obſtacles to the conqueſts of the biſhop of Rome. It is not uſeleſs to know every thing, tho' one has not the power of diſpoſing of every thing. Religion needs only teach men what they ought to believe and practiſe: it needs only put them in a capacity of confuting error, and it is only in that ſenſe that the authority of deſtroying the monſters of hereſy and impiety belong to it. If men do not act according to the knowledge it affords them, it belongs to GOD to puniſh them for it as being without excuſe: This is not the buſineſs of religion, nor part of the miniſtry eſtabliſhed by JESUS CHRIST. I proceed to the ſecond part of the reflexion of the anonymous writer.

'But, not to take ſuch a high flight, and to ſpeak more humanly, I find nothing that is very ſurpriſing in the Popes greatneſs. By the help of ſome paſſages of holy writ, they have perſuaded the world of their divinity. Is this a new thing? Is it not uſual with men to ſuffer themſelves to be impoſed upon in point of religion? above all things they love to deify their fellow-creatures, as Paganiſm makes it plain. Now if it be once ſuppoſed, that the Popes could eaſily eſtabliſh the divine privileges of their office; was it not natural for people to declare for them againſt all other powers? for my part, I am ſo far from admiring their elevation, that I wonder they did not arrive at univerſal monarchy. The great number of princes, who have been greater, than that they have been ſo great. I ſhall ſay ſomething of a book lately printed

‘ have ſhaken off the Roman yoke, confounds me: when I enquire into the reaſon of it, I can only think of theſe two cauſes, which are very general and well known, that men do not always act according to their principles, and that this preſent life makes a deeper impreſſion upon them, than the future (62).’ Suppoſe, as this ingenious writer will have it, that the Popes could eaſily make the world believe they were Gods upon earth, that is to ſay, that being the viſible heads of the church, they might authoritatively declare what is heretical or orthodox, regulate ceremonies, and command all the biſhops of of the Chriſtian world: will it follow from thence, that they could eaſily ſet up their authority over kings, and bring them under their yoke without any difficulty? I confeſs I do not ſee this conſequence. On the contrary, it ſeems to me, that, in all appearance, their ſpiritual authority would run a great danger by their attempting upon the temporalities of kings. The Athenians were told one day, have a care that your concern for heaven do not make you loſe the earth (63). The Popes might have been told in a contrary ſenſe, have a care, that your great deſire of getting the earth do not make you loſe heaven: you will be deprived of the ſpiritual power, if you pretend to uſurp the temporal. It is well known, that the moſt orthodox princes are more tender of their ſovereignty than of religion: a thouſand examples ancient and modern prove it: and therefore it was not likely they ſhould ſuffer the church to invade their demeſnes and rights; and it was likely they would rather increaſe their authority to the prejudice of the church, than ſuffer the power of the church to increaſe to the prejudice of their temporal power. Princes, who underſtand the art of reigning, have generally the gentry and the ſoldiery at their command; and when that part of their ſubjects remain faithful to them, they need not be afraid of the clergy; their troops will fight for them againſt all ſorts of enemies. The army of Charles V made war againſt Clement VII. The troops of France fought againſt Julius II, for Lewis XII, and would have done the ſame for Lewis XIV, againſt Alexander VII, not long before the peace of Piſa (64) delivered the Pope from the ſtorm ready to fall upon him. I was at Mr Juſtel's at Paris, in the year 1675, when a noveliſt affirmed, that the count de Vignori, governour of Triers, made this anſwer to the monks, who repreſented to him, that the convents he pulled down, to fortify the town, had been founded by Charlemagne; I do but execute the king's orders, and, if he ſhould command me to raiſe a battery againſt the holy ſacrament, I would do it. Francis Mendoſa de Corduba was not ſo paſſionate in the anſwer he made to a letter of the emperor, the thirtieth of December 1598; but he did not want much of it. He wrote to him, that if his imperial majeſty was with his power on the one ſide, and the holy father the Pope with his excommunication on the other, commanding him once more to retire, he would not do it, ſince he had a maſter who had ordered him to perform his exploits, unleſs he was obliged by force of arms to do otherwiſe (65). We may add, that kings and emperors are able to beſtow ſo many favours and noble rewards upon ſo many people, that they may eaſily bring over to their party many prelates and monks, and put them upon writing againſt the pretenſions of the court of Rome. This paper-war, in all appearance, muſt needs be very prejudicial to the pontiffs, who uſurp a temporal authority; for it is eaſy to ſhew, by ſeveral expreſs texts of ſcripture, by the ſpirit of the goſpel, by ancient tradition, and the practice of the firſt centuries, that the Popes have no manner of ground to pretend to diſpoſe of crowns, and to ſhare, in ſo many things, the rights of ſovereignty. Nay, this may ſerve to bring into queſtion their ſpiritual authority; and, being thus upon the defenſive, as to that point, they muſt needs be reduced to great ſtraits. Nay, the very articles, which the people came to believe by degrees, will run a great hazard. Beſides, the clergy, whom the court of Rome will force to abſtain from marriage, will be thereby diſpoſed to ſerve their princes, which is no inconſiderable thing. Thoſe, who cannot bear that yoke, are innumerable: the honeſt clergymen, who cannot live in celibacy, are moſt fond of marriage; for thoſe, who are not conſcientious, do not ſcruple to keep concubines. Celibacy is intolerable to a vaſt many people: marriage is to them the deareſt and moſt precious of all the ſacraments; and whoever ſhould write a book on this ſubject like that of the Frequent Communion, would become as odious as Mr Arnauld, when he publiſhed, under this title, but on another ſubject, a work, which has made a great deal of noiſe. Therefore one ſhould have thought, that princes and emperors would find great numbers of biſhops, prieſts, and monks, well-affected towards them, and ready to ſerve them againſt the Popes zealous promoters of celibacy. Now what may not a prince expect, who, beſides great armies, has ſo many clergymen at his diſpoſal, who cannot be without women, and are extreamly deſirous of having wives and children?

But, in order to know, whether ſuch conjectures about the obſtacles, the Popes would meet in their way, would have been well grounded, we muſt have recourſe to experience, and conſult hiſtory; whereby it will appear, that thoſe conjectures would have been right as to the obſtacles, though perhaps wrong in pretending that thoſe obſtacles would prove inſurmountable. Read du Pleſſis's book, intituled, Le Myſtere d'Iniquité, or l'Hiſtoire de la Papauté, and you will find, in every chapter, the progreſs, and the oppoſition. The Popes cannot go forward, and get ground, but by overcoming the obſtacles they meet with at every ſtep. Armies and books, ſermons, libels, and prophecies, have been made uſe of againſt them; nothing was left unattempted to put a ſtop to their conqueſts, and at laſt every thing proved inſignificant. Why? Becauſe they uſed all imaginable means to ſucceed in their deſigns. Their excommunications have been ſupported with arms and cruſades, and by the tribunals of the inquiſition: craft, violence, courage, and artifice, have concurred to protect them. Their conqueſts have coſt the lives of as many men, or near as many, as thoſe of the commonwealth of Rome. Many writers apply to new Rome what Virgil obſerves concerning the old.

Zipporah told Moſes, Surely a bloody huſband art thou to me (68); but if the church of Rome were the ſpouſe of JESUS CHRIST, he might tell her with much more reaſon, Surely a bloody ſpouſe art thou to me.

I think this ſufficient to juſtify the propoſitions, which I inſerted in the firſt edition of this dictionary, in the remark [B] of this article. I am ſtill perſuaded, that the power, the Popes have attained to, is one of the greateſt prodigies of human hiſtory, and one of thoſe things, which never happen twice. If it had never happened, I believe it would never be. Future ages would not afford a time ſo proper for ſuch an enterprize, as paſt ages have been; and if that great ſtructure ſhould be deſtroyed, it were in vain to undertake to raiſe it up again. All that the court of Rome can do now, with the greateſt policy in the world, is to maintain herſelf. Her conqueſts are at an end (69). She dares not excommunicate a crowned head; and how often is ſhe obliged to diſſemble her reſentment againſt the Catholic party, who deny the ſuperiority and infallibility of the Popes, and burn the books that are moſt favourable to them? If there was now an anti-papacy, I mean a ſchiſm, like thoſe, which have been ſo frequent in former times, when a Pope ſet up againſt a Pope, and a council againſt a council;

She would not come off with honour, ſhe would be confounded, and at her wit's end. Such a contraſt, in ſuch an age as ours, would prove deſtructive. Obſerve by the bye, in order to have a right notion of the great obſtacles above-mentioned, that the Popes were obliged to make themſelves maſters of many general councils. This was a very difficult taſk; for the more numerous a council is, the more it is like a ſhip toſſed with contrary winds, and expoſed to the violent ſtorms, thus deſcribed by Virgil:

> Incubuêre mari, totumque à ſedibus imis
> Unà Eurusque Notuſque ruunt, creberque procellis
> Africus; & vaſtos volvunt ad littora fluctus.
> Inſequitur clamorque virûm, ſtridorque rudentum.
> Eripiunt ſubitò nubes cœlumque diemque
> Teucrorum ex oculis: ponto nox incubat atra.
> Intonuêre poli: & crebris micat ignibus æther (71).

> Together, from their caverns, eaſt and weſt,
> And ſouth, ſtill brewing tempeſts in his breaſt,
> Ruſh on the ocean with impetuous roar,
> And roll enormous billows to the ſhore.
> Th' affrighted ſeamen dread th' impending wreck,
> Whilſt the tough cables in the tempeſt crack.
> The gathering clouds, ſpread o'er the heavenly way,
> Snatch from the Trojans eyes the light of day.
> Night hovers o'er the deep: loud thunders roll,
> And the quick light'nings dart from pole to pole.

The ſteering of ſuch a ſhip requires the utmoſt art and ſkill; and if the beſt working is ſufficient to bring it into the deſigned harbour, it is a wonder.

[T] I ſhall ſay ſomething of a book . . . . with this title, Hiſtoire des Amours de Gregoire VII.] The whole title runs thus: Hiſtoire des Amours de Gregoire VII, du Cardinal de Richelieu, de la Princeſſe de Condé, & de la Marquiſe d'Urfé. Par Mademoiſelle D. A Cologne chez Pierre le Jeune MDCC. Though the author uſes the word romance in the firſt lines of the preface, he affirms, that theſe ſtories are all true, and might have been longer, if he had been willing to exerciſe his invention. This is the higheſt pitch of boldneſs: one may eaſily perceive it now by the meer reading of his book; but can any one ſay, that it will not be a difficult thing in future ages? Let us ſuppoſe, that ſuch a book had been written in the time of Gregory VII; is it not very likely, that Aventinus or Flacius Illyricus, finding it in a library, would have made uſe of it as a true hiſtory? Would it not be quoted every day, as a genuine piece, in all controverſial books? Do we know what will happen between the XVIIIth and the XXVIIIth centuries? Perhaps ignorance and barbarity will prevail again, and then learning will be revived. Perhaps a thouſand good books will be deſtroyed, and this will be preſerved. Perhaps a curious perſon will find it out, and it will be accounted an invaluable piece of ſecret hiſtory, and a certain monument of cardinal Richelieu's amours, &c. People have been impoſed upon by ſuch books more than once, and it is likely will be ſo in future ages.

GREGORY (Peter), a native of Toulouſe, taught the civil law firſt at Cahors, and then in the town, where he was born. He flouriſhed in the XVIth century. He was a very learned man, and wrote ſome books full of great erudition [A]; but he does not appear very judicious in the choice of the things contained in them. What was ſaid of his book de Republica, may be applied to all his works [B]. He was invited into Lorrain in a very glorious manner, to be profeſſor of the civil and canon law at Pontamouſſon (a), where duke Charles had lately founded an univerſity. See the margin (b). He diſcharged the duties of that place with great reputation, till the year 1527, in which he died [C]. He was buried in the convent of the nuns of St Clara (c). He underſtood the Hebrew tongue [D]. If Mr Colomiés had known it, he would have taken notice of it in his Gallia Orientalis.

[A] He wrote books full of great erudition.] This any one may be convinced of, that will peruſe never ſo little his book, intituled, Syntagma Juris univerſi atque Legum pene omnium Gentium, & Rerumpublicarum præcipuarum, in tres partes digeſtum, in quo divini & humani Juris totius, naturali ac nova methodo per gradus, ordineque, materia univerſalium & ſingularium ſimulque judicia explicantur. It is a large folio, which has been reprinted many times (1). His other works are, Syntaxis Artis mirabilis. De Republica, Libri XXVI. Two volumes upon the canon-law: the firſt contains Partitiones totius Juris Canonici, in quinque libros digeſtæ, Scholiis & Annotationibus illuſtratæ inſtar Syntagmatis totius Juris Eccleſiaſtici, quæ à methodo Partitionum Ciceronis Oratoriarum diverſæ, Summam potius Hoſtienſis imitantur: The ſecond volume contains, Commentaria & Annotationes in Decretalium proœmium. Ad Tit. de ſumma Trinitate & fide Catholica. De conſtitutionibus. De reſcriptis. De electione enarratio. Ad Cap. conquerente de officio & poteſtate Judicis Ordin. Rei beneficiariæ Eccleſiaſticæ Inſtitutiones. Ad Tit. de Sponſalibus & Matrimoniis. De Uſuris libri tres (2). He wrote againſt Charles du Moulin (§ a), to ſhew, that the council of Trent ought to be received in France.

[(§ a) Under the name of Ræmundus Rufus, if I am not miſtaken, and for the reception of the council of Trent in France, againſt what du Moulin had written to the contrary in his Conſilium ſupra facto Concilii Tridentini. The work of Peter Gregory was inſerted, in 1682, in one of the laſt editions of Charles du Moulin's works, to introduce, as it were, into the world, this little piece, which made it's appearance for the firſt time in the works of this civilian. Rem. Crit.]

[B] What was ſaid of his book de Republica.] Gabriel Naudæus made the following judgment of it. 'Copioſior (Nicolao Bieſio Medico Lovanienſi) extitit 'Gregorius Tholoſanus, ac magis ex arte ſcribens, 'quia Juriſperitus: deſiderantur tamen in eo modus, 'quem ſibi præſcribere non potuit eruditione vulgari 'luxurians; & majeſtas, cui non magis indulſit quàm 'judicio, dum omnia ingerit, & pauca digerit: cæterum valde utilis eſt, & diverſa in ſe continet, propter 'quæ theſauri inſtar haberi poſſit, ubi meliorum auctorum gemmas ac precioſam variæ doctrinæ ſupellectilem poſſis invenire (3). —— Gregory of Toulouſe 'was a writer of more ſcope and art, as being a civilian, than Nicolas Bieſius the civilian of Louvain: 'yet the luxuriancy of his erudition allowed him to ſet 'no bounds to his writing: he wants likewiſe dignity, 'which he no more conſulted than judgment, crowding 'in every thing, and digeſting nothing: however he is 'a very uſeful writer, and full of variety; upon which 'account he may be looked upon as a treaſure, in which 'you may find whatever is moſt valuable in many 'authors.'

[C] The year 1597 . . . . was that in which he died] This I find in Mr Doujat (4); and, becauſe he was this author's countryman, I rely more upon him, than upon Konig, who ſays our Gregory died in the year 1585. The Francfort bookſeller (5) is not exact, when he ſays, in his epiſtle dedicatory of the firſt of March 1599, that, thro' the misfortunes of the times, he could not enjoy the preſence and aſſiſtance of the author (6), when he reprinted the Syntagma Juris univerſi. Would he have ſpoken thus of a man in the year 1599, if he had known, that he had died in the year 1597? He could not be fully excuſed, by ſaying, that this book was ſome years in printing.

[D] He underſtood the Hebrew tongue.] Feltman, a civilian of Germany, ſays ſo; for he calls him, not only virum omni ſtudiorum genere excultiſſimum (7), but alſo, Hebræi Juris ac ſermonis callentiſſimum (8).

GRENAILLE (Francis de), born at Uzerche in the Limouſin, in the year 1616, wrote a great many French books [A], that are very indifferent. He turned monk at Bourdeaux, and then forſook the order at Agen (a). He was made hiſtoriographer to the duke of Orleans. See the Sorberiana [B]. He prefixed his print to his books with a proud inſcription [C]. He informs us in a preface (b), that he was accuſed of a ſtate-crime, and found himſelf in danger of death.

[B] See the Sorberiana.] There you will find theſe words (2): 'At that time there was at Paris one Grenaille, Sieur de Chatonnieres *, a native of Limouſin, of twenty ſix years of age, who all of a ſudden put out a prodigious number of books, ſome of which he intituled, L'honnête Fille, l'honnête Veuve, l'honnête Garçon, and others, La Bibliotheque des Dames. What ſeemed to me commendable in his book, intituled, Le plaiſir des Dames, was, that, in all likelihood, a man of his age had kept in his cloſet, and avoided many debaucheries, to write books: but then there were but few good things in them, and what was good in them had been ſo often printed, that he could expect no great glory by repeating them. His ſtile was inſipid, whereby it appeared that the author wrote only for the ſake of writing. That book, concerning the pleaſures of the ladies, is divided into five parts, Du Bouquet, du Bal, du Cours, du Concert, de la Collation. —— Of the Noſegay, the Ball, the Ring, the Concert, and the Collation. At firſt he handles this queſtion, whether the noſegay adorns the breaſt, or the breaſt the noſegay? And he decides it in favour of the breaſt; being of opinion, that a certain influence proceeds from the two hemiſpheres of a lady, which revives the noſegay, and makes it not only more beautiful, but alſo more laſting.'

[C] He prefixed his print to his books with a proud inſcription.] Sorbiere goes on thus: 'He hopes that theſe fine thoughts will make him immortal; and it is the ſenſe of the motto under his print prefixed to his book, Hac mortales evadimus immortales.' Gueret is ſtill more ſevere upon him. GRETSERUS (James), a very learned man, born at Marcdorf in Germany, turned Jeſuit at ſeventeen years of age, in 1577. He was profeſſor in the univerſity of Ingoldſtadt for a long time [A]. It is ſaid, that, notwithſtanding his application to ſtudy, he was very conſtant at prayers, and that his great learning was attended with a wonderful modeſty. The inhabitants of Marcdorf were very deſirous to have his picture, in order to place it in the town-houſe; but, when he came to know, that they had made an earneſt application to his ſuperiors about it, he was ſorry for it, and told them, that, if they had a mind to get his picture, they needed only draw the picture of an aſs (a). To make themſelves amends, they bought all his works for the uſe of the public. He never uſed his intereſt to procure ſome mark of diſtinction to his nephew, who was a ſtudent. He died at Ingolſtadt the twenty ninth of January, 1625 (b). He was continually ingaged in diſputes with the Proteſtant writers, and in defence of his order. He wrote ſomewhat ſharply againſt them; but he was anſwered in the ſame ſtrain. He compoſed, or tranſlated, a prodigious number of books [B]. Some authors have commended him very much (c). Cardinal du Perron acknowledged, that he was a man of parts; but this commendation of his was attended with a very uncivil clauſe, ſince it reflected upon a moſt illuſtrious and learned nation [C]. A modern author carried this incivility farther than that cardinal, and was juſtly cenſured for it (d).

[A] He was profeſſor at Ingolſtadt for a long time.] He taught there philoſophy three years, morality ſeven years, and ſchool divinity fourteen years (1).

[B] He compoſed . . . . a prodigious number of books.] The catologue of them was publiſhed at Munich in 1674, in 4to, by George Heſerus a Jeſuit. It is a very exact catalogue; and it was printed from the author's original (2). I ſhall only ſet down the titles of ſome of his books. De Sancta Cruce Tomi III. De ſacris Peregrinationibus Libri IV. Three apologies for the life of the founder of the Jeſuits. The refutation of the hiſtory of the Jeſuits. That hiſtory was written by one Haſenmullerus. De Jure & More probibendi Libros noxios Libri II. Controverſiarum Roberti Bellarmini Defenſio Tomi II, in folio. Baſilicon doron, ſeu Commentarius exegeticus in Sereniſſimi Magni Britanniæ Regis Jacobi Præfationem monitoriam; & in Apologiam pro juramento fidelitatis. Many books againſt Goldaſt, and, among others, one intituled, Arnoldi Brixienſis in Melchiore Goldaſto Calviniſta redivivi vera Deſcriptio & Imago (3). Notes upon Thuanus's hiſtory. A treatiſe upon Compelle intrare, an Heterodoxi ad fidem cogendi ſint. An anſwer to du Pleſſis Mornai's book, intituled, Le Myſtere d'Iniquité. This anſwer is more cloſe, and leſs inſtructive, than that of Coëffeteau; but it was eaſier to reply to Coëffeteau, than to Gretſer. The latter has unmercifully ſcanned the quotations, and the leaſt chronological faults. I have mentioned, in another place, what he wrote in vindication of Gregory VII (4). Some authors of his communion call him the ſcourge of heretics, and the terror of the calumniators of the Jeſuits (5). He was well skilled in the Greek tongue, and publiſhed ſome grammatical pieces upon that language, and notes upon ſome Greek authors, as George Codinus Curopalata, John Cantacuzenus, &c. I muſt not forget, that he procured the im reſſion of ſeveral manuſcripts.

They are cardinal du Perron's words. Father Bouhours alledged this teſtimony, when he called in queſtion the wit of the Germans. There was a Frenchman, who took the part of that injured nation, and critized Father Bouhours in the following manner. 'It is in the ſame diſcourſe the author puts this queſtion, whether a German can be a wit? I think the poſſibility of it was never yet doubted of; and it is likely, the author is the firſt, that ever asked ſuch a queſtion. His anſwer to it is, that it is kind of prodigy, that a German ſhould be a very witty man; whereupon he cites cardinal du Perron . . . . . But it does not follow from all this, that the author ſhould have carried the thing ſo far as to make it a queſtion, whether a German can be a wit; and it is the way to be treated with very ill language in German (7).' In another place (8) he ſpeaks thus: this 'is no great ornament, no more than his queſtion, whether a ‘ German can be a wit ? I aſſure you, Sir, that ſome ‘ very wiſe perſons have been offended at it, and ‘ told me, that, if the author of the Entretiens were ‘ more judicious, he would not have been ſo rude ‘ to a nation very much addicted to learning and war, ‘ by whom admirable diſcoveries have been made in ‘ the arts and ſciences, as artillery, printing, and the ‘ ſector ; and who, beſides, are moſt of them our ‘ friends, allies, and neighbours. ’ Cleanthes was not thought to have ſufficiently vindicated the Germans ; and therefore M. Cramer has publiſhed, upon that account, a fine apology for his nation, in a book (9) that came out laſt year. An extract of it may be ſeen in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans (10).

[(§ α) I dare almoſt aſſert, that this expreſſion of cardinal du Perron is not ſo uncivil as it appeared to Mr Bayle. What the French call de l'Eſprit, (wit) is a certain talent for trifling things, or at moſt a kind of vivacity, which in general is little agreeable to the German gravity, and the ſerious character of that nation. When therefore this cardinal ſaid of Gretſer, that he had a great deal of wit (de l'Eſprit) for a German, he ſeems to have meant no more, than that a German has ſeldom ſo much of this French vivacity, as Father Gretſer had, as much a German as that Jeſuit was. I ſay as much of the queſtion, whether a German can be a wit ? no body denies the German nation the moſt refined good ſenſe, the greateſt ſagacity, and the nobleſt ſallies of genius ; and, ſatisfied with this lot, ſhe may look upon the French vivacity as no great prerogative. GREVIUS (JOHN), an Arminian miniſter, born in the duchy of Cleves, was depoſed, and baniſhed, for refuſing to ſubſcribe the canons of the ſynod of Dort ; and becauſe he did not keep in his exile, he was condemned to a perpetual impriſonment [A] ; but, in the year 1621, he made his eſcape out of the priſon. He began there a work, which he publiſhed afterwards [B], wherein he condemns the uſe of the torture. He pretends, that reaſon is for him [C], though the moſt general practice be againſt him. He gives an account of his deliverance in his letter to Vorſtius (a). His impriſonment laſted a year and a half (b). He was admitted miniſter the tenth of May 1605,

[A] He was baniſhed . . . . . and becauſe he did not keep in his exile, he was condemned to a perpetual impriſonment.] He ſays, that tho' he was ſeparated from his flock, yet he continued to take care of it ; and that his flock deſiring he would give them the ſpiritual food, he thought himſelf more obliged to mind their ſalvation, than to obey the ſentence of the magiſtrates, whereby he was forbidden to return into the country. He therefore returned into Holland, and had ſome private meetings at Campen, for the inſtruction of his flock. This thing came to be known ; he was apprehended, and condemned to perpetual impriſonment. Thus the matter is related by him (1). I know no more of it : but I know, that, on this account, he muſt needs be looked upon as a truly honeſt man, who diſcharged his duty. I appeal to thoſe, who maintain, that the miniſters, who return into France, to inſtruct the Proteſtants privately, notwithſtanding the prince's prohibition, do a very noble action. Obſerve, by the by, that perſecution is inconſiſtent with the maxim, Quod tibi fieri non vis alteri ne feceris : you puniſh ſuch a one, and you blame thoſe, who do the ſame.

Revius obſerves, in his hiſtory of Deventer, that Grevius had been miniſter of Heuſden ; and that he came to Campen in November 1619, where he preached eleven times in the houſes of the Arminians (2), [B] He began there a work, which he publiſhed afterwards.] The title of it runs thus : Tribunum reformatum, in quo ſanioris & tutioris juſtitiæ via judici Chriſtiano in proceſſu criminali commonſtratur, rejecta & fugata TORTURA cujus iniquitatem, multiplicem fallaciam, atque illicitum inter Chriſtianos uſum libera & neceſſaria diſſertatione aperuit JOANNES GREVIUS Clivenſ. quam captivus ſcripſit in Ergaſtulo Amſterodamenſi. This work was publiſhed at Hamburgh in the year 1624 (3). It turns upon a very nice ſubject ; for it ſeems one cannot be for the negative, without condemning a practice authoriſed by the laws of the ſtate. The torture is practiſed in moſt countries ; but it ought to be obſerved, that the ſovereigns, who authoriſe it, and even will have it to be a conſiderable part of the proceedings in criminal cauſes, do not impoſe upon private men the neceſſity of believing the lawfulneſs of it. Many learned men at all times, and in all countries, have taken the liberty to ſhew the injuſtice of it. Our Grevius is one of them : his treatiſe is worth reading. Such as have the ſpirit of perſecution ſhould learn from hence, that they are in the wrong to vex and harraſs their enemies, under pretence they do not approve all the uſages of their country, or all the principles of their governors. Subjects are indeed bound to obey the magiſtrates, but not to believe, that they act juſtly and at all times ; and that of two uſages, they have not ſometimes pitched upon the worſt. Nay one may be allowed to write againſt abuſes in a reſpectful manner, that the ſovereign may reform them.

[C] He pretends, in condemning the uſe of the torture, that reaſon is for him.] The author of the Philoſophical Commentary upon theſe words, Compel them to come in (4), quotes a very fine paſſage of Michael de Montagne, wherein the two inconveniencies of the torture are mentioned : one is, that thoſe, who are able to endure the torments, do not ſpeak the truth ; the other is, that thoſe, who cannot bear pain, confeſs things that are falſe. Montagne's words deſerve to be ſet down here at length ; however, I ſhall only direct the reader to the place, where they may be found (5). The ſame commentator obſerves, that Saintmars, who was beheaded at Lyons, in 1642, for high treaſon, ‘ died with great conſtancy, and ex‘ preſſed a great contempt for life ; but, at the ‘ ſame time, ſeemed to be ſo afraid of the rack, that, ‘ if he had been put to it, it is very likely he would ‘ have confeſſed any thing. ’ It were an eaſy thing to collect many authorities and examples, to ſhew the injuſtice of the torture ; for many modern authors have publiſhed collections upon that ſubject. See among others, Ramirez de Prado in the ninth chapter of the Pentecontarchos, Segla in thirty ſixth annotation upon a decree of the parliament of Toulouſe, and Rupert upon the fourth chapter of the ſeventh book of Valerius Maximus. I omit the civilians, who have wrote upon this ſubject, ex profeſſo. Thoſe authors do not fail to mention a paſſage of St Auguſtin (6), wherein the injuſtice of the torture is both ſtrongly repreſented, and weakly excuſed. Ludovicus Vives, in his note upon that paſſage, openly declares againſt the uſe of the torture : but Leonard Coquæus, in his commentary upon the ſame words of St Auguſtin, condemns Vives's opinion, and ſays, that the fathers and the canon law approve, that the torments ſhould be made uſe of, to extort truth from thoſe, who are accuſed. Nor are theſe words of Quintilian forgotten : ‘ Sicut in tormentis quoque ‘ qui eſt locus frequentiſſimus, cùm pars altera quæ‘ ſtionem, vera fatendi neceſſitatem vocet, altera ſæpe ‘ etiam cauſſam falſa dicendi, quòd aliis patientia fa‘ cili mendacium faciat, aliis infirmitas neceſſarium (7) : ‘ —— As in the caſe of the torture, which is a very ‘ common topic, when the one ſide calls the rack a ‘ neceſſity laid on the accuſed of confeſſing the truth ; ‘ the other, the occaſion likewiſe of ſaying what is ‘ falſe ; becauſe patience makes ſome eaſily guilty of a ‘ lye, and infirmity lays others under a neceſſity of be‘ ing ſo.’ Nor theſe of Ulpian (8).’ Statutum eſt non ‘ ſemper fidem tormentis, ne tamen nunquam adhi‘ bendam fore. Etenim re eſt fragilis (quæſtio) & pe‘ riculoſa, & quæ veritatem fallat : nam plerique pa‘ tientiâ, ſive duritia tormentorum, ita tormenta con‘ temnunt, ut exprimi eis veritas nullo modo poſſit : ‘ alii tanta ſunt impatientia, ut quævis mentiri, quàm ‘ pati tormenta velint. Ita fit, ut etiam vario modo ‘ fateantur, ut non tantùm ſe, verum etiam alios cri‘ minentur.

1605, and that very day he preached his firſt ſermon at Arnheim. This I find in a letter, which he wrote, in 1620, to Balthazar Brantius (c), who intreated him to forſake the party of the Remonſtrants.

minentur. —— It is agreed, that we are not always to believe what is extorted by the rack, but not that we are never to give credit to it. The torture is a dangerous thing, and which ſometimes deceives the truth: for many perſons are ſo hardened againſt pain, as to deſpiſe the torture, and can by no means be brought to confeſs the truth: others are ſo unable to endure pain, that they will tell any lye rather than ſuffer the torture: hence it is, that they ſay and unſay, and accuſe, not only themſelves, but others.’ I have obſerved in another place (9), that the Cappadocians could ſtoutly endure the greateſt torments: the ſame has been ſaid of the (10) Egyptians and Spaniards (11). Obſerve, that the torture is not practiſed in England; no not againſt thoſe, who are accuſed of high treaſon. Barclay makes this obſervation in the fourth chapter of his Icon Animorum. To conclude, Grevius had a copious ſubject; and as the materials were plentiful, he knew how to make a good uſe of them.

GRIBALDUS (MATTHEW), a learned civilian of Padua, left Italy in the XVIth century, in order to make an open profeſſion of the Proteſtant religion; but, in imitation of ſome other Italians, who turned Proteſtants, he fell into the hereſy of the Antitrinitarians. After he had been profeſſor of the civil-law at Tubingen for ſome years, he left that employment, to avoid the puniſhment he had undergone, if he had been convicted of his errors. He was apprehended at Berne, where he would have been ſeverely uſed, had he not pretended to renounce his opinions; and, becauſe he returned to the mire, and openly favoured the heretics, who had been expelled from Geneva, and particularly Gentilis, whom he harboured in a ſeat he had not far from that town (a), he would have been ſooner or later puniſhed with death [A], if the plague, of which he died in September, 1564, had not prevented his being proſecuted for hereſy. In a journey he took to Geneva, during Servetus's trial, he deſired to have a conference with Calvin, but could not obtain it. Some time after, Calvin ſent him word, that he would admit him to a conference; at which his colleagues, and three elders of the conſiſtory, ſhould be preſent. Gribaldus came to the appointed place, but went away haſtily, when he ſaw that Calvin refuſed to give him his hand. He would not admit his excuſe, that ſuch a thing could not be done, till he and they ſhould agree (b) as to the principles of religion, viz. the Trinity and the divinity of CHRIST (c). He was ſummoned to appear before the magiſtrates, to give an account of his faith; and becauſe his anſwers were not ſatisfactory, he was ordered to leave the town. This is what may be inferred from the letter I quote (d). He wrote ſeveral books, which are eſteemed [B].

[A] He would have been ſooner or later puniſhed with death.] This is what I find in Beza: I ſhall ſet down his words, which prove many things I have advanced. ‘Domi verò Serveti cineres pullulare cœperunt: cujus blaſphemiis favere deprehenſus Matthæus Gribaldus, non incelebris Juriſconſultus quam Genevam forte veniſſet . . . . . deductus ad Calvinum à quibuſdam Italis, quos Patavii docuerat, recuſante Calvino dextram illi porrigere, niſi prius de primario Chriſtianæ fidei articulo, id eſt de ſacra Triade & Deitate Chriſti inter eos conveniret, nullum poſtea locum ullis admonitionibus vel argumentis reliquit. Itaque quod ei jam tum prædixit Calvinus, grave nimirum Dei judicium pertinaci ipſius impietati imminere; hoc reipſa poſtea expertus eſt, Tubinga primùm profugus, quò fuerat Vergerii favore introductus: Bernæ poſtea captus, ſimulatâque abnegatione liberatus, ad ingenium poſtea rediens, & Gentilis illius de quo mox dicemus fautor & hoſpes, ſupervenіente demum peſte correptus, paratum ſibi in terris ſupplicium antevertit (1). —— At home, the aſhes of Servetus began to ſpring up: for Matthew Gribaldus, a famous civilian, who was found to favour the blaſphemies of that man, coming by accident to Geneva . . . . . was introduced to Calvin by ſome Italians, whom he had taught at Padua; but, upon Calvin's refuſing to give him his hand, till they ſhould agree upon the principal article of the Chriſtian faith, the ſacred Trinity, and the divinity of CHRIST, he left no room for any farther admonitions or arguments. This man afterwards experienced the judgment of GOD on his obſtinate impiety, as Calvin at that time foretold him, being firſt baniſhed from Tubingen, whither he had come by the favour of Vergerius; afterwards, being apprehended at Berne, and ſet at liberty upon a pretended recantation, but returning to the ſame ſentiments, and openly favouring and entertaining Gentilis, whom I ſhall ſpeak of preſently, he was ſeized with the plague, and prevented the puniſhment prepared for him in this world.’ It does not appear from theſe words, in what year Gribaldus died; but it is known, that he was no longer alive when Valentinus Gentilis went in queſt of him into the territories of the canton of Berne, in 1566 (2), and it may be proved, That he died in September, 1564 (3). See, above, a paſſage of Languet at the end of the remark [E] of the article GOVEA.

[B] Gribaldus wrote ſeveral books which were eſteemed.] Here follow the titles of them. Commentarii in legem de rerum miſtura, & de jure fiſci: they were printed in Italy (4). Commentarii in Pandectas juris, printed at Lyons. Commentarii in aliquot præcipuos Digeſti, Infortiati novi, & codicis Juſtinianei titulos atque leges utiliſſimis concluſionibus illuſtrati, Francfort 1577 in folio. Hiſtoria Franciſci Spiræ (cui anno 1548, familiaris aderat) ſecundum quæ ipſe vidit & audivit, Baſil 1550. De omni genere homicidii, Spire 1583, in 8vo. De methodo ac ratione ſtudendi in jure civili libri tres, Lyons 1544, & 1556. Probably it is in this laſt book he maintained, that a civilian ought to underſtand hiſtory; and that he ſhewed the miſtakes into which ſome civilians are fallen through ignorance (5). He ſpent only eight days in writing that book (6).

Note, that Sledian confirms, that he was one of the ſpectators of the diſmal condition the unhappy Spiera was reduced to, and that he wrote and publiſhed an account of it, Multi præterea Spieram in eo ſtatu viderunt magni omnis viri, & in his Mathæus Gribaldus, Jureconſultus Patavinus, qui & rem omnem, quam ipſe coràm vidit & audivit, ſcripto complexus in lucem edidit (7).

GRILLON, a gentleman of Provence, one of the moſt valiant men of his time, under the reigns of Henry III, and Henry IV. See his hiſtory in Varillas's preface to the hiſtory of Henry III. That hiſtorian calls him always Crillon, which is the true orthography of his name, though unknown to almoſt all other authors (§ α).

[(§ α) This gentleman ſubſcribed himſelf Crillon in conformity to the orthography of the ancient titles of his houſe ; but, probably, he called himſelf Grillon, in like manner as, notwithſtanding the etymology, we pronounce gril, grotte, migraine. REM. CRIT.]

GROPPER (JOHN) archdeacon of Cologne in the XVIth century, and raiſed to the purple by Pope Paul IV. See his article in Moreri's dictionary, and add to it, that he took it extreamly ill, that Sleidan ſhould endeavour to render him ſuſpected of having once inclined to Lutheraniſm [A].

[A] He took it extremely ill, that Sleiden ſhould endeavour to render him ſuſpected of having once inclined to Lutheraniſm.] Sleidan affirms (1), that Gropper had always very ſtrongly recommended Martin Bucer to Herman de Wida, archbiſhop of Cologne, who made uſe of the miniſtry of the ſame Bucer to eſtabliſh the reformation in his diminions in the year 1543. But, as Gropper threw obſtacles in the way of it, Sleidan would make him paſs for a deſerter, who, after having had an intimacy with that miniſter, ſtrongly oppoſed him. Hujus libri (2) fuit author, ut aiunt, & architectus, Gropperus. Nam is, etſi Bucero fuerat admodum familiaris ante biennium in comitio Ratisbonæ, quamquam inde domum reverſus, vehementer eum non Archiepiſcopo tantùm, ſed paſſim apud omnes prædicaverat, licet crebras ad eum dediſſet & amiciſſimas literas : tamen, quum res eſſet in eum deducta caſum, ab ejus amicitia ſe totum avertit, & principe relicto, cui fortunam omnem debebat, in adverſariorum caſtra tranſiit (3). As to the reſentment of Gropperus, I am going to cite a copyiſt of Surius. 'Sleidan . . . . would make us believe, that . . . . John Gropper was an heretic, and that he had always greatly eſteemed and recommended Martin Bucer. But this ſo valuable a man did plainly ſhew, that, what was ſaid of him was meer calumny, in a book, which he dedicates to Charles V; and again in another place he witneſſes, that Sleidan (whom he repreſents as maliciouſly ignorant of the affairs of the empire) has falſely lied in his hiſtory full of untruths when he ſays ſuch a thing of him, and that Martin Bucer inſinuated himſelf by little and little in the dioceſe of Cologne, not only without his knowledge, and that of all the Catholics, but even in deſpite of them ; and in the ſame place he expreſsly calls Bucer a deteſtible wretch. In truth Sleidan would not have ſaid ſo injurious a thing, without receiving an anſwer had he not died before Gropper could anſwer him in writing, as he had reſolved to do (4).'

Maimbourg does not deny, that Gropper, who was one of the three Catholic doctors, that conferred with Bucer and with two other Proteſtants, at the conference of Ratisbon, in the year 1541, had correſponded after that time with Bucer; but it is, adds he (5), 'becauſe, this preacher of Strasburg, convinced by the reaſons, which that excellent man produced in that conference, gave him room to believe, by the letters, which he wrote to him, that he was prepared to renounce Luther, as he had already done Zuinglius, and to return to the Catholic church.' However it be, the copyiſt of Surius obſerves, that Gropper, in his in his return from this conference of Ratisbon, 'caſt his eyes on the books of Bucer, and, to prove the conſtancy of the man, he compared them with the articles, that had been agreed upon in the ſaid conference. Then he met with an immenſe number of points directly oppoſite to thoſe, which Bucer had admitted and approved in that conference ; and nevertheleſs he remarked ſome villanous repugnancies of the ſaid Bucer, errors, lyes, and blaſphemies ſo great, that the Manicheans never uttered the like, that if any one deſires farther information in this matter, he muſt read what the learned Everard de Billy (6), has written, in defence of the judgment of the univerſity and clergy of Cologne, againſt the calumnies of Melancthon, Bucer, and others, in which he will find this matter fully handled (7).' Surius and his copyiſt alledge this, in order to have an opportunity of ſaying that Sleidan is a liar. They expreſs great rage againſt him in this and an hundred other places.

GROTIUS (CORNELIUS), in Dutch, de Groot, that is the Great, was born the 25th of July 1544, at Delft, where his family had been illuſtrious for the ſpace of four hundred years [A]. He went there, through his ſchool-learning ; and then he was ſent to Louvain, where he ſtudied philoſophy four years. He applied himſelf chiefly to that of Plato [B]. He learned alſo Greek and Hebrew, and even Mathematics. At twenty years of age he went to Paris, where he continued to ſtudy the belles lettres and philoſophy, and was very well beloved by John Daurat, Regius profeſſor. From thence he went to Orleans to learn the civil law ; and when the profeſſors thought he deſerved to be admitted doctor, he was contented to take his licentiate's degree, to which he kept all his life-time. Being returned into his country, he betook

[A] He was born at Delft, Where his family had been illuſtrious for the ſpace of four hundred years.] Here follow the words of the author I have quoted in the text of this article. 'Patrem habuit Hugonem Grotium virum antiqua virtute & opibus pollentem, ex patricia Grotiorum familia quæ in repub. Delphenſi totis quadringentis annis continuis illuſtris, etiam hucuſque conſulatibus & ſummis reipub. honoribus decoratur (1). —— His father was Hugo Grotius, a man of great probity, and wealth, deſcended from the noble family of the Grotii, which, having been famed in the republic of Delft four hundred years, ſtill continues to ſhine in the moſt diſtinguiſhed poſts of the common-wealth.' That author is not exact, and wants to be explained. His words do manifeſtly imply, that the ancient family of the De Groot's continued in the male line down to our Cornelius Grotius ; which is not true : for about the year 1430, Dederic de Groot, burgomaſter of Delft, and illuſtrious by many deputations, had but one daughter, who, marrying Cornelius Cornetz, ſtipulated, that her children ſhould go by the name of de Groot. Which began to be executed in the perſon of Hugh de Groot, the father of our Cornelius. The Cornetz deſcended from a French gentleman, who ſettled in the Low-Countries in the time of the dukes of Burgundy. See the paſſage quoted by me in the remark [E].

[B] He applied chiefly . . . to the philoſophy of Plato.] The author of his elogy expreſſes it in this manner : (2) 'Philoſophiam Platonicam, quippe quam ſolam inter humanæ ſapientiæ ſectas magis divinam (ut re vera eſt) judicavit, adeo avide amplexus eſt, ut omnia Platonicorum ſcripta perſcrutatus fuerit, memoriæ infixerit, ac per totam vitam manu ac mente volutaverit. —— He was ſo fond of the Platonic philoſophy, which he thought (as indeed it is) the moſt divine among the ſects of philoſophy, that he read over all the works of the Platoniſts, got them almoſt by heart, and was perpetually meditating upon them.' betook himſelf to the bar. The city of Delft made him counſellor and echevin at the ſame time; and becauſe he gave ſeveral proofs of his virtue and learning, prince William conferred upon him the office of maſter of the requeſts. He worthily diſcharged the duties of that office till the year 1575, when he was made profeſſor in the univerſity of Leyden, newly founded, where he taught philoſophy for ſome years, and then the civil-law. He was ſo well pleaſed with that employment, that he would not leave it to be counſellor in the great council, though that office was offered him ſeveral times. He died in the year 1601, without iſſue. He left behind him ſome books concerning the civil-law, that have not been printed (a) [C]. He had a brother, whoſe name was JOHN DE GROOT [D], who was the father of HUGH DE GROOT, who makes the ſubject of the following article. They were both the ſons of HUGH DE GROOT, the firſt of his family who went by that name [E], and who died in the year 1567 (b), being burgomaſter of Delft the fifth time.

[C] He

(a) Taken from the book intituled, Illuſtrium Hollandiæ & Weſt-Friſiæ Ordinum Alma Academia Leidenſis, printed at Leyden, in 1614.

(b) Ibid. in Jano Grotio.

[C] He left ſome books concerning the civil-law, that have not been printed.] The ſame author goes on thus: ‘Libros nullos edidit, ſed elaboratos quoſdam commenrios ad diverſas Juris partes conſcripſit. Inter quos Abſolutiſſimum commentarium ad quatuor libros Inſtitutionem juris civilis. Ad omnes titulos quatuor primorum librorum digeſtorum. Duos Tomos commentariorum & obſervationum feudalium. Singularem tractatum continentem quinquaginta differentias feudorum, à feudis Hollandicis. —— He publiſhed no books, but wrote ſome elaborate commentaries on different parts of the civil-law; among which, one, which he intituled, Abſolutiſſimum Commentarium, &c.’ Konig did not obſerve this; for he ſays, that moſt of thoſe books were publiſhed by the author of them (3), and he quotes Swertius and Meurſius, who ſays no ſuch thing (4).

[D] He had a brother, whoſe name was JOHN DE GROOT.] Who, after he had gone through his ſchool-learning at Delft, ſtudied philoſophy and the civil-law at Douay. He returned into Holland, as ſoon as the univerſity of Leyden was founded; and lived, till the year 1582, in the houſe of his brother Cornelius de Groot, profeſſor of the civil-law in that univerſity. Afterwards he was made ſucceſſively Schepen and Burgomaſter of Delft, and curator of the univerſity of Leyden (5); and did not ſcruple to be admitted doctor of law after he had been curator (6). There are ſome of his works written with great politeneſs, if we may believe Moreri; but he is miſtaken: He too much enlarges what Meurſius had already too much amplified. Theſe are Meurſius's words (7): Pater (Hugonis) erat Joannes Grotius cujus exſtant carmina, & Lipſii ad ipſum literæ, Douſæque verſus, nec pauca aliorum monumenta ipſius inſcripta nomini. The plain meaning of which is, That John Grotius had made ſome verſes, which had been publiſhed. But ſince the whole paſſage of Meurſius, is to be found in the life of Grotius, except theſe words, cujus exſtant carmina (8), it is very probable that Meurſius was miſtaken upon that head. Beſides, it is certain, that John Grotius underſtood poetry: Lipſius ſays ſo. ‘Negas agnoſcere te Deas, idque carmine quod agnoſcant ipſæ Deæ. . . . . Carmen totum approbum, nec critica illi à me nota (9). —— You deny, that you acknowledge goddeſſes, and that in a poem which goddeſſes themſelves might acknowledge. . . . The whole poem is perfectly good, nor will I offer to criticiſe it.

[E] HUGH DE GROOT, was the firſt of his family, who went by that name.] This I find in the life of Grotius, prefixed to his works, and among the lives collected by Dr Bates. The paſſage deſerves to be ſet down at length. ‘Avus ei fuit ille Hugo de Groot qui ex illuſtri Cornetziorum gente prognatus, primus Grotianum nomen in familiam ſuam tranſtulit. Quippe cùm circa annum trigeſimum ſeculi decimi quinti in Diderico de Groot ejuſdem itidem civitatis conſule, & non paucis deputationibus ſatis claro, defeciſſet ſtrips maſculina, filia ejus Ermgarda de Groot, domûs ſatis opulentæ hæres, viro Nobiliſſimo Cornelio Cornetzio, qui genus ſuum ex ea Cornetziorum proſapia ducebat, qui ſub Ducibus Burgundiæ ex Gallia in Belgium migraverant, nuptura, matrimonium non iniit, niſi factâ conditione, ne, qui ex eo naſcerentur maſculini ſexûs liberi, alio quam Grotiano nomine nuncuparentur; ita natus Hugo de Groot, ejus Hugonis, de quo loquimur, avus, vir ſupra quam ea tempora ferebant, Latinarum, Græcarum & Hebræarum quoque literarum ſciens. —— His grand-father was that Hugh de Groot, who, being deſcended from the illuſtrious family of the Cornetz, firſt introduced the Grotian name into his family. For the male line failing in Dideric de Groot, chief magiſtrate of the ſame town, and well known by his many deputations, about the year 1430 his daughter Eremgard de Groot, a rich heireſs, being to marry the moſt noble Cornelius Cornetz, deſcended from that branch of the Cornetz, which, under the dukes of Burgundy, tranſplanted itſelf from France into Holland, articled with him, that their male iſſue ſhould bear the name of Grotius: from this marriage ſprung Hugo Grotius, grand-father of that Hugo we are ſpeaking of, a man of uncommon skill in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, for the times he lived in.’ It appears from the ſequel of this paſſage, that this Hugh was burgomaſter of Delft, and married Elſelinge Heemskerk, a woman of a very noble extraction.

GROTIUS (HUGO), one of the greateſt men in Europe, was born at Delft the tenth of April 1583. He made ſo early a progreſs in his ſtudies, that he wrote verſes before he was nine years of age; and at fifteen he had great ſkill in philoſophy, divinity, and the civil-law: But he was ſtill better ſkilled in the belles lettres, as he made it appear by the commentary he wrote at that age upon a very difficult author (a). In the year 1598, he accompanied the Dutch ambaſſador (b) into France, where Henry IV gave him ſeveral marks of his eſteem. He took there his degree of doctor of laws; and, being returned into his country, he applied himſelf to the bar, and pleaded before he was ſeventeen years of age. He was not twenty four years old, when he was made advocate-general. He ſettled at Rotterdam in 1613, and was ſyndic of that town (c); he would not accept of that employment, but upon condition that he ſhould not be deprived of it; for he foreſaw, that the quarrels of divines about the doctrine of grace, which formed already a thouſand factions in the ſtate, would occaſion many revolutions in the chief towns. He was ſent into England in the ſame year, on occaſion of the miſunderſtanding between the merchants of both nations, about which he had written ſomething [A]. He found himſelf ſo far engaged in the affairs, which which ruined Barnevelt, that he was arreſted in Auguſt 1618, and condemned to a perpetual impriſonment, the 18th of May 1619, and to forfeit his eſtate. He was confined to the caſtle of Louveſtein the 6th of June, in the ſame year. Every body knows how he made his eſcape [B], after he had been ſeverely uſed above a year and and a half (d). He retired into France, where he met with a kind reception at court, and had a penſion aſſigned him. The Dutch ambaſſadors endeavoured to prepoſſeſs the king againſt him; but that prince did not mind their artifices, and gave a glorious teſtimony to the virtue of that illuſtrious refugee [C]. Grotius applied himſelf very much to ſtudy, and to compoſe books. The firſt he publiſhed, after he had ſettled in France, was an apology for the magiſtrates of Holland, who had been turned out of their places [D]. He left France, after he had been there eleven years, and returned into Holland full of hopes, by reaſon of a kind letter he had received from prince Frederic Henry; but his enemies prevented the good effects of it [E]; and therefore he was forced once more to leave his country. He reſolved to go to Hamburgh, where he ſtayed till he accepted the offers of the crown of Sweden in the year 1634. Queen Chriſtina made him one of her counſellors, and ſent him ambaſſador to Lewis XIII. Having diſcharged the duties of that employment about eleven years, he ſet out from France to give an account of his embaſſy to the queen of Sweden. He went through Holland, and received many honours at Amſterdam. He ſaw queen Chriſtina at Stockholm; and, after he had diſcourſed with her about the affairs he had been intruſted with, he moſt humbly begged of her, that ſhe would grant ‘excite his countrymen to undertake thoſe things with courage, he wrote a book, Of the right of commerce to the Indies.’ That tract was intituled, Mare liberum, ſive de jure quod Batavis competit ad Indicana commercia diſſertatio, and was printed in 1609. See Colomiés's Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 157.

[B] Every body knows how he made his eſcape.] It was ‘by the advice and artifice of Mary de Regelſberg (2) his wife, who having obſerved, that the guards, being weary of ſearching a large trunk full of books, and linnen to be waſhed at Gorcum, a neighbouring town, let it go without opening it, as they uſed to do, adviſed her husband to put himſelf into it, having made ſome holes with a wimble in the place, where the fore part of his head was, that he might breathe, and not be ſtifled. He followed her advice, and was in that manner carried to a friend of his at Gorcum; from whence he went to Antwerp in the uſual waggon, after he had croſſed the public place in the diſguiſe of a joyner, having a rule in his hands. That artful woman pretended all the while, that her husband was very ſick, to give him time to make his eſcape into a foreign country: but, when ſhe thought that he was ſafe, ſhe told the guards, laughing at them, that the bird was flown. At firſt there was a deſign to proſecute her; and ſome judges were of opinion, that ſhe ſhould be kept in priſon inſtead of her husband: but by a majority of votes, ſhe was releaſed, and praiſed by every body for having, by her wit, procured her husband's liberty (3).’ Such a wife deſerved not only to have a ſtatue erected to her in the commonwealth of learning, but alſo to be canonized; for it is to her we are indebted for ſo many excellent works, publiſhed by her husband, which had never come out of the darkneſs of Louveſtein, if he had remained there all his life-time, as ſome judges, appointed by his enemies, deſigned it (4).

[C] Lewis XIII gave a glorious teſtimony . . . of this illuſtrious refugee.] Grotius preſerved ſtill an affection for his country, though he had been ſo ill uſed. This Lewis XIII admired; and doubtleſs it was one of the reaſons, which moved that prince to reject the ill councils of the Dutch miniſters, who hated him, and endeavoured to make him odious to the court of France. ‘Semper intentus patriæ & popularibus ſuis ubi quid negotii illis apud aulam eam eſſet, conſilio, operâ, & quâ pollebat apud nonnullos Miniſtros regios gratiâ inſervire ac prodeſſe; quamvis non ignoraret, eos, qui ibi res Fœderatorum curabant, nihil intentatum relinquere, quo Regis animum ipſi infeſtum redderent, ſed fruſtra laborabant apud Principem nihil ignorantem eorum, quæ annis cIↄ Iↄc xviii & cIↄ Iↄc xix in Hollandia acta erant; quin dixiſſe non ſemel fertur, mirari ſe virtutem hominis, qui tam malè in patria habitus, non deſineret tamen ei, ſubditiſque ejus bene velle, imò quocunque etiam poſſet modo benefacere (5). ——— Always ready to aſſiſt his countrymen, who had any buſineſs at court, by his advice, and his credit with ſome of the king's miniſters; tho' he was not ignorant, that the States envoys left no ſtone unturned to alienate the king's affection from him; tho' they laboured to no purpoſe with a king, who knew every thing that had been tranſacted in Holland, in the years cIↄ Iↄc xviii and cIↄ Iↄc xix: nay he was often heard to ſay, that he admired the virtue of the man, who, notwithſtanding the ill uſage of his countrymen, ceaſed not to wiſh well to them, and even to ſerve them whenever he could.’ Grotius ſhewed, by his conduct, that he had made a good uſe of the noble examples he had read in the ancient Roman authors (6). See what I have obſerved in relation to Camillus (7).

[D] The firſt book he publiſhed was an apology for the magiſtrates of Holland who had been turned out of their places.] The contrary party was very much diſpleaſed with that book. They thought Grotius made it appear, that they had acted againſt the laws, and they endeavoured again to ruin him; but the protection of the French court ſecured him againſt their attempts. Which may be ſeen more at large in the following paſſage (8). ‘Primum operum, quod poſt receptam libertatem edidit, fuit Apologeticus ſive defenſio, non tam ſua, qui non potuerat peccare in exſequendis iis, quæ ſibi à Superioribus ſuis mandata erant, quam eorum, qui legitimo modo creati, legitimò jure Reip. Hollandicæ annis decimo octavo & nono præfuerant. Quo comperto Fœderatorum Delegati, neque ignorantes ſuas in eo libro artes, illatamque Hollandiæ vim (9) detegi, cum nihil haberent, quo expreſſam in eo veritatem redarguere aut refutare poſſent, uſitatâ jam diu violentiâ utentes, proſcriptionibus eum perſecuti ſunt: quod brutum fulmen, cùm per Chriſtianiſſimi Regis tutelam, qui eum in fidem ſuam receperat, evanuiſſet, nihil aliud eo actum eſt, quam quod, &c. —— The firſt work he publiſhed, after he was ſet at liberty, was an apology, or defence, not ſo much of himſelf who could not offend in the performance of thoſe things, which his ſuperiors required of him, as of thoſe, who, being legally created, preſided legally over the commonwealth of Holland, in the years eighteen and nineteen, which being known, the delegates of the States, conſcious that their arts, and the violence offered to Holland, were detected in that book, and not being able to deny the truth of what he had ſaid, had recourſe to their old violènce, and purſued him with proſcriptions: which impotent malice being diſappointed by the protection of the moſt Chriſtian King, nothing farther was done than that &c.’

[E] His enemies prevented the good effects of it.] Prince Frederic Henry wrote a letter to Grotius in the year 1622, wherein he offered to ſerve him. It is printed at the end of Grotius's life: and, in all probability, that prince would have gladly reſtored that great man, had he not been told there was ſome danger in it. Here follows a Latin paſſage, wherein the whole matter is explained. ‘Mortuo Mauritio Arauſionenſium Principe, frater ejus Fredericus Henricus ad gubernaculum Reipublicæ admotus, non mitioris tantùm regiminis, ſed & priſtinæ in adminiſtranda Republica libertatis ſpem dederat, ipſique jam pridem Grotio animi ſui affectum per literas teſtatus erat, cregrant him his diſmiſſion. He had much ado to obtain it; and that princeſs gave him ſeveral marks of her great eſteem for him. He had many enemies in that court [F]. The ſhip, on board which he embarked, was violently toſſed by a ſtorm, and caſt away on the coaſt of Pomerania. Grotius, being ſick, and uneaſy in his mind, continued to travel by land; but his illneſs forced him to ſtop at Roſtoc, where he died, in a few days, on the 28th of Auguſt 1645. His body was carried to Delft, to be buried among his anceſtors (e). Notwithſtanding his embaſſy, he publiſhed many books upon ſeveral ſubjects [G]. He engaged in an unpleaſant diſpute, having undertaken to reconcile theological controverſies. A divine of Leyden (f), who was a native of France, wrote againſt him upon that account, and left nothing unattempted to make him ſuſpected by the Proteſtants, and to exaſperate the court of Sweden againſt him. That diſpute afforded an inſtance of the truth of this maxim, That the mind is deceived by the heart. Grotius, being deſirous to re-unite all Chriſtians, looked upon it as a thing that might be effected; his deſire did not permit him to ſee the unſurmountable obſtacles, which the obſtinacy of ſome private perſons would eaſily raiſe, though there had been none,

[F] He had many enemies in the court of Sweden.] The queen gave him no poſitive anſwer, when he asked leave to retire; which diſpleaſed ſome great men, who were afraid that ſhe would keep him in her council. He perceived their diſcontent, and was ſo preſſing to obtain his dimiſſion, that it was granted him at laſt. 'Neque dubitavit hoc unum ſufficere ad irritandam invidiam illam, quam à principio adventûs ſui in nonnullis Regni Proceribus animadverterat. Quare, cùm nihil minùs propoſitum ei eſſet, quàm in ea terrarum parte habitationis ſuæ ſedem figere, ubi non minus cum ingeniis hominum tam malè ſibi volentium, quàm cum aëris inclementia luctandum quotidie foret, non deſtitit coram Regina, quoties ad eam accederet, dimiſſionem ſuam & veniam ad ſuos revertendi efflagitare (11). ——— Nor did he doubt that this would encreaſe that envy, which he had obſerved in ſome of the nobles from his firſt arrival. Wherefore, as he deſigned nothing leſs than to fix his reſidence in that country, where he muſt daily ſtruggle, not only with the tempers of men, who wiſhed ſo ill to him, but alſo with the inclemency of the air, he perpetually ſollicited his diſmiſſion, and leave to return to his own country, as often as he had acceſs to the queen.' Du Maurier ſays (12), that chancellor Oxenſtern would have taken care to get Grotius deprived of his embaſſy much ſooner, had he not been willing to vex cardinal Richelieu. This cardinal (13) ſtruck off the penſion of three thouſand livres, which had been paid to Grotius for the ſpace of ten years, which obliged that illuſtrious refugee to leave France. The author of that affront being informed, that Grotius was coming again with a noble character, was very ſorry for it, and earneſtly deſired the court of Sweden to recal that ambaſſador, who did not love him, and whom he did not love. Oxenſtern who was reſolved to mortify the cardinal, refuſed to grant him his requeſt; but, as ſoon as he heard that the cardinal was dead, he ceaſed to protect the ambaſſador and even proved ſo unkind to him, that he was obliged to ask leave to retire, which was granted him. Du Maurier adds (14), 'that Grotius being not at all regarded in Sweden, left Stockholm without taking leave of the queen, or of any of her miniſters, and was already come to the Dalles to take ſhipping; but the queen, having ſent for him, preſented him with twelve thouſand Rixdollars.' This does not agree with Grotius's life. See in the margin a paſſage out of the Menagiana (15). 'Mr Arnauld produces a letter, importing, that Grotius, being diſſatisfied with the court of Sweden, tho' very well pleaſed with the queen, left it, to return into France, where he was to be ambaſſador of Poland; that before he was far advanced in his journey, the queen urged him to come back; that he did it; and being ſet out again, &c (16).'

[G] Notwithſtanding his embaſſy he publiſhed many books.] Here I ſhall ſpeak of the works of that author, in whatever time they were written or publiſhed.

During his ſtay at Paris, before he was ambaſſador of Sweden, 'he tranſlated into Latin proſe his book concerning the truth of the Chriſtian religion, which he had writ in Dutch verſe, for the uſe of the ſeamen, who travel into the Indies, that they might have ſome diverſion in ſinging ſuch a pious poem.' Thus Du Maurier ſpeaks of it (17). He is very much to blame for giving ſuch a mean notion of the author's deſign; for Grotius aimed at a nobler end: he had a mind to enable the Dutch, who travel into the Indies, to promote the converſion of the infidels. 'Propoſitum enim mihi erat, omnibus quidem civibus meis, ſed præcipuè navigantibus, operam navare utilem, ut in longo illo marino otio impenderent potiùs tempus, quàm quod nimium multi faciunt, fallerent. Itaque ſumto exordio à laude noſtræ gentis, quæ navigandi ſolertia ceteras facilè vincat, excitavi eos, ut hac arte, tanquam divino beneficio, non ad ſuum tantùm quæſtum, ſed & ad veræ hoc eſt Chriſtianæ religionis propagationem, uterentur (18). —— My deſign was to write a work, which might be of uſe to all my countrymen, but eſpecially our ſailors, that, during their leiſure of a long voyage, they might employ their time, rather than, as many do, miſpend it. Beginning therefore with the praiſe of our nation, which excels all others in the art of navigation, I exhorted them to employ this ſcience, as a favour from heaven, not only to their own profit, but to the advancement of the true, that is the Chriſtian, religion.' It is an excellent work, and the notes upon it are very learned. It was tranſlated into Engliſh, French, Dutch, German, Greek, Perſian, and Arabic; but I do not know whether all thoſe tranſlations have been publiſhed. The Greek was not printed in the year 1637 (19). In the year following Grotius mentions the Perſian tranſlation only, as a book, which the Pope's miſſionaries had a mind to publiſh. 'Liber meus de veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ . . . . . qui Socinianus eſt Voëtianis adeo hic pro tali non habetur, ut ſtudio Religioſorum Pontificiorum vertatur in ſermonem Perſicum ad convertendos, ſi Deus cœpto annuat, ejus imperii Mahumetiſtas (20). ——— So far is my book, of the Truth of the Chriſtian religion from being thought a ſocinian work, that the Roman Catholics have got it tranſlated into the Perſian none in the cauſes of the diviſion. The calumnies, maliciouſly diſperſed by his enemies, about his death, are irrefragably confuted by the relation of the miniſter, who attended him, when he was dying [H]. Thoſe falſe reports are nevertheleſs revived from ‘ ſian tongue, in order to convert, by the grace of GOD, the Mahometans of that empire.’ In the year 1641, an Engliſhman. who had tranſlated that book into Arabic, was deſirous, that his tranſlation ſhould be printed in England ‘ Fuit apud me his diebus Anglus vir doctiſſimus, qui diu in Turcico vixit imperio, & meum librum de Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ in Arabicum vertit ſermonem; curabitque ſi poteſt, typis in Anglia edi. Is nullum librum putat eſſe utiliorem aut inſtruendis illarum partium Chriſtianis, aut etiam convertendis Mahumetiſtis, qui ſunt in Turcico imperio, aut Perſico, aut Tartarico, aut Punico, aut Indiano (21). —— A very learned Engliſhman was lately with me, who reſided long in the Turkiſh empire, and tranſlated my book of the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, into Arabic; and will, if he can, get it printed in England. This man thinks no book more uſeful, either for inſtructing the Chriſtians of thoſe parts, or even for converting the Mahometans of Turkey, Perſia, Tartary, Barbary, or India.’ That tranſlation made by the famous Dr Edward Pocock, was printed at London in the year 1560, in 8vo. We ſhall ſee, in the article HENICHIUS, that Grotius has been taxed with plagiariſm. There are three German tranſlations of that work (22), two in proſe and one in verſe, and two French tranſlations in proſe. The laſt was made, and publiſhed at Utrecht, in the year 1692 (23); the other came out long before. I have ſeen two editions of it; one in 12mo, in the uſual character, and the other in 8vo, in a letter like that of a writing-maſter: and therefore it is ſaid in the title, that it was made at Paris, in the printing-houſe of the new letters invented by Peter Moreau, a writing-maſter at Paris. There is no date, neither in the title page, nor at the end of the epiſtle dedicatory. The author of that verſion dedicated it to Mr Bignon, counſellor of ſtate, and put only an M to it to denote his Name: I have been told, that his name was Mr de Courcelles.

The incomparable work, De Jure Belli & Pacis, was publiſhed at Paris in the year 1625 (24). I ſhall ſpeak of it at large in the remark [O].

As for the commentary, De imperio ſummarum poteſtatum circa ſacra (25); the treatiſe, De ſatisfactione Chriſti contra Fauſtum Socinum (26); the notes upon the goſpels (27); the Pietas Ordinum Hollondiæ (28); the diſſertation, De Cœnæ adminiſtratione ubi Paſtores non ſunt, & an ſemper communicandum per Symbola (29); the Epiſtolæ ad Gallos (30); I refer my readers to a book of Colomiés, quoted in the margin, where they will find ſome curious particulars. Concerning the edition of the letters in folio, conſult the firſt volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle and Morhofius's Polyhiſtor (31). But as to the Hiſtoria Belgica, I refer to the remark [P]. Note that there is in the fourth volume of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (32), a large abſtract of the treatiſe, De Cœnæ Adminiſtratione ubi Paſtores non ſunt, &c. which was reprinted at London, with ſome other pieces, in the year 1686.

There are ſeveral miſtakes in the following words of du Maurier: ‘ during that embaſſy, which laſted twelve years, Grotius publiſhed ſeveral books; among others, a Latin diſſertation againſt la Perrere (33), who had written a piece concerning the Pre-Adamites: that diſſertation is intituled, De origine gentium Americanarum Diſſertatio, wherein he ſays, That the nations of America are not very ancient; and that they came from Europe, either by a land-paſſage or being driven thither by a Storm: Niſi, ſays he, quis Præ-Adamitas eſſe dixerit, ut nuper quidam in Gallia ſomniavit. But one Laëtius of the Low-Countries having written againſt him, he put out a ſecond diſſertation, intituled De origine gen- Americanarum Diſſertatio altera, wherein he confutes Laëtius at large (34).’ It is not true that Grotius wrote his diſſertation de Origine gentium Americanarum againſt la Peyrere; nor is it true, that the book concerning the Pre-Adamites was then printed. The words, quoted by du Maurier, are not in that diſſertation; but the following paſſage is to be found in his reply to Laëtius: ‘ Cui conſequens eſt ut credatur ...... aut aliquos ante Adamum fuiſſe conditos homines, ut nuper quis in Gallia ſomniavit. —— The Conſequence of which is, that we muſt believe ...... or that there were men created before Adam, as a certain perſon in France lately imagined.’ I believe la Peyrere is hinted at in thoſe words; but I maintain ſtill, that the book concerning the Pre-Adamites was not yet publiſhed (35). Grotius was acquainted with that man's opinion; and therefore he ſaid ſomething of it occaſionally. But this cannot be called a confutation.

[H] The calumnies of his enemies .... concerning his death, are irrefragably confuted by the relation of the miniſter who attended him when he was dying.] That miniſter, named John Quiſtorpius, was profeſſor of divinity at Roſtoc. His relation (36) imports, that he went to Grotius, who had ſent for him, and found him almoſt dying; that he exhorted him to prepare for death, in order to enjoy a more happy life, to acknowledge his ſins, and repent of them; that, having mentioned to him the publican, who confeſſed himſelf a ſinner, and begged GOD's mercy, the ſick man anſwered, I am that publican (37); that he went on, and told him, he ſhould have recourſe to JESUS CHRIST, without whom there is no ſalvation; and that Grotius replied (38), I place all my hopes in JESUS CHRIST alone; that he repeated with a loud voice, in High-Dutch, the prayer, which begins thus: Heer Jeſu wahrer Menſch und Gott, &c (39). and that the ſick man ſaid it ſoftly after him with his hands joined; that having ended, he asked him, whether he underſtood him? and his anſwer was, I underſtood you very well (40); that he continued to repeat to him ſome paſſages of the word of GOD, which dying people are uſually put in mind of, and to ask him, Do you underſtand me? and that Grotius anſwered, I hear your voice, but I do not underſtand every thing that you ſay (41); that, after this anſwer, the ſick man loſt his ſpeech, and expired ſoon after.

It would be ridiculous to call into queſtion Quiſtorpius's ſincerity: no reaſon of intereſt could move him to tell a lie; and every body knows, that the Lutheran miniſters were no leſs diſpleaſed, than the Calviniſts, with the particular opinions of Grotius (42); and therefore the teſtimony of the profeſſor of Roſtoc is an authentic proof; and, if ſuch a proof is not ſufficient in matters of fact, we make way for Scepticiſm, and it will be a hard matter to prove any thing. It is therefore an undeniable matter of fact, 1. That Grotius, being a dying, was affected like the publican mentioned in the goſpel; he confeſſed his faults; he was ſorry for them; he implored the mercy of his heavenly father. 2. That he placed all his hopes in JESUS CHRIST alone. 3. That his laſt thoughts were thoſe that are contained in the prayer of dying people, according to the liturgy of the Lutheran churches (43). Now I do not think there is any prayer that contains more pious thoughts, ſuch as a true Chriſtian ought to have, when he is preparing to appear before GOD's tribunal, than that prayer.

The reſult of this is plainly; 1. that thoſe who ſay he died a Socinian (44), would be too gently uſed, if they were only told, that they are guilty of a raſh judgment; they deſerve to be called calumniators. 2. That theſe words of du Maurier contain a fabulous ſtory (45): ‘ I have been told, ſays he, that during his ſickneſs, a Catholic prieſt, and ſeveral Lutheran, Calviniſt, Socinian, and Anabaptiſt miniſters. came to him, to perſuade him to die in their belief: But whilſt they diſcourſed of controverted points, and each of them endeavoured to prove that his religion was the beſt, his only anſwer was, non intelligo; and when they had done ſpeaking, he told them, hortare me ut Chriſtianum morientem decet; exhort me, as a dying Chriſtian ought to be exhorted.’ 3. That the report that was ſpread immediately after his death, that he refuſed to hear a miniſter, who had a mind to ſpeak to him, is another lie (46). 4. That it is not true, ‘ that, when a Lutheran miniſter began to ſpeak to him of his religion .... the ſick man anſwered only, non intelligo, giving him to underſtand by thoſe words, that he did not like his diſcourſe,

That there is a falſity in a little Engliſh book (48), wherein it is affirmed, ' that Grotius, being a dying, ' ſaid, ×multa agendo, nihil egi, though I have under- ' taken many things, I am not a jot the better for it.' 6. That thoſe, who ' ſoon after the death of that ' great man . . . . . ſpread a report that he had been ' thunder-ſtruck (49),' gave out a falſity more ridiculous ſtill, than malicious. (I have been very busily employed & have not done what I ought

I ſhall conclude this remark with a paſſage, wherein Andrew Rivetus, one of the moſt zealous adverſaries of Grotius, is concerned. He gave out, that Grotius was dead, breathing out threatenings, and full of anger and bitter gall, without ſhewing any ſign of repentance. However, ſays he, we will not judge another's ſervant. The caution contained in theſe laſt words ſeemed ridiculous to an Arminian profeſſor, becauſe good ſenſe does not permit us to admit a principle, without admitting the conſequences neceſſarily reſulting from it; but eternal damnation is an infallible conſequence of a final impenitence; ſo that it is but a ſilly artifice to ſay, ſuch a one is dead without repenting of his heinous crimes; nevertheleſs I will not decide about his fate. This is what that profeſſor ſays about it (50): I do not examine whether he is in the right. But here is the paſſage I have promiſed: ' Paulo apertius egit A. Rivetus, de illuſtri viro Hu- ' gone Grotio loquens: ἐμπνέων ἀπειλῆς, inquit, ' & totus in fermento jacens, imo in felle amaritudinis, ' videtur ad plures abiiſſe, nullo pœnitentiæ, quod ſcia- ' mus, ſigno exhibito, &c. Ubi nihil aliud ſuperfuit, ' niſi ut adderet, Actum eſt de ejus ſalute. Licet ad ' emolliendum tam inclementem ſententiam, ita con- ' cludat: Sed tamen non judicamus ſervum alienum, qui ' Domino ſuo ſtetit & cecidit. Sed quorſum modera- ' tionis ſpeciem præ ſe ferre circa conſequens, cum ' tota difficultas ſit in antecedente? Ego contra, ſi ' mihi conſtaret, vel Grotium, vel Blondellum, in ali- ' quo gravi delicto ſine pœnitentia obiiſſe, non vererer, ' etſi dolens, dicere, damnatus eſt. Non enim ipſe ' ſententiam ferrem, ſed Deus in verbo ſuo, quod ' cœlo & terra firmius eſt. —— Andrew Rivetus dealt ' a little more openly, ſpeaking of Hugo Grotius: ' Breathing out threatening, ſays he, and being wholly ' in a ferment, even in the gall of bitterneſs, he ſeems ' to have died, without ſhewing any ſign of repen- ' tance, that we know of, &c. To which he had no- ' thing to add, but that his ſalvation was deſperate; ' though, to ſoften ſo harſh a ſentence, he concludes; Yet ' we judge not another man's ſervant; to his own ' maſter he ſtandeth or falleth. But to what purpoſe ' this ſhew of moderation as to the conſequent, when the ' whole difficulty lies in the antecedent? I, on the con- ' trary, if I were certain, that Grotius, or Blondel, had ' died in ſome heinous ſin, without repenting of it, ' ſhould not ſcruple to ſay, though with grief, he is ' damned. For it is not I who paſs the ſentence, but the ' word of GOD, which is firmer than the heavens and ' earth.' I have ſeen, in a book of Mr Arnauld, a like ſtroke againſt Mr Daillé's regard for St Ambroſe (51). But this is foreign to my purpoſe. I ſhall only ſay, that Rivetus advances a thing, concerning the pretended impenitence of Grotius, that is contradicted by the relation of the Lutheran miniſter. Mareſius, who refutes the paſſage I have quoted, does not in the leaſt diſapprove Rivetus's conduct.

[I] No one was ſo exceſſive in his accuſations, as the author of the book, intituled, L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld.] He is not contented to ſay, that Grotius is a paſſionate Arminian, a Socinian, a Papiſt (52), things which are inconſiſtent in one and the ſame perſon; but he adds (53), ' that Grotius died without profeſſing any reli- ' gion, and without giving any anſwer to the perſon, ' who exhorted him upon his death-bed, but, non in- ' telligo, I do not underſtand you (54), turning his ' back to him.' His only authority for it is Mr Arnauld, a man of whom he gives ſo hideous a character in that ſame book, that no equitable judges would fine a perſon, charged with murther, by twenty witneſſes like him. Can there be a more ſtrange blindneſs? Muſt we not confeſs, that of all paſſions, the deſire of ſlandering is moſt proper to make one act againſt common ſenſe? But, laying aſide ſuch moral reflexions, I ſhall only ſay, that it is manifeſt, the author of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld affirms, that Grotius died an Atheiſt. To reject all manner of religion at the point of death, to die without profeſſing any religion, and to die an Atheiſt, are three ſynonymous propoſitions: and therefore, if the accuſer was to be proſecuted, the matter ſhould be reduced to this queſtion, DID GROTIUS DIE AN ATHEIST? The accuſer does plainly aſſert it: he muſt therefore prove it; and it were to no purpoſe for him to prove, that Grotius was neither a Lutheran, nor a Calviniſt, nor a Papiſt, nor an Arminian. Now is it not a horrid thing, that a man, who died in the manner mentioned by Quiſtorpius, ſhould be accuſed of dying an Atheiſt? Is not the impudence of ſuch a calumniator prodigious? Can any one that reads his book believe it, without calling to mind what he knows of the great corruption of men, and thinking of theſe words of the ſcripture, The heart of man is deſperately wicked (55)? I have already ſaid (56), that there is no reaſon to doubt of Quiſtorpius's ſincerity; and I add, that the thing he witneſſes is of ſuch a nature, that he could not be deceived in it. He heard what Grotius anſwered him; he ſaw the motion of the lips and hands of his penitent, whilſt he was repeating an excellent prayer. The ears and the eyes are authentic witneſſes in ſuch matters of fact. I confeſs, he did not know whether Grotius ſpoke with a low voice other things than thoſe he (Quiſtorpius) ſpoke aloud: it is an objection, Mr Arnauld was not aſhamed to propoſe (57): it does not deſerve an anſwer; for, at this rate, one might doubt of the faith of all dying people.

[K] Very wiſe perſons highly approve their waving all juridical proceedings.] The example of Janſenius's relations, which ſome wiſhed Grotius's family had followed, is one of the things that can beſt juſtify their contempt of that calumny. The Janſeniſts hoped to mortify Father Hazart, a famous Jeſuit, who had ſaid in one of his books, that Janſenius's father was a Proteſtant, and that Janſenius had been a profeſſed Calviniſt till he came to a certain age. They publiſhed very fine caſes (58), to ſhew, that this Jeſuit was a downright calumniator; and he was ſummoned with all the uſual forms to give ſatisfaction for that injury by a ſolemn retractation. They applied themſelves to the tribunals, to which it belonged, to decide that difference; but after many writings, and a great ſtir, they miſcarried in their deſign. Father Hazart had ſuch an intereſt, and invented ſo many cavils, that the proceedings of the plantiffs came to nothing. This inſtance ſhews, that Grotius's deſcendants did well in not proſecuting the author of the calumny; for he would have invented as many cavils as Father Hazart, and would have been as powerfully ſupported, to avoid the puniſhment he deſerved. He might have been proſecuted before the ſecular courts by the law, Si quis famoſum. Complaints might have been made alſo to the eccleſiaſtical judges: But he would have had ſuch powerful patrons, and ſo great an intereſt in the ſecular courts, that all the proceedings would have come to nothing, It had been worſe ſtill, if the eccleſiaſtical courts had been applied to; in which he never wants cavils to juſtify himſelf, and his friends uſe a thouſand artifices to ſecure him from the leaſt cenſure. The author of the Thoughts on Comets, could he obtain any ſatisfaction for a calumny very like this relating to Grotius? The accuſer, heaping frauds on frauds, did he not always elude the juſt demands made on him by the accuſed, before their proper judges? What ſucceſs had the miniſters, who charged him with a falſe doctrine? Did they not find him ſuperior to the laws of diſcipline, tho' they took never ſo much pains, and made his errors manifeſt? This is a new reaſon why Grotius's relations ought to be glad, that they did not proſecute him juridically.

(g) See the beginning of the remark [K].

to that paſſage of l'eſprit de Mr Arnauld [L]; and ſince the accuſer made no reply to it, it is a plain ſign that he has been convicted of calumny. Now this is a ſcandalous thing upon two accounts; for on the one ſide, he made no ſtep in order to give ſatisfaction for ſo great an injury; and on the other, his eccleſiaſtical ſuperiors never cenſured him for ſo plain a calumny, and never intimated to him, that they did not approve his publiſhing ſuch books as l'eſprit de Mr Arnauld. Caſpar Brand, an Arminian miniſter of Amſterdam, is writing a life of Grotius (b): It will be large and very inſtructive: It is pity he does not write it in a language more generally underſtood than the Dutch. He will not fail to praiſe him for his memory, which was ſo good, that, being preſent at the muſter of ſome regiments, he remembered the names of every ſoldier (i). A letter of Salmaſius has been printed within theſe few days, wherein he is ill uſed [M]. He left behind him three ſons, and one

(i) Borremans, Var. Lect. cap. iii, apud Crenium, Animadverſ. Philolog & Hiſt. Part. I, pag 19.

[L] We have ſeen a very ſolid anſwer to that paſſage of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld.] The apologiſt begins thus. ‘ But, Sir, what that author, and Father Simon, ſay of Grotius, is nothing, if compared to what the nameleſs author of the ſcandalous libel, intituled, L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, ſays of him. It is true, he ſlanders every body in that book, and that the manifeſt lies, that are in it, ought to make one disbelieve every thing elſe. But, becauſe ſome are ſo weak as to be impoſed upon by his bold way of ſpeaking, and becauſe ſome of thoſe, to whom you ſhew my letters, entertain an ill opinion of Grotius upon that account, you will give me leave to undeceive them here. Perhaps, they will not be diſpleaſed to find an author, for whom they have ſo great an eſteem, guilty of the moſt horrid calumny that ever was. This will teach them, that one ought to ſuſpect thoſe, who appear ſo zealous for truth; and that ſometimes a prodigious malice and detraction are concealed under that zeal, upon pretence of defending the church of GOD (59).’ Afterwards, the apologiſt examines the four accuſations one after another. I ſhall not dwell on what he ſays upon the firſt head (60): What he ſays upon the ſecond runs thus (61): ‘ Grotius, ſays our ſatirical author, in the ſecond place a Socinian, as it appears from his enervating ALL the proofs of CHRIST's divinity. Sir, deſire your friends to read Grotius's annotations upon the paſſages of St Mark and St John, which I have mentioned to you; and if they do not ſay, that it is an abominable calumny, I am willing to be accounted a moſt wicked calumniator. See alſo the DXLVIIIth letter among the Literæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ (62).’ I ſhould be too long, ſhould I mention what he ſays upon the third head, both againſt the author of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, and Mr Arnauld himſelf. I ſhall only ſet down this paſſage out of it. ‘ When Mr Arnauld ſays ſomething that is injurious to the reformed, the author of the libel exclaims violently againſt him, and Mr Arnauld is then an inſincere man, an unfair accuſer, an infamous calumniator; but, when he ſays ſomething that may ſerve this ſatirical writer to inveigh againſt thoſe, whom he hates, every thing is then right; it ſerves him to fill up his page, and to prevent his being placed among the little authors 63).’

I muſt not forget, that Mr Arnauld blames the Lutheran miniſter for not asking Grotius in what communion he would die (64). This is a material thing, ſays Mr Arnauld, ‘ with reſpect to a man, who was known to have had no communion for a long time with any Proteſtant church, and to have confuted, in his laſt books, moſt of the doctrines that are common to them.’ Whereupon the apologiſt ſays (65), that Mr Arnauld, and the author of the libel, ‘ do wrongfully fancy, that a man has no religion, when he joins with none of the factions that condemn all mankind, and each of which pretends to be the only church of CHRIST. Grotius abſtained from communicating with the Proteſtants, as well as with the Roman Catholics, becauſe the communion, which was appointed by CHRIST as a ſymbol of peace and concord among his diſciples, is accounted in thoſe ſocieties a ſign of diſcord and diviſion ..... (66). Quiſtorpius acted the part of a wiſe man, in not asking him what communion he would die in, ſince he ſaw him dying in the communion of JESUS CHRIST, by virtue of which we are ſaved, and not by virtue of that of the biſhop of Rome, or of the ſeveral Proteſtant ſocieties.’

Without inquiring whether Quiſtorpius was in the right or the wrong, not to ask him ſuch a queſtion, I obſerve, that a man, who believes the fundamental doctrines of Chriſtianity, but forbears receiving the communion, becauſe he looks upon that action as a ſign that one damns the other Chriſtian ſects, cannot be accounted an Atheiſt, but by an old doating fool, who has forgot the notions of things, and the definitions of words. Nay, I go farther, and I maintain it cannot be denied, that ſuch a man is a Chriſtian. I allow you to ſay, that his believing all the ſects, that receive the goſpel, to be in the way to ſalvation, is an hereſy; I allow you to maintain, that it is a pernicious and dangerous doctrine: notwithſtanding which, can it be ſaid, that thoſe, who believe that JESUS CHRIST is the eternal Son of GOD, co-eſſential and con-ſubſtantial with the Father; that he died for us; that he was raiſed from the dead; that he ſits at the right hand of GOD his father; that men are ſaved by faith in his death and interceſſion; that one ought to obey his precepts, and repent of one's ſins, &c. I ſay, can it be affirmed, that ſuch perſons are not Chriſtians? No man of ſenſe can affirm it; but none would be more unreaſonable, in aſſerting ſuch a thing, than the author of L'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, ſince he publiſhed another book (67), wherein he ſhews, that all thoſe, who believe the fundamental points, belong to the true church, whatever ſect they may be of. I omit ſeveral other maxims advanced by him, whereby it appears, that one may be ſaved in all religions; as an anonymous writer (68) has demonſtratively proved to him. I only mention ſuch doctrines as he cannot deny, and according to which he ought to acknowledge, that Grotius, who believed the fundamental doctrines, without approving Calviniſm, or Popery, &c. in every thing, was a member of the true church.

For the reſt, we need not wonder, that Grotius was abuſed by a man, whoſe book is looked upon as a ſatire upon all mankind. ‘ Homo iſte procaciſſimus in illo ſuo ARNALDI SPIRITU, univerſum genus humanum impetit, nec Sacris parcens nec profanis, nec Eccleſiaſtico, nec Civili Statui; Regem ſuum, Regem Chriſtianiſſimum, ſingula Regiæ familiæ capita, familiares Miniſtroſque Regis tam fœdè, tam impudenter carpit: ut vel in ſuo Hollandiæ aſylo vix tutus ipſe (69), tutum præſtare id libri monſtrum nequiverit (70). —— This moſt ſlanderous author, in his Eſprit de Mr Arnauld, falls foul of all mankind, ſparing neither things ſacred nor prophane, the church, nor the ſtate: he attacks his prince, the moſt Chriſtian king, every branch of the royal family and the king's favourites and miniſters, ſo baſely and impudently, that he could ſcarce publiſh ſuch a monſtrous book with impunity, even in his aſylum of Holland.’ See the margin (71), and judge whether ſuch an author could fail to meet Grotius in his way, there being ſome particular reaſons, which made him angry with that great man: thoſe, who know Rotterdam, underſtand me.

[M] They have publiſhed a letter of Salmaſius . . . wherein he is ill uſed.] Mr Crenius has publiſhed that letter in the firſt part of his Animadverſiones Philologicæ & Hiſtoricæ, printed at Rotterdam in 1695. Salmaſius wrote it to Sarravius, the twentieth of November 1645. Not contented to prefer Voſſius to Grotius, he undervalues the merit of the latter as much as he can: he hardly allows him to have an indifferent skill in philoſophy, and makes him inferiour to every body, as to the reaſoning part. In Philoſophicis ſi diſputandi ſolertia ſpectetur, vix mediocribus par eſt:

daughter [N]. The eldeſt ſon of one of his ſons is Droſſart (k) of Bergenopzoom.

Grotius's book de Jure Belli & Pacis being a maſter-piece, and having received a very particular honour from the public, I ought to ſpeak of it ſomewhat at large [O]. I ſhall nec unquam vidi qui minore tum vi ratiocinetur. A profeſſor of Tranſilvania, adds he, who is writing againſt the book De Jure Belli & Pacis, pretends to ſhew groſs miſtakes in every page of it; adſirmavit ſe oſtenſurum eſſe nullam paginam vacare inſignibus erratis. Grotius, ſays he, is a mean critic; many of his notes upon the Old Teſtament are extreamly childiſh; I would not put my name to ſuch a work. Scimus etiam in Critica quam infelix fuerit & ἄςοχος vir alioquin ſummus Grotius . . . . Nollem meum nomen adſcriptam eſſe adnotatis in Vetus T. nibil his in multis puerilius invenio, & tanto nomine indignius. How ſhall we reconcile this with Salmaſius's letters to Grotius? There is one, in which he calls him ſupereminentiſſimus; and ſays, he had rather be like him, than enjoy all the wealth and glory of the ſacred college. Non ſolum Cardinalibus, ſed etiam mibi rem minime gratam facis, qui me dones eo titulo, quo tu dignior, ſupereminentiſſime Groti. Quid enim te non ſic appellem, cujus me multo ſimilem malim, quàm omnes purpurati illius gregis divitias & honores poſſidere (72)? See the paſſage of Juſtus Pacius in the margin. I was asked not long ago, whether the letters, written by great men to an author, are like thoſe, wherein they ſpeak of that author to other perſons? I anſwered, that they ſeldom ſpoke the ſame things in thoſe two ſorts of letters. When they write to an author, they commend his book; but when they write to others, they praiſe it but little, and ſometimes find fault with it. If they themſelves publiſhed their own letters, they would endeavour to ſuppreſs their double-dealing; but moſt times they come out after their death. If Salmaſius had publiſhed the letter of the twentieth of November 1645, he would have ſuppreſſed thoſe wherein he beſtows high encomiums upon Grotius. He was no friend to him, as he made it appear when he wrote againſt him under the diſguiſe of Simplicius Verinus (73).

[N] He left behind him three ſons and one daughter.] The daughter was married to a French gentleman, called Mombas, who was very much talked off on occaſion of a trouble he was brought into, ſoon after the French had paſſed the Rhine in the year 1672. The eldeſt ſon, and the youngeſt, pitched upon a military life, and died without being married. The ſecond, whoſe name was PETER DE GROOT, made himſelf illuſtrious by his embaſſies. The elector Palatine, being reſtored to his dominions by the treaty of Munſter, appointed him his reſident in Holland. He was made penſionary of the city of Amſterdam in 1660, and diſcharged the duties of that place with great ability for the ſpace of ſeven years. He was ſent embaſſador to the northern crowns in the year 1668. A year after he went into France with the ſame character, and acquitted himſelf in that employment with great dexterity and wiſdom. When the war was kindled in 1672, he returned into his country, and was deprived of his office of penſionary of Rotterdam, which he had enjoyed ever ſince his return from his embaſſy into Sweden: he was deprived of it during the popular tumults, which occaſioned ſo many alterations in the towns of Holland. He retired to Antwerp, and then to Cologne, whilſt the peace was treating there, and acted for the good of his country as much as ever he could; and yet, when he returned into Holland, he was accuſed of a ſtate crime. The cauſe was tried, and he was acquitted. He retired to a country houſe, where he died at ſeventy years of age (74). See his encomium in Wicquefort (75).

[O] I ought to ſpeak ſomewhat at large of his book De Jure Belli & Pacis.] It was printed at Paris in 1625, and dedicated to Lewis XIII. ‘ King Guſtavus of Sweden, having read and admired it, re‘ ſolved to make uſe of the author, whom he took ‘ to be a great politician by reaſon of that work: and ‘ chancellor Oxenſtern, prime-miniſter of that conque‘ ror, confirmed him in that deſign, making great ac‘ count of his work De Jure Belli & Pacis, which ‘ he continually peruſed. But that prince being killed ‘ at the battle of Lutzen, in the year 1632, chan‘ cellor Oxenſtern, according to his inclination, and ‘ the deſign of the late king Guſtavus, nominated him ‘ to be ſent embaſſador into France (76).’ Colomiés ſays (77), ‘ it is believed, that Grotius exhauſted his parts ‘ upon that book, and that he might have ſaid of it ‘ what Caſaubon ſaid of his own commentary upon ‘ Perſius, in a letter to Mr Perillau his kinſman, ‘ which is not printed, in Perſio omnem ingenii cona‘ tum effudimus; and indeed that work of Grotius is ‘ an excellent piece; and I do not wonder that it ‘ has been explained in ſome German univerſities . . . ‘ Here follows the judgment, which Mr Bignon, ‘ that unblameable magiſtrate, makes of that book, in ‘ a letter to Grotius, dated the fifth of March 1632.’ I had almoſt forgot, ſays he, to thank you for your treatiſe De Jure belli, which is as well printed as the ſubject deſerves. I have been told, that a great king had it always in his hands; and I believe it is true, becauſe a very great advantage muſt needs accrue from it, ſince that book ſhews, that there is reaſon and juſtice in a ſubject, which is thought to conſiſt only in confuſion and injuſtice. Thoſe, who read it, will learn the true maxims of the Chriſtian policy, which are the ſolid foundations of all government. I have read it again with a wonderful pleaſure.‘ They did not ‘ make the ſame judgment of it at Rome, where it ‘ was placed among prohibited books, the fourth of ‘ February 1627.’

The memoir, which M. Chauvin has inſerted in his journal (78), concerning the fate and importance of that work, is ſo fine and ſo curious, that I cannot forbear tranſcribing ſeveral things out of it. It informs us, that Grotius undertook to write that book at the ſollicitation of the famous Peireskius. He himſelf ſays ſo in a letter he wrote to him, when he preſented him with a copy of that work. ‘ The ſubject ‘ of it was thought to be ſo important and uſeful, ‘ that it gave occaſion to make a particular ſcience ‘ of it; for the explication of which, ſome profeſ‘ ſors have been appointed on purpoſe in the univer‘ ſities.’ Charles Lewis, elector Palatine, ‘ did ſo ‘ highly value that book, that he thought fit it ſhould ‘ ſerve as a text to the lectures, concerning the law ‘ of nature, and the law of nations; and in order ‘ to expound it, he appointed Mr Puffendorf in his ‘ univerſity of Heidelberg; and, in imitation of that ‘ prince, the like ſettlements have been made in ‘ other univerſities. . . . . It does not appear that any ‘ body criticiſed or wrote againſt that book of Gro‘ tius, during his life. Some indeed are of opinion ‘ that Mr Selden wrote his book De Jure Natura‘ li & Gentium juxta diſciplinam Ebræorum out of ‘ emulation . . . . . The firſt author, who criticiſed ‘ Grotius, was Joannes à Felden, doctor of the civil‘ law, and profeſſor of the mathematics, at Helmſtadt. ‘ He cloſely follows the three books of Grotius, ‘ and dwells upon ſuch ſubjects as concern the civil‘ law and morality . . . . . He contradicts him every ‘ where.’ His work came out in 1653, and was confuted the next year by Theodorus Graſwinckel. The public ſaw, in 1663, ‘ Boeclerus's commentary upon ‘ the firſt book of Grotius, which he continued af‘ terwards upon the ſeven firſt chapters of the ſecond ‘ book; and beſides, he has publiſhed five important ‘ ſubjects of the ſame book . . . . . He does not fol‘ low all the opinions of that author, but differs quite ‘ from him upon ſeveral ſubjects . . . . In 1664, John ‘ Philip Mullerus, a civilian, reduced the three books ‘ of Grotius into tables . . . . In 1665, Janus Klen‘ kius (79) publiſhed his inſtitutions De Jure natu‘ rali & gentium, taken out of Grotius's book. In ‘ 1666, Gaſpar Zieglerus . . . . . profeſſor of the civil‘ law at Wittemberg, put out his notes on the three ‘ books of Grotius . . . . He does not appear to be ‘ acted by a ſpirit of contradiction; nevertheleſs he de‘ parts from Grotius's opinions in a great many things.’ Grotius's younger brother (80) publiſhed, in 1667, Enchiridion de Principiis Juris Naturalis: that book is properly an introduction to the work De Jure Belli & Pacis, and was illuſtrated with notes, in 1675, by John George Simon, profeſſor of the civil-law at Iëna (81). About the year 1668, David Mevius, vice-preſident of the ſupream court of Wiſmar, undertook to compoſe a juſt ſyſtem of the doctrine concerning the law of nature and the law of nations, and and publiſhed an introduction to it in nine conſiderations. He highly commends Grotius in his preface, and gives him the glory of being the firſt, who introduced the ſtudy of the law of nations, and explained it more ſolidly and learnedly than any one before him. His great work was to be made up of three parts: the two firſt were finiſhed, and ready for the preſs; but he knew not, whether his great age, and his affairs, would permit him to make an end of the other. John Adam Oſiander, profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Tubingen, publiſhed his obſervations upon the work of Grotius in 1671, and affected to criticize him almoſt every where. The year following, Mr Puffendorf publiſhed his book De Jure Naturæ & Gentium, wherein he fully explains what had been omitted or lightly touched upon by Grotius: and ſome look upon his work as a large ſupplement to Grotius, and others, as a continued commentary upon Grotius. The obſervations of Henry Heniges upon Grotius came out in 1673. He follows the opinions of that author, and maintains them againſt thoſe who wrote againſt them. About the ſame time, John George Simon reprinted Grotius's book with notes, particularly concerning the civil-law, and the law of nations. Sometimes he takes part with John à Felden againſt him. In 1676, Samuel Rachelius publiſhed his treatiſe De Jure Naturæ & Gentium, and Valentinus Velthem put out his introduction to Grotius's work in three volumes. John George Kulpis publiſhed alſo his remarks upon the ſame Grotius in 1682. Gronovius made learned notes upon the ſame book of Grotius in the year 1680. Mr de Courtin tranſlated it into French in 1687. Mr Becman publiſhed it in 1691, cum notis Variorum, which he took out of the moſt famous authors who had written upon it, as Boeclerus, Zieglerus, Oſiander, Puffendorf, Simon, Gronovius, and ſome others. It is further ſaid, in Mr Chauvin's memoir, that in the year 1696, there came out a new edition of that book of Grotius in folio, with Mr Vandemeulen's commentary (82). It is to be obſerved, that this memoir ſerves as an introduction to an abſtract, publiſhed by Mr Chauvin, of a commentary of Job. Teſmarius in Hugonis Grotii de Jure Belli ac Pacis libros 3. printed in folio at Francfort, in the year 1696, with the notes of Ulric Obrecht upon the ſame work of Grotius. Mr Teſmar, who died in the year 1693, had been twenty years upon that commentary (83). Mr Becman's work abovementioned was reprinted at Francfort on the Oder in 1699, in 4to. It is intituled; Hugonis Grotii de jure belli & pacis libri tres, in quibus jus naturæ & gentium, item juris publici præcipua explicantur cum Annotatis Autoris ex poſtrema ejus ante obitum cura. Acceſſerunt excerpta annotationum variorum virorum inſignium in totum opus. Edente Job. Chriſtoph. Becmano. Thus Grotius, fifty years after his death, obtained an honour, which was not beſtowed upon the ancients till after many ages: I mean, that he has appeared cum Commentariis Variorum. I have juſt now read in a book of Mr Crenius (84), that Theodore Graſwinckel wrote the original of that book of Grotius, who dictated it to him, ex ore dictantis Grotii ſe excepiſſe, eoſque in ordinem demum redegiſſe. Chriſtopher Arnoldus had this particular from Graſwinckel himſelf, and inſerted it in a letter printed with thoſe of Richterus.

(81) He is profeſſor in the new univerſity of Hall, in the year 1696.

I ſhall alſo ſay ſomething of Grotius's book concerning the hiſtory of the Low-Countries [P]. He wrote it in his youth, and according to Tacitus's ſtyle.

[P] I ſhall ſay ſomething of Grotius's book, concerning the hiſtory of the Low-Countries.] It contains an account of what happened in the Netherlands from the departure of Philip II. till 1608. It is divided into annals, and hiſtory: the annals comprehend five books: the hiſtory contains eighteen, and begins in the year 1588. Caſaubon, who had read ſomething of it in the year 1613, ſpeaks well of it in a letter written from London to Thuanus (85). He obſerves, that there were twenty one books in that work: he did not reckon well; but perhaps the two laſt books were added to it ſince. The author did not publiſh that hiſtory; he only ſhewed the manuſcript copy to Caſaubon. It did not come out till after the author's deceaſe, Grotius having had ſome reaſons to keep it by him during his life .... (86). His wife refuſed the manuſcript of that hiſtory to Sarravius, though he offered her two thouſand livres for it (87). It was printed at Amſterdam for John Blaeu, in the year 1657, in folio, and in the year 1658, in 12mo (88). Mr L'Heritier tranſlated it into French (89). The French tranſlation was reprinted at Paris in the year 1672, in folio. See the extract Mr Denys gave of it, in his ſeventh memoir concerning arts and ſciences (90). Here follows the judgment of the author of the Parrhaſiana. 'We may add to Polybius, a famous hiſtorian among the moderns, who, tho' he had been a great ſufferer by the injuſtice of a great prince, relates his noble actions as carefully as any other hiſtorian, and ſpeaks of him according to his merit, without ſaying any thing, whereby it may appear that he had reaſon to complain of him. I mean, the incomparable Hugo Grotius, who ſpeaks, in his hiſtory of the Netherlands, of prince Maurice de Naſſau, as if he had never been ill treated by him. This is a remarkable inſtance of impartiality, which ſhews, that it is not impoſſible to overcome one's paſſion, and ſpeak well of one's enemies, as ſeveral people fancy, who judge of others by themſelves (91).' The author, who obſerves this fine paſſage in Grotius's hiſtory, did it not out of flattery; for he blames him afterwards for a thing that deſerves to be blamed: he does not approve Grotius's ſtyle; and ſhews thereby, that he is a man of a good taſte. 'None, ſays he, (92), of thoſe, who ſpoke well at Athens, and at Rome, expreſſed themſelves ſo obſurely in converſation, as Thucydides and Tacitus did in their hiſtories. Doubtleſs, they had a mind to raiſe themſelves above common uſe, and thereby they fell into that obſcurity, for which they are juſtly reproved. It cannot be denied, that they have an affected ſtile, and that they hoped to recommend their hiſtories, as it were, by a manly eloquence, whereby it ſeems that many things are expreſſed in few words, and raiſed above the capacity of the vulgar. I cannot apprehend why ſome learned men undertook to imitate them, as Hugo Grotius, and Dionyſius Voſſius in his tranſlation of Rheide's hiſtory, and how they could reliſh ſuch a ſtile. For certainly good thoughts need not be obſcure to be approved by good judges; and when a reader is obliged to ſtop continually, in order to look for the ſenſe, he does not think himſelf in the leaſt obliged to an hiſtorian, who gives him that trouble. This is the reaſon why ſome hiſtories, though excellent as to the matter, are read by few people; whereas if thoſe hiſtorians deſigned to write for the inſtruction of thoſe, who have a ſufficient knowledge of the Latin tongue, to read a hiſtory with pleaſure, they ſhould have endeavoured to make themſelves eaſily underſtood, and uſeful to as many people as ever they could. The more a hiſtory deſerves to be read by reaſon of the events contained in it, the more it deſerves to be of a general uſe. The authority of the ancients, who neglected the clearneſs of the ſtile, cannot juſtify the moderns, who have imitated them, contrary to the reaſons, I have mentioned, or rather contrary to good ſenſe.' There is nothing in Tacitus that leſs deſerves to be imitated, than his too conciſe and conſequently obſcure ſtile; and yet that very fault has been moſt imitated. I am ſorry Grotius is one of thoſe who did not avoid it. The great Bignon, who did not approve that ſtile, had almoſt perſuaded the author to alter it. 'Amavit (Grotius) ubique orationem preſſam, & quadam dignitate gravem. A qua nec in hiſtoria ſibi temperavit. Satis conſtat, virum noſtri ſæculi ſummum, omniſque doctrinæ & auctorem & cenſorem graviſſimum, Hieronymum Bignonium, cum ineditas adhuc Grotii hiſtorias & Annales legiſſet, non probaſſe brevitatem orationis, obſcuritati obnoxiam, in illo genere ſcripturæ, quod à perſpicua venuſtate potiſſimum commendationem caperet; peneque Grotio perſuaſiſſe, ut reſcriberet (93). —— Grotius was every where fond of a conciſe and majeſtic ſtile; which he could not forbear uſing in hiſtory. It is well known, that one of the learnedeſt men of our time, Jerom Bignon, having read the hiſtories and annals of Grotius in manuſcript, diſapproved the brevity of ſtile, which made it liable to obſcurity, in a kind of writing, whoſe greateſt recommendation is perſpicuity; and that he had almoſt perſuaded Grotius to write it over again.' Mr de la Neufville, in the preface to his hiſtory of Holland, affirms, that Grotius had begun to mould his work anew.

GRUTERUS (Peter) was born in the Palatinate. His father, THOMAS GRUTERUS, who fled thither (a), becauſe the Proteſtants were perſecuted in the Netherlands, was profeſſor at Duiſburg [A], and had three or four ſons who were men of letters [B]. Peter Gruterus, who makes the ſubject of this article, practiſed phyſic in ſeveral towns of Flanders, at Dixmuyde, at Oſtend, &c. and was not very well pleaſed with the Flemiſh (b). He publiſhed, at Leyden, in the year 1609, a century of Latin letters, that were very ill uſed by the printers and the critics [C]. He affected, in thoſe letters, a ſtyle, full of old words and obſolete phraſes. He left Oſtend in 1620, and retired to Middleburg. I know not whether he made a long ſtay in that town; but I think he endeavoured to make his fortune in ſeveral places, before he ſettled at Amſterdam, where the magiſtrates proved bountiful to him (c). He publiſhed there a new century of letters in the year 1629 [D], and died in the ſame place, in the year 1634 (d). Swertius (e) ſays, he was born at Ziriczée in Zealand; and that he ſpent ſome years in Italy.

[A] His father Thomas Gruterus was profeſſor at Duiſburg (1).] This appears from ſome letters printed at the end of the ſecond century of Peter Gruterus, his ſon, ſome of which were written by that Thomas Gruterus. He wrote ſeveral books (2), and, among others, the hiſtory of David George, and a confutation of his hereſies.

[B] . . . and had three or four ſons, who were men of letters.] JAMES GRUTERUS, the ſon of Thomas, was profeſſor of hiſtory in the illuſtrious ſchool of Middleburg in the year 1604. Some of his letters have been printed at the end of the ſecond century of Peter Gruterus, his brother, with a catalogue of ſome books written by him, which were never printed. REINIER GRUTERUS, the ſon of the ſame Thomas, was principal of Caſimir college at Heidelberg. Some of his letters to his brother Peter are to be found at the end of the ſecond century, juſt now mentioned, with a liſt of his manuſcript works. JOHN GRUTERUS, another ſon of Thomas, left his ſtudies, and took a journey into Italy, which did not prove lucky; for, being ſo imprudent as to diſpute about the euchariſt, he was obliged to run away, for fear of falling into the hands of the inquiſitors. He fled to Naples in the night, and ſoon after ſet out to return into his own country; but he died of a ſickneſs before he made an end of his journey (3). Some of his letters have been publiſhed with thoſe of his brothers'.

[C] His Latin letters were very ill uſed by the printers and the critics.] He complains of the printer at the beginning of his ſecond century (4): 'Externa 'quoque fata ſæpe eas involvunt; Typographo alibi 'ſtertente, & correctoris ignavia vacillante: quæ ſors 'meas certe obruit, nuſquam prælo magis famæ au'toris invidente, quibus ſi deſidiam illius aſſocio, cujus 'fidei typorum curam adſcripſeram, omnem excuſa'tionis cumulum confeci. ——— They likewiſe ſuffer 'thro' the negligence of the printer and corrector: This 'was certainly the fate of my letters, no author's fame 'having ſuffered more by the preſs; to which if I add 'the careleſſneſs of him whom I intruſted with the care 'of the impreſſion, I ſhall have fully apologized for 'myſelf.' The ſame complaint is to be ſeen in many other places in that work. His reſentment againſt thoſe, who cenſured the firſt century, does alſo frequently appear in it, and he expreſſes it with the ſame earneſtneſs. His ſon hopes that the ſecond century will meet with a better reception. 'Vario fato prima 'Centuria fluctuavit, iniqui ſubinde Cenſoris aciem ex'perta, prout rudi manu libram hanc vitio-creati Ju'dices verſarunt. Sed qui felices adoleſcentiæ tuæ 'primitias non benignè ventilarunt, ſæcundæ virili'tatis meſſem admirari diſcant (5). —— The firſt cen'tury of letters was variouſly fated, meeting now and 'then with an ill-natured critic, as it happened to fall 'into the hands of bad judges. But let thoſe, who 'cenſured the firſt fruits of your youth, learn to admire 'the harveſt of your fertile manhood.' The truth is, that thoſe, who ridiculed thoſe letters, had good reaſon for it; and yet many perſons complimented the author upon that work in a very high ſtrain: he took care to prefix thoſe compliments to his ſecond century. Which ſhews, that whoever writes to a vain author, whoſe books are not good, ought duly to conſider his words. It is to be feared, that ſuch a man will publiſh the encomiums beſtowed upon him, if he has the originals in his hands. Peter Gruterus foreſaw, that the affectation of his old language would not be approved, and therefore he made an apology for it before-hand, and printed it with the firſt letters (6).

[D] He publiſhed a new century of letters.] Valerius Andreas is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Iſaac Gruterus, the author's ſon, publiſhed it. It plainly appears from the epiſtle dedicatory, and the preface, and from a letter of Giles Snouck prefixed to the reſt, that it was Peter Gruterus who put out the ſecond century. The ſame appears from a letter of his ſon Iſaac, printed at the end of the book, with a Carmen gratulatorium, which he made upon that edition, and with ſome other letters written by him to ſeveral perſons.

GRUTERUS (Janus), a learned philologer, and one of the moſt laborious writers of his time, was born at Antwerp the 3d of December 1560. He was but a child, when his father (a) and mother, being proſcribed on account of the Proteſtant religion by the ducheſs of Parma, governeſs of the Low-Countries, removed him into England. His mother, who was a learned woman [A], was his chief tutor. He ſpent ſome years in the univerſity of Cambridge, from whence he went to that of Leyden [B], in order

(a) I ſpeak of him towards the end of the remark [B].

[A] His mother . . . . was a learned woman.] She was an Engliſh woman (1), and her name was Catherine Tiſhem (2). She underſtood Greek ſo well, that ſhe could read Galen in that language, which very few phyſicians can do. 'Is ſicut rebus duris 'conſtantiæ doctores utrumque parentem, ita matrem 'præcipuè ſtudiorum magiſtram, votum ſimul Agaſi'clis conſecutus eſt, ut eorum diſcipulus diceretur, 'quorum & filius eſſet. Mater enim præter Galli'cam, Italicam, Britannicam linguam, Latinas litteras 'optimè, Græcas ita callebat, ut & Galenum, quod 'milleſimus Medicus vix ſolet, linguâ Galeni legerit. '—— In adverſity, he was taught conſtancy by both 'his parents; but his mother had the chief direction of 'his ſtudies; in which he had, what Agaſicles wiſhed 'for, the happineſs of being both pupil and ſon to the 'ſame perſon. For his mother, beſides French, Italian, 'and Engliſh, was ſo well acquainted with Greek and 'Latin, that ſhe could read Galen in his own language, 'which ſcarce one phyſician in a thouſand can do.' I doubt this woman has been too often forgotten by thoſe, who have publiſhed catalogues of learned women.

[B] He paſſed ſome years in the univerſity of Cambridge, from whence he went to that of Leyden.] He ſtudied there for the ſpace of ſeven years, if we believe Valerius Andreas (3), who quotes a preface of Gruterus himſelf; and adds, that Gruterus had been in England ever ſince he was four years of age, till he came to be nineteen; and that, intending to ſettle at Antwerp, his birth-place, after he had been admitted doctor of the civil-law, he immediately left it, being informed, that the duke of Parma was ready to beſiege it. His father, who was a conſiderable man, and had ſome order to ſtudy the civil-law. He took there his doctor's degree; but afterwards he wholly applied himſelf to the belles lettres, and ſoon publiſhed ſome critical books [C]. Though it is known in general that he travelled, one cannot give an account of the circumſtances and order of his travels. He was in Pruſſia, when Chriſtian, duke of Saxony, offered him the profeſſorſhip of hiſtory in the univerſity of Wittemberg. He accepted it, but kept it only a few months, becauſe Chriſtian died ſoon after; and thoſe, who governed after him, obliged all the profeſſors to ſubſcribe a formulary, or to reſign their places. Gruterus choſe rather to reſign his, than to ſubſcribe any confeſſion of faith againſt his conſcience [D]. I find, that he read publick lectures in the univerſity ome employments in that town during the ſiege, being unwilling, that his ſon ſhould ſtay in it at that troubleſome time, ſent him to travel into France. Theſe computations are wrong; for they ſuppoſe, that the duke of Parma beſieged Antwerp in the year 1586, which is not true; he beſieged it in 1584; and therefore, if Gruterus had left Leyden, to retire to Antwerp, before the ſiege, he could not have ſtudied in England till he was nineteen years of age, and then at Leyden for the ſpace of ſeven years. But to go on, our Gruterus's father's name was Gualtherus; he was a burgomaſter of Antwerp (4), and ſubſcribed the famous petition, that was preſented to the duchеſs of Parma, and which gave riſe to the name Gueux, Beggars. Being proſcribed, he went through many hardſhips, before he got to Norwich in England, where he ſtayed a conſiderable time; afterwards he came to Middleburg, from whence he removed to Antwerp, when the States were maſters of it. He demanded of the ſenate that he might be exempted from all offices; which was granted him, till they were threatened with a ſiege, and then he was not only appointed captain of his ward, but alſo one of the four overſeers of the proviſions. 'Gualtherus vici ſui Magiſter delectus eſt; cui muneri minùs gravi ſucceſſit deinde gravius, cùm Parmenſis obſidionem feciſſet. Rei namque frumentariæ quatuorvir, collegis Aldegondio, Leſdale & Roſa, adſcitus in partem gloriæ illius mittendus eſt, quod annonæ conſcientiam ſic inter paucos ſeptam tenuiſſent, ut citra deditionem nec civi nec hoſti conſtare poſſet, tantum tridui frumentum ſuperfuiſſe (5).'

[C] He ſoon publiſhed ſome critical books.] He publiſhed firſt of all ſome Latin verſes, being about twenty years of age. Famæ ſuæ immortalis januam circa annum vigeſimum aperiebat verſibus quos Ocellos vocabat (6). Afterwards he put out, at Wittemberg in the year 1591, Suſpicionum libri IX. in quibus varia ſcriptorum loca emendata & explicata; and then he printed, ſucceſſively, notes upon moſt of the ancient Latin authors, upon the two Senecas, Martial, Cicero, Livy, Florus, Velleius Paterculus, &c.

[D] He choſe to reſign his place, rather than to ſubſcribe any confeſſion of faith againſt his conſcience.] They required from him, that he ſhould ſign the book of the concord: he anſwered, that he knew not what it was, that he had never read or ſeen that book, and that it would be great raſhneſs for any one to approve a thing, that he has not examined (7). Whereupon he was diſmiſſed, with two others, who refuſed to ſubſcribe; but they came off cheaper than he. They received half a year's ſalary as a gratification, as is uſually practiſed in that country, in favour of thoſe, who are honourably diſmiſſed. Gruterus was ſo far from being gratified in the ſame manner, that he had not ſo much as the charges of his journey paid him. He was the worſt courtier in the world; he minded nothing but his books, and did not care to trifle away his time in viſiting and cringing to the court favourites, in order to inſinuate himſelf into their good graces; and he thought, that, all things duly conſidered, it would be better for him not to think of that gratification, than to engage in long and troubleſome ſollicitations about it. 'Causâ ſuperius indicatâ, quod purpuras Aulicas adorare neſcierat, Principi verò tormentum, aut ſupplicationis continuæ fidiculas adhibere ſibi interdixerat. Minus enim moleſtiæ ineſſe videbatur diſpendio expedito, quàm ſtipendio aut præmio intricato (8).' This is the true character of a man, who is a meer ſcholar. But perhaps it may ſeem ſtrange, that a man, who had read ſo much, ſhould not have known what the book of the concord was. I do not think that Gruterus had a vaſt genius; but his extraordinary application, his great deſire of knowing a world of things, and his prodigious diligence in making large collections, gave him a kind of univerſal knowledge, for which he was not naturally qualified. How comes it then, that he neglected to inform himſelf of a thing, which divided the churches, and made a great noiſe among divines? In all likelihood, he had no inclination for the ſtudy of controverſies. To ſpeak more poſitively, he did not approve the diſputes of divines (9); he would never meddle with them; he never had any quarrel about religion with the Roman Catholics; and therefore he was ſuſpected of being inclined to change his religion. Venator, his panegyriſt, is a little angry with thoſe, who entertained ſuch ſuſpicions. Theſe are his words (10): 'Huc accedit quædam alia dementia, quæ frigere eos dicit in Religione, quos in contentiones non vident ardeſcere. Pontificio non oblocutus es? Pontificius haberis. Lutherano non reluctatus? Lutheranus audis. Calviniſtæ non inſultaſti? Calviniſta es. Iſtis enim nominibus invicem diſcedimus. Novi qui de GRUTERO propter hanc ipſam cauſam Tranſitionem ſparſerant. Sicut & David Chytræus, quod in Academia Roſtochiana GRUTERO, qui tunc ibidem Suetonium legebat, conjunctior erat, & ſtudium rixandi averſabatur, Calviniani nominis invidiam ſuſtinuit. —— To this may be added another piece of madneſs, which calls thoſe cold in religious matters, who are not heated with controverſy. Have you never reviled a Papiſt? You are a Papiſt. Have you never ſtruggled with a Lutheran? You are called a Lutheran. Have you never inſulted a Calviniſt? You are a Calviniſt. For theſe are the names, that alternately divide us. I know ſome, who, for this very reaſon, ſpread a report, that Gruterus was gone over. In like manner David Chytræus, becauſe he was intimate, in the univerſity of Roſtoc, with Gruterus, who then read lectures on Suetonius, and hated contention, was branded with the name of a Calviniſt.' This panegyriſt had been ſpeaking very judiciouſly againſt thoſe, who love diſputing, and concerning the ill effects of controverſies. Men do not grow the better for them, ſays he, but more ſpiteful againſt their neighbours. 'Certamina talia ſemper ferè iſtis eventibus finiuntur, ut acerbius fiat odium inter partes, & nemo per illa melior. Mira res eſt, quod commiſſionibus factionum, argumentorum verſutiis, clamoribus, convitiis, mutuis execrationibus Deo nos gratiores fieri putamus, cum amor & pax, & manſuetudo, & præcedentium mater Fides nobis rem conficiant, quorum tamen poſtrema cura habetur, & inter diſceptandum nulla. Hæreſes odiſti? Dicam quæ maxima ſit, Hypocriſis. Hanc prius exuamus. Quotus enim quiſque de gloria Dei prius cogitat, quam de ſua? Quotuſquiſque melius vivit, quàm diſputat (11)? —— Such kind of diſputes generally end in ſuch a manner, that the parties are ſtill more exaſperated againſt each other, and no one is the better for it. It is ſtrange, that we ſhould think to render ourſelves acceptable to GOD, by factious diſputes, by clamour and mutual reviling; when love, peace, mildneſs, and faith, the mother of them all, do our buſineſs, yet are laſt taken care of, and amidſt diſputation not at all. Do you hate hereſies? I will tell you which is the greateſt; Hypocriſy. Let us firſt diveſt ourſelves of this. For how ſeldom do we conſider the glory of GOD before our own? How few of us live better, than we diſpute.' I muſt acquaint the reader, that one ought not haſtily to believe what Venator advances upon this ſubject; for he ſeems too angry with the divines, and makes an odious deſcription of them; and therefore the following words ought to be read with caution (12). 'Multas inauſpicatas, inimicas & arcentes aves mortales illi ubique fere nanciſcuntur, nullas tamen infeſtiores hodie, quàm quæ de ſuggeſtu diris omnibus regnant, & populares animos odiis aſperant, quos vetus Augurum verſity of Roſtoc (b), but I do not know when, nor how, he left that univerſity. The place, where he appeared as a profeſſor with the greateſt luſtre, was Heidelberg, where he had alſo the direction of that famous library (c), which was removed to Rome ſome time after. He was very fit for ſuch an employment, which very much helped him in writing a great many commentaries. One of the moſt uſeful works, he publiſhed, is a large collection of inſcriptions [E]. Nothing could be more deplorable for a man of his character, than the loſs he ſuſtained, when his fine library was plundered [F], with the town of Heidelberg, in the year 1622. Before that town was taken, he retired to his ſon-in-law at Bretten, from whence he removed to Tubingen. He returned to Bretten, when the affairs of the Palatinate began to be in a better poſture; but,

There are ſome (*GOD forbid I ſhould involve all in the ſame cenſure) even in our mother-country Germany, men of the moſt ſacred character, who, as if they were ſole judges of things divine and human, act, with ſo much confidence, that part, which ſome one has called both the beſt and the worſt, that they ſay any thing of any one, without any caution, right or wrong, and hold the ears and faith of the vulgar in moſt ignoble bondage and ſervitude. Does any one refuſe to beſtow ſomething on them? he is avaritious: is he wanting in paying a particular reſpect to them? he is arrogant: has he not praiſed them? he is ambitious: does he not aſſent to them? he is their enemy: but if he cenſures their bad morals, ſo heinous an offence makes them eloquent.' This is ſufficient: he ſays a great deal more upon this ſubject; the readers may conſult the original, if they have a mind to know it.

[E] One of the moſt uſeful works he publiſhed is a large collection of inſcriptions.] Here follows an hiſtorical account of that work (13). Martin Smetius, a native of Bruges, ſpent ſix years in Italy, to make a collection of inſcriptions, and adding them to thoſe, which ſome learned men gave him, he digeſted them into a very good order. Mark Laurinus, lord of Watervliet, a great lover of antiquity, deſired to have a copy of thoſe inſcriptions, and promiſed to requite him for ſuch a painful office. Whilſt Smetius was about it, his houſe was ſet on fire, and all his goods and inſcriptions, except fifty ſheets he had laid by in a cloſet, were burnt. Laurinus encouraged him, with entreaties and promiſes, to reſtore that work to it's firſt perfection, which was done; and thus that fine collection was delivered to Laurinus, who, preparing to retire into France by reaſon of the civil wars, took thoſe inſcriptions along with him, as alſo the treaſure of ancient medals, which Hubert Goltzius had collected with great pains and vaſt charges. The whole was taken from him by the Engliſh garriſon of Oſtend. No application could be made again to Smetius; for, being miniſter of the Reformed at Bruſſels, he had been hanged there by the ſoldiers. Goltzius married his widow. Whereupon Janus Douza, being ſent into England by the States, bought the manuſcript inſcriptions of an Engliſh ſoldier, and gave it to Lipſius, who had it printed with ſome ſupplements. Gruterus took thoſe inſcriptions, to which he added as many as he could get, with prodigious pains, and, putting them in order, publiſhed them at Heidelberg, in the year 1601, being ſo happy as to prevail upon Scaliger to make twenty four Indexes, upon which that great man beſtowed ten months. Hoc Gruterus tandem noſter aſinino prorſus labore ex lateritio marmoreum imo aureum fecit, nam & illas pauciores primo ſervavit, & omnes quotquot unquam in toto orbe ſuperfuerant collegit inſcriptiones, & eaſdem in ordinem coëgit, & denique Cæſari Rudolpho parenti publico perpetuoque Auguſto dedicatum publicavit. Cui ipſemet Joſephus Scaliger in ſenecta ætate, ſolo amore atque ſtudio quo Gruterum proſequebatur compulſus, viginti quatuor Indices decem menſibus continuo illis inſudando adjecit (14). The emperor commended that work very much, and left it to Gruterus's choice what reward he ſhould beſtow upon him. The author anſwered, he left it to the diſcretion of the emperor, provided the reward ſhould not conſiſt in money: and, when he came to hear that there was a deſign to give him a coat of arms, in order to ſet off his noble extraction in the empire; he gave to underſtand, that he was ſo far from deſiring a new coat of arms, that he found that, which he had from his anceſtors, a burthen to him. Whereupon the emperor was adviſed to grant him a licence for all the books he ſhould publiſh (15). That prince approved of it, and, beſides, thought fit that Gruterus ſhould have a character whereby he might have a right to grant licences (16): he deſigned to make him count of the ſacred palace; but, becauſe he died before he could ſign the patent, the buſineſs came to nothing. Gruterus was too haſty in expreſſing his acknowledgement. 'Decreta res apud Principem, approbata in Senatu Auguſto, relata ad principem iterum, ut ſubſcribendo firmaret, quod præſcripſerat communicando. Sed Cæſarem occupavit morbus, deinde fatum, quod bonas actiones plerumque cum authoribus finit. Literæ itaque quibus ſuperiora Privilegia continebantur, ſicut ejus generis mille alia, more quodam differendi, relicta ſunt abſque manu Imperatoris, abſque ſignatione, nec poſtea unquam productæ, quia nova Poteſtas faciliùs ſua beneficia orditur, quàm aliena abſolvit, & novis curis occupata raró ſuccedit in obligatione veteris promiſſi. Itaque GRUTERUS luculentiſſimum munus nunquam accepit, & laudes Cæſaris optimi ſic celebravit, quaſi integrum accepiſſet (17). —— The thing was conſented to by the emperor, approved by the Aulic council, and returned to the emperor, that he might confirm, what he had directed, by his ſign manual. But it was prevented by the emperor's death, a fatality, which generally puts an end to good actions with their authors. Therefore the letters patent, which contained the above privileges, together with many others of the ſame kind, by being deferred, were left unſigned by the emperor, nor were ever after produced; for a new prince is more inclined to begin with conferring his own favours, than with compleating thoſe of others, and, being taken up with new cares, thinks itſelf under no obligation to make good an old promiſe. Therefore GRUTERUS never received this noble privilege; yet he celebrated the praiſes of the beſt of emperors, as if had been put in full poſſeſſion of it.' but, being moleſted there by the Roman Catholics [G], he retired to a country-houſe, which he bought near Heidelberg. He went to that town now and then, and ſet out from it, on the day that he fell ſick of the illneſs of which he died. He ſet out from it the tenth of September, 1627, to go to Berhelden (d), where he ended his life ten days after. He was buried at Heidelberg in St Peter's church. Juſt at the time of his death, the news came, that the univerſity of Groningen offered to make him profeſſor of hiſtory, and of the Greek tongue (e). He had been invited to ſeveral other places [H]. As I have already ſaid, he was a moſt laborious man [I]. He had a very uncommon quality ; varian troops ; but the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiers prevailed over the good intentions of that officer. Smendius, being informed, that Gruterus's houſe was plundered, repaired to Heidelberg, and ſaw the books pillaged. He endeavoured to ſave at leaſt thoſe, which the amanuenſis of Gruterus had removed into the electoral library, and deſired the Pope's commiſſioner to give him leave to take them out. He was anſwered, that the Pope would have all the manuſcripts to be carefully preſerved, and carried to Rome ; but that the printed books might be reſtored to Gruterus, provided Tilly approved of it by a note ſigned with his own hand. This pretended civility proved inſignificant, becauſe Tilly could not be ſpoken to (13).

[G] He was moleſted there by the Roman Catholics.] I have already ſaid (20), that he never loved controverſies, or diſputes about religion ; and therefore, being importuned by ſome young Jeſuits, who were mightily for diſputing, he quickly left Bretten. The firſt time he gave them a gentle anſwer, and ſet them right upon a paſſage of St Auguſtin, which they had quoted wrong ; but, when they renewed the attack, he grew ſomewhat angry, called them preſumptuous young men, and told them how civilly he was uſed by Andreas Schottus and James Sirmond. 'Ipſum quoque juvenes quidam ex familia Jeſuïtarum diſputando ſolicitabant, quibus ille primum placidè reſpondit, & ſemel etiam ſententiam Auguſtini, quam non ſatis memoriter ipſi meminerant, ex libro præſenti oſtendit, docuitque aliis verbis, & alio loco extare, quod ab illis & pro illis fuerat allatum. Deindè cum nec dum deſiſterent, quin ipſum talibus obtunderent, libertate reſumpta, mirari ſe dixit, ubi frontem reliquiſſent ſemibarbatuli juvenes, ut ſperent docere ſenem ſexagenarium, qui plures patres in vita legerit, quàm ipſi ſaltem vidiſſent. Jeſuitas ſenes & primarios (SCHOTTUM nominabat & SIRMONDUM) ſibi mutuo honore litterarumque commercio coli : nullam tamen ab iſtis de religione ſibi moleſtiam exbiberi. Erat enim noſter alienus ab iſtis velitationibus, quas nec in aliis probavit (21). —— Some young Jeſuits likewiſe teized him with offers of diſputation ; whom he at firſt anſwered with mildneſs, and even once pointed out to them, upon the ſpot, a paſſage of St Auſtin, which they had not ſufficiently remembered, and ſhewed them that it was extant in other words, and in another place, than as they had produced it. At laſt, when he found they continued to importune him in the ſame manner, he aſſumed a freedom of ſpeech, and ſaid, he wondered where they had left their modeſty, that ſuch half fledged boys ſhould pretend to inſtruct an old man of ſixty, who had read more fathers in his life, than they had ſeen : that men of years and diſtinction among the Jeſuits (particularly SCHOTTUS and SIRMOND) did him the honour to correſpond with him, but never troubled him about religion. For Gruterus was averſe himſelf to thoſe ſquabbles, and diſapproved of them in others.' It was not the buſineſs of ſuch a critic, as Gruterus, to diſpute about controverted doctrines with young Jeſuits, bred up in the ſubtilties of the ſchools ; and he found, that the only way of avoiding their importunity, was to live at ſome diſtance from them.

[H] He had been invited to ſeveral other places.] The moſt conſiderable invitation was that of Padua. They offered him (22) the chair of Riccoboni, who was lately dead, with a noble ſalary, and a promiſe that he ſhould enjoy liberty of conſcience ; but he refuſed all thoſe advantages, notwithſtanding the ſollicitations of Pinellus and Velſerus to the contrary. He was afraid of expoſing himſelf to envy by ſo honourable and profitable an employment, and would not deprive himſelf of the public exerciſe of his religion. 'Erat ei religioni religio, ſed & erat religioni ipſa pecuniæ ſumma, quæ cæteroqui paucis nimia eſt, & multis opportuna ad impietatem merces ..... Cultus enim divini libertatem publicam (quamvis privatam recepturus) pro quibuſcunque divitiis ſibi negabat eſſe venalem ; præterea tam humanum ſciebat eſſe invidere alienæ felicitati, quàm alienæ virtuti, & hanc quidem propter invidiam non eſſe deſerendam, illum verò feliciorem eſſe, qui non ſit infelix, quàm qui cum invidia feliciſſimus (23). —— He made a conſcience of religion, as he did likewiſe of the ſalary, which to a few is too great, and to many an occaſion of impiety .... for he declared nothing ſhould bribe him to quit the public exerciſe of his religion, tho' he might have been allowed it in private ; beſides, he knew men are as apt to envy another's happineſs, as another's virtue, and that the latter is not to be forſaken on account of envy ; but that he is more happy, who is not unhappy, than he who is moſt happy, with envy.' This is more meritorious in a critic, than it would be in many others. I find, that Gruterus was invited to Denmark ; and that the conſtable d'Eſdiguieres wrote to him, and deſired him to enter into his ſervice ; and that Claudius d'Expilly, and Charles Perinet, lord of Maugarniac, exhorted him to comply with the conſtable's deſire (24). The curators of the univerſity of Franeker offered him, in 1624, the profeſſorſhip of hiſtory (25).

[I] He was a moſt laborious man.] How many learned men might be called idle, if their labours were compared with Gruterus's? Cum quo etiam doctiſſimi hujus ævi, ſi laboris emenſi reſpectu comparentur, deſidioſiſſimi vocabuntur (26). Spizelius, who ſays this, had it from Flayder, who adds : 'Cum etiam illi qui tota ſua vita literis aſſident huic collati, quaſi ſomno ac inertiæ dediti erubeſcere cogantur, niſi Gruteri labores callidius diſſimulare velint, quam candidius æſtimare. - - - When even thoſe, who ſpend their whole lives in ſtudy, if compared to him, are forced to bluſh for their want of induſtry, unleſs they more cunningly diſſemble, than candidly reckon up the labours of Gruterus.' Spizelius obſerves, that Gruterus publiſhed a book almoſt every month : 'Nullus ferè author ſive Græcus ſive Latinus extabat ex antiquis, quem non notis ac commentariis ſuis aut illuſtrarit, aut illuſtrare potuerit ; nemo plura veterum recenſuit monumenta & reſtituit, imò ſingulos ſuæ vitæ annos, ac propemodum menſes, libris ſingulis à ſe editis diſtinxit. - - - There was ſcarce any ancient author, Greek or Latin, extant, whom he did not either comment upon, or could have done it : no one reviſed and reſtored more remains of antiquity, inſomuch that he diſtinguiſhed each year, almoſt each month, of his life by the books he publiſhed.' He ſtudied all day, and a great part of the night, and always ſtanding : Die toto maximam ſæpe noctium partem ſtans literis operam navabat .... ſtans ſcribebat, ſtans legebat, ſtans ſtudebat (27). Any one that conſiders the many books he wrote, or collected into one body, will eaſily believe this extraordinary application. His Theſaurus Criticus (28) is a work of the laſt ſort, wherein he collected into ſix large volumes, in 8vo, a vaſt number of tracts of the moſt excellent critics, which could hardly be met with, if he had not collected them. He did the ſame ſervice to many modern poets, whoſe works he collected, with this title : Deliciæ Poëtarum Gallorum, Italorum, Belgarum, in nine volumes (29). He called himſelf, in that compilation, Ranutius Gerus, which is the anagram of his own name (§ α). He publiſhed two Florilegiums. The firſt, in three volumes in 8vo, contains a great collection of proverbs of moſt nations, and notes. The ſecond is a continuation of Langius's Polyanthea. The firſt volume of that continuation was printed at Strasburg in the year 1624, in folio. 'Compoſuit (30) quoque Polyantheæ tomum tertium & quartum nondum tamen editos, qui ſi referantur ad Langiaquality ; for he was not intent upon gain. He did not care to increaſe his income. He was very charitable to the poor, and lent money, without much inquiring whether it would be paid him again [K]. He patiently bore adverſity ; and, if he was not inſenſible upon the death of his four wives, it appeared at leaſt that it was no very difficult thing to comfort him [L]. His moſt violent quarrel, about learning, was with Philip Pareus : I have mentioned it in another place (f). That which he had with Dionyſius Gothofredus, was like a torrent [M] ; violent, but of no long continuance. He

'num ſunt Oceanus ad guttulas. - - He compoſed likewiſe the third and fourth volumes of the Polyanthea, not yet publiſhed, which, if compared with that of Langius, are as an ocean to a few drops.' He publiſhed a Chronicon Chronicorum Eccleſiaſticum & Politicum, in four large volumes in 8vo, at Francfort, 1614, and, inſtead of putting his own name to it, he put that of Johannes Gualterus, in honour of his father's memory (31). He was too fond of writing many books ; which is the reaſon why choice and judgment do not prevail in his works. Non curat, ſays Scaliger (32), utrum charta ſit cacata, modo libros multos excudat . . . quod fecit Gruterus in Senecam, is a ſchool-boy's or a printer's work. Mr Amelot de la Houſſaye (33) ſpeaks with great contempt of this critic's performance upon Tacitus, and Baudius had paſſed the ſame judgment upon it long before. 'Vidi quæ J. Gruterus ad eum auctorem annotavit. Diligentiam ejus in colligendis varie ſententiis improbare nefas ſit. Sed (quod libere liceat) commiſſiones meræ ſunt, &, ut flagitioſiſſimi Caligulæ non abſonum dictum in re ſimili uſurpem, arena ſine calce. Videtur ſibi propoſuiſſe ad imitandum rationem illam, quam ſecutus eſt Lipſius in admirabili & præſtantiſſimo opere De civili doctrina. Sed Dii boni ! quam longo intervallo, quam non paſſibus æquis veſtigia ſectatur (34). —— I have ſeen the annotations of Janus Gruterus on that author. I can by no means diſapprove his diligence in collecting the opinions of different authors. But I muſt ſay they are meer patch-work, without coherence, and, to uſe an apt expreſſion of the wicked Caligula on a like occaſion, ſand without lime. . . . . he ſeems to have propoſed to himſelf for imitation the method which Lipſius followed in his excellent work De civili Doctrina. But, Good GOD! how greatly does he fall ſhort of that author.' You will ſee another paſſage of the ſame author in the remark [M].

His exceſſive application to books was probably the cauſe of ſome ſtarts of fancy, which made Commelinus ſay, that Gruterus 'was a mad man. When he meets with ſomething, that he does not underſtand, he frets, and throws the book upon the floor (35).

[K] He lent money, without much inquiring whether it would be paid him again.] Tho' he had been caught, he was ſtill willing to lend his money, and thought himſelf happy, that he was not a woman ; for, ſaid he, by way of jeſt, I ſhould have denied no body. 'Et egenis benignè dedit, & indigis prompte credidit ; utrumque virtute indolis, cum tam crudele putaret non dare eſurienti, quam inhumanum negare mutuanti. Et quamquam ipſius argentum non ſemel in mala nomina inciderat, & oblivioſam fidem, facientibus ex commodato donum, quibus dignum erat ultra ſortem etiam uſuræ loco reddere gratias ; non tamen deſiſtebat ille, quoties rogaretur, pecunias promere auxiliares, cùm interim ſubinde confiteretur damnoſam facilitatem ſuam, dicere per jocum ſolitus : Bene ſecum actum, quòd puella non eſſet natus, haud dubiè enim nemini ſe fuiſſe negaturum (36). —— He was both charitable to the poor, and ready to lend his money to thoſe who wanted it ; and in both he followed his natural inclination, whilſt he thought it as cruel not to feed the hungry, as inhuman to refuſe a borrower. And tho' he often met with bad debts, thoſe, who borrowed of him, looking on what he lent as a gift, who, beſides the intereſt, ought to have repaid him with thanks ; yet he ceaſed not to lend his money, as often as he was asked, at the ſame time acknowledging that he ſuffered by his eaſineſs, and ſaying jeſtingly of himſelf : that it was well for him he was not born a girl, ſince he ſhould undoubtedly have refuſed no body.' The ingratitude or unfairneſs of ſome of his debtors did not make him more cautious for the future, by requiring ſecurity, or a bond. Nay, he neglected thoſe formalities, when he paid the portions of his daughters. 'In ſe itaque potius facetè luſit, quam ingratos aſperè perſtrinxit, aut propter hos inhumaniter alios rejecit, aut eoſdem ſponſoribus, teſtibus, aut ſcriptis publicis ſtipavit, ut & ipſi in ære eſſent, & fides in cuſtodia. Quem morem vulgò receptum noſter ne tunc quidem adhibuit, cùm majoris etiam momenti pacta forent condenda, cùm filiabus generos daret & dotem, nulla teſtium conſcientia, nulla Formulariorum curioſitate, nulla cerâ, quam ſoceri generique opus eſſe cenſebat (37). —— Therefore he rather jeſted upon himſelf, than reflected upon the ingratitude of his creditors, or inhumanly rejected others upon their account, or even required proper ſecurity of them. This uſual precaution he neglected even when he was to enter into contracts of much more importance, I mean when he was to marry and portion his daughters ; for he thought there was no need of witneſſes, of writings, of ſigning and ſealing, between father-in-law and ſon-in-law.'

[L] It was no very difficult thing to comfort him] This may be inferred from the words of his panegyriſt ; and it is likely, he did not ſay all that he knew about it, thinking that inſenſibility was not a commendable thing. He ſays, that one of Gruterus's four wives died a violent death ; ſhe fell from the top of the houſe and was killed : nevertheleſs her husband bore it patiently, tho' the circumſtances of his wife's death ſhould have encreaſed his grief. 'Doluit ille quidem magnopere morte uxoris, doluit ipſa ſpecie mortis, doluit inopinâ viduitate ; ſed poſt amiſſionem tamen uxoris multum abfuit ab amiſſione ſui, multum ab impatientia vulgari, quæ plerunque cùm corrigere non poſſit mala ſua, corrigere vult Deum (38). —— He grieved indeed greatly for the death of his wife ; he lamented the particular circumſtancies of it ; he was afflicted at his ſudden widdowhood ; but the loſs of his wife was far from making him loſe himſelf ; nor did he ſhew that uſual impatience, which, when it cannot remedy it's miſfortunes, is apt to quarrel with GOD.

[M] The quarrel he had with Dionyſius Gothofredus was like a torrent.] That learned civilian corrected ſome paſſages of Seneca differently from him ; whereupon Gruterus immediately put out a book with this title ; Confirmatio ſuſpicionum extraordinariarum contra Dionyſii Godofredi conjecturas & varias lectiones in Senecam Philoſophum. He publiſhed it at Francfort in 1591. The heat of youth carried him too far, and he was very ſorry for it afterwards, when Gothofredus became his colleague (39), and they were reconciled. The panegyriſt will have it that this diſpute is of ſuch a nature, that, conſidering the learning it contains, we ſhould have been ſorry that thoſe two critics had not quarelled ; and that one would wiſh they had never had any quarrel, by reaſon of the great paſſion that appears in it. 'Quod certamen inter ipſos certatum vix poſſis nolle, quin velis, vix velle, quin nolis. Adeò multum excidebat inter diſceptandum humanioris doctrinæ, adeò multum rurſus inhumanioris cenſuræ. GRUTERUS ipſe calorem illum juventutis ſæpe poſtea deteſtatus eſt. He made a very good uſe of his misfortunes in the laſt years of his life; which appears by the moral reflexions he publiſhed (g). His curioſity, though never ſo great, went no farther than learning: he did not mind the town news, as ſo many other learned men do [N], who never go to bed without being informed of all the flying ſtories. Nor did he mind controverſies (h); and doubtleſs this was one of the reaſons why one of his antagoniſts accuſed him of having no religion. Nevertheleſs, he gave ſuch proofs of his attachment to the Proteſtant church, that many paſſionate and reviling controverſiſts are not pious enough to do the like [O].

'learning fell from them during the diſpute, and at the ſame time ſo much ſevere cenſure of each other. GRUTERUS himſelf afterwards deteſted that heat of youth. For when that beſt and learnedeſt of men, whom Gruterus had before a little too vehemently attacked, came likewiſe to Heidelberg to teach there, they were firſt reconciled, then grew more intimate, till at laſt GRUTERUS repented of the ſharp invectives he had thrown out againſt him. For had I known, ſaid he, that Dionyſius was ſo good a man, nothing would have provoked me to have fallen upon him ſo earneſtly.'

To ſhew that he was ſincerely reconciled to Gothofredus, I ſhall mention a thing, which I find in Baudius's letters. Baudius deſired him to preſent his ſervice to that civilian; but Gruterus would not do it, becauſe he thought Baudius had not praiſed Gothofredus according to his merit; and he wrote to him, that it was not enough, for ſuch a man, to ſay, that he was laborious, and had done no ſmall ſervices to the civil-law; but that he ſhould have commended him for having done very great ſervices to that ſcience, or rather that he ſhould have uſed more emphatical words. Baudius was offended at this advice, and ſpoke very unkindly of Gruterus, in a letter which he wrote to a learned man of Hamburgh. 'Quemamodum Grutero non fuit animus ſalutandi meo nomine Dionyſium Godofredum, quia nimis parca manu laudes & virtutes ejus eram perſecutus: quod & ſignificavit per literas adjuncto noſtro elogio, ſi forte me ratio fugiſſet. Erat autem tale, vir laborioſus, & non male de jure meritus. Dicere debueras, inquit, optime, aut ſi quid aliud efficacius. Vide quid oneris nobis injungatur, ut faſces ſubmittamus ſcilicet iis, quibus οὐκ ἐςι νοῦς αρτίφρων. Omnes hominis dotes abunde complexus eſſe videor, ſi dicam Sarcinatorem eſſe probum ſuere centones optime. Ego malim in æternum ejerare omnem ſcribendi copiam, quam tali pacto me poſteritati æſtimandum proponere, etſi hæc via & ad opes & ad æſtimationem ducit. ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον αἰσχύνομαι καὶ ἐμαυτὸν, καὶ τὰς τῶν ἐσομένων δόξας. Quanquam bonum illum Gruterum (eſt enim vir minime malus, imo vix capax malitiæ) prorſus habeo excuſatum, ſi id ætatis homo non poteſt ablegare vaniſſimam illam gloriæ cupiditatem, quæ nunquam ſeneſcit, & (uti incomparabilis meus Tacitus ait) ſapientiam profeſſis, noviſſima exuitur (41). —— In like manner as Gruterus was unwilling to make my compliments to Dionyſius Gothofredus, becauſe I had been too ſparing in reciting his praiſes and virtues; which he ſignified alſo by letter, adding my Elogium, leſt I ſhould have forgot it. It was as follows: an induſtrious man, and not ill deſerving of the law. You ought, ſays he, to have ſaid moſt deſerving, or ſomething ſtill ſtronger. Behold what task is impoſed upon me, to ſubmit, forſooth, to thoſe, who are not proper judges. I think I comprehend all the qualifications of the man, if I ſay, He is a good compiler, and patches up cento's admirably. For my own part, I had rather forſwear writing for ever, than be tranſmitted to poſterity under ſuch a character, tho' this way leads both to riches and fame. Tho' I entirely excuſe Gruterus (who is indeed a man of no guile) if, at that age, he cannot get rid of that moſt empty deſire of glory, which never decays, and (as Tacitus admirably expreſſes it) is the leaſt thing which a philoſopher ſhakes off.' I think no body will be diſpleaſed to know upon what occaſion Baudius wrote this. He had been ſaying: 'If any body enquires after me, be pleaſed to give him my ſervice, tho' I do not mention him to you; for I do not think that people miſtruſt you to ſuch a degree, or that they are ſo ridiculous in our country, as to believe nothing but what they read (42).' Whereupon he tells his friend, that Gruterus refuſed to give his ſervice to Gothofredus, being not willing to do it without ſhewing Baudius's own words. This piece of ſervitude has no place in the epiſtolary correſpondence of men of figure.

[N] He did not mind the town news, as ſo many other learned men do.] The author, I quote, blames the learned men who have ſuch a curioſity, whereby, ſays he, a man muſt be willing to hear a thouſand ſlanders and to know the ill deſigns of ſtep-mothers, and the temptations of widows: temptations do I ſay? the Latin has it Big-bellies (43). Gruterus was to be praiſed for not minding ſuch news (44). 'Quamquam in omni artium ac ſcientiarum indagine curioſiſſimum ſemper ſe exhibuerat, alieniſſimus tamen fuerat ab omni reliqua curioſitate, ſive πολυϖραγμοσύνῃ, quæ haud raro doctiſſimis quibuſdam nimis eſt familiaris ac domeſtica, ut ubique tibi obvii, nil niſi novitates aut rumuſculos aniles ad innocentium ac ſimplicium, ut vocant, mortalium vitam macula inurendam fabrefactos, aucupentur, & impetuoſorum inſtar ventorum atque turbinum, non modo veſtes hominum, ſed ædium quoque parietes atque facta intima ſupinent, nec prius in dulcem, &c (45). —— Tho' he had ever ſhewed himſelf moſt curious in all enquiries of arts and ſciences, yet was he a perfect ſtranger to all other kind of curioſity, ſuch as that impertinent one, which too often is to be found in the moſt learned men, who run after news and idle reports, which injure the characters of innocent perſons, and, like impetuous winds, or ſtorms, lay bare, not only the garments of men, but their very houſes, and moſt ſecret actions, nor can ſleep, &c.' The ſequel of this paſſage may be ſeen in the margin.

[O] He was accuſed of having no religion. Nevertheleſs, he gave ſuch proofs of his attachment to the Proteſtant church, &c.] It is ſaid, that Philip Pareus charged him with ſetting a greater value upon a ſentence of Apuleius or Petronius, than upon all the precepts of JESUS CHRIST: he added, that his atheiſm, and unconcernedneſs for religion, were very well known. Unum Appuleji aut Petronii effatum pluris facit, quam infinita ſervatoris noſtri ϖαραγγέλματα. Notus quippe eſt ejus ἀθεισμὸς, & in ſacra religione ψυχρότης frigus (46). I cannot at preſent verify whether James Gretſerus, a Jeſuit, who is quoted for this, does faithfully cite Pareus's words; but I am ſure, that the following paſſage is to be found in the index of one of Pareus's books (47): Gruterus ſcurriliter illudit religioſiſſimis Salvatoris myſteriis; and this other, Gruterus ἄθεος & Theologiæ ſacræ ignarus. The reader is referred to Pag. 334. where theſe words may be ſeen: 'Abi, Grutere; & Theologica mitte, quæ nihil ad Criticum tuum umbonem. Tuum eſt, conflictari cum blattis ac tineis: non ſcrutari myſteria ſacra, quæ numquam didiciſti, immò quæ adſpernari ſolitus es, Critico planè & aſinino ſupercilio. —— Go, Gruter, and lay aſide divinity: it has nothing to do with criticiſm; your buſineſs is to combat with moths and worms, not to ſearch into ſacred myſteries, which you never learnt, nay always deſpiſed, with the ſupercilious contempt of a dull critic.' We have ſeen that Gruterus refuſed to ſubſcribe a formulary (48), out of a principle of conſcience, tho' he loſt his place by it: and, being offered a profeſſor's chair at Padua (49), he would not accept of it, becauſe he could not there have the public exerciſe of his religion: how great therefore was his boldneſs, who charged him with atheiſm? beſides, this pretended atheiſt anſwered thoſe, who put it to his choice, either to leave his country, or to change his religion, I had rather leave my country: if I am not allowed to live in a town, I ſhall live in the fields or in woods; GOD will ſupply me with herbs or roots the remaining part of my life, which will not be long. Cum juberetur ad aliam Religionem tranſire, aut exire foras, hoc malo, inquit, quàm illud. radicis aut herbæ, quod ſpiritum hunc alat, non diu moraturum (50). Do theſe things betray a man guilty of atheiſm or indifferency for religion? do they not rather ſhew, that Gruterus had a true zeal, preferable to all the clamours and bitterneſs of violent controverſiſts, who damn all other communions?

GRYNÆUS (SIMON) a countryman's ſon of Suabia, was born at Veringen in the county of Hohenzollern, in the year 1493. He ſtudied at Pfortſheim at the ſame time with Melanchthon, and this gave birth to a friendſhip of long continuance between them. He continued his ſtudies at Vienna in Auſtria, and received there the degree of maſter in philoſophy, and the profeſſorſhip of the Greek tongue. Having embraced the Proteſtant religion, he found himſelf expoſed to many dangers, and eſpecially in Baden, where he was for ſome years rector of the ſchool. He was impriſoned at the inſtigation of the monks; but, by the recommendation of the nobility of Hungary, he was ſet at liberty, and retired to Wittemberg, where he ſaw Luther and Melanchthon, and had a conference with them. Upon his return to his own country, he was ſent for to Heidelberg, to be profeſſor of Greek, in the year 1523. He diſcharged this employ till 1529, when he was invited to Baſil, to teach there publickly. There he explained ſeveral authors, and even the epiſtle to the Romans. He was employed with ſeveral others, in the year 1534, to reform the church and ſchool of Tubingen. He returned to Baſil in 1536, and was aſſociated, in 1540, with Melanchthon, Capito, Bucer, Calvin, &c. for the conferences of Worms. He died of the plague at Baſil, the firſt of Auguſt 1541 (a). He had taken a journey into England, in 1531, and had received, from the lord chancellor Sir Thomas More, to whom Eraſmus had recommended him, all imaginable civilities [A]. He was a learned and induſtrious man, and did great ſervice to the Republic of Letters [B]. See his Elogium in Verheiden's collection (b), and in Joachim Camerarius's preface to Theophraſtus. His ſon SAMUEL GRYNÆUS, born at Baſil in the year 1539, obtained there the profeſſorſhip of rhetoric at the age of twenty five years, and afterwards that of civil-law. He died the third of April 1599 (c).

[A] He received from the lord chancellor, Sir Thomas More ..... all imaginable civilities.] This particular is not found in Melchior Adam; for which reaſon I am the more careful in relating it. I have taken it from the epiſtle dedicatory to the works of Plato, printed in Greek at Baſil, apud Joannem Valderum, 1534, in folio. It is there that Grynæus, to teſtify his gratitude, thus addreſſes himſelf to John More, ſon of the chancellor (1): 'Annus eſt (ut noſti) tertius jam, cum in Angliam '..... veniens, ac Eraſmi noſtri commendatione velut vento ſecundo ad illas muſis totas ſacras ædes veſtras delatus, humanitate mira acciperer, majori tractarer, maxima dimitterer. Non ſolum enim ampliſſimus vir pater tuus, ac tum quidem conditione, per cætera vero rebus omnibus egregiis, facile toto regno princeps, privatum hominem ignotumque me, literarum tanto ergo, ad colloquium inter tot publica privataque negotia admiſit: menſæ ſuæ ſceptra regni gerens, adpoſuit: in aulam abiens rediens ſecum traxit: laterique adjunxit ſuo: ſed omnem meam de religione ſententiam locis non paucis diverſam ab ipſius eſſe haud difficulter præſentiens placide benigneque cognovit: ac cum ab illa non parum tum diſcreparet opera conſilioque ſic juvit nos tamen, ut omne mihi negotium ſumptibus etiam ſuis confecerit. Nam & itineri comitem Harriſium doctum juvenem addidit, & Oxonienſis Gymnaſii Proceribus ſic literis inſinuavit, ut ad earum conſpectum omnes nobis collegiorum omnium non ſolum bibliothecæ, ſed ſtudioſorum etiam animi velut mercuriali quadam virgula tacti pateſcerent. —— It is now three years (as you know) ſince, coming into England, and being recommended by my friend Eraſmus to your houſe, the ſeat of the muſes, I was received with wonderful humanity, entertained with greater, and diſmiſſed with the greateſt. For that great man your father, diſtinguiſhed both by his rank and noble actions, not only admitted me, a private and obſcure perſon, to converſe with him (ſo great was his love of learning) amidſt the hurry of both public and private affairs, not only ſet me at his table, tho' the firſt man in the kingdom, carried me with him to and from court, and made me his conſtant companion; but, with great affability and good nature, informed himſelf wherein my religious principles differed from his, and even defrayed all my expences himſelf. He ſent me likewiſe to Oxford, accompanied by Mr Harris, a learned young gentleman, and recommended me ſo ſtrongly to the heads of that univerſity by letters, that, at the ſight of them, I had acceſs to all the public libraries, and met with the moſt friendly treatment from the ſtudents.' They communicated to him at Oxford ſome manuſcripts of Proclus, and he was permitted to take them away: Sir Thomas More added another favour; he made him a preſent of them (2). The paſſage of Eraſmus, which I am going to cite, makes mention of this journey of Grynæus.

[B] He was a learned man ..... and did great ſervice to the republic of letters.] See here the good opinion Eraſmus had of him, which he thus teſtified in 1531: 'Simon Grynæus ...... eſt homo Latine Græcèque ad unguem doctus, in Philoſophia & Mathematicis diſciplinis diligenter verſatus; nullo ſupercilio, pudore penè immodico. Pertraxit hominem iſthuc Britanniæ viſendæ cupiditas, ſed præcipuè bibliothecarum veſtrarum amor (3). —— Simon Grynæus ..... is a compleat maſter of Latin and Greek, a good philoſopher and mathematician, of no pride, and modeſt to exceſs. The deſire of ſeeing England brought him thither; but the chief inducement was, the libraries you have there.' We are obliged to him for editions of ſeveral books of the ancients. He was the firſt, who publiſhed the Almageſt of Ptolemy in Greek (4): he added to it a preface concerning the uſe which is to be made of that author's doctrine. He likewiſe publiſhed Euclid in Greek with a preface (5), and the works of Plato, with ſome commentaries of Proclus (6). He retouched in ſome places the Latin verſion of Plato made by Marſilius Ficinus. See the edition of Plato, 1539, at Baſil, for Frobenius. Whoever would fee a particular account of his tranſlations, prefaces, and other writings, need only conſult the abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque, at pages 755 and 756 of rhe edition of Zurich, 1583.

The Oxford catalogue aſcribes to him ſome works, which cannot be his: de Cometa qui fulſit annis 1577-78; de inuſitata magnitudine & figura Veneris annis 1578-79. We have ſeen that he died in 1541. I make no queſtion but the treatiſe, de ignitis Meteoris & de Cometarum cauſis ac ſignificationibus, which the ſame catalogue aſcribes to him, is, as well as the other two, the production of SIMON GRYNÆUS, phyſician and mathematician at Heidelberg, and ſon of THOMAS GRYNÆUS, nephew of him we are ſpeaking of. The other works, which the Oxford catalogue attributes to Simon Grynæus, really belong to the Grynæus of this article.

GRYNÆUS (THOMAS) nephew of the preceding, was born at Veringen in Suabia, about the year 1512. He ſtudied under his uncle at Heidelberg and Baſil; and he taught the Latin and Greek languages in the city of Berne during eleven years; after which the love of eaſe, and a diſreliſh for diſputes, induced him to retire from this employ, becauſe they drew him into the controverſies, which divided the miniſters. He returned to Baſil, where he became one of the profeſſors, in 1547. He read public lectures, and preached ſometimes in the villages. The marquis of Baden, having introduced the reformation in his dominions, made him miniſter of Rotelen (a). He acquitted himſelf honourably in this employ, during eight years, to his death, that is to the ſecond of Auguſt, 1564. He left four ſons, famous for their learning, THEOPHILUS, SIMON (b), JOHN-JAMES, and TOBIAS (c).

GRYPHIANDER (JOHN), born in the county of Oldemburg, was profeſſor of poetry and hiſtory in the univerſity of Iëna, after Elias Reuſnerus, who died in the year 1612. He was admitted doctor of the civil-law in the ſame univerſity in the year 1614, and, four years after, returned into his country, to take poſſeſſion of an office of judicature. He died in December, 1652 (a). There are ſome books of his writing [A].

(a) Taken from Freberus's Theatrum, pag. 1130.

[A] There are ſome books of his writing.] A treatiſe of iſlands. The whole title runs thus: Joannes Gryphiandri ICti de INSULIS Tractatus ex ICtis, Politicis, Hiſtoricis, & Philologis collectus, ut omnibus hiſce uſui eſſe poſſit, in quo plurimæ cognatæ quæſtiones de mari, fluminibus, lacubus, littoribus, portubus, aquæ ductibus, aggeribus, navigationibus, alluvionis, alveique incremento &c. excutiuntur. It was printed at Francfort in 4to, in the year 1624. Nothing can be more inſtructive than a particular treatiſe upon a certain queſtion, when a learned man ſets about it, and undertakes to exhauſt his ſubject. There are a vaſt number of quotations in that book of Gryphiander. He wrote one about the Phœnix in 1618. He publiſhed another in 1625, which is very curious, in which he treats of a certain right of ſome towns in Saxony, viz. that of erecting Roland's ſtatues of a gigantic ſize. That book is intituled, Commentarius de Weichbildis Saxonicis, ſive Coloſſis Rulandinis urbium quarundam Saxonicarum. Konig aſcribes to Gryphiander a tract, de Oeconomia legali: Freherus ſays nothing of it.

GRYPHIUS (SEBASTIAN), a famous printer of Lyons in the XVIth century, was a German. He perfomed the duties of his profeſſion with ſo much honour, that ſome learned men beſtowed public praiſes on him upon that account. And among others Julius Cæſar Scaliger, and Conrad Geſner. The latter dedicated to him one of his books [A]. Some will have it, that the other dedicated to him his work De cauſis Linguæ Latinæ; but it is a miſtake [B]. One of his beſt editions is a Latin bible, which he publiſhed in two volumes in folio, in the year 1550. He made uſe of the largeſt letter that had been ſeen till then (a). It is inferiour to none, but the bible printed at the Louvre in the year 1642, in nine volumes in folio (b). His many editions are eſteemed by all thoſe, who know wherein the art and perfection of printing doth conſiſt. He dealt very fairly

[A] Geſner dedicated to him one of his books.] Viz. The twelfth of his Pandects. He beſtows the following encomium upon him: 'Tu inter primos, humaniſſime Gryphi, minime prætereundus in mentem 'mihi veniſti πολλῶν ἀντάξιος ἄλλων, cui non poſtremus inter eximios ætatis noſtræ chalcographos locus deberetur: idque eò magis, quoniam non ſolum 'inter externos in Gallia innumeris optimis libris optima fide ſummaque diligentia elegantiaque procuſis, 'maximam tibi gloriam peperiſti: ſed noſtras etiamnum eſſe videris, qui Germanus in Galliam veneris '(1). —— Nor can I forget you, moſt humane Gryphius; you, who deſerve not the laſt rank among the 'printers of our age: for this reaſon in particular, becauſe you have not only acquired the greateſt reputation, of any foreigner in France, by the many beautiful and correct editions you have publiſhed of the beſt 'books; but ſeem to be one of our own countrymen, 'ſince, though a German, you came into France.' Next to his epiſtle dedicatory, there is a catalogue of the books printed by Gryphius.

[B] But it is a miſtake.] 'It is not true, that Julius Scaliger dedicated his book, De cauſis Linguæ 'Latinæ, to Sebaſtian Gryphius, a printer at Lyons. 'He only wrote a letter to him on occaſion of that 'book, which he was to print, wherein he tells him: 'Tuam vero, mi Gryphi, veram pietatem, excellentem eruditionem, inſignem humanitatem, his noſtris 'lucubratiunculis & præeſſe volui, & moderari: ſi id 'tibi ita collibuiſſet: ut Poſteri intelligerent, ejus 'frugis proventum, ſi qua ad eorum commoda per nos 'exculta eſſet, à nobis tantùm commendari, quantùm 'ex diligentia tua, atque auctoritate gratiæ conſequi 'potuiſſet. —— I was willing, my Gryphius, that 'a man of ſuch true piety, excellent learning, and remarkable humanity, ſhould have the care and direction of my works, if you think fit to undertake it; 'that poſterity make know, that I tranſmit the fruits 'of my labours to them, if my abilities can be of any 'ſervice, recommended by your diligence and authority.' 'Can this be called a dedication? Julius Scaliger 'likewiſe wrote a letter to the printer Vaſcoſan, to 'recommend to him the edition of his book De Subtilitate. Not to ſay, that Julius Scaliger was too 'proud to dedicate his book to a printer, how could 'he dedicate his book, De cauſis Linguæ Latinæ, 'to Gryphius, ſince he had inſcribed it to his eldeſt 'ſon Silvius Cæſar Scaliger, to whom he alſo inſcribed 'his Ars Poëtica? Julius Scaliger wrote to Sebaſtian 'Gryphius, in the ſame manner as Quintilian wrote 'to Trypho, a bookſeller, to recommend to him his 'Inſtitutiones Oratoriæ, which he had dedicated to 'Marcellus; and in the ſame manner as Scævola 'Sammarthanus inſcribed ſome Hendecaſyllabic verſes 'to Mamert Patiſſon, to recommend to him the edition 'of his works (2).' This is what Menage obſerves in a book printed in 1688. If the curious Mr Chevillier had known it, he would not have ſaid, that Julius Cæſar Scaliger dedicated to Gryphius (3) 'his treatiſe De cauſis Linguæ Latinæ, printed in 1540, in '4to, wherein he paſſes this compliment upon him: 'that if his works have been kindly received by the 'learned, it is no leſs owing to the beauty and charms 'of the impreſſion, than to their own merit. Cum 'plerique librorum meorum . . . . tuis opibus atque apparatibus ea gratia effecti (4) ſint, ut non minus tuum 'ob beneficium quam propter ſuum meritum eos doctiſſimus quiſque exceperit & probarit.' It was an eaſy thing to commit the fault cenſured by Menage; for Scaliger's letter to Gryphius is prefixed to that book. You will find the ſame fault in the ſupplement to Moreri's dictionary.

It was an uſual thing to place the errata in the leſs viſible part of the book; but Gryphius put it in the moſt obvious place. The firſt page contains the title of the book, the printer's mark, and the year of the impreſſion; the ſecond contains the errata; and the third the epiſtle dedicatory (5).

[D] He had excellent correctors.] Here is an inſtance of their exactneſs. The Errata of Stephen Doletus's Commentarii de Lingua Latina contains only eight errors, tho' that work is made up of two volumes in folio. Since the errors of the preſs were ſo few, Gryphius was in the right to affirm, that the proofs had been very carefully corrected (6). One of his correctors was a phyſician of Cologne, called Adam Knouf (7).

[E] He printed Hebrew perfectly.] Mr Chevillier adds: ‘there is, in the library of the Sorbonne, Bagninus's Theſaurus Linguæ Sanctæ, which is a very fine edition in folio, printed in the year 1529 (8).’

[F] I muſt not forget, that he was a learned man.] (9) ‘Majoragius calls him, Vir inſignis ac litteratus (10), and John Vulteius ſays, in one of his epigrams of the firſt book, that Robert Stephens corrected books very well, that Colinæus printed them very well, but that Gryphius knew very well both how to print and correct them.

The poets of his time called him the excellent Trypho of our age mentioned by Martial. Learned men reſorted to him. He was diligent and curious in ſearching every where for the good books, that were almoſt loſt, to procure ſuch a rare treaſure to poſterity. Antony Gryphius, his ſon, has ſtill many of them that remain to be printed; and, as his father ſpared nothing to recover and publiſh them, he freely beſtows his money and his pains to make them public. He died in the year 1556, at ſixty three years of age.

GUADAGNOLO (PHILIP), reader of Arabic and Chaldee at Rome, in the college Della Sapienza, in the XVIIth century, was one of the firſt that was made uſe of to tranſlate the ſcripture into Arabic, when the congregation De propaganda fide reſolved to comply with the deſires of ſome Eaſtern prelates, who preſented a petition to Pope Urban VIII upon that ſubject, about the year 1624. The archbiſhop of Damaſcus, and Father Guadagnolo, were put upon that tranſlation; but, ſome time after, only the latter undertook that taſk. He was very much eaſed under the pontificate of Innocent X; having nothing to do but to correct that verſion. He died at Rome the twenty ſeventh of March, 1656 (a). Starovolſcius obſerves, that Guagnin compoſed that chronicle of Poland in the year 1578, Puro & nitido ſermone Latino, and got it tranſlated into the Poliſh language, by Martin Paſcowski, in the year 1611 (1).

GUALDRADA, a Florentine lady, illuſtrious for her chaſtity, of which ſhe gave ſo ſeaſonable a proof before the emperor Otho IV (a), that ſhe had immediately, for a reward, the ſatiſfaction of being married very advantageouſly [A], as will be ſeen below. Dante makes mention of her in a very glorious manner; for, ſpeaking of a famous warrior [B], he calls him, Nepote della Gualdrada.

(a) He reigned about the beginning of the XIIIth century.

[A] She had immediately, for a reward, the ſatiſfaction of being married advantageouſly.] To comment upon this, I ſhall make uſe of the old French commentator upon Dante. ‘That lady, ſays he (1), was in her younger years a very handſome and genteel maid, the daughter of Belnicio Barti des Ravignans, an ancient family of Florence, and a branch of that of the Ademares. It happened one day, that the emperor Otho IV, being at Florence, in an aſſembly of ladies, on account of the feſtival of St John the Baptiſt, was wonderfully moved with the beauty of that maid; and asking whoſe daughter ſhe was, Bellincio, her father, being near the emperor, anſwered before the company, that ſhe was the daughter of a man, who would get him to kiſs her. The maid, hearing this, got up merrily, and told him, out of a principle of virtue, pray, father, do not be ſo liberal of a thing, wherein I am ſo nearly concerned: for you will give me leave to tell you, that no man ſhall ever kiſs me, unleſs he be my lawful husband. The emperor was ſurpriſed at ſuch a virtuous and prudent anſwer, and immediately ſent for one of his barons, called Guido, and ordered him to marry her upon the ſpot. He gave her for her portion the Caſſentin, and part of Romagna, and conferred the title of count upon her husband, from whom the counts Guido's are deſcended. The ſaid Guido and Gualdrada had two ſons, viz. William and Ruggier.’

[B] Dante .... ſpeaking of a famous warrior .... calls him nepote della Gualdrada.] It is in the ſixteenth canto of his Inferno, wherein we find theſe words:

Queſto, l'orme di cui peſtar mi vedi,
Tutto che nudo, e dipelato vada
Fu di grado maggior, che tu non credi:
Nepote fu della buona Gualdrada:
Guidoguerra hebbe nome: e in ſua vita
Fece col ſenno aſſai, e con la ſpada.

This ſhade, whom you ſee me treat ſo contemptibly, tho' he wanders naked and ſtript, was of greater rank than you think: he was grand-ſon of the fair Gualdrada; his name was Guidoguerra, famed, in his lifetime, for his prudence and his valour.

The French commentator upon Dante (2) tells us alſo, that Ruggier Guidoguerra, nephew to the fair Gualdrada, ‘was a valiant knight, and a man of great prudence; ſo that in the battle of Benevento, between Charles I, and Manfredo, he was accounted the chief cauſe of the victory obtained by the ſaid Charles, becauſe he happened to be colonel of four hundred Florentine knights, who had been baniſhed for being Guelfes, and ſome time after returned to Florence, from which they expelled the Ghibelins by Charles's aſſiſtance.’ I muſt obſerve, that Grangier contradicts himſelf, when he explains that degree of kindred in the following page. ‘The ſaid Guido and Gualdrada had two ſons, William and Ruggier, and the latter had Guidoguerra, who is therefore Gualdrada's nephew (3).’ How can a man be ſo groſly miſtaken? is it not plain, that the ſon of Gualdrada's ſon is the grand-ſon, and not the nephew of that lady? I think the word nepote in Dante ought to be taken in the ſame ſenſe as nepos in the good Latin authors: Father Paul (4), and cardinal Pallavicini (5), uſe it to denote the grand-ſons of Paul III. One may therefore ſay, that nepote or nipote ſignifies ſometimes a grand-ſon in Italian: Franceſco Alunno ſhould have taken notice of it in his dictionary of the words uſed by Dante, Petrarch, Boccace, &c (6).

GUARINUS, a native of Verona, and ſcholar of Emanuel Chryſoloras, was one of the firſt, who revived the Belles Lettres in Italy, in the XVth century [A]. He underſtood Greek and Latin, and taught thoſe two languages with great ſucceſs, firſt of all at Venice, and then at Ferrara (a). Pope Nicolas V ordered him to tranſlate

(a) Voſſius de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 584.

[A] He was one of the firſt, who revived the Belles Lettres in Italy, in the XVth century.] Leander Albertus (1) beſtows this encomium upon him; and the following paſſage of Jovius confirms the ſame thing: ‘Ab hoc inſigni viro, Græcæ Latinæque literæ obſcuris illis temporibus antiqui ſeculi normam, quadratæque ſtructuræ ordinem & diu quæſitum decus receperunt (2). —— From this famous man, the Greek and Latin languages, in thoſe obſcure times, received the long ſought for ornaments of antiquity.’ Poggius acknowledges, that the Italians were very much indebted to Guarinus: ‘Vir doctiſſimus, ſays he (3), ſpeaking of him, atque humaniſſimus, cujus ſtudia & præſtans doctrina plurimum Italis profuerunt. —— A moſt learned and humane man, whoſe ſtudies and excellent erudition were of great ſervice to the Italians.’ Laurentius Valla (4) calls Guarinus and Leonard Aretin, the moſt learned men of their age. Philelphus (5) calls Guarinus a moſt eloquent man.

Gabriel Naudé affords me a very good addition. He ſays (6), that Boccace, endeavouring to revive good literature, did ſo well ſucceed in it, that, when he came to die in 1375, he had for his ſucceſſor in that deſign, one John of Ravenna, who was the firſt that re-eſtabliſhed the ſchools of Venice, out of which came Gaſparinus, who did the ſame at Milan, and Guarinus Veronenſis.

GUARINUS (BAPTIST), ſon of the foregoing, trod in his father's ſteps, and made himſelf very famous for his skill in the learned languages. He taught them for a long time at Ferrara with great reputation, and publiſhed ſome books anſwerable to the glory he had acquired [A].

He was ſtill living in the year 1494, and he had been then thirty three years profeſſor of the Belles Lettres, having ſucceeded his father in his profeſſorſhip (a). The paſſage, wherein Geſner informs us of this particular, was not well underſtood by Henry Stephens [B].

[A] He publiſhed ſome books anſwerable to the glory he had acquired.] A treatiſe De Secta Epicuri, another de Ordine docendi (1), another De Regno adminiſtrando, notes upon Ovid's Faſti, upon Catullus, ſeveral orations, letters, verſes, and a tranſlation of ſome orations of Demoſthenes and St Gregory Nazianzen, &c. [B] Was not well underſtood by Henry Stephens.] Let us compare his words with thoſe of Geſner. 'Memini me in Bibliothecographia Geſneri legere, Guarinum patrem (nam fuit & Baptiſta Guarinus ejus filius, quem Geſnerus, etiamnum ſe de illo ſcribente, claruiſſe Ferrariæ ait, ubi patris ſucceſſor jam per annos tres & triginta linguam utramque florentiſſime doceret) ſcripſiſſe canoniſmata in lingua Græca (3). I remember to have read in Geſner's Bibliotheque, that Guarinus the father (for there was alſo Baptiſt Guarinus, his ſon, of whom Geſner, at the time he wrote of him, tells us that he flouriſhed at Ferrara, where, being his father's ſucceſſor, he had already taught both languages, for thirty three years, with great ſucceſs) had written rules for the Greek tongue.' They are Henry Stephens's words. The paſſage in Geſner runs thus: 'Claret uſque hodie Ferrariæ, ubi patri ſuccedens, jam per annos tres & triginta utramque linguam florentiſſime docet & varia conſcribit (4). —— He is famous to this day at Ferrara, where, ſucceeding his father, he has already taught both languages, for thirty three years with great ſucceſs, and writes on various ſubjects.' Can you find two paſſages that agree better than theſe two, you will ſay: I will anſwer, yes; for the words uſed by Geſner are Trithemius's. It is not Geſner, who ſays claret uſque hodie, as Henry Stephens will have it, wherein he is groſly miſtaken. He ſhould have referred the word hodie to the year 1494, which Geſner placed in the margin of his book at that place. It is not true, that our Guarinus was alive in the year 1545, in which Geſner's Bibliotheque was printed.

GUARINI (BAPTIST), was born at Ferrara, in the year 1538. He is more known by his tragi-comedy, called Paſtor Fido, than by all his other works, and by the honourable employments [A] beſtowed upon him by the duke, his maſter. That piece was his favourite work; and he made it appear by his great paſſion againſt a critic [B], who had only reflected upon it indirectly. He has expreſſed the myſteries of love ſo much to the life, in that piece, that it is thought the reading of it has been very prejudicial to the chaſtity of many perſons among the fair ſex. This ſeems to confute a maxim of Mr de la Fontaine [C]. I cannot tell whether Guarini would have alledged ſuch

[A] By the honourable employments.] See Moreri's dictionary, to which you may add, that Guarini, being ſent to Venice by Alfonſo II, duke of Ferrara, made an Italian ſpeech before the ſenate, which was admired; and that, after the death of Alfonſo, he was ſent by the city of Ferrara to Paul V, to congratulate him upon his acceſſion to the pontificate (1).

[B] His great paſſion againſt a critic.] Jaſon Denores (2), a native of the iſle of Cyprus, and originally deſcended from a gentleman of Normandy, and profeſſor of morality at Ferrara, wrote a treatiſe concerning poetry, wherein he reflected upon a kind of dramatic poetry, that was very much in vogue, I mean tragi-comic paſtorals (3). He called them monſters, produced by men wholly unacquainted with antiquity, and contrary to the rules of ancient poetry. Guarini, being perſuaded that this criticiſm was levelled at him, wrote an apology againſt Denores. The latter replied, and died whilſt Guarini was writing ſo ſharp a rejoinder, that it is thought it might have occaſioned the death of that critic. Thuanus ſpeaks of it in the following manner: 'Baptiſta Guarinus lectiſſimus eques Ferrarienſis, qui ſub id Paſtorem fidum magno plauſu ubique in Italia exceptum ediderat, eum ſermonem ad injuriam ſuam pertinere exiſtimans, defenſionem ſub nomine Verati publicavit, quam apologia contraria ſtatim Denores refutavit. Sed dum alteram defenſionem meditatur Guarinus, morte minime fatali Denores conceſſit, quæ niſi dilectiſſimi filii calamitate fuiſſet præcipitata alterius Verati lectione accelerari potuiſſe credita eſt. Tanta ſiquidem vi eloquentiæ ſimul & aſperitate ac verborum amaritudine in Jaſonem invectus eſt Guarinus, ut Archilochum ipſum in Lycamben ïambos ſtringentem eo ſcripto ſuperaſſe paſſim jactaretur (4). —— Baptiſt Guarini, a knight of Ferrara, who about that time had publiſhed his Paſtor Fido, a work received with great applauſe all over Italy, thinking thoſe words reflected upon him, publiſhed a defence under the name of Veratus, which Denores preſently refuted by a contrary apology. But whilſt Guarini was preparing another defence, Denores died, not unluckily, ſince his death, if it had not been haſtened by the calamity of his deareſt ſon, might, it is thought, have been brought on ſooner by a ſecond reading of Veratus. For Guarini inveighed againſt Denores with ſo much eloquence, and at the ſame time in ſuch ſharp and bitter terms, that it was generally ſaid he had outdone Archilochus himſelf, who wrote Iambics againſt Lycambes.

[C] This ſeems to confute a maxim of Mr de la Fontaine.] Nicius Erythræus having ſaid, that the Paſtor Fido is reprinted almoſt every year, and that all nations, tho' never ſo barbarous, have it tranſlated into their language, adds, that perhaps that book is prejudicial to chaſtity (5), and he gives this reaſon for it: 'Etenim in ejus dulcedine ſuavitateque tanquam in infeſto Sirenis mari in quo etiam Ulyſſes erravit, virgines nuptæque complures pudicitiæ naufragium feciſſe dicuntur. ——— For many virgins and married women are ſaid to have made ſhipwreck of their modeſty by it's allurements, as in a ſea infeſted by Sirens, in which even Ulyſſes went aſtray.' Let us ſee Mr de la Fontaine's maxim (6).

ſuch a maxim in his vindication; perhaps he would have had recourſe to a more common thought [D]. I do not think there is any part of his work ſo remarkable as that ſcene, which has been ſo well tranſlated into French by the counteſs de la Suze; wherein

Iroit-il après tout s'allarmer ſans raiſon

Je craindrois bien plûtôt que la cajolerie
Ne mît le feu dans la Maiſon.
Chaſſez les Soupirans, Belles, prenez mon livre,

Is there any reaſon, after all, to be alarmed at a little pleaſantry? I ſhould ſooner fear, that a lover's courtſhip would ſet fire to the houſe. Baniſh your ſuitors, ye fair, and read my book: I will anſwer for you, body for body.

Thus that author extricates himſelf out of a great difficulty. It was complained that his tales raiſed a thouſand leud deſires in the minds of his readers: his anſwer is, that if the women, who read his book, will not ſuffer any gallant to come near them, they will not loſe their honour. This is a ſophiſtical anſwer; for it requires a condition, the practice whereof is made very difficult by the very book complained of. You will have us read your book, and baniſh our lovers; you are unjuſt in requiring ſuch a thing from us, ſince your poems deprive us of the power of baniſhing our lovers. They fill us with love, they inflame us, they raiſe in us a violent deſire to ſee thoſe gentlemen: how then can you ſay, with any ſhew of reaſon, that if we baniſh them, we ſhall be ſafe. Another difficulty may be objected to Mr de la Fontaine, viz. that, tho' a woman ſhould baniſh her lovers, ſhe would be expoſed to many leud paſſions, excited by the reading of his tales; which is no ſmall miſchief. In order to make a good apology for that author, it ſhould be ſuppoſed, that his book cannot be prejudicial to chaſtity, and that nothing but the ſight of the beloved objects, and actual courtſhip can be contrary to that virtue. But ſuch a thing cannot be ſuppoſed, if it be true, as it is ſaid, that the reading of Paſtor Fido has undone many women and maids. This is a ſufficient commentary upon my text.

Tho' what we are told of the ill effects of that poem ſhould be falſe, yet it would be true, that the reading of certain books is very pernicious to young people of both ſexes. Some phyſicians have preſcribed the reading of the Priapeia to thoſe, who are not well diſpoſed for love-ſports (7); and I have obſerved, that the emperor Ælius Verus, a very leud prince, had always the amorous poems of Ovid in his bed, and that he ſet a great value upon Martial: Idem Ovidii libros amorum in lecto ſemper habuiſſe: idem Martialem Epigrammaticum Poëtam Virgilium ſuum dixiſſe (8). I remember to have read in Taſſoni, that ſtudy raiſes leud thoughts, among other reaſons, becauſe it diſcovers a thouſand obſcenities that are in books: he alledges that as a reaſon, why many learned women, mentioned by the ancients, were very leud. Theſe are his words (9). 'Che ſimilmente le lettere ſieno cagioni d'eccitar la libidine, e di parturire moli atti oſceni, non è ne da dubitarne; poſciache col leggere accidenti, e ſtratagemi amoroſi, e libri laſcivi, e particularmente nelle ſolitudini, e ne gli ozi, che richieggono le lettere, s'appreſentano fantaſmi oſceni, e penſieri, e voglie di coſe illecite ſotto apparenza di guſto e di diletto; e l'ingegno ſagace vi s'abbandona ſopra. E quindi è (cred'io) che in Euripide, e Giuvenale (10) leggiamo notate d' impudizia le donne di lettere antiche, le quali leggendo libri de coſe laſcive, e converſando ſotto quel preteſto di lettere più liberamente con gli huomini, che ſi conveniva alla debolezza del ſeſſo, ſi ſecero ardite, e la libidine loro s'infervorò nell'ozio e la ſagacità dell'ingegno s'offerſe di ricoprire gli eceſſi. —— That this book likewiſe may be the occaſion of exciting luſt, and of producing many obſcene actions, cannot be doubted; becauſe, together with the reading of adventures, ſtratagems of love, and wanton books, and eſpecially in ſolitude and at leiſure, obſcene images preſent themſelves, thoughts, and deſires after unlawful things, under the appearance of pleaſure and delight; and the ſagacious mind gives itſelf up thereupon. And thence it is, I believe, that in Euripides, and Juvenal, we read of learned women among the ancients branded with immodeſty, who, by reading of books on wanton ſubjects, and converſing, under this pretence of learning, with men, more freely, than ſuits the weakneſs of their ſex, have grown bold, and their luſt has been inflamed in idleneſs, and all the ſagacity of their wit employed in excuſing their exceſſes.'

[D] Perhaps he would have had recourſe to a more common thought.] He might have ſaid, that his readers learned nothing by his Paſtoral but what they knew before; or if young people found ſomething in it that was unknown to them, they would have learned it elſewhere; ſo that the ſuppreſſion of Paſtor Fido had been of no advantage to the public. A friend to Mr de la Fontaine has nicely touched this ſort juſtification. 'Thoſe, ſays he (11), who are entruſted with the education of youth, ought to prevent not only their reading (12) of them, but alſo their learning a great deal more than there is in them, by frequenting bad company. Men do not always learn from books what they ſhould be ignorant of.' This author plainly intimates, that, as the world goes, thoſe, who ſhould not learn from la Fontaine's book what it is fit they ſhould be ignorant of, would learn it ſeveral other ways. The ſame kind of thought has been made uſe of (13), in anſwer to the unjuſt complaints of thoſe, who do not approve, that the obſcenities of Juvenal and Martial ſhould be left out. This apology is more tolerable than la Fontaine's Maxim, and yet it is not a good one; for, tho' diſorders be ever ſo unavoidable, even when we do not contribute to them, every body ought to be more willing that they ſhould proceed from others than from himſelf. It is to be obſerved, that what I ſay concerns thoſe, who invent obſcene ſtories, or tranſlate them with new flouriſhes of their own, and not thoſe, who quote a paſſage of Martial &c. to prove a fact, which the nature of their work, or their character of hiſtorian, commentator, &c. requires they ſhould mention. Upon the whole, it muſt be granted, that all the leud things, that may be read in ſome books, may be learned, without books, by converſation. It is almoſt incredible how many things of this nature are known to people, who are ſtill in their younger years, and never learned to read. The progreſs of this ſcience is ſurpriſing, and does not require many years. Let us ſee what Montagne ſays about it (14). 'When women are free in their diſcourſe, we are but children, if compared to them in that reſpect. When they talk of our courtſhips and converſations, they plainly diſcover that we tell them nothing but what they knew before. Shall we ſay, that they were formerly diſorderly boys, as Plato will have it? I happened one day to be in a place, where I could hear what they ſaid among themſelves, without being ſeen. It is pity I cannot tell it. Faith, ſaid I to my ſelf, we need not learn phraſes from Amadis, and ſtudy Boccace and Aretin, in order to fit our ſelves for their converſation: it is all time loſt. They know every thing better than thoſe, who read books for that purpoſe. It is a ſcience that grows in their veins, Et mentem Venus ipſa dedit; nature, youth, and health, three excellent maſters, do continually infuſe it into their minds: they need not learn it; they produce it.

Nec tantum niveo gaviſa eſt ulla columbo
Compar, vel ſi quid dicitur improbius,
Oſcula mordenti ſemper decerpere roſtro:
Quantum præcipue multivola eſt mulier *.

Not with more ardour bills the milkwhite dove,
Than woman, raging in exceſs of love.

Women learn thoſe things one from another; the old inſtruct the young; and, if the ignorant are greedy of knowledge, the learned are no leſs deſirous of imparting it to them. One would think they look upon this axiom as a canonical one, viz. That knowledge is inſignificant, unleſs others know that we have it (15). And therefore the Italian education, the great care that is taken in Italy to keep girls from the company of boys, does not remove the evil. Beſides, women, in the countries, where they are kept under reſtraint, have the liberty to be at a wedding pro-wherein he touches upon one of the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries of nature [E]. The number (a) of the editions and tranſlations of Paſtor Fido is incredible (b). Guarini died at Venice in an inn, in the year 1613 [F]. His funeral pomp, by the academy of humoriſts, ſhews, that he was in great eſteem (c).

He was great-grandſon of Guarini of Verona, and taught moral philoſophy in the univerſity of Ferrara. Notwithſtanding the great reputation he had acquired by the abovementioned poem, he could not endure the name and title of a poet; for he thought that ſuch a title does no honour to thoſe who have it, and expoſes them to contempt. One would think by reading his verſes, that he made them with the greateſt facility; but it is miſtake; they coſt him a great deal of pains [G], and many alterations and raſures. miſcuouſly with men. Now can there be a more ſcandalous ſchool of leudneſs, than the aſſemblies, ſports, and entertainments of weddings? how many fooliſh and obſcene things are ſpoken upon ſuch an occaſion (16)? St Cyprian was in the right, not to approve, that virgins ſhould go to a wedding; he tells them, that they will come home with a maimed virginity (17). ‘Quaſdam non pudet nubentibus intereſſe, & in illa laſcivientium libertate ſermonum colloquia inceſta miſcere; audire quod non licet dicere: obſervare & eſſe præſentes inter verba turpia & temulenta convivia, quibus Libidinum fomes accenditur, Sponſa ad patientiam ſtupri, ad audaciam ſponſus animatur. Quid illic diſcitur? quid videtur? Quantum à propoſito ſuo virgo deficit, quando, pudica quæ venerat, impudica diſcedit? Corpore licet virgo ac mente permaneat; oculis, auribus, lingua, minuit illa quæ habebat (18). —— Some are not aſhamed to be preſent at a marriage, and to mix in the wanton converſation uſual at ſuch times; to hear what I dare not repeat; to obſerve, and be preſent at the filthy diſcourſe, and drunken revelling, which excite the fire of luſt, which animate the bride to endure being defloured, and encourage the bridegroom to the attack. What is learnt there? what is ſeen? how does a virgin fail in her purpoſe, when ſhe, who came modeſt, departs immodeſt? for tho' ſhe continues a virgin in body, yet her eyes, ears, and tongue, rob her partly of what ſhe brought with her.’ See what will be ſaid in the remark [G] of the article LYCURGUS, and remember, Xenophon's maxim. He was of opinion, that a bride ſhould come to her huſband's houſe, before ſhe has ſeen and heard many things. Ὁ Ξενοφῶν οἴεται δεῖν ἐλάχιστα τὴν νύμφην ἰδοῦσαν, ἐλάχιστα δὲ ἀκούσασαν εἰς ἀνδρὸς βαδίζειν. Xenophon cenſet ſponſam ita debere in mariti domum venire ut quam minimum viderit, quam minimum audiverit (19).

[E] He touches upon . . . . one of the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries of nature.] He introduces a young woman, who, being at the diſcretion of two tyrants, who hate one another (20), envies the happineſs of beaſts, whoſe love is directed by no other rule than love it ſelf. She is amazed at the oppoſition that is between nature and the law. One of them annexes a great pleaſure to certain things, and the other will have them to be ſeverely puniſhed. Her concluſion is this: this cannot be accounted for without the revelation of Moſes; and I have often wondered that the ancient philoſophers have ſo little reflected upon it. I mean only ſuch philoſophers, who acknowledged the unity of GOD; for thoſe, who admitted of many gods could find no difficulty in it: it was but ſuppoſing, that a deity was the cauſe of the inclination of nature; and that ſome other deities imprinted the inſtincts of conſcience and the notions of honour. The difficulty concerned only thoſe, who believed, that the world is the work of one moſt holy Being. How is it poſſible that under ſuch a Being men ſhould be drawn to evil by a bait that is almoſt unſurmountable, I mean, by the ſenſe of pleaſure, and are deterred from it by the fear of remorſe, infamy, or ſeveral other puniſhments; they ſpend their lives, toſſed by theſe contrary paſſions, pulled ſometimes one way, and ſometimes another, being ſometimes overcome by the ſenſe of pleaſure, and ſometimes by the fear of the conſequences. Manicheiſm probably aroſe from a ſtrong meditation on this deplorable condition of man.

[F] He died at Venice in an inn.] He was gone to Venice upon account of a law-ſuit, and died of grief and old age. His enemies made his life very unhappy, if we believe the author I quote. ‘Semper cum adverſa fortuna iniquorum odio conflictatus (non enim malevoli tanto viro deeſſe poterant) demum cum Venetias litium quarumdam cauſa veniſſet, & ad cauponem divertiſſet, ibi ſenio curiſque confectus, exceſſit è vita (21). —— Having all his life-time ſtruggled with ill fortune thro' the envy of unjuſt men (for ſo great a man could not be without enemies), at laſt, coming to Venice on account of a law-ſuit, he died in an inn, worn out with old age and cares.’ Another author, I ſhall quote, is very much miſtaken as to the year, wherein Guarini died; for he ſays it was in the year 1590 (22).

[G] His verſes coſt him a great deal of pains.] Let us ſee firſt what Imperialis ſays of it. ‘Inſuper mirandum etiam, quòd licet expedita illa carminum pangendorum ubertas, illaborata penitus, & ſpontè fuſa videatur; tamen ab ipſo anxiè affectatam ac diutino quæſitam ſtudio ipſimet (familiares) aſſerunt, præmonſtrantes extrarias quaſdam carminum ſuorum ſchedulas, frequentiſſimis expunctas ac immutatas locis, ex quibus herculè peracris quidam, ac implexus ſcribendi arguitur labos (23). —— What is more to be wondered at, is, that tho' his numbers ſeemed to flow with the greateſt eaſe, yet his intimate friends aſſure us, he compoſed with great labour and pains, which they prove by ſome rough draughts of his poetry, which were corrected in a multitude of places, and ſeemed to denote a laborious writer.’ This author informs us of two things: one is, that Guarini took great pains in making his verſes; the other is, that one would think they were made with a wonderful facility. If any one ſhould fancy that thoſe two things are inconſiſtent, he muſt needs be unacquainted with the different characters of men, and believe, that no compoſures coſt a great deal of pains, but thoſe of which a reader may ſay, what was ſaid of Demoſthenes's orations, Olent lucernam, they ſmell of the lamp (24): but we ought to know, that there are many other varieties in the characters of men. Some authors make their readers ſenſible of the great pains they have been at; and, if they correct three or four times a certain place with a profound meditation and great pains, the reader perceives, that that paſſage is more laboured than another, which has been corrected only two or three times. But there are ſome writers, whoſe labour and pains make every thing they write appear eaſy and natural; ſo that the more they reviſe a piece of work, the leſs it ſeems to have been reviſed and laboured. Such was Guarini's character (25). He thought, that the perfection of a piece of poetry conſiſted in natural beauties, and a fluent and eaſy turn. He endeavoured to gain the approbation of the public by ſuch a method, and perceived, with great penetration, whether there remained any thing in his work, that was forced and unnatural; and then he made it his buſineſs to reviſe and correct thoſe faults. Thus it was only by much reviſing and poliſhing his verſes, that he made them run ſmoothly and fluently. Other authors, having a quite different taſte, place perfection in thinking and expreſſing one's ſelf in an affected and bombaſt ſtile, and ſuch as diſcovers the fatigue of a profound meditation. They fancy, they do not expreſs themſelves happily and ingeniouſly, if they can be underſtood without much wit and attention (26); and they are never ſatisfied, till they have ſtruck out of their writing whatever appears ſimple, natural, and common; and therefore the more they correct their works, the more they diſcover the pains they have been at. Their labour is certainly very great; but ſometimes it does not come near the toil of thoſe, who deſire, that their works ſhould apppear eaſy and natural throughout. I have been told by ſome perſons, who pretended to have it from good hands, and I have read it within theſe few days in a printed book (27), that Voiture did not publiſh his verſes and letters, ſuch as we have them, till he had taken great pains to correct them. His apologiſt does not ſay ſo; but yet he intimates, that the great eaſe, which appears in the works of that wit, coſt him no ſmall pains. I hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here a piece of that apology. The thing is curious enough to appear here, attended with the approbation of ſome good judges. ‘ Mr de Voiture was above all things for that ſort of negligence which ſo well becomes beautiful perſons, which ſets off the advantages of their birth, and, after having charmed the eyes, leaves room to think of what the beauties of art might have added to thoſe of nature. There is ſomething ſo eaſy and natural in all his writings, that every body thinks at firſt he might write in the ſame manner; and it is only after long and vain endeavours, that they cry out, Queſto facile, quanto è difficile! This eaſy, how difficult is it! I remember he was not diſpleaſed that I ſhould beſtow upon him an encomium, which Taſſo beſtows upon one of his heroines,

Non ſo ben dire, s'adorna, ò ſe negletta,
Se caſo od arte, il bel volto compoſe;
Di natura, d'amor, del cielo, amici
Le negligenze ſue ſono artifici.

Whether from chance alone her beauties riſe,
Or art improves the luſtre of her eyes;
Friended by nature, love, and ev'ry ſtart,
Ev'n negligence itſelf in her is art.

‘ Indeed, what ſeems to be negligence in him, is but art diſguiſed in the ſhape of it's contrary, to act with the more addreſs and greater ſafety. And as nature is never more admirable, than when ſhe ſeems to imitate the works of art; ſo art is not in it's perfection, unleſs it imitates nature, and covers it's labours and great efforts with an apparent eaſineſs. The painters of old Greece repreſented the graces without cloaths, and without a headdreſs; and, if at any time they painted them with gowns, they were looſe gowns, to denote that the greateſt charms do not proceed from artful and viſible ornament; and particularly, that whoever pretends to pleaſe, ought to avoid the very ſhadow of conſtraint. Our love of liberty reaches to the productions of the mind; and we are naturally ſo great enemies to ſubjection and ſlavery, that a thing, though never ſo fine, will loſe all it's charms, when it appears forced and ſtrained. No man was ever more ſenſible of this truth than Mr de Voiture; no man did ever conceal more induſtriouſly the art he made uſe of, to bring forth out of his imagination the fine things he has left us. One would think, that flowers ſpring up every ſtep he makes, or that he meets with them by chance, that the fineſt paſſages of his works coſt him no pains, that every thing drops from his pen without any trouble and labour, as it were, out of a plentiful and unexhauſtible ſpring (28).

Mr Pelliſſon, who was ſo good a judge of all ſorts of ingenious works, was perſuaded, that it is often a very difficult thing for an author to make it appear, that his work coſt him no great labour (29). Two things, ſays he (30), ‘ make poetry admirable, viz. Invention, from which it had it's name; and eaſineſs, which is ſo neceſſary to it. I do not mean a facility in compoſing; it may be ſometimes happy, but it ought to be always ſuſpected: I mean the facility, which the readers obſerve in a compoſition, which is ſometimes one of the moſt difficult things in the world for an author; ſo that it might be compared to garden-terraſſes, the expence of which does not appear, and which, after having coſt ſeveral millions, yet ſeem to be a meer work of chance and nature.’ What he had been ſaying about the eaſineſs, that appears in the works of good poets, is admirable. ‘ One would think they could not have expreſſed themſelves otherwiſe than they have done; their words and expreſſions are ſo eaſy that they ſeem to have dropped from their pen of themſelves, and to have taken their proper places. The lyre of Amphion did not work greater miracles, when ſtones, drawn by his harmony, placed themſelves one upon another, of their own motion, to raiſe up the famous walls of Thebes (31).

This is what the reader thinks, but the author knows the contrary, and remembers, that the moſt eaſy and fluent verſes are thoſe, that have obliged him to ſcratch his head, and bite his nails (32). He remembers, that, in making thoſe verſes, he followed Horace's advice (33), with the greateſt exactneſs, and was like thoſe ancient philoſophers, whom a deep meditation put out of their wits.

Obſtipo capite, & figentes lumine terram,
Murmura cum ſecum, & rabioſa ſilentia rodunt,
Atque exporrecto trutinantur Verba labello,
Ægroti veteris meditantes ſomnia, Gigni
De nihilo nihil, in nihilum nil poſſe reverti (34).

Wry-neck'd, and fixing on the ground their eyes,
They mutter muſty maxims of the wiſe;
To nothing nought returns, from nothing nought can riſe.

Some exceptions ought to be made; for ſome poets, as Ovid among the ancients, and Moliere among the moderns, made verſes with great facility, and the readers were ſenſible of it.

Take notice that Mr Pelliſſon obſerves, that this facility may be ſometimes happy, but that it ought to be always ſuſpected (35). Which puts me in mind of a thought of Mr Godeau. ‘ The facility in compoſing, ſays he (36), ſeems to be an advantage; but it is a kind of fault, becauſe it hinders the mind, which naturally hates labour and pain, from carrying things to the higheſt point of perfection they are capable of. And indeed, the correction, which purifies the firſt productions, is more troubleſome to thoſe, who have that facility, than to others, who finiſh things as they produce them, and in whom art bears a greater part than nature.’ This agrees well enough with Quintilian's notions. That great maſter would have an author, who begins to compoſe, to do it ſlowly. By this means, he will learn to write well, and then he will write readily; but if he writes haſtily, or, which is the ſame, if he writes with great facility, he will never write well. Hanc moram & ſolicitudinem initiis impero . . . cito ſcribendo non fit ut bene ſcribatur: bene ſcribendo, fit ut cito (37). Let this facility be as much a fault as you pleaſe, yet it is better to be ſubject to it, than not to be able to bring forth one's conceptions without intolerable pains; and it is a greater misfortune for an author never to end his corrections, than to end them a little too ſoon. Balzac has been placed among thoſe authors, who become unhappy by being too nice. Read theſe words of Coſtar (38). ‘ There is nothing fluent and natural in Balzac. His great labour is ſo ſenſible, that nice readers grow weary of his works, like that famous Sybarite, who was all in a ſweat, ſeeing a poor workman labouring very hard. And indeed he himſelf confeſſed ſometimes, that, when he took pen in hand, he ſuffered as much as a galley ſlave. Not but that he had a great and noble genius; but he found it as difficult to ſatisfy himſelf, as that excellent man, of whom the late biſhop of Lizieux ſaid, The fine things he publiſhes coſt him ſo dear, that were I in his caſe, I would pitch upon ſome other employment to ſerve my neighbours, and ſhould not think that GOD required that from me.’ Coſtar is in the right to ſay, that the readers eaſily perceive, that the productions of this famous writer coſt him a great deal of pains. They will not ſay, that they might eaſily write as he does; for it is only the reading of an author, whoſe thoughts and expreſſions have

This judgment of Horace agrees with that of Cicero, ſpeaking of certain orators. ‘ Summiſſus eſt & humilis, conſuetudinem imitans, ab indiſertis re plus quàm opinione differens. Itaque eum qui audiunt, quamvis ipſi infantes ſint, tamen illo modo confidunt ſe poſſe dicere. To conclude, I add, that Ovid is one of thoſe inimitable poets, whoſe imitation ſeems at firſt ſight to be the eaſieſt thing in the world (42).

GUARINI, or GUARINIO (GUARINUS), a Theatin monk and mathematician of the duke of Savoy, was a native of Modena, and flouriſhed in the XVIIth century. His Placita Philoſophica were printed at Paris in 1666, and his Cæleſtis Mathematica at Milan in 1683. He was dead when this laſt book came out.

GUEBRIANT (RENATA DU BEC), widow of the Mareſchal de Guebriant, was the daughter of Renatus du Bec, marquis de Vardes [A], and ſiſter of Renatus du Bec, who married the counteſs de Moret, miſtreſs of Henry IV. Her eldeſt brother was killed in Italy by ſome Banditti [B]. She was ordered to conduct the princeſs Mary of Gonzaga to the king of Poland, who had married her at Paris by proxy; and ſhe was inveſted with a new

[A] Renatus du Bec, marquis de Vardes.] I add, that he was knight of the king's orders, and governor of la Capelle, and the country of Tieraſche; and that his ſon, who married the counteſs de Moret, had by her the marquis de Vardes, who has been ſo long out of favour by reaſon of ſome intrigues mentioned in the book, intituled, Les Amours du Palais Royal. This diſgrace did not laſt till the death of the marquis de Vardes; but it wanted but a few years of it. The huſband of the counteſs de Moret was governor of la Capelle, and condemned to death for contempt of the court, as having too ſoon ſurrendered that place to the Spaniards in the year 1636 (1). But he was declared innocent by a decree of the parliament of Paris, after the deceaſe of the cardinal de Richelieu.

[B] Her eldeſt brother was killed in Italy by ſome Banditti.] It is commonly ſaid ſo in the books that contain a genealogical account of the marquis de Vardes's anceſtors (2). But in the collection of pieces, printed at the end of the journal of Henry III, there are ſome obſervations on the amours of Henry IV; wherein we are told, that this eldeſt brother was killed by a peaſant, whom he had attempted to beat; ‘ and that his father, a venerable old man, who was ‘ worth fifty or ſixty thouſand livres a year, in order ‘ to conceal the death of his ſon, cauſed his train to ‘ take the road of Lyons and Italy, and ſome days ‘ after pretended to have received letters, whereby ‘ he was informed of the ſudden death of his ſon, ‘ upon the road.’ He, who gives this account, does it upon this occaſion. He ſays, that one Villeneuve, a gentleman of Guienne, who was married in the Vexin, got together many gentlemen at Saucour (3) near Giſors, in the year 1622, to have their advice about this caſe of conſcience viz. A gentleman (probably the ſame, who conſulted the reſt) went alone into a country man's houſe to chaſtize him: the country man took him by the neck, and flung him down, ſwearing, ‘ he would kill him, unleſs he promiſed and ‘ ſwore, that he would never revenge himſelf either ‘ directly or indirectly.’ The gentleman ſwore it, and deſired to know whether he was bound to keep his word. The author of the obſervations adds, ‘ that all ‘ of them, being ten or twelve, voted in the affirma‘tive, reſolving that, for the time to come, no gen‘tleman ſhould attack ſuch people but upon ſure ‘ ground; and they alledged a new and worſe inſtance ‘ of a certain marquis, &c.’ It is the adventure I have mentioned concerning the eldeſt brother of the marquis de Vardes, and of the lady de Guebriant.

This ſtory is related with ſo many circumſtances, that one would take it to be true; but, if we conſider other circumſtances, we may very well doubt of the truth of it, and even affirm that it is falſe. We find in the voyage of the queen of Poland, written by le Laboureur (4), that the lady de Guebriant, paſſing by Genoa, cauſed a tomb to be erected for her brother, who had been killed by ſome banditti of that country. I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage of Mr le Laboureur, which contains many circumſtances, that render what is ſaid of the aſſembly of Saucour altogether improbable. That writer, having obſerved, that the princes of Monaco, and the lords du Bec-Criſpin in Normandy, are deſcended from the ſame anceſtors, adds, ‘ that this very thing moved ‘ the late meſſire John du Bec, marquis de la Boſſe (5), ‘ eldeſt ſon of Renatus du Bec, marquis de Vardes, ‘ knight of the king's orders, being in Italy in the ‘ year 1616, to go and pay a viſit to the Grimaldi, ‘ related to him; and, being killed in his way thither ‘ by the banditti, they took care to revenge his death ‘ by an exemplary puniſhment, and cauſed his body ‘ to be depoſited in St Francis's church, where many ‘ of the family had been buried, and where it re‘mained till the year 1646, when the lady de Gue‘briant his ſiſter, and meſſieurs Grimaldi, had it re‘moved to Our Lady of Conſolation without the walls ‘ of Genoa, where a monument was erected to him, ‘ and I made the epitaph.’

Can any one believe, that the farce would have been carried ſo far, to conceal from the world, that a young marquis had been killed by a peaſant? would that family have been diſhonoured by ſuch a misfortune; and was there no other way to conceal the thing, but by bringing in the Italian banditti? We muſt not uſe people a new character (a), which was that of embaſſadreſs extraordinary. Le Laboureur, in his relation of that journey, does not ſeem to give a ſincere account of the iſſue of the French Embaſſador's quarrel [C], nor does Mr de Wicquefort give an exact account of it [D], and he ſays without any reaſon, that the lady de Guebriant was concerned in it. She worthily kept up her character: ſhe was an intriguing woman, and endowed with very noble qualities [E]. Priolo does not give a right account of people to give more credit to ſtories told in converſation, than to hiſtorical monuments, like thoſe mentioned by Mr le Laboureur; it would be an ill example, and a thing of dangerous conſequence.

PRETENSIONS of Mr de Bregi, embaſſador of France in Poland.

[C] Le Laboureur .... does not ſeem to relate ſincerely the iſſue of the French embaſſador's quarrel.] Though one be never ſo deſirous to ſpare a man of his merit, one cannot forbear ſaying, that he does not give an impartial account of the French embaſſador's diſpute, and endeavours to conceal the ill ſucceſs of his pretenſions. Having mentioned, page 137, 138, the moſt ſolid reaſons of the Polanders, he does not ſay what was replied to them, nor what was at laſt reſolved. At page 151, he places Mr de Bregi at table below prince Charles (6), without telling us how, and why, that embaſſador gave up his pretenſions. In the 194th page, he places him ſtill below the prince; but he adds, that this prince repreſented the embaſſador extraordinary of the emperor. Whereby he, artfully inſinuates, that Mr de Bregi had all the advantage he could expect from his diſpute, ſince prince Charles was deſignedly inveſted with a character, to which all the embaſſadors of crowned heads give the upper hand. But the reader is told in the errata, that the words, who repreſented the perſon of the emperor, ought to be left out. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that this fault ſhould not be expreſſed in the errata exactly in the ſame words as it is in the book. But the artifice, which plainly appears in it, is much more inexcuſable, if it be conſidered that few people mind an errata (7). The reader is alſo deſired to ſtrike out of the ſame page what is ſaid in it, that the nuncio placed himſelf below that lady at the wedding feaſt. However thoſe two corrections do not well anſwer the expectation of the reader (8) grounded upon the cenſure paſſed upon Mr Renaudot's gazettes, and another relation of that feaſt, and upon theſe words of Mr le Laboureur: Perhaps I ſhall be accounted a more credible witneſs as to the perſons, who ſat down at their majeſties table, and the order they were placed in, ſince the queen of Poland ſent for me to be preſent at it. If ſo many falſities were publiſhed at Paris about things relating to the ceremonial, how could the news, that concerned things more difficult to be known, be depended upon? The multitude of thoſe, who pretend to ſend relations, produces a ſtrange confuſion. Le Laboureur ſays, they had ſeveral ſervants, who pretended to write news, and that the baker took care to obſerve, among other things, the price and goodneſs of meal (9).

[D] Nor does Mr de Wicquefort give an exact account of it.] The embaſſador, ſays he (10), 'who 'ſcrupled to give the upper hand to the hereditary 'prince of Sweden, brother to the king of Poland, and 'the lady de Guebriant, who pretended to have the 'ſame honours that were formerly paid to the arch-'ducheſs of Tirol, were guilty of an unpardonable 'impertinence, and procured an affront to their maſter.' The embaſſador he means is the ſame, whom he calls viſcount de Bregi, page 593, of the firſt book; where having called his pretenſion an extravagant one, he adds, that the pretenſion of the lady de Guebriant was not leſs ridiculous, ſince ſhe deſired to have the ſame rank, and the ſame honours that were paid to the arch-ducheſs, when ſhe brought to the queen her daughter into Poland. It is ſaid in the index, wherein the reader is referred to the ſame page 593, that the lady de Guebriant pretended to have the upper hand of the arch-ducheſs; but there is no ſuch thing in that page.

I will not contradict Mr de Wicquefort in what he ſays concerning thoſe pretenſions; it is not a matter of fact. I ſhall only ſay, that he has no reaſon to tell us, that Bregi and the lady de Guebriant procured an affront to their maſter by their pretenſions. This cannot be ſaid of that lady; for it does not appear from le Laboureur's relation, that ſhe had any diſpute. We read in it (11), that there was a long conteſt at two ſeveral times, occaſioned by the pretenſions of the French embaſſador? but le Laboureur is ſo far from ſaying, that this lady was engaged in a conteſt, that, on the contrary, he tells us, that, on the very day Mr de Bregi began to have a diſpute, the queen of Poland deſired the lady de Guebriant not to concern her ſelf in it, and that the count d'Honoff, the embaſſadors, and the grandees of Poland, aſſured her, that ſhe ſhould have the honours due to her character, not only of embaſſadreſs extraordinary, but alſo of ſuperintendant of her majeſty's conduct, according to ſeveral precedents, and PARTICULARLY THAT OF THE ARCH-DUCHESS OF INSPRUC, when ſhe brought the late queen. In another place the author informs us (12), that the king declared to all the grandees of the kingdom, that he intended ſhe ſhould receive all the honours due to a lady of her quality and character, THE SAME WITH THOSE THAT WERE PAID TO THE ARCH-DUCHESS OF INSPRUC, ſiſter to the great duke of Tuſcany, who brought the late queen. After this I need not alledge the following paſſage of that relation to confute Mr de Wicquefort (13). The lady de Guebriant going down ſtairs in the palace, to get into her coach (14), the biſhop of Poſnania gave her his bleſſing in his pontifical habits. This honour is only paid to kings and queens, and ſovereign princes; but the king ordered it to be paid to her, the better to ſhew how much he eſteemed that illuſtrious lady.

[E] She was endowed with very noble qualities.] I think that, in order to judge of that lady's merit, it is neceſſary to keep a medium between the praiſes beſtowed upon her by le Laboureur, and the ill character others give of her. However, any one that reflects upon her employments muſt needs own, that ſhe had a great deal of wit, and all the talents that a lady muſt have, in order to maintain and diſtinguiſh herſelf in the moſt eminent poſts of the court. Tho it be ſaid, that thoſe, who beſtow employments, have no great regard to merit, men of ſenſe will never believe, that the queen mother and cardinal Mazarin made that lady ſuperintendant of the conduct of the queen of Poland (15), and embaſſadreſs extraordinary, if ſhe had not been looked upon as a woman well qualified to do a great deal of honour to France in the court of Poland, and to keep up that new character (16) with all the wit, prudence, and grandeur, it required. She is very much praiſed in the letters, written to her by the king, the queen-mother, and the cardinal, when ſhe was nominated to that employment, and in thoſe, which the king of Poland wrote to the king and queen-mother, when ſhe returned to Paris; and it is certain ſhe acquitted herſelf of that employment with great ability. Thoſe letters may be ſeen in le Laboureur's relation.

As I have ſaid before, the praiſes he beſtows upon her ought not to be taken in their full latitude. It ſeems to him, that when their majeſties pitched upon her, they acted according to the wiſhes of the whole French nation, and particularly of the chief perſons of the court. He ſays, the thing was made public before it was reſolved upon; that this illuſtrious widow lived a retired life; that her huſband revived every day in her memory, to die in her heart; that ſhe ſacrificed to him daily ſome of her paſſions; that ſhe minded neither court preferments, nor the court itſelf: Laſtly, that ſhe accepted of that employment, only becauſe ſhe could not diſobey her ſovereign, being ſo much beholden to him for ſo many many favours, and particularly for the funeral honours paid to the mareſchal her huſband by his orders. This he ſays in the firſt part of his relation. He tells us, in the ſecond volume of his additions to Caſtelnau's memoirs, page 499, that ſhe kept up the reputation and memory of the mareſchal de Guebriant, by ſo many ſervices and glorious labours, that the king, by making her lady of honour to his queen, has not only pleaſed all his of her negotiation at Briſac [F]. It is not the only fault he has committed concerning that lady: which may ſerve to remove ſome ſuſpicions about her [G]. Every thing his ſubjects, but alſo acted according to the wiſhes and eſteem of all foreign nations, among whom ſhe diſcovered her great merit, during her embaſſy extraordinary to conduct the queen of Poland into her kingdom. There is certainly too much rhetoric, and too many poetical thoughts, in theſe encomiums, eſpecially for a man, who makes very bold reflexions upon the abuſes of his time in many places of his additions to Caſtelnau's memoirs, and whoſe blows are much like thoſe of the count de Lude, of whom he ſays, That though he ſhot at a great diſtance upon the government, all his ſhots were not loſt; ſome carried home, and made deſperate wounds. This he ſays at page 767 of his additions. We ſhall ſee hereafter a paſſage of Patin, whereby it does not appear, that the whole French nation wiſhed that heroine might be raiſed to great honours; and I have juſt now read in a modern hiſtorian, that ſhe had an exorbitant ambition, which was the reaſon why the mareſchal de Guebriant had a magnificent burial. ' Guebriantii exſequiæ non vulgari pompa celebratæ. ' Corpus illatum Fano Deiparæ Virginis, qui honos infrequens non tam conceſſus Viri meritis, quàm uxoris ' Renatæ Bekiæ flagitatione extortus; fœmina impotens, gloriæ potius quàm luctus immodica juſta ma' rito perſoluta in ſui oſtentationem trahere (17). —— ' The obſequies of the mareſchal Guebriant were celebrated with no ordinary pomp. The body was depoſited in ' the church of Notre-Dame, which unuſual honour was ' not ſo much granted to the mareſchal's merit, as extorted by the importunity of Renata du Bec, his wife; ' who was prompted to the performance of theſe immoderate rites, not through exceſs of grief, but ambition and oſtentation.' I muſt needs ſay, that I do not believe ſhe accepted the embaſſy extraordinary of Poland out of obedience, and that it was beſtowed upon her without her deſiring and ſuing for it. The oratory of a man, who praiſes, ought to be ſuſpected.

[F] Priolo does not give a right account of her negotiation at Briſac.] That hiſtorian (18) relates a thing, which is not much to this lady's honour. He ſays, that, during the laſt troubles, Charlevois, who commanded in Briſac, quarrelled with the governour ſent thither by the court, (it was Mr de Tilladet), and that he ſo well purſued his point, that the governour was obliged to yield to him. That the lady de Guebriant, either out of avarice or ambition, undertook to make herſelf neceſſary; and, being willing the court ſhould think ſhe had preſerved that important place, ſhe formed an intrigue to ruin Charlevois. That ſhe repaired to Briſac with a young woman he loved; and that Charlevois, being ſo imprudent as to go out of that place to ſee this woman (19), was taken, and carried priſoner to Philipsburg. That the lady de Guebriant was very much abuſed upon that account, and obliged to retire to Baſil as faſt as ſhe could; and that Charlevois had a ſecret intrigue with the count de Harcourt, who was diſſatisfied with the government, and made his peace upon advantageous terms, ſo that the lady was hated by both parties, and died of grief (20).

Here is an inſtance of what commonly happens to thoſe who write abridgments: they omit many circumſtances, without which a fact is but a rough and ſhapeleſs maſs, as thoſe know, who, after they have read it in a large hiſtory, compare their notion of it with what they read in an abridgment. Whoever reads this intrigue of the lady de Guebriant in Mr de la Barde's hiſtory, will find the truth of what I ſay. But, laying aſide Priolo's omiſſions, it is certain he has advanced two falſities.

The firſt conſiſts in ſaying, that Charlevois went out of Briſac to ſee the miſtreſs the lady de Guebriant brought him. Nothing can be more falſe; he had no occaſion to go out of that place to ſee her, ſince ſhe was there in that lady's retinue. Beſides, the reader may very well wonder that this lady ſhould be at Briſac, and that Charlevois's miſtreſs, by whoſe means he was to be entrapped, ſhould not be with the lady that carries on the intrigue, and knows ſo well how to uſe the ſtratagems of Catherine de Medicis (21). It is certain ſhe was there, and that the artifice made uſe of to bring Charlevois into the ſnare, was to uſe him to ride in a coach at a great diſtance from the town with the lady de Guebriant, and his miſtreſs. But on the day that he was taken, the lady de Guebriant, being willing to be in the town, when the firſt news of it ſhould come thither, pretended ſome buſineſs that did not allow her to go abroad, and yet deſired all her retinue ſhould go. The ſecond falſity concerns the death of that lady. Priolo ſays, ſhe died of grief, when the civil-war was not yet ended; but it is certain (22) ſhe was not diſturbed for the ill ſucceſs of her enterprize at Briſac, and that ſhe carried on her intrigues even at Baſil, and filled her head with vaſt deſigns, to ingratiate herſelf with the queen-mother, and cardinal Mazarine: in a word, that ſhe died only in 1659, after ſhe had made ſo great a figure at court, that ſhe was to be firſt lady of honour to queen Maria Thereſa. How came Priolo, who was ſufficiently acquainted with great people, to know what paſſed among them, and who publiſhed his hiſtory few years after the death of that lady, to place her death ſo wrong, as to take away from her five or ſix years of a ſhining proſperity? Perhaps he did her a good office by it.

Mr de la Barde obſerves, that this lady, not contented with the character of embaſſadreſs, which ſhe had been inveſted with, deſired to engage in a war-intrigue, as being a thing of greater luſtre (23). Nay, it was ſaid, ſhe aſpired to the government of Briſac; and that ſhe was deſirous to be poſſeſſed of the king's lands in Alſace. She would have recovered by that means the money the king owed her, and would have formed a ſmall ſtate upon that frontier. ' Eâ tempe' ſtate vulgatum Dubecam non modò Briſiacum expe' tere ſibi, cui Præfecta eſſet, ſed & prædia quæ Rex ' in Alſatiâ poſſidet omnia, quibus huic permiſſis ære ' ſe alieno liberaret, quo ſatis grandi Dubecæ obſtrictus ' erat: ita mulier nihil niſi ingens animo volvere ſolita, ' ſibi ſpeciem Principatus aliquam in hâc ab Aulâ re' motâ regione fingebat (24).'

[G] This may ſerve to remove ſome ſuſpicions about her.] I have juſt now ſaid, that perhaps Priolo did her a good office. I mean, that, if this author had not ſaid, that the lady de Guebriant died before the troubles were over, many readers might have ſuſpected, that ſhe was one of the four women, of whom he gives a very ill character. He ſays, that four women kindled a civil-war all over France, that they had more wit than virtue, and that, their projects having miſcarried, they ſet up for devout women; which, ſays he, is a common thing with women, when their looking-glaſs makes them ſenſible, that they are no longer able to make a figure in the world. ' Tunc quatuor, non ' quidem abſurdæ ingenio, ſed quæ plus moribus no' cebant quàm ingenio proderant, omnem Galliam ' commiſerunt . . . . Ipſæ poſtea improſperis, ut fit, ' rebus ſe prædamnantes Numini fidem obligarunt per ' religionis mendacem ſimulationem & fucoſa ſuperſti' tione: effœtis vitiis januâ clauſâ, cum ſpeculo dam' nante, ſe putris ſenectus, præciſa ejus ſententiâ refor' midat (25). Ad arbitrium quatuor fœminarum noſtra ' diu recta. Illæ neque Regno neque ſibi felicis uteri ' dum ſua magnitudine peccandi licentiam metiuntur, ' Galliam omnem in ſummum diſcrimen vocavere, &c. ' (26).' The better to apprehend how much this lady is beholden to that hiſtorian, for not making her one of thoſe four women, we muſt remember, that he repreſents them as being barren (27); and proportioning their ſins to their greatneſs; that their minds were always full of great deſigns; that they made a private application to the cardinal by the mediation of their gallants, and betrayed one another; ſo that his eminence was not the judge of three, but of four wanton goddeſſes. Sic Mazarinus non trium ſed quatuor dearum libidinantium judex fuit. Whilſt theſe women were in his intereſt, others were very much againſt him, and thruſt themſelves into ſecret intrigues at any rate. They proſtituted themſelves (28), which is almoſt unavoidable to thoſe women, who concern themſelves with civil-wars. They want the confidence of party-leaders; it is neceſſary that thoſe gentlemen ſhould aſſiſt them with their ſwords and politics; but they do nothing gratis, and they know how to improve the opportunity. Such is the condition of a lady, who deſigns to have the direction of ſtate-revolutions. It is ſaid, that the marſhal de Turenne, tho' a very wiſe man, could not reſiſt the impetuoſity of the torrent, and required alſo ſuch perſonal ſervices from the ladies during the civil-war. I thought it might be the firſt and thing that Patin ſays of her ought not to be credited [H]. This affords a remark, wherein we ſhall ſee when ſhe died. We ſhall ſee, in another remark, the miſtake of a German writer [I], who publiſhed notes on Priolo. I muſt not forget, that this lady, who thought herſelf undermatched, having married a man, who was very rich, cauſed her marriage to be declared void [K], and married (b) the count de Guebriant, and the laſt time he was talked of on account of his gallantry; but I have been informed by a perſon, who knew it well, that he frequently uſed that trade. Notwithſtanding the age of the lady de Guebriant, all the readers would take her to be one of the four, had not the hiſtorian prevented it by the method he took, much better than by the characters he gives of them, moſt of which ſuit with her: I ſay, her age would ſignify nothing; for, not to go ſo far as Aſpaſia, Lamia, and even theducheſs of Valentinois, do we not ſee, much about the ſame time Priolo ſpeaks of, a ducheſs ſomewhat advanced in years (29), whoſe amorous conqueſts were very conſiderable? Mr de la Barde, whom I quote, agrees with Mr Priolo in this point, viz. that women were very much at the helm during the ſtorms of the late minority. The author of the Thoughts on Comets might have added this citation to his 236th article, and not this alone, but an infinite number of the like, which we meet with in books.

Take notice, that when I ſaid, that Priolo repreſents the four ladies, who had ſo great an intereſt, as being barren; I ſaid ſo, only with reſpect to moſt readers; for thoſe, who know, that theſe words of that hiſtorian, Neque regno, neque ſibi felicis uteri, are an alluſion to what Paterculus ſaid of Julia, Auguſtus's daughter (30), will not take them to be a ſign of barrenneſs.

[H] Every thing that Patin ſays of her, ought not to be credited.] Here are two paſſages out of his letters. The lady de Guebriant, ſays he, in a letter of the ninth of September, 1659, is dead (31) at Perigueux: She had not been ſick above thirteen hours, and ſhe is dead without confeſſion. She was a partiſan in that country, where ſhe has been very much curſed. Ten days after, he ſpoke of her in the following manner. We hear that the lady de Guebriant is dead, attending upon the court. She was the marquis de Vardes's aunt, and never had any children: I believe ſhe has left a good eſtate behind her. She died in four days, without confeſſion. One might ſay of her, what Eraſmus ſaid in jeſt of a Franciſcan, who died ſuddenly, Obiit ſine crux, ſine lux, ſine Deus (§ a). It is ſaid, ſhe was very much in debt; but then the queen owed her 40000 piſtoles, which ſhe lent her during the ſiege of Paris.

[(§ a) This ſaying occurs in the Facetiæ of Bebelius, fol. 56. Edit. 1542. And Luther has likewiſe uſed it in his Table-Talk, Tom. 1. fol. 86. Omnes, ſays he of a good number of his adverſaries, mortui ſunt ſine crux, & ſine lux. Rem. Crit.]

There being many things in Patin's letters, which he picked out as he was viſiting his patients (32), I would not much rely upon what I have juſt quoted from him. I could eaſily believe this lady had a hand in finding out ways and means to raiſe money for the king, and that loving to make great expences, and to keep her ſelf buſy, ſhe willingly turned her mind that way, and that therefore ſhe was curſed in the places, wherein ſhe ſhewed her skill in that point; but I do not think it was in Perigord (33). Doubtleſs ſhe died in that province, as ſhe was going through it, during the progreſs of the court into Guienne, when ſhe expected to be ſoon firſt lady of honour to the queen; for no body doubted then of the king's marriage with the Infanta of Spain.

If the letters of that phyſician be reprinted, his miſtakes ſhould be rectified by way of notes, and a good alphabetical index ſhould be added to them. But, before I proceed, I muſt quote another paſſage, concerning the family of Guebriant, out of one of the letters I have quoted. He ſays, that the counteſs de Moret, miſtreſs to Henry IV, is famous in Barclay's Euphormio, under the name of Caſina; that it is in the place, where ſhe was married to the count de Ceſy-Sancy, who was afterwards embaſſador at Conſtantinople, and that there is in it a deſcription of a contract of marriage of a man, who is willing to be a cuckold, and engages to bear it; that, about the year 1618, ſhe was married again to the marquis de Vardes, ſon of the good man, governour of la Chapelle, &c. He ſhould have ſaid la Capelle (34); he, who married the counteſs de Moret, was alſo governour of that place. It might have been further ſaid, that Henry IV ſtipulated with the count de Ceſi, that he ſhould leave that counteſs the very night of the wedding, which was done accordingly (35). The count does not make ſuch a promiſe, in the Euphormio; but he promiſes in the contract not to meddle with the bride. Patin ſhould not have omitted that particular. For the reſt, the author, who publiſhed the key of the Euphormio (36), is miſtaken in taking Olympion, who ſubmitted to thoſe terms, for the count de Moret.

[I] We ſhall ſee . . . the miſtake of a German writer.] Priolo's hiſtory was reprinted at Leipſic, the ſecond time, in the year 1686, with the notes of a profeſſor, called Franckenſtein: they are not free from faults; nevertheleſs it appears from them, that the author was pretty well informed for a foreigner. That profeſſor, having ſaid, that Priolo does frequently tax the lady de Guebriant (37) with too great ambition, adds, that ſhe gave a remarkable inſtance of it, when ſhe demanded, at the court of the king of Poland, the ſame honours the arch-ducheſs of Auſtria had received there, when ſhe brought her daughter, who was contracted to the king. He quotes Wicquefort in the ſecond book De l'Ambaſſadeur, Sect. 8. pag. 134. But, beſides that he ſhould have quoted pag. 200, and not 134, he ſhould alſo have cited the 594th page of the firſt book, where that arch-ducheſs is ſtiled the mother of the queen of Poland, whom ſhe brought. They are both miſtaken as to that quality of the arch ducheſs; for ſhe was not the mother of the queen of Poland. That queen was daughter of the emperor Ferdinand II, and ſiſter to the emperor Ferdinand III. And therefore were it true, that this queen was conducted into Poland by her mother, ſhe would have been conducted thither by the empreſs, and not by the arch-ducheſs of Auſtria. Beſides, that author ſhould have ſaid, the arch-ducheſs of Inſpruc, and not the arch-ducheſs of Auſtria. Laſtly, I obſerve, that Le Laboureur does not intimate, that the lady de Guebriant required the ſame honours, which the arch ducheſs had received; he only ſays, that the king of Poland ordered it ſo: But Wicquefort is more concerned in this, than the profeſſor of Leipſic. See what I have ſaid about it in the remark [D].

[K] She cauſed her marriage to be declared void.] Nothing can better diſcover her ambition than this. The count de Guebriant was a hopeful man, and very much eſteemed at court; and his skill in the art of war made it very probable, that he would be preferred to the greateſt poſts. Our Renata du Bec found her man in him: ſhe foreſaw he would raiſe himſelf (38), and that ſhe would have ſeveral opportunities of intriguing, whilſt he commanded the armies: and therefore, tho' he was no rich man, ſhe reſolved to marry him, and to that end ſhe got her marriage diſſolved. Mr de la Barde will give us this account in good Latin. 'Hæc mulier animo ſuprà ſexum valido eſt, cui videlicet nec prima, nec magna uſquè fuit ſicuti vulgo mulierum ſolet, rei familiaris cura: primas, quia imparem animo, ſicuti rebatur, virum nacta erat, nuptias dedignata eſt, atque infirmas eſſe contendit, maluitque ſe I. Ex illâ ſecum, atque ex gloriâ viri poſtillà multis rebus præclarè geſtis celeberrimi communicatâ ita crevere mulieri animi, uti magna, atque inſolita moliretur (39). —— This lady had a ſtrength of mind above her ſex, ſince her domeſtic affairs were neither her principal, nor ever her great care, as is the caſe of moſt women; ſhe diſdained her firſt marriage, as having got a huſband unequal, as ſhe thought, in mind; and therefore ſhe inſiſted it was void, and choſe to ſhare in the virtue of the count de Guebriant, rather than in the larger fortunes of another, a circumſtance, which her parents, as is uſual, had conſidered in marrying her. The ſhare ſhe had in her huſband's glory ſo exalted her thoughts, that ſhe attempted great and uncommon things.'

Le Laboureur obſerves (40), ' that he had been ' an eye-witneſs of the extraordinary care ſhe took to ' ſollicit the miniſters, that the army commanded by ' her husband ſhould want nothing; and I can affirm, ' adds he, that the dignity of mareſchaleſs of France ' belongs to her on a double account, becauſe her huſband is a mareſchal of France, and becauſe ſhe had a ' great ſhare in the good ſucceſs of his arms.'

GUESCLIN (a) (Bertrand du), conſtable of France, was one of the greateſt captains of his time. However, we ought not to believe whatever the old chronicles ſay of him; for the authors of that ſort of works were not yet cured of the diſtemper, which produced the hiſtories of Roland, of Ogier the Dane, and the like. Our du Gueſclin was a Breton, and did yet very great ſervices to France during king John's impriſonment, and under the reign of Charles V. Being gone into Spain to aſſiſt Henry king of Caſtile, he did extraordinary things in that country. He returned into France, when the crown was ſecured to Henry by the death of Dom Pedro the Cruel, his competitor, and was very ſucceſsful in recovering ſeveral countries from the Engliſh. He died in the year 1380, being ſixty ſix years old, or thereabouts (b). He was a little man, and very ugly [A]. See his life, written by Mr du Chatelet [B].

It is better than that, which was printed in the year 1618, in very old French, out of which I ſhall ſet down a very remarkable paſſage quoted by ſome controverſiſts [C], to ſhew, that laymen had a right to adminiſter the ſacraments in certain caſes of neceſſity.

[A] He was a little man, and very ugly.] ' Tho' ' Bertrand du Gueſclin was a little man, and very ' ugly, he was made conſtable of France, and was all ' along very much eſteemed. It has been ſaid in his ' favour, that nature ſeemed to have formed him ſuch ' as he was, leſt he ſhould have ſomething common ' with women: and had he ſpent every morning in ' adorning his head with a peruke, he had never ' made himſelf worthy of a never-dying lamp, and ' of being buried at the king's feet in St Denys's ' church (1).'

[B] See his life publiſhed by Mr du Chatelet.] Menard publiſhed an old hiſtory of that hero in the year 1618, which had been written in 1387. But the reader ought to be referred to that, of which an extract was publiſhed in the Journal des Savans of the twenty firſt of June 1666. It had been lately publiſhed at Paris in folio by Meſſire Paul Haï, Seigneur du Chatelet (2): it is digeſted into a better order than the other; the ſtyle is incomparably more pure and elegant, and beſides it is illuſtrated with many proofs (3).

[C] I ſhall ſet down a very remarkable paſſage quoted by the controverſiſts.] Read theſe words of Mr Drelincourt (4): 'we have a very remarkable example of ' of this lay-communion in our Hiſtories of France *, ' and a very clear proof that it was practiſed for a ' long time. For Bertrand du Gueſclin, conſtable of ' France, who lived in the reign of John and Charles ' V, kings of France, deſcribing the battle of Pontvalin, in which he obtained a ſignal victory over ' the Engliſh, informs us, that his ſoldiers confeſſed ' their ſins, and gave the communion one to another, ' before the battle.' But it is better to ſet down the words of the author: ' in that place, they eat bread ' and drank wine, which they had brought with them; ' and ſome of them took bread, and made the ſign of ' the croſs upon it, in the name of the holy ſacrament; ' and having confeſſed their ſins one to another, they ' uſed it inſtead of the communion (§ α). Afterwards, ' they ſaid many prayers, beſeeching GOD that he ' would preſerve them from death, maiming, and impriſonment.' Grotius made uſe of the ſame paſſage in a diſſertation, printed in 1638, De Cœnæ Adminiſtratione ubi Paſtores non ſunt. See the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, pag. 115, 116. of the fourth volume.

[(§ α) We meet with footſteps of theſe communions ſtill more ancient, in our old romances; among others, in ch. 36. of the Galien reſtauré, in which Roland, wounded to death, and lying in a corn-field, adminiſters the communion to himſelf with three ears of corn, in the name of the three perſons of the holy Trinity. * This hiſtory of Meſſire Bertrand de Gueſclin, conſtable of France, was printed at Paris for Sebaſtian Cramoiſi, in 1618.

GUEVARA, (Antony de), preacher and hiſtoriographer to the emperor Charles V, was born in the province of Alaba in Spain. He was brought up at court; but, after the death of queen Iſabella of Caſtile, he turned a Franciſcan monk, and had very honourable employments in his order. Afterwards, having made himſelf known at court, he was made preacher to Charles V, and was much eſteemed for his politeneſs, eloquence, and great parts (a). He ought to have been contented with the glory he got by his tongue; for, pretending to write books, he made himſelf ridiculous to good judges. His high-flown and figurative ſtyle, full of antitheſes [A], is not the greateſt fault of his works. An ill taſte, and a wrong notion of eloquence, put

put him upon ſuch a way of writing; which was an inconſiderable thing, if compared with his extravagant way of handling hiſtory [B]. He broke the moſt ſacred and the moſt eſſential laws of it, with a boldneſs that cannot be ſufficiently deteſted; and he ſhewed, that no man was ever ſo unworthy of the character of Chronicler to Charles V, which was given him. He alledged a very bad excuſe, when he was cenſured for it [C]: he pretended, that, excepting the holy ſcripture, all other hiſtories

'antithetis doctas poſuiſſe figuras laudari contentus. Fulgurat interdum & tonat, ſed non totam (ut olim Pericles Athenienſis) dicendo commovet civitatem, & dum nihil vult, niſi culte & ſplendide dicere, ſæpe incidit in ea quæ deriſum effugere non poſſunt. Qui ſi illam (ſubjungit) extra ripas effluentem verborum copiam artificio dicendi repreſſiſſet, & graviorum artium inſtrumento locupletaſſet, dubito quidem an parem in eo eloquentiæ genere in Hiſpania eſſet inventurus. —— Tho' this author's ſtyle be not altogether pleaſing, nor merits true praiſe in the ſchool of the rhetoricians. Particularly Alphonſus Garſias Metamorus, and Andreas Scotus, men of great learning and judgment, are highly diſpleaſed with that perpetual affectation of antitheſes. The former of theſe, Metamorus, in his book, de Academiis & doctis viris Hiſpaniæ, owns that he was a writer of wonderful eloquence, and incredible fertility of genius; but (ſays he) he fell into the fault, which Perſius objects to the poets, of perpetually playing with antitheſes. He ſometimes thunders and lightens, but does not, as formerly Pericles the Athenian did, ſhake a whole ſtate with his eloquence; and whilſt he aims at elegance, he often falls into thoſe things which expoſe him to laughter. Had this author (he goes on) kept the torrent of his eloquence within bounds, I queſtion whether Spain could have ſhewn an author equal to him.' It is in vain, and thro' a blind conceitedneſs, that Wadding (3) taxes Father Schottus with envy.

[B] His extravagant way of handling hiſtory.] The liberty he took to falſify whatever he pleaſed, and to advance, as true matter of fact, the meer inventions of his ſhallow brains, comes near that of the writers of romances. The latter deceive no body; for they do not require, that whatever they ſay ſhould be accounted true: the only thing they are fond of, is, that their fictions ſhould be approved as being ingeniouſly contrived; but Guevara pretended, that what he advanced, ſhould be looked upon as hiſtorical facts taken from good authors. He was therefore a public poiſoner, and a ſeducer, and deſerved to be puniſhed as a prophane and ſacrilegious man, at the tribunal of the commonwealth of learning; for he violated the moſt ſacred laws of hiſtory. Nicolas Antonio is too indulgent. 'Illud, ſays he (4), 'commiſeratione potius quam excuſatione indiget, talis famæ virum putaſſe licere ſibi adinventiones proprii ingenii pro antiquorum proponere, & commendare, fœtus ſuos aliis ſupponere, ac denique de univerſa omnium temporum hiſtoria, tanquam de Æſopi fabulis, portentoſiſve Luciani narrationibus ludere. —— It deſerves our pity rather than our cenſure, that a writer of ſuch fame ſhould think himſelf at liberty to forge ancient facts, and to play with the hiſtory of the world, as with Eſop's fables, or Lucian's monſtrous ſtories.' See the whole extent of his impoſtures in the article RUA: I have alſo touched upon them in other places (5).

[C] He was cenſured]. Peter Rua, profeſſor at Soria, did not ſuffer the boldneſs of this author to go unpuniſhed. He wrote ſtrongly againſt him, as may be ſeen in his article. Here follows the judgment that Voſſius paſſed upon the pretended life of Marcus Aurelius, written by Guevara: 'Vita illa M. Aurelii Antonini, quæ ab Antonio Guevara, Mendonenſi Epiſcopo, & Cæſari Carolo V. à conſiliis, Hiſpanicè edita eſt, eâque è linguâ in alias permultas tranſlata fuit, nihil Antonini habet; ſed tota eſt ſuppoſititia, ac genuinus Guevaræ ipſius fœtus; qui turpiter os oblevit lectori, planè contra officium hominis candidi, maximè Epiſcopi. Habet interim plurima lectu nec inutilia nec injucunda imprimis viro principi: unde & Horologium principum inſcribitur (6). —— That life of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, which is publiſhed in Spaniſh by Antony Guevara, biſhop of Mondonedo, and privy counſellor of the emperor Charles V, and tranſlated from thence into many other languages, has nothing in it of Antoninus; but the whole is fictitious, and the genuine offſpring of Guevara himſelf; who ſcandalouſly impoſes upon the reader, plainly againſt the duty of an honeſt man, but eſpecially of a biſhop. In the mean time, he has many things not unuſeful or unpleaſant, eſpecially to a prince; whence it is intituled, the Dial of Princes. I quote Martin Schoockius in the margin (7): he knew very well the faults of that Spaniard; but, becauſe he goes upon Rupertus's authority, it will not be improper to ſet down ſomewhat at large the words of that learned German (8). 'Eandem quoque impoſturam notaram in eodem Guevara, quem ob id tanta Imperatoris ſui, tanta noſtrorum hominum benevolentia prorſus indignum ſtudioſæ juventutis manibus excuſſum ibam. Refert *lib. Here lies Clavilla, only daughter of Camillus, who choſe to live forty ſix years among the Veſtal ſiſters, a priſoner, rather than to marry, at liberty, the great king of Sicily. Sad fate! the worms now feed upon thoſe limbs, which ſhone pure and undefiled thro' her whole life.

The learned Antonius Auguſtinus has very well deſcribed the faults of that man. Antonius Guevara, ſays he (9), 'qui ſcire antiquas Romanaſque Hiſtorias fingit, eaque comminiſcitur quæ nec viſa nec audita mortalibus, nemo ut divinare queat in quos ille libros inciderit. hiſtories are too uncertain [D] to be credited. Being in the emperor's retinue, he ſaw a great part of Europe (b), and was made biſhop of Guadix in the kingdom of Granada, and then biſhop of Mondonedo in Galicia (c). He died the tenth of April 1544, after he had been poſſeſſed of that dignity for ſome years (d). It is a fiction to ſay, that he was beatified by the court of Rome [E]. The eagerneſs of foreigners, in tranſlating ſome of his works into ſeveral languages, cannot be ſufficiently admired [F]. I ſhall give ‘ nullum reperias auctorem. —— Antonius Guevera, ‘ who pretends to be ſkilled in the ancient Roman hiſtory, and invents ſuch things, as were never ſeen or ‘ heard of, and which no one can tell whence he had ‘ them. He even invents new names of authors, and ‘ publiſhes idle ſtories, not to be met with in any ‘ author.’

[D] He pretended, that . . . hiſtories are too uncertain.] He alledged this excuſe, when he found himſelf nonpluſſed by the learned Peter Rua. ‘ Adeo in lubrico ‘ eſſe omnem veterum factorum fidem cauſabatur, ut ‘ non aliis diceret quam Sacrorum Bibliorum hiſtoriis ‘ præſtandam: nempe hoc velamenti genus ſibi à ‘ tam parum æquo de præſtantiſſima arte judicio tunc ‘ quæſivit cum è Sorienſis Scholæ cathedra vir eximiæ ‘ eruditionis Petrus Rua eum de fide in hiſtoris præſtanda non ſemel datis admonuit expoſtulatoriis literis (10). —— He pretended, by way of excuſe, that ‘ all ancient facts were ſo little to be depended upon, ‘ that the holy ſcripture alone deſerves to be believed. This ‘ was the falſe pretence, under which he endeavoured ‘ to ſkreen himſelf, when the very learned Peter Rua ‘ admoniſhed him by ſeveral expoſtulatory letters, concerning the credit due to hiſtory.’ It was a poor excuſe; for though hiſtorical Scepticiſm were as well grounded as ſome pretend, yet an author would not be allowed to advance, that Cicero or Cæſar ſaid or did a certain thing invented by himſelf. Every body would be obliged to aſcribe nothing to them but what is to be found in ancient monuments. An author ought not to go by particular rules of his own; he muſt conform to public rules: but, according to the public laws in point of hiſtory, what is proved by the teſtimony of grave authors is admitted; and whatever a modern writer advances concerning antiquity, without taking it from good hiſtorians, is rejected as a fable: and therefore, whatever opinion Guevara had of ancient hiſtory, whether he believed it to be true, falſe, or doubtful, he ſhould have cited what he found in it, and only that, otherwiſe he deſerves to be treated like a public ſeducer. Rua confuted that ſubterfuge, and wrote againſt him, in vindication of the truth of hiſtory. Another author (11) did likewiſe enter the liſts, to run down Guevara's principles. ‘ Cujus rei ‘ etiam nomine doctiſſimus ille Theologicorum locorum ‘ ſcriptor libri ſecundi ſexto capite in Guevaræ hoc, ‘ indignum eo, ac dignitate ejus, ſive judicium, ſive, ‘ quod magis credere eſt, ingenii luxuriantis licentiam, ‘ acri, quod decuit, oratione invehitur. Præſertim cum ‘ Chronographi munus regio beneficio apud Carolum ‘ exerceret, neutiquam debuit eam qua ornabatur hiſtoriarum profeſſionem ſic deprimere, ut propria confeſſione ſibi ipſi quoque & monumentis ſuis fidem apud poſteros derogaret (12). ——— Upon which account, likewiſe, the learned writer of the Theological ‘ Common-places, in the ſixth chapter of the ſecond ‘ book, inveighs ſharply againſt this opinion, or rather ‘ wanton liberty, of Guevara, ſo unworthy of him, ‘ and of his dignity. Eſpecially, conſidering he was ‘ chronicler to the emperor Charles, he ought by no means ‘ to have ſo depreſſed the authority of hiſtory, which ‘ was his profeſſion, as, by his own confeſſion, to take ‘ away all credit from himſelf and his writings to all ‘ poſterity.’

Mention is made, in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (13), of a certain Triumvirate, to which Guevara might be added. That Triumvirate is made up, I. of Father Morin, who, ‘ three years after the ‘ taking of Rochelle, maintained ſtill that it had not ‘ been taken, and that all the reports that went about ‘ it were meer romance.’ II. Of a famous and dreadful logician, who told a gentleman, who had been ſaying, that he had ſeen the duke d'Epernon at Plaſſac, ‘ that cannot be . . . . . for four undeniable reaſons, and ‘ I will make it out that this duke muſt neceſſarily be ‘ at London . . . . . It is more probable that the eyes ‘ are miſtaken, than reaſon . . . . The news in queſtion implies a moral contradiction, and perhaps a ‘ phyſical one.’ III. Of a man, who told Iſaac Voſſius ‘ that after long and intent meditations, he had ‘ writ a book, wherein he ſhewed by invincible arguments, that whatever is contained in Cæſar's commentaries, concerning the wars of Gaul, is falſe; ‘ and beſides, that Cæſar never went beyond the ‘ Alpes.’

[E] It is a fiction to ſay that he was beatified by the court of Rome.] Don Nicholas Antonio quotes an author, who compoſed the martyrology of the Franciſcans, and ſaid, that the holy ſee, after the neceſſary informations, ſolemnly declared, that Guevara is one of the beatified perſons, and ought to be looked upon as ſuch. Neſcio unde Arcturus, à Monaſterio Franciſcani Martyrologii auctor rem aliis indictam, inauditam acceperit. Antonium ut Guevaram Octobris die XXIV in albo eorum collocaret quos Apoſtolica Petri ſedes Beatos eſſe atque appellari debere, acceptis prius exquiſitiſſimis probationibus, ritè ſanxit (14). This is a greater boldneſs than that of Guevara. If this fact had any apperance of truth, how comes it to be mentioned only by one author? the ſilence of all others is a demonſtrative proof againſt the author of the Martyrology.

[F] One cannot ſufficiently admire the eagerneſs of foreigners, in tranſlating ſome of his works into ſeveral languages.] The Dial of Princes was tranſlated into Italian by Mambrin Roſeo in 1548, and into French in 1588 (§ a). Frederic William duke of Saxony cauſed it to be printed in Latin, with notes and aphoriſms, by John Vankelius in 1611, in folio. That edition was reprinted at Leipſic in 1615, and 1624, and at Francfort in 1664 (15). Emericus Caſaubonus in prologo ‘ ſic feliciter Guevaræ ſuam contigiſſe fictionem confirmat, omnium ſit ut hic liber ubique gentium celebratiſſimus, Europæique omnes ſuo uniuſcujuſque ‘ idiomate loquentem theſauri ad inſtar habeant, mirificéque ejus poſſeſſione fruatur (16). ——— Emeric ‘ Caſaubon, in the prologue, aſſures us, that Guevara's ‘ fiction ſucceded ſo well with him, that that book was ‘ in great reputation all over the whole world, and ‘ tranſlated into every language of Europe, as a moſt ‘ valuable treaſure.’ This I take from Nicolas Antonio: he ſays, Vankelius's edition was made at Torgau in 1611; but he ſhould have added that this edition of the year 1611 is the third. I rather think that it came out at Leipſic than at Torgau; for the tranſlator oppoſes it to that of Torgau, which was the firſt (17), and which appeared in the year 1601. The ſecond came out in 1606. Guevara's epiſtles have been taanſlated into Italian and French. The Jeſuit Schottus very juſtly laughs at thoſe, who valued thoſe two books in France. ‘ Nam Principum Horologium, ſays he, Pag. 215. of his Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, ‘ ſeu de ‘ vita M. give a catalogue of his writings [G]. I have ſomething to add to what I have ſaid of his Dial of Princes [H], and I will ſhew, that, if the French are to blame for having highly valued ſuch a book, the Spaniards, who have eſteemed it ſtill more, deſerve more to be laughed at.

To theſe two different tranſlations, the laſt of which, by the by, is caſtrated of ſeveral chapters, alludes the ſæpius verterunt of the Jeſuit Schottus, Rem. Crit.]

[G] I ſhall give a catalogue of his writings.] I have mentioned the moſt famous, which is intituled in Spaniſh, Relox de principes: ò Marco Aurelio. It is thought the firſt edition is of the year 1529. It was followed by ſome others before the author publiſhed it himſelf. He complained, that it had been taken from him tho' imperſect, and made public without his knowledge. His letters were printed the firſt time in 1539; and ſince in ſeveral places, and at ſeveral times. His other works are, Prologo ſolenne, en que el autor toca muchas hiſtorias. Una decada de las vidas de los X. Ceſares Emperadores Romanos deſde Trajano à Alexandro. Del menos precio de la Corte y alabanca de la Aldea. Aviſo de privados, y doctrina de Corteſanos (19). De los inventores del marear y de muchos trabaxos que ſe paſſan en las Galeras (20). Monte Calvario, ſive de myſteriis Dominicæ paſſionis ac de verbis Domini in Cruce pendentis (21). Oratorio de eligioſos y exercitio de virtuoſos. He was about a hiſtory of Charles V, and it is ſaid, he ordered by his will, that the penſion of hiſtoriographer ſhould be reſtored (22) to that emperor, which he had received, for one year, wherein he had beſtowed no time upon that hiſtory (23).

[H] I have ſomething to add to what I have ſaid of his Dial of Princes.] He declares, that this work (24) was a tranſlation of the life of Marcus Aurelius, and that the original had been ſent to him from Florence (25). He confeſſes, that he had not confined himſelf to tranſlate it word for word, and that he had added many things to it. He begun this work in the year 1518, and finiſhed it in the year 1524: ‘and tho' during thoſe ſix years, ſays he (26), I kept my book ſecret, nevertheleſs it was divulged: for the emperor, being ill of an ague, ſent for it, to paſs away the time, and divert his diſtemper. Wherefore in obedience to his intention, I myſelf carried him Marcus Aurelius, without it's having been reviſed, corrected, or finiſhed, humbly beſeeching him, in recompence of my labour, that he would not ſuffer it to be tranſcribed, nor taken out of his royal apartment, otherwiſe his majeſty would do me a great prejudice, becauſe, in purſuing and finiſhing my undertaking, he would know, that my intention was not only to publiſh Marcus Aurelius, juſt as it was, but to add to it many ſentences worthy of recommendation: notwithſtanding this, it unfortunately happened, that the book was ſtolen, and afterwards copied by ſeveral hands, by which means it became every day more incorrect and faulty; for there was but one original to correct it by: it is true, ſome perſons brought me ſome copies, to reviſe and correct them; but, if they could ſpeak, they would complain more of thoſe, who have copied them, than I of the thieves, who ſtole them; and, what is worſe, about the time when my labour was near at an end, ready to diſperſe the fruit, Marcus Aurelius was printed at Sevil, and ſoon after in Portugal, and in the kingdom of Arragon, in ſuch a manner, that, if the firſt edition was bad, the others were more ſo.’ Judge from hence, whether the Spaniards deſerve leſs than the French the ralleries of Andrew Schottus (27). Perhaps, he knew not, that there were Frenchmen, who deſpiſed the epiſtles of Guevara, of which, ſays Montagne (28), thoſe who call them golden make a judgment very different from what I do. It muſt be owned, however, that they impoſed upon a great many Frenchmen, and that the Dial of Princes met with very good ſucceſs in France. It was printed there ſeveral times. I make uſe of an edition of Lyons, by Benoiſt Rigaud, 1592, in 12mo, and I ſee, in the title, that the work was tranſlated out Caſtilian into French by R. B. de Griſe. Afterwards reviſed and corrected by N. de Herberay, lord des Eſſars, beyond the preceding editions. The epiſtle dedicatory to cardinal de Givri is not ſigned. I there find, that the lord des Eſſars died whilſt he was tranſlating this work. ‘We have therefore, continues he, only the firſt book of his tranſlation, in which we ſtill find ſome looſe ſheets, in ſo poor a condition, that it is impoſſible to read them; for which reaſon the work has been continued from the old tranſlation, after having been corrected, from the Spaniſh copy, of an infinite number of faults, and altered as to certain phraſes, contrary to our language, which often obſcure the ſenſe of the author, and ſometimes are entirely repugnant to his meaning.’

The Italians likewiſe have more than once tranſlated this book. I have ſpoken of the verſion made by Mambrin Roſeo, and I add, that Fauſto da Longiano gave another, which was printed in the year 1546, in 8vo. He added ſome things to it, which were not in the Spaniſh original, and he replaced thoſe, which the other Italian tranſlation had retrenched from the ſame original. He lays open, in his preface, the liberty Guevara gave himſelf of advancing facts which were not true. His criticiſm is good and learned. He promiſed a life of M. Aurelius, compoſed from the teſtimony of the ancient hiſtorians, in order to ſet in compariſon with this, which the Spaniſh writer had forged. He repreſents himſelf as one, who applys himſelf to more ſerious ſtudies, in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, than ſuch as tranſlating a Spaniſh book into Italian, and he gives us hopes of his Latin works.

GUICCIARDIN (Francis), deſcended from one of the moſt noble and ancient families of Florence, and author of an hiſtory very much eſteemed [A], and of ſome other works (a), was born in that town the ſixth of March 1482. He was profeſſor

[A] He is author of an hiſtory very much eſteemed.] It contains, in twenty books, the tranſactions in Italy, from the year 1494, to the year 1532. I confine it within theſe bounds (1), becauſe the author of his life will have it ſo; but I muſt obſerve, that the hiſtorian goes back as far as the ſtate that Italy was in, in the year 1490, and ends with the death of Clement VII, and the election of Paul III (2). It is true, he is very ſhort in his account of what paſſed in the laſt years of Clement VII, eſpecially from the year 1530. This hiſtory has been tranſlated out of Italian into ſeveral languages. Cælius Secundus Curio publiſhed it in Latin, at Baſil, in 1566. One Jerome Chomedey, a Pariſian, publiſhed it in French at Paris in 1568. The Engliſh have it in their own language, as appears from the catalogue of the Bodleian library. The Spaniards, the Germans, and the Dutch, have alſo tranſlated it into theirs (3). The beſt Italian edition is that, which is illuſtrated with the marginal notes of Thomas Porcacchi. The firſt edition of that nature is of Venice in 1573 (4). This hiſtory did not appear till after Guicciardin's death; and it was Agnolo Guicciardin his nephew, who publiſhed it. The Proteſtants took care to preſerve the fragments, that were left out, becauſe the court of Rome did not like them. They publiſhed them by themſelves at feſſor of the civil-law, being twenty three years of age; but he rather choſe to follow the law, than to teach it, as he had done before. He became a very famous advocate, inſomuch that he was thought fit to be employed in ſtate-affairs. He was ſent embaſſador to the court of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, in January 1512. His embaſſy laſted two years, and proved very glorious to him; for, at his return to Florence, he met with a kind reception, and was very well approved. Some time after, he entered into the ſervice of Leo X, who made him governour of Modena and Reggio. He defended Parma with great ſucceſs, after the death of that Pope, and continued in the ſame governments under Hadrian VI, and Clement VII. Beſides, he was made governour of Romagna, under Clement VII, and lieutenant of the army, and ſhewed, that he was as great a captain, as a good negotiator. He was governour of Bologna, when that Pope died, and took care that the enemies, he had gained by an exact obſervation of juſtice, ſhould not take advantage of the Interregnum, to his prejudice. The new Pope beſtowed that government upon another; whereupon Guicciardin returned to Florence, where he ſettled, till he died. He did great ſervices to the houſe of Medicis, and would not accept the offers of Paul III, who deſired to take him into his ſervice. He had a wife, but no ſons, and therefore he conſidered, that he could not be preferred to eccleſiaſtical benefices, nor procure any to his ſons: beſides, being afraid that he could not ſerve the Pope, without diſobliging ſometimes the duke of Florence, he rather choſe to live a quiet life in his country-houſe, and to ſpend his time in writing the hiſtory he had undertaken. He was advanced very far in it, when he died of a malignant fever, in May 1540, being fifty five years of age. He deſired to be buried without pomp, and without an epitaph or funeral oration (b). His hiſtory of Italy is very good. Many look upon him as an impartial hiſtorian, who flatters no body, and blames only what is to be blamed; but ſome are of opinion, that he ſhews too great a partiality againſt France [B], or that ſeveral times (5). Heidegger, laſt of all, inſerted, in his Hiſtoria Papatus (6), the fragment of the fourth book. Varillas affirms, that Guicciardin's heirs preſumed to publiſh, againſt his intention, the four laſt books in the third edition. I ſhall enquire into the truth of it hereafter (7). Note, that Sanſovino publiſhed an epitome of that hiſtory, and that Guicciardin deſigned, in imitation of Cæſar, to write ſome memoirs concerning the actions of his life; but James Nardi, whom he conſulted about it, made him reſolve to undertake a nobler work, viz. a hiſtory of his own times. He took him to be a man well qualified for ſuch an undertaking, knowing, that neither fear nor hope would hinder him from diſcharging the duties of a faithful hiſtorian. Beſides, had he confined himſelf to the hiſtory of his own life, he might have expoſed himſelf to the envy of the Florentines. Fu da lui diſſuaſo, & eſſortato a ſcriver l'Hiſtoria de ſuoi tempi, ſi perche lo conoſceva d'ingegno, atto a condurre un' impreſa coſi fatta à perfettione; e perche anche ſapeva molto bene, ch'egli era per deſcriver la pura verità, ſenza riſpetto di paura, ò ſperanza di premio, delle quali due corruttele par che ſieno ſtati ne' tempi paſſati, e ſieno ancor hoggi corrotti quaſi tutti gli Scrittori; ſi ancora perche fuggiſſe l'invidia de' ſuoi Cittadini, e'l biaſimo univerſale de l'haver voluto celebrare ſolamente ſe ſteſſo (8).

[B] Some think, that he ſhews too great a partiality againſt France.] I ſhall ſet down a long paſſage of Claudius du Verdier (9). ‘ Guicciardinus tam frigide invituſque Gallorum victorias & gloriam narrat, ‘ quam accuratè lubenſque, adverſa quæque, quantumvis minima, à fortunæ potentiſſimo belli numine ‘ ejaculata: quemadmodum ſarcinarum in alicujus fluminis trajectione ſubmerſionem perſequitur, atque dilatat. Dum videt Carolo VIII totam Italiam ab ‘ Alpibus ad Neapolim nemine penitus obſiſtente occupanti, victoriam abſque ſuſpicione falſi adimi non ‘ poſſe, in Gallorum quorundam militum internecione ‘ paucorumque, quâ ſine victoria obtineri non potuit, ‘ totus eſt, magnam eam appellans ſtragem; Carolo ‘ tamen agri dominium ſuperſtitiſſe diffiteri non auſus ‘ eſt. Sed quæ de victoribus ſtrages fieri potuit? Si ‘ de ſuis ſermonem inſtituit, eis ſemper plus meritis ‘ attribuit, & regionis laudes magis, quàm ſuæ gentis ‘ res geſtas perſequitur, unde maxima laus ducenda ‘ eſt. —— Guicciardin relates as coldly, and as much ‘ againſt his will, the victories and glory of the French, ‘ as he does accurately, and readily, every the leaſt ‘ unfortunate event, ſuch as the loſs of baggage in paſſing a river, on which he deſcants at large. Whilſt ‘ he ſees, that he cannot, without ſuſpicion of falſehood, ‘ deny the ſucceſs of Charles VIII in conquering all ‘ Italy, from the Alps to Naples, without any reſiſtance, ‘ he dwells wholly on the putting to death of a few ‘ French ſoldiers, without which the victory could not ‘ have been obtained, calling it a great ſlaughter; at ‘ the ſame time not daring to deny, that Charles remained maſter of the field. But what ſlaughter could ‘ be made of conquerors? But, when he is to ſpeak ‘ of his own party, he ever attributes more to them than ‘ they deſerve, and rather expatiates in praiſe of the ‘ country, than relates the actions of his own countrymen, whence the greateſt praiſe is to be fetched.’ If this cenſure be well grounded, Guicciardin made himſelf ridiculous, and as our gazetteers do. They afford ſport every day; for, to give an inſtance of it, when the French are encamped beyond the Rhine, the gazetteer of the contrary party ſpeaks of nothing but of their parties beaten, of the priſoners made upon them, and of their deſerters. The Paris gazette ſays nothing of all this; but then the French gazetteer enlarges upon the loſſes of the allies, and the contributions they are forced to pay. When the Germans march into the territories of France, as they did in the autumn of the year 1694, the French gazetteer does not forget to take notice of their parties that are defeated, or obliged to ſurrender: he ſpeaks of nothing elſe. On the contrary, the gazetteer of the allies, forgetting all thoſe things, keeps a very exact account of all the villages plundered by the the Germans, of all the magazines burnt, of all the French parties beaten, &c. There are a thouſand unlucky reaſons for uſing ſuch a method in thoſe daily writings (10); but an hiſtorian, who does the ſame, is wholly inexcuſable. He ought to relate the loſſes and advantages of his party with the ſame exactneſs. Is there any that does it?

AN OBSERVATION upon Gazettes.

La Popeliniere is one of thoſe, who tax Guicciardin with too great a partiality againſt France. ‘ He ‘ is a free and ſincere writer, ſays he (11), exempt ‘ from paſſion, but not from hatred, which he could ‘ not conceal againſt the French, the duke of Urbino, and others . . . . nay, he could not forbear reſenting the injury, which the Italians continually ‘ complain, in their words and writings, to have received from the French, when they diſturbed the ‘ lòng and profound repoſe of Italy under the reign ‘ of Charles VIII. . . . . though it be an improper ‘ ſubject for Guicciardin and moſt Italian authors to ‘ ſhew their animoſity: and I cannot apprehend upon ‘ what grounds he ſays, that that king was a man of a ‘ monſtrous ſhape.’ La Popeliniere confutes this with many tedious words: he ſhould have been contented with the following paſſage. ‘ If king Charles had ‘ been ſuch a man, or any thing like it, let any body ‘ judge, whether the other Italians, as great enemies ‘ to the French as Guicciardin, (who has only men-he dwells too much upon inconſiderable things [C], or that he has inſerted too many prolix harangues [D], or that he is too apt to aſcribe actions to bad motives [E]. Cardinal Palavicini is not favourable to him: I will mention what he ſays of him [F]. As for Guicciardin's ſtyle, his moſt unjuſt cenſurers acknowledge, that it is very pure and exact; but they make a great difference between the firſt books, and the following, becauſe they ſuppoſe, that the firſt five books were corrected by an able hand (c). Father Poſſevin blames him for aſcribing to fate and fortune the ſucceſs of wars, and the revolutions of ſtates: he is willing to believe, that it does not proceed from an error of his mind, and that it is only an effect of cuſtom; but he fancies

'tioned the virtues he could not deny, without being 'taxed with lying) would not have ſtuffed their writings with it before and after him: but no man 'among chriſtian nations did ever reflect upon that 'king in his life-time (12).' Not to refer it to another time, I ſhall mention the other faults, for which that writer blames Guicciardin. They are the ſame that have been obſerved by others, as it will appear by the following remarks. 'I do not find, ſays he '(13), any thing in him, for which he ought to be 'more valued than others, except his great freedom 'of ſpeaking of great men, and his care to inquire 'into the cauſes and motives of ſeveral actions. But 'he is ſo prolix, and ſo full of harangues, and inconſiderable things not worth mentioning, that, if ſome 'author had gone before him in boldly laying open 'the faults of eminent men, he would not have been 'much eſteemed. But it is well known how much 'the minds of men are affected with a remarkable 'novelty: and yet he has done himſelf a great deal 'of injury by not keeping within due bounds, and by 'preferring the regard he had for his country, to the 'duty of an hiſtorian, and even of a Chriſtian, and a 'man of honour, to whom ſuch things ought to be 'indifferent.'

[C] . . . . or that he dwells too much upon inconſiderable things.] It is Lipſius's opinion (14). 'Vitia duo propria hujus ævi non effugit, quod & juſto 'longior eſt, & quod minutiſſima quæque narret, parum ex lege aut dignitate hiſtoriæ, quæ, ut Ammianus, lib. 26. ait Diſcurrere per negotiorum celſitudines aſſueta, non humilium minutias indagare cauſarum. —— He did not eſcape the two faults peculiar 'to this age: I mean, that he is too prolix, and too 'particular, contrary to the law and dignity of hiſtory, which, as Ammianus, book 26, ſays, is wont to 'dwell on the ſummit of affairs, not to deſcend into a minute recital of every little ſpring of 'action.'

[D] . . . or that he has inſerted too many prolix harangues.] Beſides what you will ſee in the paſſage out of Montagne in the following remark, here are Lipſius's words (15). 'Sed non orationes ejus ſatis 'vegetæ mihi aut caſtigatæ, languent ſæpe aut ſolutè 'vagantur. Denique, uno verbo, inter noſtros ſummus eſt hiſtoricus: inter veteres, mediocris. —— 'But his harangues appear to me to be incorrect, 'and ſometimes ſpiritleſs and tedious: In a word, among the moderns, he is one of the beſt hiſtorians; 'among the ancients, but indifferent.'

[E] . . . . . or that he is too apt to aſcribe actions to bad motives.] It is Montagne's opinion, who aſſumes a ſpirit of charity for mankind in that reſpect. Many others will not believe, that Guicciardin deſerves to be cenſured upon that account: but let us ſee what Montagne ſays, both upon what concerns the text of this remark, and in general about the character of that famous hiſtorian. 'It is not at all likely, that 'he has miſrepreſented things out of hatred, love, or 'vanity; and one may be convinced of it by the judgment he freely paſſes upon great men, and eſpecially 'upon thoſe, by whom he had been raiſed and employed, as Pope Clement VII. As for that part of 'his hiſtory, of which he ſeems to be moſt proud, 'viz. his digreſſions and diſcourſes; ſome of them 'are very good, and adorned with fine ſtrokes; but 'he is too fond of them. For, being willing to omit 'nothing, and having a very full, and, as it were, 'an infinite ſubject, he grows weak by it, and his 'hiſtory ſavours of ſcholaſtic prattling. I have alſo 'obſerved, that, among ſo many events and counſels, 'about which he gives his judgment, he never aſcribes 'any to virtue, religion, and conſcience, as if thoſe 'things were wholly baniſhed from the world: and 'he imputes all actions, tho' they appear never ſo fine, 'to a vicious principle, or ſelf-intereſt. It is impoſſible 'to believe, that, among ſuch a vaſt number of actions, none ſhould have been produced by a reaſonable motive. Men can never be ſo generally 'corrupt, but ſome will avoid the contagion: 'which makes me afraid, that Guicciardin had a 'vicious taſte, and perhaps he judged of others by 'himſelf (16).'

[F] I will mention what cardinal Palavicini ſays of him] Firſt, he taxes him with three falſities, and then judges of him in general. The firſt falſity concerns Hadrian VI. The cardinal pretends, that Guicciardin ſhould not have ſaid *, that, on the day of that Pope's election, no cardinal intended to raiſe him to the pontificate; and that thoſe, who voted for him in the ſcrutiny, deſigned only to ſpend the time that morning (17). I omit the reaſons alledged by the cardinal againſt it. The ſecond falſity concerns the elector of Saxony. Palavicini maintains, that it is not true, that Leo X publiſhed a threatning monitory againſt that prince, which did very much exaſperate him. Due altre abbagli piu rilevanti prende egli nelle principal noſtra materia. Il primo è l'affermar che Leone ſpediſſe contra l'Elettor di Saſſonia un monitorio con minacce di gravi pene, e pero con irritazion di quel Principe. Il che è un vano ſogno contrario à quanto ſi leggi nelle memorie pieniſſime di que' ſucceſſi (18). The third falſity concerns Luther, who, according to Guicciardin, was ſo frighted when he was put to the ban of the empire, that he would willingly have renounced his errors, had not cardinal Cajetan caſt him into deſpair by his threatnings and injurious words, and had he made him honourable offers. Palavicini maintains, that cardinal Cajetan returned to Rome twenty months before Luther was put to the ban †, and that he ſpoke to him very kindly. E pur è certo che il Cardinal di Gaeta non parlò con Lutero nè allora, nè dipoi, nè per gran tempo addietro; eſſendo tornato in Roma venti meſi prima del Bando: E quando gli parlò, gli offerſe benignamante il perdono, ſecondo che Lutero ſteſſo racconta: E la medeſima eſibizione gli fù più volte fatta in Vormazia nella Dieta, come teſtificò Ceſare nel ſuo Bando (19). Whereupon Palavicini ſays, that Guicciardin had but a confuſed notion of things, that did not directly belong to his ſubject, and was more inclined to believe ill than good, in order to ſatisfy his ſlandering humour. He adds ſomething to make one ſuſpect his ſlanders againſt the court of Rome. Theſe are his words (20): 'Dal che m'auveggo, che quell' 'Iſtorico, di ciò che non apparteneva al ſuo principal argomento, preſe notizie molto confuſe: e fû 'anche ſempre inclinato à credere le peggiori, come 'appare nella ſua ſpeſſa maledicenza di ciaſcheduno; 'la quale appreſſo alla vulgare malignità gli hà guadagnata eſtimazion di veridico. Mà contro à Pontefici fù anche più ſpecialmente amaro, così per 'quell' uſato rancore che i miniſtri di lungo ſervigio 'concepiſcono contra i padroni da cui non ottennero 'le mercedi ſperate; come forſe perch'egli riconoſceva da loro la perdita della libertà nella ſua Repubblica. —— This hiſtorian has a very confuſed notion 'of what does not immediately belong to his principal ſubject. Beſides, he was inclined to believe the 'worſt, as appears from his frequent ſlandering of 'every one; which with the vulgar gained him the 'reputation of ſpeaking the truth. But he was eſpecially bitter againſt the Popes, through that uſual 'diſguſt, which thoſe, who have long ſerved, conceive 'againſt their patrons, from whom they do not obtain 'the expected reward; becauſe, perhaps, they impute 'to them the loſs of liberty in their republic.

fancies that ſuch a thing ſpoils the readers (d). It does not clearly appear, whether he is more inclined to cenſure him, than to commend him [G]. Varillas charges him with calumny in what he ſays about Francis the firſt's intelligence with Soliman: I ſhall examine what that French hiſtorian obſerves upon it [H]. [G] It is not eaſy to know whether he is more inclined to cenſure, than commend him.] He (21) ſays, Guicciardin was a man of great judgment and experience in public affairs: he mentions the good opinion Thomas Porcacchi had of his hiſtory (22); but he ſays alſo, that John Baptiſt Leone publiſhed (23) five books of conſiderations upon that work, to ſhew the falſities and partiality of the author. That book, ſays he, is in every body's hands, and therefore I need not dwell upon it. For the reſt, he informs us, that Clement VIII had lately cauſed the Latin tranſlation of Guicciardin, made by the heretic Cælius Velcurio, to be put into the index (24). He pretends, that the true reaſon of it was, becauſe the tranſlator had not rightly explained the original (25); but ſuch a reaſon ought not to be minded, as we ſhall ſee hereafter from what Vannozzi ſays. Had Poſſevin intended to inſpire his readers with a great eſteem for Guicciardin's hiſtory, he would have been as careful to mention Remigius, as John Baptiſt Leone. This Remigius, a Florentine monk, is the author of a book printed at Venice in 1582, with this title, Conſiderationi civili ſopra l'Hiſtorie di M. Fr. Guicciardini, e d'altri hiſtorici.

[H] I ſhall examine what Mr Varillas obſerves upon it.] He affirms (26), that Francis I, and Henry VIII engaged, in 1532, ‘to defend, without any exception, any ſtate of Chriſtendom attacked by the Turks .... The original of that agreement, adds he (27), is ſtill to be found in the Chamber of Accompts at Paris; and Guicciardin muſt needs have known nothing of it, ſince he poſitively ſays, as moſt foreign hiſtorians do, upon his credit, that the moſt Chriſtian king ſollicited Soliman at the ſame time to make an end of the conqueſt of Hungary, and offerred to join his forces with thoſe of the Turks, in order to attack the houſe of Auſtria. This is ſo groſs a calumny, that Jovius, who wrote his hiſtory at the ſame time with Guicciardin, and in Italy as well as he, was ſenſible of it. But Guicciardin will be found more excuſable, if it be conſidered, that he inſerted this calumny only in the latter part of his work; and that the four laſt books of that author are neither ſo good, nor ſo authentic, as the ſixteen that go before; that they are imperfect in many places; that the author did not think they deſerved to be printed; and that they were publiſhed only after his death, when his heirs preſumed to publiſh them againſt his intention in the third edition.’ This account does not ſeem to me to be exact: I do not find, that Guicciardin ſays more than this, viz. that, in 1531, Francis I kept correſpondence with the German princes, diſſatiſfied with the emperor, and with the Pope, and Soliman (28); and that, in 1532, the ſame prince and Henry VIII, projected to attack the Milaneze, becauſe they thought Soliman would be all the winter in Hungary (29). Beſides, I do not find, that Jovius confutes what Varillas aſcribes to Guicciardin. He only mentions as a report, the truth of which he will not warrant, that Soliman came into Hungary in the year 1532, at the ſollicitation of the king of France, and of the king of Poland (30). Varillas expreſſes himſelf, as if he believed, that the firſt ſixteen books of Guicciardin's hiſtory were printed during the author's life, which is not true. They were publiſhed in the year 1561, by his nephews. The epiſtle dedicatory to Coſmo de Medicis, duke of Florence, is ſubſcribed Agnolo Guicciardini. The editors promiſe to publiſh the four laſt books, though they are ſenſible of their imperfection (31). Thoſe four books are not in the edition of Venice, 1565, in 4to, appreſſo Nicolo Bevilaqua. It was corrected and enlarged with ſummaries and marginal notes by Father Remigio, a Florentine. Neither are they in the edition, which the ſame Bevilaqua put out in the year 1568, in 4to. And therefore Varillas ſhould not have ſaid that they were inſerted in the third edition. They were printed by themſelves at Venice, appreſſo Gabriel Giolito de Ferrari, in the year 1564, in 4to. I have that edition. The nephews of the author dedicated it to the ſame Coſmo de Medicis, duke of Florence, to whom they had dedicated the ſixteen books. Agnolo Guicciardini ſigned for them all the epiſtle dedicatory dated from Florence the twentieth of July, 1564. The Pope, the doge of Venice, and the duke of Florence, granted licences to Giolito the bookſeller, which were prefixed to that work. And doubtleſs this was the reaſon why the bookſeller, Bevilaqua, did not inſert thoſe four books in the edition of the firſt ſixteen.

Theſe ſame four laſt books were printed at Parma appreſſo Seth Viotti in the year 1567, in 4to, con l'aggiunta de' Sommarii à ciaſcun Libro, & di molte Annotationi in margine delle coſe piu notabili, DI MARCO PAPIRIO PICEDI.

[I] I will mention the devout complaints of Bonifacio Vannozzi.] His hiſtory, ſays he (32), is more acceptable to private perſons than to princes; for he ſpeaks of the latter without any reſerve, and reflects ſo much upon the Pope, that his book tranſlated into Latin has been greedily read in heretical countries. From whence it appears, continues he, that the Italian writers may do a great deal of prejudice to the Papacy. Vannozzi pretends, they ought not to diſcover their mother's nakedneſs; and that, if they publiſh a diſgraceful truth, they offend againſt charity; and if they publiſh falſities, they offend againſt juſtice. This is in general the meaning of what he ſays; but I ſhall ſet down his own words, for the ſatisfaction of thoſe, who may be deſirous to know more particularly how he expreſſes himſelf. ‘Si che vegga un pò chi ſcrive, con quanta facilità egli poſſa pregiudicare alla Chieſa Romana; alla Sedia Apoſtolica, & al Sommo Pontefice: & che le penne de gl' Italiani, profeſſanti il Chriſtiano, ò ſcoprano le noſtre vergogne, ſe dicono il vero, che è contro alla carità, dovuta al proſſimo; ò calunniando per odio, ò per altra paſſione, chi merita eſſer onorato; facciano da maligno, & da triſto (33).’ He owns, that Guicciardin's hiſtory does not give ſo great a ſcandal, ſince it has been corrected; but he maintains, that the Latin tranſlation made from the firſt original (34) may offend the devil himſelf. ‘Ma la fatta Latina, cavata dal primo originale, & piena di maledicenze contro à Papi, & altri Eccleſiaſtici, può ſcandalizare il Diavolo ſteſſo; parlo di quel ch'io sò di propria ſcienza, & come ſi dice di veduta. Et un moderno Scrittore, parlando di queſta Storia, dice così per l'appunto. Il Guicciardini hà potuto per ſe ſteſſo, acquiſtar tanto d'autorità all' Iſtoria ſua, che molte indegnità, molti errori, & molte bugie, ch'ella contiene, ſono ſtate non ſolo ſopportate dal Mondo; ma approbate da molti, per eſempi, & per dogmi del vero, & perfetto viver civile. Et laſciando il reſto, ſi legge pur in eſſo, un'aperta, & faſtidioſa irreverenza, dice il medeſimo moderno Scrittore, verſo gli ſteſſi Vicari di Chriſto, con grande indegnità della Sedia Apoſtolica, & non potendoſi accuſarlo d'ignoranza, biſogna neceſſariamente confeſſarlo, per troppo appaſſionato, & commiſerare più toſto, che biaſmare una così bella, ma così difettoſa, fatica (35). —— But the Latin tranſlation, made from the firſt original, and full of calumnies againſt the Popes, and other eccleſiaſtics, may ſcandalize the devil himſelf; I ſpeak by experience, and, as it were, by ſight. And a modern writer, ſpeaking of this hiſtory, expreſſes himſelf thus: Guicciardin ſo eſtabliſhed the credit of his hiſtory, that the many meanneſſes, the many errors, and the many lies, which it contains, have been not only born with in the world, but approved by many, as examples of true and perfect civil life. And omitting the reſt, let any one read only the bare-faced and contemptuous irreverence in him (ſays the ſame modern writer) towards the very vicars of CHRIST, and as he cannot be accuſed of ignorance, we muſt confeſs, that he is too paſſionate an author, and pity, rather than blame, ſo fine, but defective, a work.’ This long paſſage is not needleſs in this place, ſince it belongs to the hiſtory of the ſeveral judgments paſſed upon Guicciardin.

whom they ſent to the imperial court [K]. Beſides this, he wrote ſome other books [L]. LEWIS GUICCIARDIN his nephew ſignalized himſelf in the common-wealth of learning [M].

[K] The Venetians complained of a ſpeech, which Guicciardin aſcribes to their embaſſador.] Nothing can be more humble than that ſpeech. That hiſtorian ſuppoſes it was made by Antonio Juſtiniani to the emperor Maximilian, in the year 1509. Per ottener da lui con qualunque conditione la pace gli mandarono cón ſomma celerità Ambaſciatore Antonio Giuſtiniano: il quale ammeſſo in publica audientia al coſpetto di Ceſare; parlò miſerabilmente è con grandiſſima ſommiſſione (36). Not contented with this general notion of the too great humility of the Venetians; he adds, that it is not improper to ſet down the whole ſpeech, that the reader may ſee how great was their conſternation. Accordingly he ſets down the whole diſcourſe of the embaſſador, without any alteration; only he tranſlates it out of Latin into Italian. Non mi pare alieno dal noſtro propoſito, accioche meglio s'intenda in quanta conſternatione d'animo fuſſe ridotta quella Repub. la quale già più di dugento anni, non haveva ſentito averſità pari a queſta, inſerire la propria oratione havuta da lui innanzi a Ceſare, transferendo ſolamente le parole Latine in voci volgari, lequali furono in queſto tenore (37). The Venetians maintain, that it is a chimerical ſpeech, and, in order to prove it, they ſay, that Francis Capello (38), whom they ſent to the emperor, after they had retaken Padua, could not ſo much as obtain leave to go into the territories of that prince; and that Lewis Mocenigo and Antony Juſtiniani, whom they ſent to him ſome time after, were neither admitted, nor heard, no more than Francis Capello. What is certain, is, that thoſe embaſſadors were ordered to make very advantageous offers to his imperial majeſty. The hiſtorian of Venice, whom I have quoted, does not deny it. Peter Bembo, another Venetian hiſtorian, confeſſes it ſtill more expreſsly. 'Latum, ſays he (39), 'ut Antonius Juſtinianus .... ad Maximilianum recta 'contenderet; & cum illo, ſi poſſet, pacem quantumvis duris conditionibus faceret: Tergeſtéque oppidum, '& Portum Naonis, reliquaque municipia, quæ reſp. 'ex ejus ditione ſuperiore anno ceperat, Senatum ei 'paratum eſſe reſtituere: ac quæ oppida ex Romanorum imperatorum ditione in Carnis, & Gallia, & Venetia reſp. poſſideret, ea ſe omnia illi tanquam accepta relaturum nuntiaret. —— It was decreed, that 'Antony Juſtiniani .... ſhould go directly to Maximilian, and make peace with him, if poſſible, upon any 'conditions, how hard ſoever; and inform him that the 'ſenate was ready to reſtore the city of Tergeſte, the 'harbour of Naon, and the other towns, which the republic had taken from him the year before, and to deliver up to him the imperial towns, which ſhe poſſeſſed 'in Carinthia, France, and the territories of Venice.' Take notice, that he affirms, that Antonio Juſtiniani was ſent to the emperor, as ſoon as the Venetians heard of the victory obtained by the French. Perhaps Guicciardin ſaw a copy of the ſpeech, which Juſtiniani had prepared. This cannot juſtify him; for if it be true, that the embaſſador had no audience, his copy could not be produced as a diſcourſe actually made before the emperor. The hiſtorians were very bold as to the ſpeeches mentioned by them; they forged them, and yet they would have the world to believe, that they had been actually delivered. Read, in Jovius, the ſpeech ſpoken by the embaſſador of the duke of Milan to Charles VIII, to perſuade him to make an expedition into Italy: read it alſo in Guicciardin, and you will find that thoſe two pieces are not alike (40). The diſcourſe, which the doge Loredano made to the ſenate, in order to ſend 200 noble Venetians to the defence of Padua, is mentioned by Guicciardin quite otherwiſe than it is by Mocenigo and Juſtiniani, hiſtorians of Venice (41).

[L] Guicciardin wrote ſome other books.] I reduce them to two; one of which is intituled, Conſigli aurei, and the other, Auvertimenti Politici. Ghilini mentions only thoſe two books (42). There are ſome other books aſcribed to Guicciardin in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, viz. Piu Conſigli e Auvertimenti in materia di re publica e di privata, printed at Paris in 1576, in 4to. I Precetti e Sententie in materia di Stato, printed at Antwerp in 1585, in 4to. Auvertimenti Politici, printed at Venice in 1583, in 4to. Hypomneſes Poëticæ. Theſe are the titles we find in the Bodleian catalogue, without being told they are only different editions of the ſame books. The bookſellers occaſion this confuſion by the liberty they take to put different titles to one and the ſame book. Some will be apt to think, that Guiccardin publiſhed the rules of poetry, becauſe the catalogue of the Bodleian library aſcribes to him Hypomneſes Poëticæ. But it is a fault of impreſſion; it ſhould be Hypomneſes Politicæ; for ſo the Latin tranſlator of Guicciardin's Auvertimenti Politici intituled his tranſlation. Theſe works of Guicciardin, tranſlated into French by Charles de Chantecler (43), were printed at Paris in 1577, in 8vo, with this title, Pluſieurs Advis & Conſeils tant pour les affaires d'eſtat que privez. There is a great miſtake in the catalogue of Thuanus's library. Two books, written by Lewis Guicciardin, are aſcribed there (44) to Francis Guicciardin his uncle; one of them is intituled, Raccolta de i detti & fatti notabili coſi gravi come piacevoli; and the other, Hore di Ricreationi. That miſtake implies an abſurdity; for Guicciardin the uncle was ſo far from being a facetious man, that he never uſed any jeſt. He was extremely grave and ſevere. 'Fuit indignationi proclivior, oriſque ductu licet ſuavi, 'tamen ſevero & gravi genioque ſupra modum ſalſæ 'urbanitatis dicteriis repugnante, quorum nullum in 'tota vita ipſi unquam excidiſſe perhibent quidam '(45).' An Italian hiſtory, Urbis Haliæ, is aſcribed to him in the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

[M] LEWIS GUICCIARDIN his nephew ſignalized himſelf in the common-wealth of learning.] Beſides the two books I have juſt now mentioned, he publiſhed Commentarii delle coſe più memorabili ſeguite in Europa, ſpecialmente in queſti Paeſi baſſi dalla pace di Cambrai del M. D. XXIX inſino a tutto l'Anno M. D. L. I have the edition printed at Venice, appreſſo Domenico Farri 1566 in 4to. The author dedicates that book to the grand duke of Florence: his epiſtle dedicatory is dated at Antwerp, the firſt of January 1565. That hiſtory was tranſlated into Latin (46), and followed ſoon after by the Deſcrizione di tutti i Paeſi baſſi, altrimenti detti Germania inferiore. That deſcription of the Netherlands is a very good book: the author was a long time in that country, and took great pains to be informed of every thing, and viſited the places as much as he could, in order to ſay nothing but what he was ſure of. He publiſhed three editions of that book; the laſt is of the year 1587, and exceeds the ſecond, as much as the ſecond exceeds the firſt. That book was tranſlated into French by Belleforet, and into Latin by John Brant, a ſenator of Antwerp, and by Regnier Vitellius. Brant's tranſlation was never printed; the author ſuppreſſed it, being prevented by others (47). Ghilini knew ſomething of it: but his account is ſtrangely confuſed. Theſe are his words: Reynero Vitellio, e avanti di lui Giovanni Branzio Senatore di Anverza, che dal Vitellio fu prevenuto la traduſſero dal Franceſe nel Latino (48). Theſe words are very faulty: firſt, they ſignify, that Brant's tranſlation was publiſhed; for when an author mentions a book, without ſaying, that it was never printed, he gives us to underſtand that it was made public. This falſity is attended with a ſtrange piece of nonſenſe. Ghilini ſays, that Brant tranſlated that book before Vitellius, and was prevented by Vitellius: theſe things are inconſiſtent, when an author forgets, as Ghilini does, to diſtinguiſh the compoſition from the impreſſion. Nay, it is to be obſerved, that Valerius Andreas does not ſay, that John Brant made a tranſlation of that book before Vitellius did the ſame: he only ſays, that he was prevented as to the impreſſion (49). Laſtly, it is not true, that Vitellius and Brant tranſlated that Book from the French tranſlation. Vitellius ſays in the title page of his verſion (50), that he made it from the Italian; and Valerias Andreas affirms the ſame with reſpect to Brant. I have quoted his words. Ghilini committed all thoſe faults, becauſe he blindly followed Swertius (51). Pocciantio (52) ſays, that Guicciardin underſtood Greek and Latin, and mathematics, and was a good antiquarian. Thuanus does very much commend the deſcription of the Low-Countries, and mentions a remarkable thing, viz. that the duke of Alva cauſed Lewis Guicciardin to be impriſoned, for writing a book, containing the reaſons why Lent ſhould be ſuppreſſed. Which ſhews the fierceneſs and the enormous pride of that duke; for Guicciardin wrote that book by his order; but, but, becauſe he himſelf did not give his copy to the duke, and that haughty Spaniard received it from the hands of a third perſon, he fell into a violent paſſion againſt the author, and cauſed him to be ſhamefully impriſoned. Guicciardin was betrayed by a man, who, deſigning to ingratiate himſelf by his diligence, preſented the manuſcript he had been intruſted with. ‘ In carcerem ignominioſum ob id conjectus, quod Albanus poſtea excuſavit, cùm diſceret, non tàm ob conſilium optimo viro ſuccenſere, quam quod illud juſſu ſuo; nam fatebatur, cùm ſcriptis mandaſſet, non per ipſum ſcriptorem, ſed per alias manus in ſuas præpoſtera perfidi hominis gratiam ſuam aucupantis diligentia illud perveniſſet (53).’ He died at Antwerp the twenty ſecond of March, 1589, aged ſixty ſix years.

GUICHENON (Samuel), advocate at Bourg in Breſſe, deſerves an illuſtrious place among the hiſtoriographers of the XVIIth century. He was born at Mâcon. He publiſhed the hiſtory of Breſſe, in 1650, and then he ſet about the Genealogical Hiſtory of the houſe of Savoy, and had it printed at Lyons in the year 1660, in two large folios. He publiſhed, in the ſame year, a Latin book, intituled, Bibliotheca Sebuſiana [A]. Thoſe three works are very good in their kind, and made him worthy of the rewards beſtowed upon him (a). Le Laboureur owns it, but in ſuch a manner, as ſeems to reflect upon the court of France for their ingratitude towards their hiſtoriographers [B]. He had been a Proteſtant, and he died a Roman Catholic, the eighth of September, 1664. He has been taxed with plagiariſm [C].

I have been accuſed of believing, without any grounds, that he had been an Huguenot. A confutation of this cenſure appeared in the Memoires de Trevoux, for January 1703 (b); but I am going to ſay ſomething ſtronger than all that: I ſhall cite a miniſter, who has publickly upbraided Guichenon with abjuring the reformed religion. He makes uſe of very harſh expreſſions [D]; whence we may gather that he was well aſſured of the truth of what he advances.

(a) His titles run thus, Lord of Paineſſuyt, Counſellor and Hiſtoriographer to the King and his Royal Highneſs, Count Palatine, Knight of the Empire, and of the Sacred Order of St Maurice and St Lazarus.

(b) Of the edition of Amſterdam, pag. 59.

[A] He publiſhed a Latin book, intituled, Bibliotheca Sebuſiana.] It is a book in 4to, containing 448 pages, printed at Lyons. I ſhall ſet down the whole title, that the reader may know what it treats of. Bibliotheca Sebuſiana, ſive variarum chartarum, diplomatum, fundationum, privilegiorum, donationum & immunitatum à ſummis Pontificibus, Imperatoribus, Regibus, Ducibus, Marchionibus, Comitibus, & Proceribus, Eccleſiis, Monaſteriis & aliis locis aut perſonis conceſſarum nuſquam antea editarum, miſcellæ Centuriæ II. Ex Archivis Regiis, Monaſteriorum tabulariis & codicibus manuſcriptis ad hiſtoriæ lucem collegit, & ad locorum explicationem & familiarum illuſtrium cognitionem notis illuſtravit S. Guichenon, Dominus de Paineſſuyt, Regi à Conſiliis, Franciæ, Sabaudiæ, & Dombarum Hiſtoriographus, Eques auratus & Comes Palatinus, Sacræ Religionis SS. Mauritii & Lazari miles.

[B] Mr le Laboureur . . . . . ſeems to reflect upon the court of France, for their ingratitude towards their hiſtoriographers.] Theſe are le Laboureur's words. ‘ Whilſt ſhe (1) enlarges their dominions by her victories, ſhe takes care to have the genealogical hiſtory of the dukes of Savoy written by the Sieur Guichenon. The name of the author is ſufficient to ſhew, that ſhe has made a good choice, and to give a good opinion of that work, which is now (2) in the preſs. M. Guichenon has already illuſtrated Breſſe with an excellent collection of the antiquities of that country, and with the hiſtory of it's ancient lords and nobility. If that princeſs was not the daughter of the great Henry IV, I ſhould be aſhamed for our nation, to ſay, that ſhe made it appear to him, by the honours he received from her, whilſt he was about that work, that the affection of ſovereigns is not ſuited to the extent of their dominions; and that the character of hiſtoriographer of Savoy is now the moſt glorious and happy in the world (3).

[C] He has been taxed with plagiariſm.] That accuſation is contained in theſe words of Varillas. ‘ I ſpeak, in the eleventh book, of the pretenſions of the duke of Savoy, and of the biſhop of Geneva, to the town of that name; and I confeſs Mr Guichenon's hiſtory has been of good uſe to me. Not but that I find this author too much addicted to the houſe of Savoy, to which he was born a ſubject; but, becauſe that inclination did not prevent his reading all the printed books and manuſcripts relating to his work, I have found ſome fragments in it, which I had not ſeen before. However, I am obliged out of ſincerity, to take notice of one of his faults, which ſeems to me ſo groſs, that I wonder no body has reproved him for it. He finds fault with William Paradin in his preface, for having taken the greateſt part of his hiſtory of Savoy from the ancient chronicle of that houſe, and from the hiſtory of Jerome Champier, without ever quoting either of them; and yet I have found out that Guichenon is guilty of the ſame ingratitude. Nani's hiſtory is well known, and it is acknowledged, that few hiſtorians of our age come near him in politeneſs and ſubtilty. Any one, who compares it with Guichenon's account of the laſt dukes of Savoy, will find, that he inſerted it word for word, in his laſt volume, without mentioning the hiſtorian he tranſcribed (4).’

(4) Varillas, preface to the third volume of his Hiſtory of Hereſy.

[D] A miniſter . . . . has publickly reproached Guichenon with having abjured the reformed religion. He makes uſe of very harſh expreſſions.] Conſider only the parentheſis of the paſſage I am going to copy. ‘ Guichenon . . . has juſt publiſhed a large hiſtory in three great volumes in folio, in which he evidently falſifies, againſt his knowledge and conſcience, all that relates to the right, the innocence, and the conduct of theſe Vaudois, both in general and in particular; and he is not aſhamed to employ his mercenary pen in giving the lie, both to the truth of the maſſacres of the year 1665, and to whatever may tend to the juſtification of thoſe good Chriſtians, and in repreſenting the cruelty and perfidy of their enemies as acts of great forbearance and mildneſs (WHICH I THINK NO STRANGE THING IN A RENEGADE, WHO HAS APOSTATISED FROM THE KNOWN TRUTH, AND GONE OVER TO THE INTERESTS OF LYING) (5).’ This is what John Leger, miniſter and moderator of the churches of the Valleys has obſerved in his preface. Let us ſee what he ſays in the body of the book, when he endeavours to juſtify his uncle Antony Leger, whom Guichenon repreſents as a factious ſpirit, and capable of diverſe crimes. ‘ I might confute this Guichenon, only by ſaying, that he was himſelf born and bred up in the reformed religion, and that he went through part of his ſtudies with the abovementioned Leger, whoſe conſtant companion he was, as I learned from the ſaid Leger's own mouth, but that afterwards, in order to arrive at the honours he now enjoys, he turned his coat, and denied the known truth, to embrace the maſs, taking for his device the Italian proverb, Guelfo io fui, e Gibbelin m'appello, à chi più mi darà volterò il mantello. For no one doubts, that he, who ſells his ſoul for bread, and his birthright for a meſs of pottage, can let out his tongue and pen to ſay and write, as thoſe, who hire him, direct. And I am poſitive, that he did not dare to ſet down one line in his book, which had not been ſifted and re-ſifted at Turin, and that he could not refuſe to inſert in it all the anſwers of the oracles of the marquis de Pianeſſo, and of the preſident Truquis (6): and I have by me proofs of it (7).’

He refutes him, in another place (8), in relation to two facts, and obſerves again, that he is one, who has betrayed religion, and renounced the known truth for worldly advantages.

GUIGNARD (John), a Jeſuit, native of Chartres (a), and profeſſor of divinity in the college of Clermont (b), was executed at Paris, the ſeventh of January 1595, for high-treaſon. He was convicted of having written a book full of rebellion and rage againſt Henry III and Henry IV [A]: and, as the circumſtances of the time required, that a doctrine, which had not long before expoſed the life of the king to the wicked attempt of John Chaſtel, ſhould be puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, it was not thought proper to ſhew any favour to this Jeſuit. He obſtinately refuſed to make the amende honorable; and he perſiſted to his death in not acknowledging Henry IV for king of France [B]. He has been extolled as a martyr by the apologiſt of John Chaſtel [C]. We ſhall ſee what the Jeſuits anſwered, when they were reproached with [A] He was convicted of having written a book full of of rebellion and rage againſt Henry III and Henry IV.] This is the way how they came to know it. "Whilſt the parliament was carrying on the proceſs againſt John Chaſtel, ſome of them, deputed for that purpoſe, went to the college of Clermont, and ſeized on ſeveral papers, among which was found a book written in Guignard the Jeſuit's own hand, containing ſeveral propoſitions and means to prove, that it was lawful to kill the king, with ſeveral inductions for the murther likewiſe of his ſucceſſor. Here are ſome of them extracted from the ſaid book, which are yet extant in the rolls of the court (1).' The author of the Anti-Coton afterwards produces ſome extracts of that book; but, as Victor Cayet has given them more at large, I chooſe to make uſe of his narrative upon this occaſion. 'As to Guignard, he could not deny, that he wrote the nine following propoſitions, to wit,

'I. That in the year 1572, on St Bartholomew's-day, if they had bled the royal vein, we ſhould not have fallen out of the frying-pan into the fire, as we experience: But quicquid delirant Reges; by being ſparing of blood, they have involved France in fire and blood, & in caput reciderunt mala.

'II. That the cruel Nero was ſlain by a Clement, and the pretended monk diſpatched by the hand of a true monk.

'III. Shall we call a Nero Sardanapalus of France, a Fox of Bearne, a Lyon of Portugal, a She-wolf of England, a Griffin of Sweden, and a Hog of Saxony.

'IV. Think that he ſaw in vain three kings, if kings they may be called, the late tyrant, he of Bearne, and this pretended monarch of Portugal D. Antonio.

'V. That the fineſt anagram, that ever was, on the name of the deceaſed tyrant, was that, by which it was ſaid, O the baſe Herod.

'VI. That the heroic action performed by James Clement, as a gift of the HOLY GHOST, ſo called by our divines, has been juſtly extolled by the late prior of the Jacobins, Burgoign, confeſſor and martyr, by ſeveral reaſons, as well at Paris, where I was an ear-witneſs of them, when he taught the book of Judith, as before that fine parliament of Tours: and this the ſaid Burgoign, which is more, ſealed with his own blood, and conſecrated by his death; and we muſt not believe what the enemies report, that with his laſt breath he diſapproved this action as deteſtable.

'VII. That the crown of France might and ought to be transferred to another family than that of Bourbon.

'VIII. That he of Bearne, though he were converted to the Catholic faith, would be treated more mildly than he deſerved, if he were preſented with a monkiſh crown in ſome well-reformed convent, there to do penance for the many evils he has done to France, and to thank GOD for giving him the grace to know himſelf before death.

'IX. That if he cannot be depoſed without war, let war be made on him: that if war cannot be made on him, let him be aſſaſſinated (2).'

[B] He obſtinately refuſed to make the amende honorable, and perſiſted to his death in not acknowledging Henry IV for king of France.] Let us give the ſequel of Cayet's narrative. 'The parliament having ſeen theſe writings, Guignard the author, being interrogated concerning them, acknowledged that he had compoſed and written them with his own hand; and for that he was condemned by the court * to make the amende honorable, naked to his ſhirt, with a rope about his neck, before the principal gate of the church of Paris, and there, being on his knees, and holding a lighted torch of wax, of the weight of two pounds, in his hands, to ſay and declare, that wickedly, traytorouſly, and againſt the truth, he had written that the late king was juſtly killed by James Clement, and that, if the reigning did not die in war, he ought to be aſſaſſinated: of which he repented, and aſked pardon of GOD, the king, and juſtice. This done, to be led and conducted to the Greve, to be hanged and ſtrangled on a gibbet to be there erected for that purpoſe, and afterwards his dead body to be burnt to aſhes in a fire, which ſhould be made at the foot of the ſaid gibbet. This decree was put in execution the ſeventh of January, and the ſaid Guignard was hanged and burnt at the Greve. As they were conducting him before the church of Noſtre-Dame, there to make the amende honorable, being naked to his ſhirt, and having the torch in his hand, he aſked the Sieur Rapin, lieutenant of the ſhort robe, what he muſt do: he told him, that he muſt aſk pardon of GOD and the king, repeating what the regiſter ſhould ſay to him. I will aſk GOD's pardon, ſaid he, with all my heart; but why the king's? You have offended him, ſaid Rapin to him, in that you have written againſt him: Guignard replied; what I wrote thereupon was before Paris ſubmitted to him. What you ſay, is not true, ſaid Rapin to him, and, though it were, you have no right to the pardon and general indemnity, granted by the king to his ſubjects of Paris after their ſubmiſſion, ſince you were not ignorant, that it was ſtrictly commanded to burn ſuch writings, on pain of death: by keeping them contrary to theſe decrees, you have therefore offended both him and the public. After diſputing the matter above a quarter of an hour, notwithſtanding all the reaſons and menaces of the ſaid Sieur Rapin, Guignard refuſed to make the amende honorable, and was carried to execution without making it (3).'

It is plain, that in ſaying he had not offended the king, he ſuppoſed that Henry IV was not king. We are going to ſee, that he is commended for entertaining this opinion, and for never renouncing it.

[C] He has been extolled as a martyr by the apologiſt of John Chaſtel.] The tenth chapter of the fifth part of the apology of that villain is intituled The martyrdom of Father Guynard juſtified in every point. The author declares him happy in dying 'as one, who kept himſelf unſhaken on the baſis and ſtrength of the goſpel ſtone. That is to ſay, of the obedience, and for the obedience of the church (4). The conſtancy of this perſon †, to his laſt breath, (adds he (5), in refuſing to acknowledge for king, him whom the church has condemned, and for lawful judges, thoſe who are ſeparated from the church, and judge contrary to the church: and refuſing to repeat the clauſes and words, preſcribed by the Arrêt, to make the amende honorable: and inſiſting upon the truth, both of what he had preached, and of what he had laid down in his memoirs (for which reaſon his execution was haſtened, and on the ſpot, and in his ſhirt, without carrying him back to priſon), all which entirely juſtifies the martyrdom, having no other foundation than the pure Catholic truth, maintained to death incluſively, the contrary of which is hereſy: this will ſerve as a witneſs, to make out their proceſs one day, to chain them hand and foot, to pronounce their ſentence, and to condemn them definitively, and by an irrevocable judgment, as this glory is to all his ſaints ⸸. When he, who guards the eternal truth ‡, who keeps the books of the eternal regiſter, in which every thing is written, ſhall render judgment to thoſe, who ſuffer injury *.

with giving him a place in their martyrology [D]. They denied the fact; and as to what regards his puniſhment, they employed ſeveral turns of wit, and they endeavoured to extenuate the outrageouſneſs of his tenets [E], and to excuſe him by alledging the great

[D] We ſhall ſee what the Jeſuits anſwered, when they were reproached with giving him a place in their martyrology.] Let us begin with quoting a paſſage of the Anti-Coton (6): 'The reader may aſk, if he pleaſes, if there ever was a Jeſuit, who has condemned this Guignard of treaſon and perfidy. On the contrary, Richeome, in his apology, excuſes him as much as he can; ſaying, that Guignard treated the abovementioned propoſitions, by way of a diſpute in divinity. And in this we agree; for thus, I ſay, that to kill the king, has always been one of the reſolutions of the divinity of the Jeſuits. If any Jeſuit, half thro' force, and half thro' ſhame, condemns him, it is for not having been diſcreet enough, or for having taken a wrong time, or for ſome ſuch reaſon. This appears by the Jeſuits having put Guignard in the catalogue of their martyrs, which they publiſhed at Rome, in two forms, in one of which Guignard is, in the other not, that there might be copies, which might be ſold in France without danger. Thus the Jeſuit Bonarſcius, in the eighth chapter of his Amphitheatre, extols Guignard to the ſkies, tho' without naming him, for fear of offending our king, always plainly enough, that we may diſcover him in theſe words: ſhall I ſay nothing of you, O! bright ſtar of heaven and earth, and laſt expiation of the houſe, which after this ought to ſuffer nothing more? no time ſhall eraſe the memory of your death: then he adds, all France will join in my wiſhes ††: This can only agree with Guignard, who was a French Jeſuit, and who was the laſt Jeſuit, that ſuffered puniſhment in France.' Father Coton replied, among other things (7), that no Jeſuit had 'diſapproved the judgment of the court, and that every one of them had endeavoured to perſuade himſelf, that Guignard had been juſtly condemned; that all that is added to it is not equally certain, and that many things muſt be imputed to licentious tongues, and the injuſtice of the time (8); that if no Jeſuit has condemned Guignard of treaſon and perfidy, it is becauſe none of them are thoroughly acquainted with the proceſs.' I have ſeen (continues he) ſeveral catalogues of Jeſuit martyrs, 'but not one in which is Guignard; and yet I have ſeen ſome printed at Rome. And, if he appear as ſuch in prints made elſewhere, who knows not the liberty, which painters and poets give themſelves?' He denies that the paſſage of Bonarſcius relates to Guignard; but it is to deny an almoſt indiſputable fact. Another apologiſt was not ſo peremptory; he was contented to evade the queſtion. Thus he replied to the author of the Anti-Coton: 'You are angry, that Clarus Bonarſcius, in his Amphitheatrum, praiſes this father, and that he calls him a ſhining ſtar in heaven, how do you know, that he ſpeaks of this father, ſince he does not name him? Do you gueſs ſo, becauſe he was the laſt that was executed in France; he is likewiſe the firſt. But, ſuppoſing your conjecture to be right, why are you angry, that he extols this father as a ſaint (9)? . . . . . Now accuſe, and complain of Clarus as as much as you will, you will not hinder me from commending him for this praiſe, and from praiſing, with him, this father, becauſe he was a great divine and did honour to France, his country which you diſhonour; and I believe, with the ſame Clarus, that he is in heaven, if not in the liſt of martyrs, at leaſt in the number of the ſaints: not becauſe he was condemned to death, but for having forſaken the vanity of the world to ſerve God and the public in religion, to the utmoſt of his abilities: for having lived as a true Religious many years; for having taught the catholic faith, and oppoſed hereſy which you defend under the cover of the ſtate; laſtly, for having patiently ſuffered all the torments of death, and the ſhame of puniſhment, and given up his ſoul as a good and firm Catholic (10).' He had expreſſed himſelf as follows, p. 181. 'You take exceptions at our placing the ſaid father in the liſt of martyrs: who told you ſo, except the ſpirit of lying, which directs your pen? for, among the many thouſand perſons of credit, who have read this catalogue, not one has found what you pretend to diſcover in it: if you have not ſeen this catalogue, which is moſt probable, why do you ſpeak ſo poſitively of a thing unknown to you? have you ſo little regard for your honour to take all falſe reports for truth, and to give them as matters of fact, and become the ſubject of contempt and laughter thinking to prejudice the Jeſuits?' The Jeſuit Eudæmon Johannes, replying to the Anti-Coton, denies, that Guignard was placed in the martyrology of the Jeſuits, and obſerves that the prints of their martyrs were made and ſold by perſons, who only aimed at profit, and who had no dependance on the Jeſuits (11). 'Verebaris nimirum, ne prolatis Martyrum noſtrorum Catalogis, impudentiſſimi mendacii convincerere, quæ te cauſa impulit, ut frigidam hanc Catalogorum varietatem dignam planè ſtupore iſto animi ſomniaris. Nam neque mendacium tegis, & vecordiam tuam prodis: Martyrum enim noſtrorum effigies non à nobis, ſed ab exteris lucri ſui cauſa typis excuſæ, venales per orbem palam expoſitæ ab iis ſunt, ut in noſtra poteſtate nullo modo fuerit quis Martyrum Catalogus, aut à Gallis emeretur, aut in Galliam ab emptoribus importaretur. Neque vero ita ſtolidos quiſquam Jeſuitas exiſtimaturus eſt, ut cum rem eam aggrederentur, non viderent fieri non poſſe, ne Gignardus quoque cum cæteris martyribus vel ab amicis, vel ab inimicis in Galliam mitteretur. Mirum vero eſt, ſi cum utriuſque generis Catalogi venderentur, non niſi unus in Galliam, iſque ad tuas unius manus venerit, in quo Gignardus legeretur, quem ſi apud te habes, profer ſodes, ſi non habes indica, apud quem inveniri poſſit. Nam nos quidem Romæ nunquam Gignardum adſcriptum Societatis Martyribus vidimus: numquam in Martyres retulimus. —— No doubt, you were afraid, if we produced the catalogue of our martyrs, of being caught in a lye, which put you upon inventing this nonſenſical variety of catalogues. For you betray both the lye, and your own folly. For the prints of our martyrs, engraved, not by our ſelves, but by foreigners, for the ſake of gain, are ſold by them all over the world, ſo that it is not in our power what catalogue of martyrs ſhall be bought by Frenchmen, or imported into France by the buyers. Nor would any one think the Jeſuits ſuch fools, as to think they can prevent Guignard being ſent, with the reſt of the martyrs into France, either by friends, or enemies. And it is ſtrange, that, when catalogues of both kinds are ſold, but one ſhould come into France, and that into your hands, in which Guignard appears; which if you have, pray, produce it; if not, tell us where we may find it. For we at Rome never ſaw Guignard in the liſt of martyrs of the ſociety nor ever put him there.

[E] They endeavoured to extenuate the outrageouſneſs of his tenets.] See in the remark [A] the doctrine of Guignard. It is abominable. In 1602, a little book was publiſhed, intituled The free and true addreſs to the King, on the re-eſtabliſhment of the Jeſuits, deſired of him. We find in it, among other things, that, 'if the Pope can lay his hand on the SCEPTRE and temporalities of kings, as the Jeſuits affirm, it remains without difficulty, that, when his holineſs excommunicates a king, he is ipſo facto deprived, he becomes a private perſon, and is no longer a king; and if he continues reſolved to reign, he is a tyrant. Whoever allows the firſt propoſition, muſt grant the latter. Now the book, written by John Guignard the Jeſuit, and which he acknowledged in full parliament, the two chambers being aſſembled, contained theſe two propoſitions outrageouſly written: for among other things there was, that the Nero, &c. . . . . THAT IF HE OF BEARNE COULD NOT BE DEPOSED WITHOUT WAR, WAR MUST BE WAGED: THAT IF WAR CANNOT BE WAGED, HE MUST BE ASSASSINATED. Your majeſty may ſee the original; this well deſerves it (12).' The Jeſuits replied, by the pen of Richeome, as follows (13). 'Sire, I will not here accuſe any one, nor plead for this deceaſed, he is out of the reach of an earthly tribunal, nor call for vengeance, any more than he does, whom I believe to be praying in heaven for his enemies. I only ſay, that your majeſty has pardoned great number of perſons, who at that time held the ſame maxims. It is certain, the kingdom

'pardoned whatever paſſed of this kind, and that prudently and royally, in imitation of the emperor Octavian ⸸⸸, who ordered all inſtruments concerning debts, which occaſioned calumnies and quarrels, to be burned; and of the emperor Conſtantine the Great ‡‡ who likewiſe condemned to the flames contentious libels. And certainly, if it had been neceſſary to make enquiry after all thoſe of the League, who had written and ſpoken, there would have been no end of the troubles and enmities: and there were at that time a thouſand and a thouſand Frenchmen who had by them worſe writings, than that which this perſon here counterfeits and produces, who nevertheleſs have continued your very faithful ſervants and ſubjects: why then does he alledge this writing againſt the law of Oblivion, and againſt one deceaſed. If he had been guilty of a puniſhable fault, has it not been ſufficiently expiated by the puniſhment of death? ought the proceſs to be revived, and ſentence again paſſed, on one, who has been executed eight years ſince? I ſay farther, that this piece  was not written by that divine, but is an invention of his adverſary.' Obſerve well, that they pretended, that the writing of John Guignard was not ſuch as their adverſaries would have it to be. The obſervations of Richeome (14), to prove this, are the weakeſt imaginable; but if Henry IV, on this plea of falſification, did not demand to ſee the original, and if he did not give order, that the enemies of the Jeſuits ſhould prove inconteſtably, that the propoſitions, which they attributed to Guignard, were really in his book, he was guilty of extreme negligence, or of a piece of policy, which might paſs for fear. However it be, the author of the Anti-Coton, who knew, without doubt, that the Jeſuits had ſtiffly denied what was given out concerning the manuſcript of their brother, continued to object to them the ſame propoſitions, as the free and true addreſs, and to ſay, that they were extracted out of Guignard's manuſcript, which was ſtill extant in the rolls of the court (15). He was anſwered, that what he ſaid was one of thoſe things, which muſt be aſcribed to licentious tongues, and the injury of the times, and that it was denied, that the words, if war cannot be waged, he muſt be aſſaſſinated, are to be found in the court rolls, in which words nevertheleſs lies the ſting of the ſcorpion (16). Theſe words, replied another to him (17), contain the poiſon of your calumny; but they are meer words and lies; for nothing of them appears in the Regiſter. Theſe anſwers are pitiful; for the author of the Anti-Coton had not ſaid, that theſe words were found in the regiſter of the parliament, but in the manuſcript, which was preſerved in the rolls. Therefore, to give any thing of a ſolid anſwer they ſhould have maintained to him, that they were not in this manuſcript. But this is what the Jeſuits, who have refuted the Anti-Coton, never ventured to maintain, and thus, we may very juſtly believe, that this propoſition is in the writing of Father Guignard. Several reaſons convince me of it.

I. In the firſt place, the Arrêt of parliament expreſſes (18), that, conſidering 'the criminal proceſs ..... made againſt John Guignard .... for having been found poſſeſſed of ſeveral books, containing, among other things, approbations of the moſt cruel and inhuman parricide of the late king, whom God abſolve, AND INDUCTIONS FOR THE MURTHER OF THE KING NOW REIGNING. . . . The court has declared and does declare the ſaid Guignard attainted and convicted of high-treaſon, and of having compoſed and written the ſaid books, containing ſeveral falſe and ſeditious means to prove, that it was lawful to commit the ſaid parricide, AND THAT IT WAS RIGHT TO KILL KING HENRY IV, NOW REIGNING. There is no doubt, but that the words of the Arrêt, which are here in capitals, are grounded on thoſe, which, according to the author of the Anti-Coton, were contained in Guignard's book.

II. Beſides this, who can doubt, that Thuanus, preſident of the parliament of Paris, had read this Jeſuit's book? now he, as well as a great many other authors, affirms, that the words in queſtion are found in it (19).

III. In the third place, the Jeſuits have never proved, that the propoſitions, which were objected to them as taken from this manuſcript, are not to be found in it. They have only denied, that the laſt is in the parliament rolls, which was not the thing in queſtion and, as to the others, they have alledged but weak probabilities. They have never boaſted, that they have ſeen the book; ſo that they have ſaid nothing to the purpoſe, and have not offered the king, as their adverſaries do, to ſhew him this or that in the manuſcript preſerved in the regiſter of parliament. If they could have hoped to convict their enemies of calumny, they would have deſired of the king or parliament, that this book ſhould be given to be examined in their preſence by ſuch commiſſaries as he ſhould chuſe. Is it not very certain, that, not having taken this ſtep, they have given to underſtand, that they diſtruſted the book, and that, if they treated the propoſitions alledged by their adverſaries, as fictitious, it was only acting like lawyers? It is well known that pleaders treat as fictitious, whatever makes againſt them as long as ever they can. I know not whether the adverſaries of the Jeſuits have taken the ſtep I ſpeak of, I mean, of petitioning the parliament to name commiſſaries to examine the manuſcript in the preſence of the parties concerned. A good verbal proceſs thereupon would have for ever ſtopped the mouth of the moſt obſtinate caviller. But, having none of theſe formalities, we have ſufficient reaſon to believe, that Guignard had inſerted in his treatiſe the propoſitions aſcribed to him.

This being ſo, one cannot but be ſurpriſed at the falſe idea which his apologiſts give of it. Let us quote Richeome. 'What was found in John Guignard's, chamber, ſays he (20), and on which he was condemned to death, was a queſtion, which he had formerly treated on, when he read divinity which was: whether it be lawful to kill a tyrant; a queſtion, which all the canoniſts and moral philoſophers put in their diſcourſes, and which Bodin among the moderns, has diſcuſſed in his republic.' Richeome informs us elſewhere (21), that Henry IV was ſatisfied with this anſwer. This prince, then, muſt have been eaſily ſatisfied; for it was a very bad one, ſince it repreſents in the moſt unfaithful manner the character of John Guignard's book. We have ſeen above (22) the reflexion, which was made on this paſſage of Richeome by the author of the Anti-Coton. It does not point out the defect which is to be found in the words of this Jeſuit, and only aims at improving an opportunity of laſhing the whole ſociety of the Jeſuits. So true it is, that there are thoſe, who take more pleaſure in ſatirizing a whole body, than in refuting one member of it in form.

The Jeſuit Eudæmon Johannes has improved upon Richeome; for he has ſaid, that Guignard only diſputed for and againſt the theological queſtion, whether it be lawful to take away the life of tyrants; and he adds, that this did not render him more worthy of death, than other divines, who exerciſe themſelves, not only on this queſtion, but on that likewiſe of the exiſtence of God (23): Theologica quæſtione in utramque partem ſcripta ſupplicium non magis meritus eſt, quam S. Thomas, quam reliqui Theologi, qui non modo de Tyrannorum nece, ſed de ipſa etiam Dei exiſtentia, in utramque partem diſputare ſoliti ſunt. A moſt horrible miſrepreſentation of the ſtate of things, ſince Guignard was not contented to examine a problem, as a reporter of reaſons for and againſt; but he took the affirmative, and approved by name the aſſaſſination of Henry III, and every the like action which ſhould be executed on Henry IV.

Father Gretſer inſerted in one of his books (24) an account of the tryal of John Chaſtel, in which the book of Father Guignard is deſcribed as a mere collection of various paſſages concerning the theſis, whether private men may take away the lives of tyrants. He adds that, in the way of narrative, Guignard had ſpoken of the Jacobin, who aſſaſſinated Henry III, and that he declared on the ſcaffold, that this was the true character of his book, and that he had not written one word in it, which might offend the king (25): 'In cubiculo P. Johannis Guignardi Theologiæ Profeſſoris, perbrevis Tractatus repertus eſt, quem ipſe ante annos quatuor vel quinque conſcripſerat, quo illa Quæſtio continebatur à Doctoribus in Scholis paſſim tractata & agitata: Utrum Tyrannum qui ſe palàm hoſtem gerit Reipublicæ li-

Regem ibi neque verbulo læſum aut offenſum. Quæ Patris verba omnem circumſtantem Populum in magnam commiſerationem inflexerunt. —— In the bed-chamber of Father John Guignard profeſſor of divinity, was found a ſmall treatiſe, which he had written four or five years before, in which was contained that queſtion, every where handled and diſcuſſed by the doctors in the ſchoools; whether a private man may kill a tyrant, who is an open enemy to the ſtate? the arguments on which queſtion, which are alledged by various authors on both ſides, for diſcuſſing and enquiring into the truth, are there likewiſe collected. Among others, there was a narrative of what Father Clement, a dominical monk; had attempted againſt Henry III. When he ſaw the gallows at a diſtance, to which he approached, he piouſly and chearfully ſaluted it, after the example, and in the words, of St Andrew the Apoſtle; he mounted the ladder with a chearful mind and countenance, from whence he harangued the croud of ſpectators round him: he told them, that the ſole reaſon of his ſuffering this kind of death, was, that, four or five years before, he had written a ſhort treatiſe, with no ill deſign, nor to the detriment of any one, in which he had collected the opinions and ſentiments of the holy fathers, and of various authors, concerning this queſtion, whether it was lawful for a private man to kill a manifeſt tyrant: that he had never printed that treatiſe, nor ſuffered it to go into the hands of any perſon. That he had not offended the king by the leaſt word. Which ſpeech of the father greatly inclined the ſurrounding audience to pity.’

What diſguiſes, or rather what impoſtures? But obſerve, that, by the help of an equivocation, he might pretend, that he had ſaid nothing, which might offend the king; for he did not acknowledge Henry IV for king.

Let us quote a very long paſſage of a book, which is ſeldom to be met with. This may ſerve to excuſe the length of the citation, without reckoning, that this paſſage will inform us, I. that Guignard had preached the ſame doctrine, which he had maintained in his writing; II. that he pretended, that this doctrine was agreeable to that of the ancient fathers, and to a deciſion of the church, and to the opinion of the Catholic party. This is a mixture of truth and falſehood. ‘But the exceſs, committed in the perſon of Father Guygnard, was the more cruel, as he was put to death unjuſtly; to wit, for collections and memoirs, taken both from the fathers, and decrees, to prove, that it is lawful to make war againſt heretical and excommunicated princes, which were found in his ſtudy; on eſpecial notice given them to ſearch it, and to make uſe of them for this purpoſe, by a certain miniſter, who, ſome years before, had heard the ſaid Guygnard, preaching at Bourges on this ſubject. For if a man is to be ſentenced to death for ſcholaſtic collections, what injury is this to the holy fathers, out of whom they are taken? And what becomes of St Hilary, the light of the French, and of Lucifer biſhop of Sardinia, who, in their times, wrote ſo ſtrongly, on this ſubject, againſt the emperor Conſtantius, and ſent him their books? Likewiſe of St Cyril, and St Gregory Nazianzen, againſt Julian the apoſtate? If theſe are things debated time out of mind, digeſted by conſent of the ancients, ratified by the judgment of the church, which has the ſole right of determining ſuch truths, and afterwards received and made public in the ſchools of the divines; what are theſe cenſors, who ſo highly exclaim againſt them? What! Do they condemn the holy ſpirit? And dare they judge of colours, in which they are truly blind, and leaders of the blind? And if ſuch collections are condemned, and ſo ſeverely puniſhed, how will they bear with thoſe of heretics? How will they endure their books and peſtilent writings, their propoſitions and maxims, judged and condemned as they are, both by the church, and the parliaments of France? Why are their preachings and blaſphemies againſt God and the church tolerated, nay, approved by edicts, and verified by them? And if it be not lawful to make war againſt an heretical prince, how is it lawful for an heretic to make war againſt a Catholic prince? And how can he be juſtified, who, as head of the heretics, has made war, all his life, againſt the Catholic kings of France: upon which he has valued himſelf, and is the reaſon why he has been condemned, and why they acknowledge him for their prince? Why is it not lawful againſt him, ſince beſides the authority of decrees, he himſelf has ſet the example? Add, that this was not at all to be condemned, for being a propoſition of the ſchools, and a general one, and meerly the doctrine of the church. And however it be, belonging to the party in general, and conſequently covert, as well by the edict of treaſon of Paris, as by that, which was afterwards publiſhed. Conſidering that, upon this treatment, there was no one, not only of the ſaid ſociety, but even no zealous eccleſiaſtic, nay, no one of the whole Catholic party, but ought to undergo the ſame puniſhment (27).’

[F] The whole kingdom was full of ſeditious preachers.] The evil did not ceaſe by the abſolution, which the Pope granted to Henry IV, the ſixteenth of September, 1595. Read theſe words of cardinal d'Oſſat: they are in a letter, which he wrote from Rome to the duke of Villeroy, the fourteenth of May 1601. I ſpoke the other day to the Pope of what the king deſired; which was, that his holineſs would order his new Nuncio to take care, that the preachers in France, preached with the requiſite diſcretion and moderation, without meddling in ſtate-affairs, of which they knew not the motives, nor hold ſeditious diſcourſes: and I delivered to him likewiſe a Memorial in writing, the copy of which I ſend you incloſed. His holineſs told me, he would order his new Nuncio accordingly (28).’ Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie has commented admirably on this paſſage of cardinal d'Oſſat. ‘It no better becomes preachers (ſays he) to talk about affairs of political government, which they underſtand nothing of, for the moſt part; than it does politicians, to decide in matters of faith and religion. Affairs of ſtate are of ſo nice a nature, that it is always dangerous to ſpeak of them before the people, who are not always well-affected to the government. Omni populo, ſays Plutarch, ineſt malignum quiddam & querulum in imperantes. All preachers have a good zeal, I confeſs; but as this zeal is not always attended with knowledge and prudence, it is for the intereſt of the public that thoſe of ability ſhould forbear, through modeſty, to bring theſe matters into their ſermons, in order to oblige others to confine themſelves within the limits of the goſpel doctrine, which every where recommends peace and obedience. In the laſt years of the reign of Henry III, and the firſt of Henry IV, the doctors, Aubry, Boucher, Pelletier, Linceſtre, Roſe, Feu-ardent, and many others of that ſtamp, had ſo prophaned the miniſtry of the word, that the pulpit, where nothing but truth ſhould be ſpoken, was become the ſeat of impoſture and calumny; and that the people, infected through the ears, adored no other croſs, but that of Lorrain. For which reaſon it was abſolutely neceſſary to reſtrain this licence, and reeſtabliſh good diſcipline in the ſacred miniſtry, which the ſpirit of rebellion had converted into a myſtery of iniquity.’

If the Pope's Nuncio acquitted himſelf well of his commiſſion, yet he did not remove this great diſorder. They continued to preach and talk ſeditiouſly, and to give riſe thereby to conſpiracies againſt the life of Henry IV (29). The true Frenchmen, favourers of the independant writings and private converſation, inſinuated the aſſaſſination of ſuch princes as Henry IV, whom they ſuſpected of favouring the enemies of Popery. This was perhaps one of the reaſons, which obliged the parliament of Paris to involve all the Jeſuits of France in the cauſe of John Chaſtel, and John Guignard [G]. They hoped perhaps, that, by baniſhing out of the kingdom thoſe who paſſed for the principal authors of dangerous doctrines, they ſhould bridle the boldneſs of other Eccleſiaſtics.

independant power of the king, and attached to the monarchical maxims of ſtate, attributed to the Jeſuits eſpecially this republican and ultramontane ſpirit. Not that they looked upon them as the firſt authors of it (30): they only conſidered them as it's ſtrongeſt ſupport. This puts me in mind of a remark, which appeared in a book, printed in the year 1701, and intituled, The preſent ſtate of the faculty of divinity of Louvain, treating of the conduct of ſome of it's divines, and of their ſentiments againſt the ſovereignty and ſafety of kings, and againſt the four articles of the clergy of France. It is three letters of a canon of Tournai to a doctor of the Sorbonne. They are preceded by a letter of that doctor, in which we find theſe words (31): ‘But whence is it, that in mentioning, in your letters the ſentiments of thoſe divines, who teach, that kings ſubjects may be abſolved from the oath of fidelity, you ſpeak only of ſome particular doctors of Louvain, of ſome Auguſtins, of ſome Recollects, and not at all of the Jeſuits? Know you not, that theſe deteſtable opinions are derived from them? Not that they are the firſt, who maintained them: ſeveral canoniſts, ſome divines, above all, the Italians, ſubject to the Pope, taught them before them: but their writings were ſo inſignificant, that they fell of themſelves, and ſerved rather to diſcredit theſe opinions, than to bring them into faſhion. But the Jeſuits have heightened them, and have undertaken to give them credit.’

[G] This was one of the reaſons, which obliged the parliament to involve all the Jeſuits of France in the cauſe of John Chaſtel, and John Guignard.] There were ſome perſons, who were ſurprized, that there being at moſt but preſumptions, that the Jeſuits had adviſed John Chaſtel to the wicked attempt, which he executed, yet they were baniſhed the kingdom by the ſame Arrêt, which condemned that aſſaſſin. But to juſtify in this the conduct of the parliament of Paris, we muſt obſerve, that the action of that young man was not the foundation of the baniſhment, to which the Jeſuits were condemned: it was only an occaſion of determining a cauſe, which had been pleaded ſome months before. This cauſe was a proceſs carried on againſt the Jeſuits by the univerſity of Paris. Antony Arnauld, who pleaded for that univerſity, had concluded, ‘that the court might be pleaſed in confirming the requeſt of the univerſity, to order all the Jeſuits of France to quit the kingdom and all his majeſty's dominions, within fifteen days after notice given in every one of their colleges or houſes, ſpeaking to one of them for the reſt. Alias, and, upon their refuſal, wherever any of them ſhall be found in France after the ſaid time, they ſhall be condemned upon the ſpot, without form of proceſs, as guilty of high-treaſon, and attempting on the life of the king (32).’ The judgment of the cauſe was referred to another time; but, on occaſion of the affair of John Chaſtel, they complied with the petition of the univerſity, and the methods made uſe of by Antony Arnauld. Some other parliaments imitated that of Paris: but the parliament of Toulouſe, and that of Bourdeaux refuſed to conform themſelves to it (33); and thus the Jeſuits kept their ground in Languedoc and Guienne till their re-call. They did not obtain it till the beginning of the year 1604.

GUILLELMA, or GUILLELMINA, of Bohemia, the head of an infamous ſect, which appeared in Italy in the XIIIth century, did ſo effectually deceive the world by the appearances of an extraordinary devotion, and acted her part ſo well to the laſt, that ſhe died with the reputation of holineſs, and was in great veneration for a conſiderable time after her death, as if ſhe had been a ſaint. At laſt her impoſture was found out; her corps was dug up, and burnt, in the year 1300. She died in 1281, and had been buried at Milan in the church-yard of San Petro del Horto. Half a year after, ſhe was removed to the convent of Caravalla (a), and a tomb was erected to her, the ruins whereof are ſtill to be ſeen in the burying-place of the monks. Two learned men, Puricellus and Boſſius, have publiſhed an account of that ſect; but they do not agree in every particular. Boſſius was the firſt, who defamed that ſect on account of their leudneſs [A]; but Puricellus maintains, that the corruption did not pro-

(a) It is of the order of Citeaux, two leagues from Milan. It is wrongly called Claravallis. Mabillon, Muſeum Italicum, Part. I, pag. 19.

[A] Boſſius . . . . . firſt diffamed this ſect on account of their leudneſs.] That ſect was accuſed of a thing, wherewith many other conventicles have been charged at ſeveral times, and in ſeveral places. It was ſaid, that the followers of Guillelma met in a cave in the night-time, and that, after they had repeated certain prayers, they put out the candles, and men and women lay together, as chance directed. Quos ipſi in quadam Synagoga ſubterranea conventibus antelucanis congregantes, cum ad modum Presbyterorum induti certas orationes ad altare fudiſſent, extincto aut ſub modio abſcondito lumine ad fortutitos concubitus hortari, conſueverant (1). It is further ſaid, that a rich merchant having a wife, who uſed to go frequently by ſtealth to that cave, followed her one day privately, and lay with her, and convicted her of it by a ring he took from her finger. He ſet up for a informer againſt that ſect (2). The ſame ſtory is related of the Fratricelli, as I have ſhewn in their article (3). I believe ſuch accuſations have been ſometimes calumnious: but doubtleſs many leud actions have been frequently performed in thoſe conventicles: and I do not wonder, that ſo many husbands do not approve, that their wives ſhould grow fond of certain devout aſſemblies; for love will come in ſooner or later, and one cannot ſufficiently admire the docility of the fair ſex in relation to the doctrines that are moſt contrary to chaſtity (4). I do not much wonder, that women ſhould have been prevailed upon to proſtitute themſelves, in the ancient Paganiſm; it was accounted a kind of divine worſhip; the goddeſs Venus was honoured in that manner: but it is an amazing thing, that, in the midſt of Chriſtianity, notwithſtanding the wiſe counſels of mothers, and the pathetical exhortations of preachers, the firſt hypocrite, that comes in their way, ſhould be able to perſuade them to a thouſand abominations. If he tells one of his devotees, as St Aldhelme (5) did, lie by me; I deſire to know whether you will be ſo powerful an inſtrument in the devil's hands, as to make me yeld to the temptation; ſhe will do it. If he tells her, as ſome heretics did, who were puniſhed by the inquiſition of Toulouſe, let us be ſtark naked one by another one upon another; let us kiſs and tickle one another; we ſhall thereby give proofs of our ſpiritual ſtrength (6); he is obeyed. Can there be a greater docility? would ſhe refuſe to proceed farther, if he was willing? have not many women complied with the order of lying with the firſt comer, when candles were put out, in the conventicles of the fraternity?

I muſt take notice of another docility not ſo bad, but yet very ſtrange. When infirm men want to have their natural heat in ſome meaſure reſtored to them, there are young women who will not ſcruple to lie by them, in order to do them that good office. A panegyriſt of the fair ſex affords me a very remarkable paſſage about it. ‘Phyſicians, ſays he (7) cannot deny, that the heat of a young woman's breaſt, applied to an old man's ſtomach, may revive and keep up ceed from the mind to the body, and that Guillelma and her followers were only guilty of an abominable Fanaticiſm, which he proves by the verbal proceſs of the Inquiſition (b) [B]. Guillelma's feſtival was celebrated three times a year at her tomb; on St Bartholomew's day, on which ſhe died; on the day of the tranſlation of her body to Caravalla; and upon Whitſunday (c). ‘his natural heat. The royal prophet David was not ignorant of it, ſince he pitched upon * the beautiful Shunamite, that ſhe might, in that manner, drive away the coldneſs of his old age. And it is likely, that, in imitation of him, the grandfather of the late king of Navarre, called Monſieur d'Albret, being 120 years old, kept two young handſome women to that effect. He lived a long time upon their milk without any other food, and lay between them; which was the reaſon why they were reſpected like princes in his houſe. But I would not have every man to do the ſame; for they would often imitate a Notary in the Chatelet of Paris, whoſe name was Martin Maupin. That man made his jealous wife believe, that he was ſick of David's diſtemper, that ſhe might give him leave to make uſe of his maid in order to warm his ſtomach; and the poor woman was ſometimes deceived in it.' I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that St Jerome does not approve, that what is related of the Shunamite ſhould be taken in a literal ſenſe. He explains it allegorically, and ſays the meaning of it is, that David, in his old days, was more intimately united to wiſdom. That great doctor of the church rejects the literal ſenſe with the utmoſt indignation. ‘Nonne tibi videtur, ſi occidentem ſequaris litteram, vel figmentum eſſe de mimo, vel Attellanarum ludicra? .... Quæ eſt igitur iſta Sunamitis, uxor & virgo, tam fervens, ut frigidum calefaceret, tam ſancta, ut calentem ad libidinem non provocaret: Exponat ſapientiſſimus Salomon patris ſui delicias, & pacificus bellatoris viri narret amplexus. Poſſide ſapientiam, poſſide intelligentiam, &c. (8) --- Do you not think, that, by following the literal ſenſe, you make a meer fiction of the ſtory? .... What therefore is that Shunamite, both wife and virgin, ſo hot, as to warm the cold, ſo holy, as not to provoke him, when warm, to luſt? let Solomon, the wiſeſt of men, explain his father's joys, and a peaceful king relate the embraces of a warlike one. Get wiſdom, get underſtanding, &c.'

[B] By the verbal proceſs of the Inquiſition.] That act, drawn up in the year 1300, imports, that Andrew Saramita and Mayfreda Pirovana, the chief followers of Guillelma, maintained, that ſhe was the HOLY GHOST incarnated in the feminine ſex, and born of Conſtantia, wife of the king of Bohemia; that ſhe was only dead according to the fleſh; that ſhe would riſe again before the general reſurrection, and aſcend into heaven in the ſight of her diſciples; that ſhe had left a vicar upon earth, viz. Mayfreda Pirovana, a nun of the order of the humbled; that this nun would ſay maſs at Guillelma's tomb; and at laſt, that ſhe would be poſſeſſed of the holy apoſtolical ſee at Rome; that ſhe would expel the cardinals from thence, and have four doctors, who would make four new goſpels. Puricellus gives us a full account of all thoſe impious aſſertions. His book was never printed, and it is not known whether it will ever come out. It does not appear that Guillelma boaſted of that pretended incarnation; nay, it ſeems that by a falſe modeſty ſhe affected not to own it (9).

[C] Her viſions were not extirpated for ever.] The author of the continuation of Nangis's chronicle ſays, upon the year 1306, that one Dulcinius of Verceil vented the like doctrines concerning the HOLY GHOST (10). Poſtel, and his mother Joan, were guilty of as great extravagancies; and it were eaſy to ſhew that this ſort of Fanaticiſm is revived from time to time. One would think, that the devils have plotted to have religion ridiculed by women, and that, notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of many attempts, they renew them from time to time in many places.

[B] Menage tells a .... ſtory relating thereto.] ‘The prince of Guimené, ſeeing a man (it was Mr des Valles), with ragged breeches, come every morning into the princeſs of Guimené's chamber, asked her one day what he came for. She told him, he ſhews me Hebrew. Madam, (replied the prince) he will quickly ſhew you his backſide (2).'

GUINDANO (SIGISMUND) a native of Cremona, having made a poem about the actions of the emperor Charles V, preſented it to that prince at ſuch an unlucky time, that he received nothing for it. He did not pitch upon a proper time [A]; for he made his compliment with his copy in his hand, when Charles V was engaged in a great war in Germany. He was ſo vexed at ſuch an unprofitable reception, that he threw his poem into the fire: It is thought, that, if he had been rich enough to get it printed at his own charge, he would not have been ſo cruel to his work; but his great poverty, which did not permit him to publiſh it, together with his ſpite, was a ſufficient reaſon for him to deſtroy it (a).

[A] He did not pitch upon a proper time.] All thoſe, who intend to preſent their works to great men, ſhould mind this advice of Horace:

Ut proficiſcentem docui te ſæpe diuque
Auguſto reddes ſignata volumina, Vinni,
Si validus, ſi lætus erit, ſi denique poſcet.
Ne ſtudio noſtri pecces, odiumque libellis
Sedulus importes opera vehemente miniſter (1).

When laſt we parted, this was my command:
Preſent theſe papers to Auguſtus' hand;
From cares of empire if his mind unbends,
Or if he asks to ſee what Horace ſends;
Leſt, Vinnius, by thy diligence miſplac'd,
Thy maſter's verſes be at court diſgrac'd.

That is, one ought to avoid an unſeaſonable time; for all princes are in that reſpect like Auguſtus; they will not be unſeaſonably interrupted (2). An author will miſcarry for want of obſerving the critical minute, and what the Latins call, Molles aditus, molliſſima fandi tempora. Our Guindano had this misfortune; he miſ-timed his buſineſs; he ſhewed a poem of twelve books to an emperor, who was engaged in a very troubleſome war (3). O eſſendo preſentati con poco garbo, ò non à tempo trovandoſi egli occupatiſſimo nel'e guerre d'Allemagna, non hebbe mai niente (4).

GUISCARD. It is the name, which the lords de la Coſte, de la Bourlie, de la Laurie, &c. beſtowed upon their family, which is one of the moſt noble and moſt ancient in the province of Quercy. They pitched upon it out of reſpect to one of their anceſtors, whoſe proper name was GUISCARDUS. It was not the cuſtom of thoſe times to preſerve the proofs of the origine of families in favour of their poſterity; nevertheleſs thoſe lords can produce ſome writings near five hundred years old; for they make it appear, not only that they are poſſeſſed of lands, which never were out of their family for many ages, but alſo that their nobility has been tranſmitted without any interruption to the count de GUISCARD, who is (a) a worthy ſucceſſor of his illuſtrious anceſtors. BERNARD DE GUISCARD makes the firſt degree of the genealogy of that houſe. The teſtimonies of his actions, which are extant, ſhew that his race had an original, which reached beyond the age he lived in. He took the title of knight in all the leaſes of his lands from the year 1247 to 1283. This is a manifeſt proof, that he had ſignalized himſelf in war, and that his ſervices procured him that title, which was then, and for many ages after, the moſt honourable reward beſtowed upon military valour. There are fourteen degrees in a direct and male line from that Bernard to the preſent count de Guiſcard, and that ſeries of ſucceſſions affords ſeveral illuſtrious alliances, and ſeveral perſons diſtinguiſhed by their merit [A]. But it muſt be confeſſed, that thoſe, who gave a greater luſtre to that family, are, GEORGE DE GUISCARD, lord of la Bourlie [B], and LEWIS DE GUISCARD, his

(a) I write this n March, 1700.

[A] Several illuſtrious alliances, and ſeveral perſons diſtinguiſhed by their merit.] I ſhall mention ſome of them. BERTRAND DE GUISCARD, Damoiſeau (1), the third ſon of BERNARD (2) DE GUISCARD, left a ſon behind him called GAILLARD DE GUISCARD, 'about whom there is an uncommon record preſerved in the archives. Having been knighted, as his forefathers were, a private man called Peter de la Tour, who probably ſerved under him, and was upon the point of death, having deſired him to honour him with the ſame title, he conferred it upon him in the year 1334: In infirmitate qua deceſſit, fecit ſe militem fieri per Gaillardum Guiſcardum militem, & per eundem Guiſcardum inſignia militaria ſibi dari. King Philip de Valois, approving that action, by his letters dated from Paris in Auguſt, 1337, confirmed that knighthood, and was willing that the deſcendants of him, who had received it, ſhould enjoy, by virtue of it, all the privileges belonging to nobility. The ſame Gaillard de Guiſcard ſerved ſtill in the wars of Gaſcogne, in the year 1339, with four eſquires under the command of meſſire Peter de Marmande, ſeneſchal of Perigord, according to an account of that year given by Bartholomew de Drack, treaſurer of the war. But it is not known, whether he was married, and left any children behind him (3).'

BERNARD DE GUISCARD fourth of that name, Seigneur de la Coſte, and de la Laurie, Damoiſeau, married the twenty eighth of April, 1315, Helis de Montaigu, daughter and heireſs of Bernard de Montaigu, Seigneur de Montcuc. 'His caſtle of la Coſte being then an important fortreſs, Galois de la Baume, lord of Valſin, who had the direction of the war in Languedoc, and was then at Cahors, gave him the government of it, and kept him in the pay of Charles V, by letters of the tenth of May, 1348, with ſix men of arms, and ſix foot-ſerjeants, to ſecure that place. There is good reaſon to believe, that he preſerved it out of intereſt and zeal, as he had engaged; for he made his will in that caſtle, the twenty ſeventh of April in the year 1353 (4).'

WILLIAM BERTRAND DE GUISCARD, ſecond of that name, married, firſt, on the fifth of October, 1413, Margaret de Veirac, daughter of Guy de Veirac, lord of Merle and Coſſac in the dioceſe of Tulles; and, ſecondly, Helis de Landore, ſiſter to Bernard de Landore, viſcount de Cadars in Roüergue. ANTONY DE GUISCARD, lord of la Coſte and Montcuc, married, the ſixteenth of October, 1492, Iſabella de Lomagne, daughter of John de Lomagne, lord of Montagu in Agenois. JOHN DE GUISCARD, firſt of that name, gentleman in ordinary of the king's chamber, married the eleventh of Auguſt, 1528, Souveraigne de Ricard de Genouillac, daughter of John de Ricard ſirnamed de Genouillac, knight, baron de Gourdon, and lord of Genouillac, and Vaillac, and of Margaret Daubuſſon. JOHN DE GUISCARD his ſon, one of the hundred gentlemen of the king's houſhold (5), married, the twelfth of November, 1554, Frances de la Barthe, daughter of Matthew de la Barthe, baron de Montcornel, and firſt baron d'Aſtarac, and of Catherine de Lomagne, lady de Montarac. JOHN DE GUISCARD, his ſecond ſon, lord of Puy de Sirects, married Agnes de Temines, the fifth of January, 1625.

[B] GEORGE DE GUISCARD lord of la Bourlie.] That family was divided into two branches towards the end of the XVth century, viz. that of the lords du Puy de Sirects (6), and that of the lords du Cairou and de la Bourlie. The head of the firſt was the ſecond ſon of John de Guiſcard, ſecond of that name. The head of the other was GABRIEL DE GUISCARD, lord of la Gardelle, du Cairou, and de la Bourlie, the third ſon of John de Guiſcard, ſecond of that name. Gabriel de Guiſcard had eight ſons: the ſixth is the count de la Bourlie, whoſe name appears in the text of this remark. He was born the ninth of Auguſt, 1606. 'He has been ſucceſſively captain of foot and of horſe in the regiment of Vaillac and Coallin. One of his legs was broke by a musket-ſhot, at the deſcent into the iſles of St Margaret and St Honorat; and one of his arms was run through with a ſpear, at the battle of Rocroy; and having ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Lens (7), at the ſiege of Arras, and on ſeveral occaſions, he deſerved to be made one of the king's penſionaries in the year 1644. He was made ſerjeant of battle, and governor of Courtray, in the year 1647. The year following, the queen-mother thought him worthy of the choice ſhe made of him to fill the place of ſub-governor to the king. Afterwards he was made counſellor of ſtate in 1649, marêchal de camp in 1651: and his majeſty being well pleaſed with the ſervices he had done in his employments, gave him, in 1662, the command of the ſovereignties of Sedan, Raucour, and St Mange; and he had the government of that important place in 1671, of which he had been made great bayliff. The king thought he could not beſtow upon a more faithful perſon the command of the towns and citadel of Dunkirk, Bergues, Furnes, and Graveline, and of the troops appointed for the defence of that frontier, which was given him with the power of lieutenant-general in 1672: and the year following, he beat, near Furnes, with 500 troopers, above 800 men of the enemies, a great part of which were killed upon the ſpot, and he brought 140 priſoners to Dunkirk. At laſt, crowned with the reputation he had juſtly acquired by his wiſdom and valour, during the ſpace of a very long life, he died the ninth of December, in the year 1693, aged eighty ſeven years and four months. He had been married in the royal-palace, in the king's and the late queen-mother's preſence, the twenty eighth of November 1648, to Genevieve de Longueval, lady de Fourdrinoy in Picardy, daughter of Antony de Longueval, lord of Tenelles and Lemont, and of Elizabeth de Margival; and he left behind him four ſons by that lady.' LEWIS DE GUISCARD count de Neuvy, of whom I ſhall ſpeak in the following remark. 'JOHN-GEORGE DE GUISCARD, born the twenty ſeventh of September, 1657. he gave great proofs of his valour, being enſign in the colonel's company of the regiment of

Note, that the eldeſt branch is now, in the fifteenth degree, in the perſon of FRANCIS DE GUISCARD, Seigneur de St Jean and de la Coſte.

[C] .... LEWIS DE GUISCARD, his eldeſt ſon.] He was born the twenty ſeventh of September, 1651; and, ‘ever ſince he bore arms, he has had important poſts in the king's ſervice. For being animated with the ſame ſentiments, which procured to the count de la Bourlie, his father, all the glorious rewards, wherewith his majeſty honoured his courage, he began to ſerve as a captain in the regiment des Vaiſſeaux, in the year 1671. He ſerved in that quality, the year following, at the ſieges of Orſoy, Rhimberg, Duiſburg, and Zutphen, and at thoſe of Maeſtricht and Unna in the country of Marck, in the year 1673. The king made him colonel of the regiment of Normandy in March 1674; and immediately he entered into Grave, which was inveſted already, and where the ſaid regiment was. He forced a guard, and carried 16 priſoners into the place, with 30 troopers of the garriſon of Mazeyck, whom he had taken for a convoy. He was dangerouſly wounded with a muſket-ſhot in the arm-pit, towards the end of the ſiege, where he commanded the infantry. The year following, he was wounded again with a muſket-ſhot in the head, at the ſiege of Bouchain: and, being detached, the ſame campaign, to bring ſix battalions to the body, commanded by the mareſchal de Crequi near Thionville; he was at the battle of Conſarbrick, and was ſo happy, as to bring to Metz the broken remains of the Infantry, with the remainder of the regiment of Normandy and Bourlemont. He ſerved the years following, in Germany, and was at the ſiege of Friburg, and of fort Kiel; and alſo, in the year 1684, at the ſiege of Luxemburg. He always ſignalized himſelf with ſo much bravery in all the places, where he had occaſion to act at the head of that body, that his majeſty granted him, in 1689, a commiſſion of brigadier in his infantry, and gave him power to command in Dinant, and a general inſpection over the troops garriſoned in that place, and in Charlemont, Rocroy, Beaumont, and Philippeville. Having diſcharged the duties of that poſt with the utmoſt vigilance and activity (9), the king thought fit to make him, the next year, mareſchal de camp, and commander of Rocroy and Charlemont, with orders to throw himſelf into Philippeville, if it ſhould be attacked. And becauſe his wiſe conduct and indefatigable application made way for new rewards, the count de la Bourlie having reſigned his government of Sedan, the king thought it juſt to give it to the count de Guiſcard, his ſon. It was conferred upon him in the year 1692. And his majeſty being well pleaſed with the zeal and intrepidity he had ſhewn, wherever he had executed his orders, thought he ought to entruſt him with the keeping of the town and caſtle of Namur, the moſt important place of Europe, which he had juſt then ſubdued at the head of his army. He had the power to command in it as a governor; and that glorious choice was attended with the dignity of lieutenant-general, wherewith the king honoured him, the thirtieth of March, 1693. His majeſty gave him the command of a conſiderable body, to inveſt Huy, in order to make a diverſion, whereby the ſiege of Furnes, undertaken by the mareſchal de Boufflers, might be carried on; which ſucceeded, by keeping on that ſide part of the enemies troops commanded by the earl of Athlone. He ſuſtained, at Boſſu, a vigorous attack of the enemies upon a convoy, which he conducted from Maubeuge to the army of the mareſchal de Luxemburg, with a firmneſs the more extraordinary, becauſe he had but thirteen ſquadrons; and Mr du Puy, lieutenant-general of the Spaniſh armies, who had eighteen ſquadrons, and 2400 foot, of the garriſon of Charleroy, was entirely defeated, and put to flight, having had many men killed and made priſoners. He was ſo lucky as to be at the battle of Nerwinde, having ſet out from Huy at break of day. The mareſchal de Luxemburg placed him in the right wing, where he proved very ſerviceable. Having acquired a new degree of glory by the defence of Namur, attacked by all the forces of the allies, he was honoured with the order of the HOLY GHOST, to which the king nominated him the ſeventeenth of December, 1695; and he was admitted, with the uſual ceremonies, on the firſt day of January of this year 1696. He married the twenty fourth of February, 1677, Angelique de Langlée, the daughter of Claudius de Langlée, chevalier, Seigneur de l'Epicheliere, quarter-maſter-general of the king's armies, and of Catherine Roze; by whom he has LEWIS AUGUSTUS DE GUISCARD, born the twentieth of May 1680, and colonel of the regiment of Guiſcard, &c. Catherine de Guiſcard, born the twelfth of June 1688 (10).’

This is what Mr d'Hoſier ſaid in December 1696. He could not then mention the embaſſy of Sweden, to which the count de Guiſcard was named in 1698 (11); nor the untimely death of the only ſon of that count. That young lord had been educated with all imaginable care, and had wonderfully anſwered ſo good an education. He had very noble inclinations he loved not only warlike exerciſes, but alſo the Belles Lettres and philoſophy, and had made a great progreſs in them. He ſaw the court of England in the retinue of the count de Tallard the French embaſſador, in the year 1698, and accompanied his father to Stockholm in 1699. He was preparing to take a journey to Rome; but, being arrived at Vienna, he fell ſick of the ſmall-pox, of which he died in a few days, towards the end of December 1699, to the great grief of all thoſe, who knew and admired him. Had not the count de Guiſcard, who loved that only ſon with a particular tenderneſs, been a man of a very ſteady ſoul, he had never been able to bear ſuch a ſevere blow.

GUISE (JAMES DE), a Franciſcan monk, was born at Mons in Hainault. He was doctor of divinity, and taught that ſcience, philoſophy, and mathematics, for the ſpace of twenty-five years more or leſs, in the convents of his order. He earneſtly applied himſelf to illuſtrate the antiquities, and the hiſtory, of his country; but he followed fabulous traditions; for he affirmed, that his birth-place was founded by the Trojans. We have only an abridgment of his chronicle of Hainault (a) [A], and it is not [A] We have only an abridgment of his chronicle of Hainault.] That abridgment is written in French, and not in Latin, as the chronicle. It was printed at Paris in the year 1531, in folio. The title of it runs thus: *Les illuſtrations de la Gaule Belgique, antiquitez du Pays de Hainault & de la grand cité des Belges, à preſent dite Bavay, dont procedent les chauſſées de Brunehaut, & de pluſieurs Princes qui ont regné, & fondé pluſieurs villes & citez audict pays, & autres choſes ſingulieres & dignes de mémoire, advenues durant leurs regnes, juſques au Duc Philippes de Bourgogne dernier decedé. city of the Belgæ, now called Bavay, where the cauſeway (commonly called les Chauſſées de Brunehaut) begins, and of many princes, who reigned and built many towns in that country, and other memorable things, which happened in their reigns, till the time of the late duke Philip of Burgundy. By brother James de Guiſe, a monk of the order of St Francis. A work divided into ſix volumes, whereof only the three firſt are printed.' Thus the title of this work is mentioned by Andrew du Cheſne (1). Du Verdier does not mention it ſo fully; but he has not forgot a circumſtance omitted by du Cheſne, viz. That this book was tranſlated into French (2). La Croix du Maine falſly believed, that James de Guiſe was the author of that tranſlation (3). He adds, that the Latin chronicle of that monk is to be ſeen in manuſcript in the convent of the Minor Fryars at Valenciennes, as John le Maire ſays in his Illuſtrations of Gaule; that it was compoſed at the requeſt of William earl of Hainault, and that it reaches to the year 1244. This laſt particular does not agree with the title of the abridgment; for no duke of Burgundy, called Philip, died at that time. Philip de Rouvre, the laſt duke of Burgundy of the firſt branch, died the twenty firſt of November 1361. Valerius Andreas obſerves (4), that the Paris edition, 1531, is intituled, Extraict des Chroniceques de Jacques de Guiſe; and that there was, at Mr Gevart's at Antwerp, another abridgment of thoſe chronicles, made by order of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy. He further ſays, that the Franciſcans of Mons had the manuſcript of that chronicle of Hainault in three volumes.

I learned yeſterday (5) of Baron le Roy, a very curious and knowing man, that, not long before his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty beſieged Mons in 1691, he wrote a letter to the warden of the convent, where that manuſcript was, deſiring him to get ſome chapters of it tranſcribed for him; and that the warden made anſwer, that, after he had tranſcribed ſomething of it, he had left it off, not being able to read the author's letters and abbreviations, and that the moſt able monks of his convent could not do it neither. Baron le Roy added, that, during the ſiege, a lay-brother of that convent ſet up for a gunner, and made it appear, that he had not forgot the experience he had formerly got in that art; and that, a deſerter having acquainted the French with it, many bombs were thrown upon that convent, which ſet it on fire; ſo that the manuſcript of James de Guiſe was burnt, with the library of the monks.

[B] Moreri has committed ſome faults.] I. James de Guiſe was not a a native of Valenciennes, but of Mons. Obſerve, by the bye, that La Coix du Maine, who conjectured he was born at Guiſe (6), is miſtaken; beſides, he did not know that this monk lived in the XIVth century. II. Moreri ſhould not have ſaid, that he died in 1398, or in 1399; for authors do not differ in that manner as to the year, in which James de Guiſe departed this life. Their variations conſiſt in this, that ſome begin the year with January, and others after Eaſter. According to the latter, he died in 1398, and, according to the former, in 1399 (7).

GUISE, a town of Picardy, upon the river Oiſe, in the dioceſe of Laon, was the ancient patrimony of the younger brothers of the houſe of Lorrain, and was erected into a dutchy and peerdom in January 1527 (a). It went through ſeveral revolutions, according to the different ſucceſs of arms, during the wars of Francis I, and the emperor Charles V. It was taken by ſtorm in 1536. The caſtle, which might have held out, was baſely ſurrendred; for which reaſon the captains were branded with infamy (b). But in 1543, Ferdinand de Gonzaga, who beſieged it, being early informed of the march of Francis I, raiſed the ſiege, and was ſo briſkly charged in his retreat, that he loſt two thouſand men in the rear of his army, beſides many priſoners (c). In 1636, the Spaniards, who had made ſome conqueſts in Picardy, did not think fit to beſiege Guiſe, being afraid that the count de Guebriant, who commanded in it, would make a vigorous reſiſtance (d). They could not make themſelves maſters of it in 1650, though every thing ſeemed to favour them. See the book, intituled, Le Triomphe de la Ville de Guiſe. It was written by John Baptiſt de Verdun, a Minime, and printed at Paris in 1687: It is mentioned in the Journal des Savans (e). I ſhall obſerve in another place (f), that the miſcarriage of that enterprize of the Spaniards is chiefly to be aſcribed to the marquis de Bougi.

GUISE (CLAUDIUS DE LORRAIN, duke of), the ſecond ſon of Renatus duke of Lorrain, went and ſettled in France, after he had endeavoured in vain, as it is ſaid, to hinder Antony his eldeſt brother from ſucceeding his father [A]. Being a man of

[A] He in vain endeavoured, as it is ſaid, to hinder Antony his elder brother from ſucceeding his father.] The following account is to be found in Thuanus, where he gives an account of the ſpeech, which la Renaudie is ſuppoſed to have made to his accomplices (1). Renatus, duke of Lorrain, when he married Margaret d'Harcourt (2), heireſs of the houſe of Tancarville, obliged her, by the contract of his marriage, to make over to him her eſtate by deed of gift. Afterwards, under pretence that ſhe was ugly, and then under pretence that ſhe was barren, he cruelly divorced her, without reſtoring her eſtate to her, and married the ſiſter of the duke of Guelderland before his firſt wife died. He had, by this ſecond wife, among other children, Antony, who ſucceeded him, and our Claudius. The latter, who was born after the death of Margaret d'Harcourt, pretended, that Antony, being born during the life of that lady, was to be reputed a baſtard, and uncapable of ſucceeding; ſo that he did not ſcruple to diſhonour his own mother, by giving out, that ſhe was a concubine, provided he might become by that means duke of Lorrain, to the prejudice of his elder brother (3). Having miſcarried in his attempt, he left his country, and retired into France. I cannot tell whether this be true; and I give little credit to what is ſaid by a ſpeech-maker, in ſuch circumſtances as la Renaudie was in: but I am ſure, that a very ambitious man is little concerned to diſhonour his mother, when great advantages accrue to him from it. I ſhall ſet down ſome words of Thuanus, which ſeem to have ſome obſcurity in them. Cum primo ſimulatis nuptiis Margaritam Gulielmi Haricuriani Tancarvillæ Comitis filiam & ampliſſimorum bonorum, quæ Lotaringi hodie in Caletenſi agro poſſident, heredem duxiſſet, & tabulis dotalib. ad donationem illorum bonorum adegiſſet, poſtea deformitatem & ex deformitate ſterilitatem cauſſatus miſeram feminam repudiavit, & tamen bona retinuit (4). Thuanus's meaning ſeems to be this, that the two pretences of the duke of Lorrain were grounded one upon another; that is, he alledged, firſt, that Margaret was an ugly woman; and, in the ſecond place, that her uglineſs was the cauſe of her barrenneſs. None but a wretched philoſopher would argue thus: for there is no other connexion between a woman's uglineſs and her barrenneſs, than what a malicious and nice husband can make, by refuſing to pay to his wife great courage and merit, he was very much eſteemed. He married a princeſs of the blood(a), and was raiſed to great offices. The county of Guiſe was erected into a duchy and peerdom upon his account. Such erections had not been made till then but for the princes of the blood. It is ſaid, Francis I was angry with him upon ſome occaſions [B], and would not permit him to be acknowledged a prince [C], nor to aſſume all the marks of one. However it be, Claudius de Lorrain became ſo powerful, that he founded a houſe, which was like to dethrone the lawful ſucceſſors. He died in 1550, leaving behind him ſix ſons and four daughters, the eldeſt of which was married to James Stuart, the Vth of that name, king of Scotland. He ſignalized himſelf upon ſeveral great occaſions, particularly at the battle of Marignan [D]. His brother John, who went by the name of cardinal of Lorrain, proved a great ſupport to him (b).

what we call a due benevolence. Perhaps, duke Renatus took care not to want a pretence of barrenneſs upon occaſion; but I am perſuaded, that the only meaning of Thuanus's words, is, that, after the duke had alledged his wife's uglineſs, he gave another reaſon for his divorce, viz. that he could get no children by her.

I cannot tell whether Varillas had any other authority beſides la Renaudie's ſpeech: however, it will not be improper to quote him (5). ‘ When Claudius de ‘ Lorrain conſulted his own intereſt, he pretended, ‘ that the duchies of Lorrain and Bar belonged to ‘ him, and that Antony, his eldeſt brother, was not a ‘ lawful ſon, ſince he was born in the life-time of the ‘ firſt wife (6) of their father. The ſame Claudius ‘ could not forbear ſaying ſo to ſome perſons, who ‘ told duke Renatus of it; and he was afraid that his ‘ two ſons would attempt upon one another's life. He ‘ found no better expedient, than to ſend Claudius into ‘ France, and to marry him there to Antoinette de ‘ Bourbon, eldeſt daughter of the count de Vendôme, ‘ and to beſtow upon him all the lands he had in that ‘ kingdom; which were ſo many, that they take up ‘ two pages in the manuſcript of the contract *, and ‘ ſo conſiderable, that they brought in as great a re‘venue as the duchies of Lorrain and Bar.’ Beloi ſays the quite contrary; for he affirms, that the firſt duke of Guiſe was not worth above fourteen or fifteen thouſand livres per annum, when he married the lady Antoinette de Bourbon (7).

[B] Francis I was angry with him upon ſome occaſions.] La Renaudie affirms it in his ſpeech: he ſays, that Claudius de Lorrain, having ſent, without the king's order, ſome troops out of the province, of which he was governour, did ſo exaſperate his majeſty, that his pardon could not be obtained, but upon condition that he ſhould no more appear at court. The pretence he made uſe of to ſend thoſe troops out of his government of Champaigne, was, that he had a mind to repulſe the Anabaptiſts, who made excurſions into the dominions of the duke of Lorrain (8). Antonio ab Anabaptiſtis, uti ajebat, infeſtato, injuſſu regis ex præfectura ſua auxiliareis copias adduxit. Quod adeo impatienter tulit Franciſcus, qui his præludiis patientiam ſuam tentari interpretabatur, ut niſi in Joannis fratris (9) & Annæ Momorantii, qui factum excuſavit, gratiam, nunquam eam injuriam condonaturus fuiſſe credatur: quam tamen ea lege remiſit, ut Claudius in poſterum aula abſtineret, neque in ſuum conſpectum veniret. As I have already ſaid, I do not much depend upon la Renaudie's ſpeech; but part of what he ſays is to be found in a good hiſtorian: let us keep to his account. The late king Francis, ſays he (10), never had a good opinion of the father (11), ſince he came to know, that, during his impriſonment, he had brought the forces of the kingdom to Savern, in order to pacify the troubles of Germany, and fight thoſe, who troubled the Netherlands, and other countries, belonging to the houſe of Auſtria. The ſaid king took it ſo ill, that, being come from Spain to St Sever, he ordered he ſhould be impriſoned; and, had it not been for the conſtable's interceſſion, it had gone hard with him. He was alſo very much blamed, not only by the nobility, but alſo by the king, for the attempt he made upon the government of Burgundy in the life-time of Philip Chabot, admiral and governour of that country; for the doing of an ill office to the crown, and encroaching upon the office of a gentleman ſtill living, are two things very much taken notice of in France: which made the father and the ſons ſo odious to the king, that they loſt all hopes of raiſing themſelves without the alliance and favour of the ducheſs of Valentinois. I wonder this hiſtorian does not add, that the king, not long before he died, charged his ſucceſſor to beſtow no office upon the Guiſes. This particular is mentioned by ſome hiſtorians: La Renaudie did not forget it. Theſe are his words in Thuanus. Ejus rei memoria cum tenaciſſime in Franciſci prudentiſſimi principis animo, quamdiu vixit, hæſiſſet, moriens ille inter ſalutaria præcepta, quæ de poſteritate ac regno ſolicitus Henrico F. dedit, imprimis eum monuit, ut ſibi à Guiſianorum ambitione caveret, ac proinde eos publicæ rei gubernaculis ne admoveret (12).

[C] . . . . . . and would not permit him to be acknowledged a prince.] Preſident de la Place, whom I have quoted before, mentions a diſcourſe, that was made to Catherine de Medicis, by Lewis Regnier, Sieur de la Planche. ‘ The French gentlemen, (they are Regnier's ‘ words) honour foreign princes, when they keep with‘in due bounds; otherwiſe they cannot endure them, ‘ and much leſs acknowledge them for princes, but ‘ only for lords and gentlemen. Which was confirmed ‘ by the judgment of the late king Francis, when the ‘ duke d'Aumale married; for he would not permit his ‘ wife to be dreſſed like a princeſs on her wedding-day, ‘ ſaying, that he would not beſtow upon the princes ‘ of Lorrain the honours that belong only to the ‘ princes of the blood; and that, if they had a mind to ‘ appear like princes, they muſt go out of the king‘dom, and do it at their own charges. And the late ‘ duke of Guiſe, who very carefully ſued for the ‘ place of chief hunter, which before was only poſſeſ‘ſed by meer gentlemen, was well contented, that his ‘ daughter-in-law ſhould have no mantle on her wed‘ding-day (13).’ We ſhall ſee, that Henry II did not tread in his father's ſteps, and even that Francis I was not always ſo ſtrict on that head. ‘ The late king ‘ Francis, (they are la Planche's words) (14) at the en‘try of queen Alienor, was willing that Mademoiſelle ‘ de Guiſe, afterwards queen of Scotland, ſhould be ‘ dreſſed like a princeſs; but, when her brother mar‘ried, he plainly made it appear, that he would not ‘ have it to be made a precedent. And if the late ‘ king, at the ſollicitation of the ducheſs of Valen‘tinois, (to whom all thoſe of the houſe of Guiſe, ‘ that are now living, are indebted for their grandeur) ‘ altered the ancient cuſtom, which was, that no maid ‘ ſhould be dreſſed like a princeſs on her wedding-day, ‘ unleſs ſhe was the daughter of a prince of the blood, ‘ or married to one; it is certain, that, if he had ‘ lived, he was reſolved to humble them ſufficiently.’ There are two other particulars in Lewis Regnier's diſcourſe, that deſerve to be inſerted in this place. ‘ The late M. de Saint Paul never heard the duke of ‘ Guiſe, Claudius de Lorrain, ſtile himſelf prince, but ‘ he ſmiled, and told ſome perſons about him, that he ‘ ſpoke German in French; and that whenever he had ‘ a mind to call himſelf a prince, he ſhould add; of ‘ Lorrain, to ſpeak proper French (15).’ This is the firſt particular: here follows the ſecond (16). ‘ It has ‘ been an ancient cuſtom of our parliaments, eſpecial‘ly of that of Paris, to prevent any one's aſſuming the ‘ title of prince in thoſe courts, unleſs he be one of the ‘ royal blood. Which was confirmed, with reſpect to ‘ Meſſieurs de Guiſe, pleading before the late preſident ‘ Lizet, who told their advocate in a full court, that ‘ the title of prince belonged to none in France but ‘ to the princes of the blood, and ordered it to be ‘ ſtruck out immediately (17).’

[D] He ſignalized himſelf . . . . . particularly at the battle of Marignan.] Francis I obtained a victory over the Swiſs at Marignan in the year 1515. ‘ Clau‘dius duke of Guiſe, who commanded the Lanſque‘nets in the abſence of Charles duke of Guelderland, ‘ his uncle, was trampled under foot. A German gen‘tleman belonging to him ſaved his life, and loſt his ‘ own, by covering his body, and receiving the blows ‘ levelled at him (18).’ See Father Anſelme (19) who deſcribes the thing more to the advantage of the duke of Guiſe.

GUISE (Francis de Lorrain duke of) eldeſt ſon of the foregoing, was one of the greateſt captains of his age. He did very important ſervices to the ſtate, by defending Metz againſt the emperor Charles V, and by the taking of Calais, and on ſeveral other occaſions; but it may be ſaid, that the evils he occaſioned do infinitely exceed the advantages he procured to France by his valour and conduct. His ambition, and that of cardinal Charles de Lorrain his brother, which was ſtill more exorbitant than his, brought a dreadful deſolation upon the kingdom: beſides, the bloody ſpirit, wherewith they were animated againſt the Proteſtants, occaſioned the civil wars, which brought France ſo often to the laſt extremities. That hatred was at firſt a meer political pretence; for had they had a proſpect of a better fortune among the Reformed, they would doubtleſs have ſided with them [A]; but at laſt it proved a true hatred. The greateſt

[A] If the Guiſes had had a proſpect of a better fortune among the Reformed, they would doubtleſs have ſided with them.] The author of a ſhort romance (1), which came out in France in 1675, introduces the prince of Condé ſpeaking to admiral Chatillon in the following manner. Does the religion you are of, and which I profeſs, only becauſe the Guiſes make profeſſion of another, (for I ſhall not ſcruple to tell you, that if they turned Proteſtants, I would turn Catholic the very next day) I ſay, does that religion forbid to love the moſt beautiful woman that can be ſeen? Theſe words may be an unjuſt reflexion upon that prince; but it is true, generally ſpeaking, that the heads of great factions reſolve upon a thing, only becauſe their competitors are engaged in a thing contrary to it: and it is not to be doubted, that the Guiſes confirmed themſelves in their religion, becauſe their moſt dreadful enemies were in the other party. If the prince of Condé and the Chatillons had affected a great zeal for the extirpation of the Proteſtants, and if they had been enabled by that means to oppreſs the Guiſes, it is not to be queſtioned, that the latter would have forſaken the church of Rome to make themſelves dreaded at the head of the Huguenots. Some ſay, they were for ſome time wavering about it; but Varillas pretends to have very good reaſons to deny it. Theſe are his words (2). ‘Here I muſt confute an error, which is the more dangerous, becauſe the beſt hiſtorians have not always avoided it. It is ſaid, that the Guiſes took into conſideration, in the preſent juncture (3), whether it was more advantageous to them to continue in the Catholic religion, or to put themſelves at the head of the Calviniſts; and that, after an exact diſcuſſion of their intereſts, they preferred the ancient religion to the new one. Meſſieurs du Puy, thoſe two brothers, ſo famous for their great abilities, whiſpered that matter of fact to all the learned men, who viſited them in the king's library, as one of the moſt important ſecrets of the French hiſtory. They affirmed, that this ſecret was to be found in the book againſt the league of Gonzaga, duke of Nevers. They got that book very neatly bound, and kept it with particular care; and yet, when they came to die, that book was examined the more exactly, becauſe ſeveral people remembered what they had ſaid of it; but no ſuch thing was found in it. Beſides, Marin le Roy de Gomberville, having undertaken to print the memoirs of the duke of Nevers, borrowed the ſame book. He tranſcribed it, and inſerted it in the firſt volume of his memoirs (§ α). But that pretended deliberation of the houſe of Guiſe does not appear in it, tho' Gomberville knew what Meſſieurs du Puy had ſaid of it. Laſtly, all the circumſtances of that time ſhew, that this particular is a chimerical thing; for, on the one ſide, the Guiſes would have got nothing by turning Calviniſts; and, on the other, would have loſt all by it. They would have got nothing, ſince the Proteſtants, though they had ſided with them, would not have been headed by them excluſively of the two firſt princes of the blood, eſpecially of the prince of Condé, who was too ambitious to yield the command to foreigners, in a faction he had partly formed, having taken all proper meaſures to do every thing under his brother's name, and to ſucceed him, in caſe he ſhould return to the pale of the church of Rome. Beſides, ſuppoſing the princes of the blood had yielded to the Guiſes in ſo nice a point, the three Chatillons would not have done the ſame, but would have had the general direction of Calviniſm, which was afterwards ſo ſolemnly beſtowed upon them, after the deſertion of the prince of Navarre, and the death of the prince of Condé.’

[(§ α). Not in the firſt volume, but in the ſecond. For the reſt, the original of this treatiſe, containing 583 pages in 8vo, has not a word of what Varillas ſays that Meſſ. Du Puy boaſted to have found in it. It is of the year 1590, without the name of the place, or of the printer, but probably of James Metayer, and printed at Tours, whither that able printer had followed Henry III. Rem. Crit.]

I could eaſily reſt ſatisfied with theſe reaſons alledged by Varillas, tho' I know, that thoſe, who publiſh memoirs, leave out, and add, what they think fit (4). I can find no time, in which the Guiſes might have thought, that their forſaking the Catholic religion would be advantageous to them; and they never had leſs reaſon to think ſo, than in the reign of Francis II. And therefore what ground could there be for the deliberation, which Meſſieurs du Puy imparted to their friends as a great ſecret? What ſeems very likely to me, is, that, if the Guiſes had found that the Chatillons had a greater intereſt with the Catholic party than themſelves, they would have ſided with the Proteſtants; for, in all probability, ſelf-intereſt was the only cauſe of their zeal for the church of Rome, and they expreſſed a great averſion for the contrary party, only to ingratiate themſelves with the populace, and the clergy. What I ſay concerns the time, when private quarrels and libels had not yet exaſperated them: For, at laſt, when their political hatred made them execrable to the party perſecuted by them, they hated it in earneſt, and yet they cunningly diſſembled, when ſome political reaſons required it. I have read in one of the pieces that came out at that time (5), that cardinal Charles de Lorrain gave to underſtand, that by his advice the Sieur d'Aumale, his brother, favoured, as much as he could, the churches of Burgundy and Champagne, according to the edict; that he cauſed the informations drawn up againſt the Proteſtants, ſince the Declaration of the peace, to be burnt, at Chalons, in his preſence; that he knew, that Madame de Guiſe, his ſiſter, was a Proteſtant, and that ſhe took care, that the Sieur de Guiſe, her ſon, ſhould be ſecretly brought up in the confeſſion of Augsburg; at which, ſaid he, I am not diſpleaſed in the leaſt (6). He is there anſwered, among other things, I know very well, you make ſome German princes believe, that you take care to have your nephew brought up in their confeſſion; but it is only in order to get him inveſted with the four baronies of Metz, that he may be made a prince of the empire. To that end, when you paid your laſt homage, you made him harangue the nobility in the German language, to get the love of the country by degrees. Some pages before, he was told in a reproachful manner, that he had, with one hand, given ſome cups of gilt ſilver to the German miniſters at Saverne, and executed, with the other, the maſſacre of Vaſſy. During the Paris maſſacre, the duke of Guiſe harboured in his houſe above a hundred Proteſtants, whom he hoped to bring over to his party (7).

The author of the anſwer to cardinal de Lorrain's epiſtle was a good Proteſtant. What he confeſſes, concerning the hatred, which the Proteſtants had conceived againſt the Guiſes, is expreſſed by him thus: ‘It is, and it will always be, ſays he (8), the general conſent of our churches, to make head againſt all thoſe, whom you favour, directly or indirectly, and to ſide with your enemies, whatever quality or religion they may be of. I wonder you are ſtill ignorant of a thing ſo well known to the Pope, ſince he lately told the biſhop of Auxerre, that he would willingly give a hundred thouſand crowns, to make you a Huguenot, being perſuaded, conſidering the mortal hatred we have for you, that we would greateſt panegyriſts of that duke of Guiſe cannot clear him of a very unjuſt and violent uſurpation; for a man may be called an uſurper, not only when he uſurps the ſupreme authority, but alſo when he invades the power that belongs only to the princes of the blood, and deprives them of the ſhare they ought to have in the government of the ſtate, during the minority of a king. But this is what the Guiſes did under the reign of Francis II, who had married their neice (a), by making an ill uſe of that prince's weakneſs, without obſerving any rules of decency. Nay, it is ſaid, they had a deſign to put to death the firſt princes of the blood [B]. That uſurpation, attended with a horrid cruelty againſt the Proteſtants, occaſioned the famous conſpiracy of Amboiſe, whereby their authority was the more encreaſed. They carried things ſo far, as to get the ſecond prince of the blood condemned to death; and, doubtleſs, the ſentence would have been executed, and all the Proteſtants in the kingdom maſſacred, if Francis II had lived ſomewhat longer (b). After his death, the Proteſtants obtained liberty of conſcience, by virtue of the edict of January (c); and the Guiſes, notwithſtanding their authority, could not prevent it, as they had done in the aſſembly of the Notables [C] under Francis II: but they made that uſeleſs by the maſſacre of Vaſſy. It is in vain to ſay, it was not a premeditated deſign; the moſt flattering hiſtorians acknowledge ſome things, which plainly ſhew the contrary [D]. That maſſacre was ſoon followed

'would forſake our religion, if you made profeſſion 'of it. Wherefore, since this unanimous deſign of 'our churches againſt you cannot but proceed from 'a ſpecial goodneſs of GOD, we ought certainly to hope, 'that he will prevent the ill effects of your deſigns 'which you carry on by a cruel war, againſt our lives 'and fortunes.'

Mind theſe words of Brantome. Cardinal de Lorrain 'was very devout, and for that very reaſon 'very much hated by the Huguenots; yet he was 'accounted a great diſſembler and hypocrite. For I have 'heard him often diſcourſe of the confeſſion of Augſburg, and he ſeemed to approve it in great meaſure; 'which he did rather to pleaſe ſome Germans, than 'for any thing elſe. I heard him publickly talk at 'that rate at Rheims in his mother's preſence, the 'week before Eaſter (9).' See the remark [Q] of the article LORRAIN.

The following paſſage is not leſs remarkable. I take it from a piece, which Du Pleſſis Mornay wrote, in in April 1589, to juſtify Henry III, for joining with the king of Navarre. He was to anſwer the clamours of the league about the king's confederacy with the Huguenots. Du Pleſſis alledges, not only the king of Spain's alliances with Proteſtant princes, but alſo what had been done by the Guiſes. 'We need not 'go farther than our leaguers. How often did the 'late duke of Guiſe endeavour to treat with the 'king of Navarre, and thoſe of his party? did he 'not write to many Proteſtant gentlemen? let them 'remember what he uſed to ſay: Friend, I am no 'enemy to thy religion: if one miniſter is not enough 'for thee, take two. Who does not know the going 'backward and forward of the vice-ſeneſchal of Montelimar to Rochelle from the duke of Mayenne; 'what he made him ſay, that he was willing to be 'his ſervant, that he was no enemy to his religion, that 'his mother had bred him up in it, that a way might 'be found for an accommodation; that, upon his 'word, he would come to him with four horſes; 'that he would give him his wife and children as 'hoſtages; at that very time that he was upon his 'return from Caſtillon, and made a great ſhew of 'devotion and zeal for the Church? and indeed he 'did not ſcruple to make uſe of Lutheran reiſters, 'who publickly received the ſacrament in their own 'way in his army: and the letters he lately wrote 'to his agent may be ſeen, wherein he ſays, that he 'has taken up arms to exterminate the ſacramentarian 'Huguenots, but not thoſe of the confeſſion of Augſburg, whom he loves and intends to preſerve; and 'yet they have not been leſs condemned by the Pope 'than others, and they were the firſt, who roſe up 'againſt the church of Rome (10).'

[B] It is ſaid he had a deſign to put to death the firſt princes of the blood.] 'One cannot read without horror what was ſaid at that time (11), and 'printed ſince. That the Guiſes, being afraid of the 'king of Navarre's reſentment, and being of opinion 'that their authority would never be ſettled, as long 'as there ſhould remain a prince of the blood to oppoſe it, undertook to make away with them; and 'that the method they had pitched upon was ſuch, 'that, if their deſign had ſucceeded, all the royal 'family would have been deſtroyed. That the king, 'to whom they gave to underſtand, how important it 'was not to ſuffer a prince to live, who might revenge the death of the prince of Condé, was to 'ſend for the king of Navarre into his chamber. 'That he ſhould upbraid him with the crimes of 'his brother in very ſharp words, and tell him he 'had juſt reaſons to complain of him too. That the 'prince would boldly deny the thing, or at leaſt vindicate himſelf too warmly; whereupon he ſhould be 'ſtabbed by ſome men lying in wait, to whom the 'king ſhould make a ſign. It is further ſaid, that 'this prince was informed of the danger he was 'threatened with, and that, after he had been a long 'time uncertain what he ſhould do, he reſolved to 'venture himſelf; and that, as he was going into the 'king's chamber, he told one of his moſt faithful 'ſervants; If I happen to ſink under the multitude 'and treachery of my enemies, take my bloody ſhirt, 'and carry it to my wife and to my ſon. My blood 'will ſuggeſt to them what they ought to do, to revenge my death. That, afterwards, he went to the 'king, who either durſt not, or would not, give the 'ſignal agreed upon; and that Guiſe, being vexed 'at the ill ſucceſs of that attempt, cried out to thoſe, 'who were with him: Oh, what a poor prince have 'we got! (12).'

[C] As they had done in the aſſembly of the Notables.] It was held at Fontainebleau, in Auguſt, 1560 (13). The admiral preſented a petition in the name of all the Proteſtants of France, wherein they deſired to have churches for the public exerciſe of their religion. John de Monluc, biſhop of Valence, voted for the admiral; but the duke of Guiſe, and the cardinal his brother, did ſo violently oppoſe that petition, that it was rejected. They were like to eſtabliſh an inquiſition in France (14). They uſed their utmoſt endeavours towards it; and the chancellor, in order to ward off that blow, bethought himſelf of propoſing to the king the edict of Romorantin, which was very ſevere againſt the Proteſtants. From whence it appears, that all the calamities of the civil-wars of thoſe times ought to be imputed to thoſe two brothers. They oppoſed the granting of liberty of conſcience to the Proteſtants; they promoted perſecution, and introduced bloody maxims into the kingdom, contrary to the moſt eſſential and moſt indefeaſible right that a man can enjoy, and which ſovereigns ought to look upon as the moſt inviolable.

followed by a religious war, as the Guiſes expected. The ſucceſs of that war proved fatal to both parties, and conſequently very pernicious to France. The Guiſes were the only gainers by it. Our duke of Guiſe had the art to engroſs to himſelf all the glory of the battle of Dreux; and, in all probability, the taking of Orleans would have enabled him to deſtroy the reformed religion, when he was aſſaſſinated by Poltrot. He died of his wound (d) the 24th of February 1563, at 44 years of age (e) [E]. It is ſaid, he proteſted upon his death-bed, that he had no hand in the maſſacre at Vaſſy (f); but I doubt whether ſuch a proteſtation can counterballance the proofs we have of the contrary [F]. The writers of his party do very much commend him for a Chriſtian maxim, which he would uſe his intereſt with thoſe of his party to obtain their conſent, in order to prevent Calviniſm's taking root in France, they returned to Joinville, where they intended to have ſome diverſion for ſome days (17). IV. That the ducheſs-Dowager of Guiſe, their mother, who lived a very retired life at Joinville (18), uſed her intereſt with them, to perſuade them not to ſuffer any longer ſo near them the temple of Vaſſy, whoſe contagion would quickly reach Joinville. V. That the duke of Guiſe being reſolved to comply with his mother's deſires, as far as he could do it without infringing the edicts, went through Vaſſy with cardinal de Guiſe his youngeſt brother (19). VI. That he was far from having any violent deſign, ſince he ſuppoſed that his bare preſence would be ſufficient to prevent the aſſemblies of the Calviniſts, wherever he ſhould be. VII. That he came to Vaſſy the firſt day of March 1562, and that being forced to interrupt his prayers during maſs, becauſe the Calviniſts, whoſe temple was very near the church, fell a ſinging their pſalms . . . . he ſent them them word, that he deſired they would leave off ſinging for a quarter of an hour, aſſuring them they might afterwards go on, becauſe maſs would be over by that time.

I need only make two reflexions upon this account. I. It plainly appears from it, that the duke of Guiſe deſigned to have the edict repealed, and took meaſures to attack the Huguenots; and that, beſides this general diſpoſition, he paſſed through Vaſſy, only after he had promiſed his mother to comply with the great deſire ſhe expreſſed, that the heretics ſhould not preach there. It is not therefore likely, that he went to Vaſſy, without a premeditated deſign of uſing violent means againſt the Proteſtants. II. Varillas could not diſſemble the truth, without putting together ſome facts that contradict one another. For, in the firſt place, how could the duke of Guiſe have performed his promiſe to his mother, if he had intended, that the Calviniſts ſhould freely ſing their pſalms, as ſoon as the maſs was over? This is a contradiction; and therefore it muſt be confeſſed, either that he never acquainted the Calviniſts, that he had no deſign to diſturb them in their pious exerciſes, or that he did not go to Vaſſy, in order to ſatisfy the ducheſs dowager of Guiſe, or that he ſent a falſe meſſage. The laſt thing is ſo unworthy of a man of honour, that it cannot be imputed to the duke of Guiſe, if one has a mind to juſtify him; and therefore we muſt ſtick to the other two, both which contradict Varillas; ſo that the duke of Guiſe cannot be juſtified, without giving the lye to the hiſtorians, that are moſt favourable to him. In the ſecond place, it is not true, that the duke ſuppoſed his preſence would be ſufficient to prevent the aſſemblies of the Proteſtants. He knew that people, as greedy of ſermons as they were, who had purchaſed the liberty of preaching at the price of ſo many perſecutions and capital puniſhments, would not renounce their privilege by reaſon of his preſence. Thirdly, had that duke ſuppoſed, that his preſence would prevent their aſſemblies, he could not have gone thither, without infringing the king's edicts; from whence it plainly follows, that he contradicts himſelf, in Varillas, when he ſuppoſes, that his bare preſence will prevent the Proteſtants meeting at Vaſſy; and yet that he will comply with his mother's deſire no farther, than he can do it without infringing the edicts. It was impoſſible for him to ſatisfy his mother without breaking that aſſembly; and Varillas owns, that at leaſt he intended to break it by his preſence. Beſides, he could not break it without acting againſt the laſt edict; and therefore he is repreſented as acting inconſiſtently. Hiſtorians may be commonly reduced to this extremity, when they endeavour to throw a veil over the moſt glaring truths.

I might add ſeveral particulars (20), whereby it plainly appears that the duke of Guiſe intended to get the edict of January repealed; but we need only conſider what he himſelf confeſſed, as we find it in Davila. When the tumult of Vaſſy was over, the duke of Guiſe ſent for the judge of that place, and ſeverely reproved him for allowing the Huguenots ſuch a pernicious liberty of meeting together. The judge alledged, for his excuſe, the kings edict, whereby thoſe aſſemblies were permitted. The duke, being no leſs angry at that anſwer than at the thing it ſelf, laid his hand upon his ſword, and ſaid, the edge of this ſword ſhall quickly cut that edict, ſo cloſely faſtened. It is nature that ſpeaks on this occaſion; and it is not the firſt inſtance of a fit of anger that has betrayed the greateſt diſſemblers. Thoſe words did not fall to the ground; they were alledged as a ſtrong proof of the violent deſigns of the duke of Guiſe. Davila makes that obſervation. His words are theſe. Finito il tumulto, il Duca di Guiſa, chiamato à ſe l'ufficiale del luogo comminciò con gravi parole à riprenderlo, che permetteſſe in danno de paſſaggieri queſta perniciosa licenza: & iſcuſando egli di non poterle impedire per la permiſſione dell' editto di Gennaio, che concedeva le radunanze publiche a gli Ugonotti, il Duca ſdegnato non meno della riſpoſta, che del fatto, meſſa la mano sù la ſpada, replicò pieno di colera, che l'editto così ſtrettamente legato, preſto ſi troncarebbe con il filo di quella: dalle quali parole dette nell' ardore dell' ira, e non traſcurate da quelli, ch'erano preſenti, molti poi l'arguirono per autore, e per machinatore delle guerre ſeguenti (21). The Proteſtant hiſtorians afford many other circumſtances againſt the duke of Guiſe. If it be ſaid, that they ought to be miſtruſted, coming from ſuch hands, what can one ſay againſt Davila?

[E] He died . . . . . the twenty fourth of February 1563, at forty four years of age.] Father du Londel, tho' an exact man, knew not the true time of his death: he places it on the twenty ſixth of Febuary (22). The miſtake, which remains ſtill in Moreri's dictionary, is much more conſiderable. The death of that duke of Guiſe is placed therein the year 1553 (23). I wonder Mr de Valincourt mentions neither the year nor the day of that death, nor the year of the birth, in the life publiſhed by him in 1681 (24); but I am more ſurpriſed ſtill, that he makes him fifty years old.

[F] I know not whether ſuch a proteſtation can counterballance the proofs we have to the contrary.] We know no longer what to think of the proteſtations of dying people: the authors, who have written for and againſt the conſpiracy declared in England by Titus Oates, produce ſome accuſed perſons, who proteſted to the laſt breath, that they were innocent, and ſome witneſſes, who did the ſame. The accuſed, or the witneſſes, muſt needs make falſe proteſtations at the point of death; ſo that the depoſitions of dying people cannot afford us a fence againſt Scepticiſm (25). The ſentence of Lucretius, that men at laſt pull off the maſk, at the point of death (26), is not always true. A falſe ſhame does often attend us to our very graves; and the love of glory, the idol of great men, does frequently oblige them to conceal all their life-time what might blot their reputation. The power of a prevailing paſſion is ſo great, that the proſpect of approaching death is not always able to put a ſtop to it. This was obſerved in Tiberius as to diſſimulation, his darling quality. 'Jam Tiberium corpus, nondum diſſimulatio deſerebat. Idem animi rigor, ſermone ac vultu intentus, quæſita interdum comitate, quamvis manifeſtam defectionem tegebat (27). —— Tiberius's ſtrength and limbs began now to fail him, but not his diſſimulation. The ſame ſtern diſpoſition, and earneſtneſs in look and ſpeech, ſometimes with an affectation which they ſay he alledged againſt a Proteſtant, who had a mind to kill him. That maxim was not very well placed in his mouth [G]. It were to be wiſhed, that the Proteſtants had not printed ſo many libels and ſatires againſt that duke, and the cardinal his brother [H]; wherein they acted neither according to the rules of the goſpel, nor

‘tion of courteſy, covered a too plain decay.’ The hiſtory of the duke d'Epernon affords another inſtance of what I ſay. He was a very haughty man, and his haughtineſs appeared all along in all his words and actions. The very day on which he died, he made it appear, that he was ſtill animated with the ſame ſpirit, though a ſickneſs, and a very old age, had prodigiouſly weakened him. A clergy-man, who attended upon him, having made him ſay, that he forgave his enemies, and all his domeſtics who had diſpleaſed him, bethought himſelf of aſking him, whether he aſked pardon of his domeſtics, whom he might have offended: the reaſon why he put ſuch a queſtion to the duke was, becauſe, ſome few days before, he had ill uſed a perſon, who was in his ſervice. He expreſſed ſome uneaſineſs at ſuch a propoſition, and anſwered with an angry tone, that it was enough for him to forgive thoſe, who had diſpleaſed him, and that he never heard any body ſay, that, in order to die like a good Chriſtian, a maſter ought to beg pardon of his ſervants (28). The duke of Guiſe, who is accuſed of the maſſacre at Vaſſy, having made it his buſineſs all along to ſalve appearances, and pretending to more probity and candor than the other courtiers, ſaid, and proteſted a thouſand times, that he was innocent of that maſſacre; and his intereſt required he ſhould make ſuch a proteſtation; becauſe, if he had owned the thing, he would have declared himſelf to be the firſt cauſe of the calamities of France, and would have been publickly deteſted upon that account. He was therefore engaged to proteſt the ſame thing to his laſt hour, not only for fear his memory ſhould be deteſted by all thoſe, who abhorred the civil-wars, but alſo for fear all Europe ſhould know, that he had been a lyar in all the proteſtations he had made, that he had no hand in the ſlaughter committed at Vaſſy. Few ambitious men can reſolve to retract, when a retractation is ſo ſhameful.

But this is not the only thing that can be ſaid againſt the laſt words of dying people; moſt things that are told of them may be called into queſtion, becauſe they are only grounded upon the teſtimony of ſuſpected perſons (29). Who can aſſure us, that a man made ſuch a declaration when he was dying, and that his friends or relations, who are concerned in his glory, do not aſcribe thoſe words to him, in order to make the world believe, that he was innocent? there is nothing more eaſy than to give out, that ſuch a man declared ſuch a thing, when he was a dying, and that thoſe, who ſaw him dye, ſay ſo. If it be a thing, wherein the public is concerned, the news of it will be ſpread all over a great town in an hour's time: every body writes it to his friends; none goes about to enquire into the truth of it; it is immediately printed in the gazette; and you may be ſure, that, as long as the world laſts, the declaration of that dying man will be alledged, with as much confidence, as if it had been verified by the moſt ſtrict enquiries of magiſtrates. In order to ſhew how little thoſe declarations ought to be depended upon, we need only conſider how that of the duke of Guiſe is related by Maimbourg and Varillas, two famous hiſtorians, who publiſhed their works much about the ſame time. The firſt affirms, upon Brantôme's authority, that the duke proteſted he had no hand in that diſorder, and yet begged GOD's pardon for it (30); but the other aſſures us, that he prayed GOD to forgive him all his faults, except that of Vaſſy (31). Reconcile theſe two things if you can; and remember, that the Catholics were highly concerned to make the world believe, that the duke of Guiſe had made ſuch a proteſtation upon his death-bed. They were thereby enabled to deny what the Proteſtants continually upbraided them with. What will not men do, to confute ſuch things, when they are influenced by a religious hatred?

[G] That maxim was not very well placed in his mouth.] Here follows a reflection of one of the Proteſtant Authors, who have written moſt vehemently againſt the French Dragoonades (32). ‘It is ſaid, that, during the ſiege of Roüen, a Proteſtant gentleman being brought to him (33), who had a deſign upon his life, and who had confeſſed, that it was not out of hatred to him, but that he thought he was bound to do it, to ſerve his religion; the duke diſmiſſed him, telling him, Get thee gone: if thy religion commands thee to aſſaſſinate thoſe, who never offended thee, mine will have me to give thee thy life, though I may juſtly deprive thee of it; judge which of the two religions is the beſt (34). This anſwer might be looked upon as a wiſe and Chriſtian one, if the duke had not been a Catholic, and at the head of a perſecuting army; but, when I conſider, that they are the words of a perſecutor, he muſt needs be laughed at, as a man who acts the part of a comedian, and ſports with religion, who, out of vanity and bravado, forgives a private man that deſerves death, whilſt he exerciſes a wild and abominable cruelty upon a great body of innocent people. Was not this duke of Guiſe of the ſame religion with Francis I, and Henry II? did he not approve and adviſe the edict of Chateau-Briant, and that of Romorantin, whereby the Proteſtants were to be put to death? did he not uſe his utmoſt endeavours to eſtabliſh the Inquiſition in France, whereby, properly ſpeaking, there had been a continual ſlaughter of men, and a court of juſtice always ſitting, and ſurrounded with executioners? was he not the chief promoter of the deſign, that was broke by the death of Francis II; which was to ſend troops into all the provinces, and to require, that every French-man ſhould ſubſcribe a formulary, and that thoſe, who ſhould refuſe it, ſhould be expelled the kingdom, (which was the mildeſt puniſhment) and deprived of all their eſtates? but how many would have been put to death? again, was it not the ſame duke, who ſuffered his men to ſlaughter many Proteſtants at Vaſſy, whilſt they were praying to GOD in a barn? in a word, was not his obſtinacy, in having thoſe poor people always puniſhed with death, the cauſe of the civil-wars of religion, which had never been in France, if they had been allowed to ſerve GOD in their own way? did he not do it out of a religious zeal? would he have done it, if he had been a heathen? would he not have tolerated the Proteſtants as well as the Papiſts? was not what he did approved by the Pope and the clergy? how then could he ſay, that his religion enjoined him to forgive them, who offended him, ſince it put him upon perſecuting and tormenting, a thouſand ways, a vaſt number of people, who did him no harm, and only deſired to ſerve GOD according to the dictates of their conſcience? ſuch is the enormous and comic turpitude of a perſecuting religion. A man of ſuch a religion will not ſcruple to proteſt, that, for his own part, he forgives a man of a different religion the injuries he has done him; and yet he ſends him to the gallows, or to the gallies, under pretence, that he does not hold the true faith, even tho' that perſon had been ſerviceable to him. Indeed that duke little thought of what he ſaid, ſince he durſt compare the two religions together, and prefer his to the other in point of charity. The gentleman, who had conſpired againſt him, thinking that his death would prove advantageous to the Proteſtant religion, did not follow the true doctrine of his party; for all Proteſtant divines ſay, preach, and maintain, that it is not lawful for any man to aſſaſſinate any body, in order to procure ſome advantage to his religion: but the duke, purſuant to a doctrine approved, and a thouſand times commanded in his religion, voted in the king's council for publiſhing edicts, whereby a vaſt number of good people ſhould be condemned to death, and made it his buſineſs to extirpate the Proteſtants by the moſt violent methods. Is it not a jeſt for a man, thus diſpoſed, to boaſt that he profeſſes a religion, which enjoins him to forgive? I beſeech the converters to conſider this. Their conduct is ſuch, that the fineſt maxims of Chriſtian morality, when alledged by them, are trifling and comical, or perfect nonſenſe.’

[H] It were to be wiſhed the Proteſtants had not printed ſo many libels and ſatires againſt this duke ...... and his brother.] In the aſſembly of the Notables above nor according to thoſe of prudence, ſince thoſe books exaſperated more and more a moſt potent enemy [I], and afforded him a pretence to keep up his hatred, and encreaſe the perſecution [K]. It would be an unjuſt thing to aſcribe to the whole body the impatience above-mentioned, cardinal de Lorrain ſaid, haughtily, that he gloried in being hated by the Huguenots, and expoſed to their fury; that they had diſperſed in Paris, and from thence in all the provinces of the kingdom, a vaſt number of libels, full of outrageous words, and furious threatnings againſt him, and the duke of Guiſe his brother; that, for his own part, he had twenty two in his hands, which he carefully preſerved, and that he took delight in ſhewing them, as being ſo many ſhining proofs of their zeal for religion, and of their inviolable fidelity to the king, who had been pleaſed to make them his miniſters (35). I repeat it again, it were to be wiſhed the Proteſtants had not publiſhed ſo many ſatirical pieces; they are to this day prejudicial, by reaſon of the reflections they afford to the miſſionaries. To give an inſtance of it; Maimbourg did not fail to make a malicious and ſatirical obſervation on what was ſaid by the cardinal concerning thoſe libels. ‘ And indeed it is manifeſt, that it was the uſual ſtile of the Huguenots, at that time, to revile unmercifully, by a thouſand ſcandalous libels and impudent ſatires, all thoſe, who did not favour them, without any regard to merit or quality, and without ſparing kings, princes, prelates, and what is moſt ſacred and inviolable among men. For my part, I can affirm, that I have ſeen a large collection in ten volumes in folio, made up of thoſe ſorry pieces, which the Huguenots publiſhed at that time againſt Henry II, and Francis II, againſt queen Catherine, when ſhe was not inclined to favour them; againſt the king of Navarre after he had ſided with the Catholics; but eſpecially againſt the duke of Guiſe, and cardinal de Lorrain archbiſhop of Rheims; wherein they brutiſhly inſerted, without judgment and wit, the moſt heinous calumnies and accuſations †, that can be invented by the moſt malicious and ſlandering men. So that any one who has never ſo little honour and good ſenſe, cannot peruſe thoſe fooliſh and inſolent writings, without expreſſing the utmoſt contempt for them, and a juſt indignation againſt thoſe impudent writers (36).’ Such are the odious reflections, which Maimbourg made upon thoſe libels. Thoſe, who anſwered his hiſtory of Calviniſm, did not fail to confute them. He adds (37), that cardinal de Lorrain, ‘ whoſe greatneſs of ſoul anſwered the greatneſs of his wit, did not revenge himſelf upon thoſe libellers, but by a noble contempt of their weak fury: notwithſtanding which, the magiſtrates, purſuant to their duty, apprehended ſome of them, who were dealt with according to the utmoſt ſeverity of the laws; whereby it is enacted, that they be uſed as public poiſoners. And indeed two of them were hanged ‡, viz. the author (38) of one of thoſe wicked libels, entituled, Le Tigre, and he who ſold it underhand.’

‡ Memoir. de Caſteln. lib. i, cap. vii. Whereupon they apprehended a printer, who had printed a book, intituled, Le Tigre, the ſuppoſed author whereof, and a merchant, were hanged.

[I] Theſe kind of writings exaſperated more and more a moſt potent enemy.] Maimbourg is in the wrong to ſay, that the cardinal de Lorrain, having a great ſoul, did not revenge himſelf upon thoſe libellers but by a noble contempt; for can there be a more violent and unjuſt vengeance than this? he made no enquiry after the private authors of thoſe libels, which is all that Maimbourg can pretend to ſay; but he exterminated, as much as he could, the whole body of the Reformed; he was the great promoter of penal laws, and of the capital puniſhments inflicted upon them; he endeavoured to bring them under the cruel yoke of the inquiſition. Was it not a more cruel vengeance, than if he had been contented to get the authors of thoſe ſatires puniſhed? it will appear from what follows, that it is not true, that he ſtifled his reſentment againſt thoſe writers.

(38) This is not true: See the following remark.

Caſtelnau, quoted by Maimbourg (39), makes this obſervation: The Huguenots publiſhed continually ſeveral injurious libels againſt the houſe of Guiſe. Whereupon a printer was apprehended, who had printed a ſmall book, intituled, Le Tigre, the reputed author whereof, and a merchant, were hanged upon that account. This account is not exact; we are not told what became of the printer, and it is not true, that the perſon ſuſpected of being the author of that book was hanged. Caſtelnau ſhould have ſaid as la Planche does, that the printer and the vender were hanged; but neither of them was the reputed author. I ſhall ſet down that hiſtorian's own words (40). ‘ The parliament made a ſtrict inquiry after thoſe, who printed and ſold the pieces, that were handed about againſt the Guiſes. They ſpent ſome days in it, with ſo good ſucceſs, that they came to know, at laſt, who had printed a ſmall book, very ſatirical, intituled, Le Tigre. A counſellor, called du Lion, was intruſted with that employment, which he willingly accepted, being promiſed an office of preſident in the parliament of Bourdeaux, which he might ſell if he thought fit. The printer, called Martin l'Hommet, was found out with the book in his hands. Being asked from whom he had it, he anſwered, he had it from an unknown perſon; and at laſt he accuſed ſeveral people of having ſeen and read it; they were proſecuted for it, but they made their eſcape. As they were carrying that printer to the place of execution, a merchant of Roüen, who was a man in pretty good circumſtances, ſeeing the mob very much incenſed againſt him, ſaid only to them, good people, is it not enough for him that he muſt die? Let the executioner perform his duty. Will you torment him more than his ſentence imports? (Now he knew nothing of the crime, for which he was to be hanged, and was lighting from his horſe at an inn hard by). He had no ſooner ſpoke thoſe words, but ſome prieſts came up to him, calling him a Huguenot, and that man's accomplice; and immediately the mob fell upon him, and beat him unmercifully. Whereupon ſome officers of juſtice came to him, and, to refreſh him, carried him to goal, whither du Lion forthwith repaired, and asked him ſeveral queſtions about the book, intituled, Le Tigre, and what he had ſaid to the mob. That poor merchant ſwore he knew nothing of the book, and had never ſeen it, nor heard of the Meſſieurs de Guiſe; adding, that he was a merchant, and minded nothing but his own concerns.’ He proteſted, that the man that was going to be hanged was wholly unknown to him; but that he had been moved with pity, and had exhorted the people to let the executioner perform his duty. He deſired his life and converſation ſhould be inquired into, ſubmitting to every body's judgment. ‘ Du Lion, without any further proceedings, made his report to the parliament, and to the judges deputed by them, who condemned him to be hanged in the Place Maubert, where the printer had been executed. Some days after, du Lion, being at ſupper, in a great company, fell a jeſting upon that poor merchant. His own words were made uſe of, to ſhew him the injuſtice of that ſentence. How can it be helped? ſaid he; there was a neceſſity to give ſome ſatisfaction to the cardinal, ſince we could not apprehend the author, otherwiſe we had never been quiet.’ Judge whether the Guiſes were unconcerned at the ſatires publiſhed againſt them: the following paſſage of Brantôme ſhews how tender they were on that point. ‘ Many libels came out at that time (41) againſt thoſe, who governed the kingdom; but none was ſharper and more offenſive than an invective, intituled, Le Tigre, (in imitation of Cicero's firſt invective againſt Catiline) becauſe it mentioned the love-intrigues of a very great and handſome lady, married to a great man related to her. If the author had been apprehended, if he had had ten thouſand lives he would have loſt them; for that great man and that great lady were extremely vexed and almoſt diſtracted at it (42).’ I have ſaid in another place (43), that Francis Hotmanus was accounted the author of that ſatire.

[K] . . . . and gave him a pretence to keep up his hatred, and encreaſe the perſecution.] Though you make the Guiſes never ſo wicked, yet it is certain, that the libellers imputed to them many things, which they had not done. Whoever goes about to write, without having been concerned in public affairs, or without conſulting good memoirs, will unavoidably advance many falſities, if he writes againſt a man, by whom he has been ill uſed. Such writers are willing to revenge themſelves, and to defame their perſecutors: being thus diſpoſed, they believe whatever they hear; and, though they do not even believe it, they think patience of ſome private perſons, and their itching deſire of writing ſatirical books [L]. This duke of Guiſe had been made duke d'Aumale, and governor of Dauphiné, in the year 1547 (g). He was knight of the order, high-ſteward, great-chamberlain, and grand veneur of France (h). His barony of Joinville, which was under the juriſdiction of the town of Vaſſy (i), was erected into a principality in 1552 (k), and ſome villages belonging to the ſame town were added to it (l). He married Anne d'Eſte, daughter of Hercules d'Eſte, ſecond of that name, duke of Ferrara, the 4th of December 1549 (m), and had ſeveral children by her. If what we read in the hiſtory of the reformed churches of France be true, he diſcovered, ſome time before he died, that he did not believe his wife's virtue had been always unſpotted [M].

they may lawfully publiſh it, ſince they have heard it. Now, when thoſe who are defamed in thoſe libels, conſider, that they are charged with crimes of which they are perfectly innocent, they look upon the authors and approvers of them as men without honour and conſcience; they think they can never hate them too much, and fancy there is no harm in exterminating ſuch calumniators, or favourers of calumny. It is therefore certain, that thoſe, who publiſh ſuch defamatory libels, vent their ſpleen, and give a free ſcope to their zeal, with great imprudence. The whole party pays too dear for it.

[L] It would be unjuſt to aſcribe to the whole body the impatience of ſome private perſons, and their itching deſire of writing ſatirical books.] We may judge of the XVIth century by the preſent time (44). We know, that thoſe, who every day publiſh a vaſt number of anonymous libels, make no figure in the world. They live in ſuch an obſcurity, that the moſt curious inquirers cannot find them out; and, when ſome of thoſe writers come to be known, it frequently appears, that they are neither good Chriſtians, nor honeſt men. I am perſuaded, that moſt of thoſe, who wrote thoſe many libels, whereof Maimbourg pretends to have ſeen ten large volumes, were the leſs noble parts of the reformed church of France. Moſt of them were unknown, and never owned by the party, and it was not neceſſary they ſhould be many. Five or ſix men naturally ſatirical, who have nothing elſe to do, and get ſome money by it, will fill a large kingdom with their libels in leſs than thirty years. Is it reaſonable to impute to a great body the faults of a few men? In order to have a right notion of them, it is not ſufficient to ſay, that they are credulous; it muſt be further ſaid, that they are cheats: they publiſh many things, which they know to be falſe; for they themſelves invent them. Here follows a paſſage of Mezerai concerning ſuch impoſtures (45). 'Some have been of opinion, that thoſe memoirs (46) were ſuppoſititious; and the moſt equitable perſons thought, that, if they were true, they only proceeded from the deep melancholy of that advocate, who, having received ſome injury from the Huguenots, was extremely incenſed againſt them. It is highly probable, that thoſe memoirs were forged by the Minions, or the Huguenots, or by the queen-mother, all mortal enemies to the Guiſes; and it is certain they invented many other calumnies to make them odious. The Guiſes took care to be even with them; and therefore little credit ought to be given to the writings, or relations of that time, unleſs they be throughly examined.'

[M] He did not believe his wife's virtue had been always unſpotted.] 'As to the manner how he died, the biſhop of Riez, whoſe name was Carles, made a very impertinent diſcourſe about it, aſcribing to him ſeveral theological words, and expreſſions taken from the holy ſcripture, which however he had never looked into. Among other things, thinking to praiſe him, he does a great deal of wrong to the ducheſs, his widow, to whom he confeſſes he was not always a faithful husband, which he deſires ſhe would forgive, as he forgives her the like (47).' This is what I find in a book of Beza. It is not very likely, that a biſhop ſhould have given ſuch a turn to the laſt words of his hero, to the great diſhonour of the widow and her children. Wherefore I miſtruſted Beza, and endeavoured to conſult the book of Lancelot Carles; and, not being able to find it, I deſired Mr de Larroque to give me ſome information about it. He was pleaſed to ſend me the following anſwer. 'The letter of Carles, biſhop of Riez, to Charles IX, concerning the laſt words of the duke of Guiſe, has been printed three times (48), as it appears from the advertiſement to the reader, prefixed to the ſecond French edition; where it is ſaid, that what was printed before this, was but an incorrect copy, which the author, who was preſent at that diſcourſe, wrote ſummarily, to ſerve him for a memorandum. I have not been able to meet with the firſt edition; and therefore I cannot tell whether what you have read in another book was contained in it. There is no ſuch thing in the ſecond; for that duke ſpeaks to his wife in the following manner. We have been long united by the holy bond of faith and friendſhip, having all things in common. You know, that I always loved and eſteemed you, as much as any wife can be, and that our mutual affection has been the ſame all the time we have been married, as I always made it my buſineſs to convince you of it, and you have done the like to me. I do not deny that the ſuggeſtions and frailties of youth made me ſometimes take a courſe, at which you may have been offended: I beſeech you to forgive me. I muſt needs ſay, that I am none of the greateſt ſinners in that reſpect, as I am none of the leaſt, though I am one of the moſt guilty in the ſight of GOD. But you know how reſpectfully I have behaved my ſelf towards you of late years, avoiding all occaſions of giving you the leaſt diſcontent. Page 84, 85, 86, 87. This paſſage has been tranſlated into Latin by John le Vieux in the following manner. Nos enim arctiſſimo matrimonii vinculo conjugati & conſociati ſumus, ut individuam non bonorum duntaxat, ſed etiam conſiliorum & voluntatum ſine ulla exceptione, communitatem ſocietatemque ſervaremus. Et certè ut nihil mihi optabilius, aut antiquius adhuc fuit, quam ut nodum illum amabiliſſimum ſanctè conſtrictum tenerem; ſic me viciſſim inviolabili obſervantia & officio coluiſti. page 30.'

Since Mr de Larroque could not find a copy of the firſt edition, I can ſay nothing either for or againſt Beza. Only I may conjecture, that he has not calumniated the biſhop of Riez; for the advertiſement, prefixed to the ſecond edition, intimates plainly enough, that the firſt was in great diſorder, and that ſome paſſages were left out, or placed otherwiſe. Now, ſince the Latin tranſlator thought himſelf obliged to leave out of the ſecond, what remained in it concerning the amorous intrigues of the duke of Guiſe; it is likely, that Lancelot Carles left out of the firſt what he had inſerted in it, concerning the gallantries of the ducheſs. Which ſhews how neceſſary it is to keep the firſt editions, and to diſtruſt tranſlators. You ſee, that John le Vieux, or John le Vieil (49), did boldly leave out whatever concerned the duke of Guiſe's adulteries, in the original.

[A] He had a certain mixture of good and bad qualities.] A modern author (1) deſcribes this character in the following manner. 'He wanted nothing, either good or bad, that was neceſſary to make him ſucceed in what he was fully reſolved upon . . . He was a prince, who . . . . had all the noble qualities, and all the perfections of body and mind, that are moſt proper to charm one's heart, and to procure to thoſe, that are endowed with them, an abſolute empire over the people; and indeed they were in a manner bewitched with him, and doted upon him. For he was a man of a tall ſtature, admirably proportioned, ſtate. He wanted no ability, on the one ſide, to find out the way of doing it; and, on the other, he was wicked enough to put it in execution. He ſo far indulged his ambition, that, after he had brought a thouſand calamities upon the kingdom, he himſelf was undone by it. He carried things to ſuch extremities, that no other expedient could be found out to put a ſtop to his attempts, than putting him to death. The manner how Henry III made away with him, and the cardinal de Guiſe, in the caſtle of Blois, during the ſitting of the ſtates (a), is ſo well known, that I ſhall not dwell upon it. I ſhall only obſerve, that many hiſtorians have advanced a falſity, in ſaying, that, ſoon after the execution of the duke of Guiſe, the Pope's legate (b) ſpoke to the king ſo unconcernedly, or rather ſo chearfully [B], that it was thought that prince and the court of Rome acted in concert. It may be ſaid, that the violent reſolution of the court of France, upon that occaſion, was one of thoſe maſter-pieces of ſtate-policy, which cannot be excuſed, but becauſe they are abſolutely neceſſary to the public good; for, if the duke of Guiſe had not been killed, tioned, and like that which is aſcribed to heroes, having all the features of his face extremely fine, quick and ſparkling eyes; a large, ſmooth, and ſerene forehead, attended with a pleaſant ſmile, more charming ſtill, than the obliging words he ſpoke to all thoſe, who were fond of approaching him; a lively, clear, and red complexion . . . . He had a grave and ſtately gate, without any ſhew of pride or affectation; and there was in his carriage a certain air of heroical grandeur, intermixed with ſweetneſs, boldneſs, and loftineſs, without any thing diſagreeable; which inſpired, all at once, love, fear, and reſpect, into all thoſe, with whom he diſcourſed. This admirable outſide was attended with an inſide more wonderful ſtill, by reaſon of the noble qualities of a truly great ſoul, being liberal and magnificent, ſparing nothing to get creatures, and to gain all ſorts of people, eſpecially the nobility and military men; civil, obliging, popular; always ready to do good to thoſe, who made their application to him; generous, magnanimous, incapable of hurting any body, even his greateſt enemies, except in an honourable way; extreamly perſuaſive, diſſembling under the appearance of a great ſincerity; wiſe and prudent in his counſels; bold, quick, and valiant, in the execution; bearing chearfully all the inconveniences of war, as the meaneſt ſoldier; expoſing himſelf to the greateſt dangers, in order to ſucceed in his enterprizes . . . . But as there is no gold mine, wherein that precious metal is to be found pure and without mixture of a great deal of earth; ſo the great natural endowments of the duke of Guiſe were corrupted by a mixture of many faults and vices; the greateſt of which was his unſatiable deſire of grandeur and glory, and that vaſt ambition, to which he made every thing ſubſervient; being, beſides, raſh, preſumptuous, and ſelf-conceited, deſpiſing the opinion of other men, without ſeeming to do ſo; reſerved, cunning, little ſincere, and no true friend; regarding no body but himſelf, tho' he was the moſt careſſing and the moſt officious man in the world; doing no good to any body, but in order to gain his end the more eaſily; and always covering his vaſt deſigns with the ſpecious pretence of the public good, and the preſervation of the the true religion; truſting too much to his good fortune; blind in his proſperity, which made him reliſh his preſent happineſs with ſo much pleaſure, that he took no care to provide for the time to come; laſtly, too fond of women, whom nevertheleſs he cunningly made uſe of, to promote his great deſigns, though they were not ſenſible of it.' The dangerous ſpirit of the Guiſes, which Francis I did ſo well diſcover, that he adviſed his ſon to beware of it, grew worſe and worſe in every generation. 'Hoc adverterat Rex Franciſcus I. & levia licet quæ tunc ab iis cæpta, cavenda nihilominus liberis ſuis edixerat, ut parva ex queis magnarum rerum motus orirentur: nunquam ſatis fidam potentiam, ubi nimia eſt, rebus ſuis proſpicerent, nec majores domus eos crearent, quibus mos erat vim principis complecti, nomen remittere. Utinam Henricus II. patris conſilium haud aſpernando liberis ſuis conſuluiſſet, nec Guiſianos rebus gerendis præfeciſſet (2). —— King Francis I obſerved this, and cautioned his children to guard againſt their attempts, though then but trivial, ſince great commotions might ariſe from ſmall beginnings; he repreſented to them that too great power is never to be truſted; he bid them take care of themſelves, nor create thoſe mayors of the palace, who were wont to exerciſe the ſovereignty, without the name. It were to be wiſhed, Henry II, remembering his father's advice, had conſulted the good of his children, and not have placed the Guiſes at the head of affairs.' What an ancient poet ſaid of the Roman people, may be applied to them.

Degenerate more, thro' each deſcent, we grow,
And ſons more vices, than their fathers, know.

[B] The Pope's legate ſpoke to the king . . . . in a chearful manner.] There are few facts more proper than this is to confirm the uncertainty of hiſtory. I ſhall mention it, as I uſe to do, in the very words of the author from whom I have it.

'Davila ſays, that, after that (4), the king, coming down into the court, walked a long time with the legate, to whom he gave an account of all his reaſons, which that hiſtorian ſets down at large, as if he had been preſent at that long conference, and heard every word the king ſpoke to that cardinal; whoſe political reflexions he likewiſe mentions, and the anſwer he made to the king's long diſcourſe. For he ſays, that, for fear of leſſening that Prince's affection to the holy ſee, he aſſured him that the Pope . . . . He adds, that the king promiſed him upon his oath . . . . that he would allow of no other religion in his kingdom than the Roman Catholic. That, after ſuch an oath, the legate did not think fit to proceed further in that conference and, without ſpeaking to him in favour of the prelates that were priſoners, he treated with him with the ſame confidence as he had done before. Nay, ſome ſay †, that his free behaviour towards the king (for ſometimes he whiſpered in his ear, and laughed with him) created a belief, that the king had acted in concert with the court of Rome: and they add, with Davila, that it gave the king occaſion to proceed further, and to make away with the cardinal de Guiſe, perceiving how little the legate was concerned for the impriſonment of the cardinal. This is what thoſe authors tell us very ſeriouſly, as a certain truth; that conference, as they ſay, having been held in every body's ſight, in the court of the caſtle of Blois. And yet nothing can be more falſe; and the whole narrative of Davila is one of thoſe fictions, which none but a poet is allowed to invent. The proof of it is evident and unanſwerable. We have the printed memoirs of the life of the cardinal Moroſini, written in Italian very elegantly, and with great force, by Monſignor Stephano Coſmi, archbiſhop of Spalato, who was pleaſed to ſend them to me from Venice above three years ago; and it appears by the letters ‡ of that cardinal legate to cardinal Montalto, nephew to Pope Sixtus V, to whom he gives an exact account of what happened the twenty third of December, and the following days, that, though he inſtantly deſired, at the requeſt of the ducheſs of Nemours, to be admitted to the king's audience, that day, in the morning, he could not ſo much as get into the caſtle, and had not the deſired audience but on the twenty ſixth, three days after the cardinal had been killed. What will become then of all thoſe fine diſcourſes, and of all the particulars of killed, the ſtates of the kingdom would doubtleſs have done for him, what they had done in former times for Pepin and Hugh Capet [C]: But the transferring of the crown would have been attended with conſequences much more fatal to the whole kingdom [D] in the XVIth century, than they were in the time of Pepin and Capet. The party of the duke of Guiſe was ſo powerful, that, notwithſtanding the execution of Blois, whereby they loſt their head, they maintained themſelves in ſuch a manner, as to deſtroy the king himſelf, and force Henry IV to change his religion. France cannot remember that time without bluſhing; for there never was any democracy, where the authority and majeſty of kings were ſo ſlighted, as they were then in that kingdom. The preachers furiouſly inveighed againſt the king [E], and repreſented the duke of Guiſe

'of the pretended conference on the twenty third day, and of the cardinal's appearing ſo eaſy, or rather ſo chearful, and ſpeaking in the king's ear, and laughing heartily, which made people believe, that he acted in concert with the king, who, perceiving his unconcernedneſs, reſolved to proceed further, and to get alſo the cardinal de Guiſe put to death? This is writing a hiſtory of one's own invention, that is, a meer fable, as two Proteſtant writers ‡ have done in this particular, viz. d'Aubigné, and the author of the diſcourſe, De ce qui s'eſt paſſé à Blois juſqu'à la mort du Duc de Guiſe; — What paſſed at Blois till the death of the duke of Guiſe. And our Catholic hiſtorians, being deceived by thoſe Huguenots, have alſo deceived their readers (5).' If hiſtorians are ſo groſsly miſtaken about things of ſuch a nature, how can we rely upon a thouſand things more difficult to be known, which are related by them with ſo much confidence? this falſity, tho' confuted by Maimbourg, is ſtill to be found in modern books: I have juſt now read it in a romantic hiſtory of the duke of Guiſe (6).

[C] The States .... would have done for him what they had done in former times for Hugh Capet.] Doubtleſs the leaguers deſigned to degrade Henry III, and confine him to a monaſtery (7), and to place the duke of Guiſe on the throne. The ducheſs of Mompenſier, ſiſter to that duke, made no myſtery of it. She (8) *one day told ſeveral people, ſhewing them her gold ſcizars , that they would quickly ſerve to ſhave the king, that he might be ſhut up in a monaſtery, and that the throne, of which he was unworthy, might be filled by a man better qualified to reign and deſtroy the heretics. That man was her brother. Mr Maimbourg does not deny, that this duke aſpired to the crown, at leaſt after the death of the Valois. He entered, ſays he , into the League, to be the head of a party, which, after the death of the Valois, might raiſe him higher ſtill. Among other preparations for it, a genealogy had been publiſhed, whereby it appeared that the houſe of Lorrain derived their original from Charlemagne (9). The deſign of it was to intimate, that the crown would be reſtored to the deſcendants of that king, who had been deprived of it by Hugh Capet. The decrees of providence break through all obſtacles, Fata viam invenient: but, humanly ſpeaking, it may be ſaid, that Henry III made way for them, by cauſing the duke of Guiſe to be put to death; for if, on the one ſide, the ſituation of the king of Navarre enabled him to oppoſe the uſurpation with great vigour; it is certain, on the other ſide, that never was a more favourable concourſe of diſpoſitions to ſettle the duke of Guiſe upon the throne. A modern author rightly obſerves, that nothing but the power of fate could ſtop that duke. The event, ſays he (10), made it appear, that providence, which abſolutely diſpoſes of empires, deſigned to take that of France from the Valois, and to transfer it to the Bourbons; and there was a neceſſity, that whatever could oppoſe it ſhould yield to the invincible power of that decree, which no conſpiracy, no league, no fortune, no earthly power, was able to reſiſt. Apply here what Horace ſo well ſays of fortune:

Te ſemper anteit ſæva Neceſſitas
Clavos trabales, & cuneos manu
Geſtans ahena; nec ſeverus
Uncus abeſt, liquidumque plumbum (11).

Cloſe by thy ſide neceſſity ſtill ſtands;
Crows, books, and melted lead, and wedges load her hands.

It was the king of Navarre's good fortune, that he, who was ſo reſolute, wanted reſolution, when it was moſt neceſſary to him; and that he, who was ſo weak, appeared bold, when he wanted to be ſo. Thoſe two things ſaved his crown. Henry III, awaking out of his lethargy, ſtruck a great blow; but the duke of Guiſe was not bold enough to give up himſelf to the torrent of his fortune. The league had certainly crowned him, had he accompliſhed the crime, for which he was juſtly puniſhed, as great malefactors are when they want reſolution. They are the words of the author of the romantic hiſtory of that duke. It is certain, and experience confirms it, that the ſureſt way to ſucceed in ſuch deſigns, is not to ſtop, under pretence, that it would be too great a crime (12).

[D] The tranſlation of the crown would have been attended with conſequences much more fatal to the whole kingdom.] For the prince, who was to be the lawful ſucceſſor of Henry III, being a man of an extraordinary merit, extreamly brave, and ſupported not only by the Proteſtants, but alſo by a conſiderable number of Catholics; the uſurper would have been obliged to fight a hundred battles, in order to maintain himſelf, and both parties would have fought almoſt to the laſt man. Judge what had become of France during ſuch a furious competition: It would have been the ſtage of the moſt horrid tragedies; and, to compleat the ſcandal, religion would have been, not only the pretence, but alſo the moſt powerful cauſe of thoſe bloody operations; and it might have been ſaid more than ever, Tantum Relligio potuit ſuadere malorum (13).

Such tragic acts religion could perſuade.

When Pepin and Hugh Capet uſurped the crown, the circumſtances were not the ſame. The lawful party was ſo weak, that no body durſt ſtir to ſupport it; and therefore the revolution was not fatal to the kingdom. From whence it may be inferred, that there are certain times, as well as certain places, wherein ſuch undertakings are not ſo wicked; becauſe the perſons, concerned in them, may be morally ſure, that there will be little blood ſpilt; for the lawful poſſeſſor will be quickly forſaken by all his friends, or have ſo few left, that he will not be able to make any reſiſtance; every body ſiding with the ſtrongeſt party. I have ſaid more than once (14), that every thing is of ſome uſe in a ſtate: The ingratitude of great men, that unfaithfulneſs, and want of activity, and many other faults, are ſometimes more beneficial to the public, than the contrary virtues.

[E] The preachers furiouſly inveighed againſt the king.] 'They (15) changed their ſermons into invectives againſt the king's ſacred perſon, and deſcribed ſo pathetically the tragical death of the two brothers, whom they extolled to the ſky, as if they had been martyrs, that all their hearers melted into tears, and broke out into ſighs; and †, inſtead of propoſing to them St Stephen's example, they inſpired them with a violent deſire of revenge. Inſomuch, that thoſe, who had no mind to cry or ſigh, and were offended at ſuch a way ſo unworthy of the holy miniſtry of the word of God, were forced to do as others did, for fear of being knocked down. .... Francis Pigenat, curate of St Nicolas in the fields ... preaching the duke of Guiſe's funeral ſermon .... ‡ carried his fury ſo far, as to aſk his auditors, whether none of them would undertake to revenge the duke's murder by killing the tyrant; and to move the people, he brought in the ducheſs, wi-

Guiſe as a martyr, who deſerved to be canonized [F]. The people imitated the fury of the preachers [G]: And what was moſt ſtrange, was, that the Sorbonne applauded the rebellion, and made ſome decrees altogether republican [H], of which the Proteſtants did not fail to take advantage. The parliament of Paris heard the complaints of the duke of Guiſe's widow, who demanded, that Henry IV ſhould be puniſhed for the death of her huſband [I]. I ſhall ſet down an encomium, which is to be found in Balzac's

' dow of the deceaſed, who was ready to lye-in, ' ſpeaking theſe terrible words imitated from Virgil:

Exoriare aliquis noſtris ex oſſibus ultor,
Qui face Valeſios ferroque ſequare Tyrannos.

Some brave avenger from my aſhes riſe,
With fire and ſword the tyrants to purſue,
And quite extirpate the Valeſian race.

' (16) The furious Guinceſtre, ſhewing in the pulpit ſome ſmall ſilver candleſticks (17), nicely wrought ' above a hundred years before, in the ſhape of ſatires ' carrying flambeaux, charged the king with being a ' ſorcerer, ſaying, that they were the idols and the ' figures of the devils, to whom Henry de Valois ' uſed to ſacrifice in his retirement at Vincennes, and ' that they had ordered him to murder the duke of ' Guiſe, defender of the faith. To which I add, that ' (18) the curates and confeſſors of the faction of the ' ſixteen, making a ſacrilegious uſe of the power, ' which their holy miniſtry gives them, of binding ' and unbinding, refuſed to abſolve thoſe, who declared, ' in confeſſion, that they could not reſolve not to ' acknowledge Henry III as their king.'

[F] . . . and repreſented the duke of Guiſe as a martyr.] The ducheſs of Nemours was revered at Paris (19), ' as the mother of two holy martyrs; and ' the little Feuillant, preaching one day in her preſence, ' was ſo furious as to turn to her, and direct his ' ſpeech to the late duke in theſe words: O holy and ' glorious martyr of GOD; bleſſed is the womb that ' bore thee, and the breaſts that ſuckled thee ‡!' Thuanus ſays, that this ducheſs (20), ' entreated Henry III to reſtore to her the bodies of her ſons; ' but it was repreſented to the king, that he ſhould ' not do it, becauſe, the people being ſo much prepoſſeſſed in their favour, his enemies would not fail ' to make them worſhip thoſe dead bodies as reliques ' of ſaints, which would make * the king more odious: ' ſo that care was taken to get thoſe bodies conſumed with lime, through a precaution much like that ' whereby God would not ſuffer the Jews to know ' where the body of Moſes lay. It appeared by the event, that thoſe, who gave the king that advice, ' were in the right. For, among other extravagances, ' that were done at Paris, after the death of ' thoſe two brothers, Thuanus obſerves, that their ' effigies at full length were daily carried to the ' altars, bloody all over, and having a ghaſtly look .' See the firſt paſſage quoted by me in the following remark.

[G] The people imitated the fury of the preachers.] ' At the ſame time, that, by virtue of that unhappy ' decree (21), he was deprived of the title of king, ' and only called Henry de Valois, he was abuſed and ' reviled by the furious mob, all manner of ways: they ' vented their rage againſt him by ſatires, invectives, ' libels, calumnies, and all ſorts of outrageous words, ' the leaſt of which was that of tyrant and apoſtate: ' they fell with a brutiſh fury upon his arms, his ' ſtatues, and pictures, which were broke, tore, trampled upon, dragged through the ſtreets, burnt, thrown ' into the river, with a thouſand curſes upon him, ' whilſt the duke of Guiſe and his brother were reverenced as martyrs, ſo far as to place their pictures upon the altars (22).' Obſerve what Maimbourg had been ſaying. As ſoon as the decree of the Sorbonne was publiſhed at Paris, ſays he, They proceeded all of a ſudden to ſuch horrid extremities, and ſuch an execrable fury, contrary to the duty of ſubjects to their lawful prince, that, tho' our writers have mentioned them, I think it more proper to ſay nothing of them, than to profane my hiſtory with a relation, that would make it unpleaſant and odious. An Act (23) of the pretended parliament, ſent to all the towns, that ſided with the League, encreaſed the fury of the people, who did ſtill worſe things than before: nay, ſome, through an abominable mixture of parricide, ſacrilege, and magical enchantments, placed waxen imagies, like the king, upon the altars, and pricked them in ſeveral places, uttering certain diabolical words at each of the forty maſſes, that were ſaid for them in many churches, to give a greater force to their charm; and when the fortieth maſs was ſaid, they pricked them in the heart, as it were to give him the mortal blow (24).

[H] The Sorbonne . . . . . made ſome decrees altogether republican.] I have ſaid in another place (25) why I uſe Maimbourg's words; and therefore I ſhall not excuſe my ſelf again for it. Here follows another entire paſſage of the ſame hiſtorian (26). ' Thoſe, ' who made up the town-body . . . . propoſed to the ' Sorbonne, not only by word of mouth, but alſo by ' an authentical Act, ſigned by the magiſtrates, and ' ſealed with the ſeal of the town, theſe two great ' caſes of conſcience: † one was, whether the French ' were actually free from the oath of fidelity and obedience ſworn to the king? The other was, whether ' they might take up arms and unite themſelves; and ' whether they might raiſe money, and contribute towards the defence and preſervation of the Catholic, Apoſtolic, and Roman, religion in France ⸸, to oppoſe the ' execrable deſigns and attempts of the king and all his ' adherents, ſince he had violated the public faith at ' Blois, to the prejudice of the Catholic religion, of the ' edict of the holy union, and of the natural liberty of ' the States. Whereupon the Faculty meeting on the ' ſeventh of January, to the number of ſeventy doctors, after a ſolemn proceſſion, and a maſs of the ' Holy Ghost, concluded, in the affirmative, upon ' thoſe two points, with a common conſent, and without ' any oppoſition; they are the very words of the decree: And that this reſolution ſhould be ſent to the ' Pope, that it might be approved by him, and confirmed ' by his authority; and that he would be pleaſed to aſſiſt ' the Gallican church, which was under great ſufferings, ' and very much oppreſſed.' On the fifth of April of the ſame year 1589, the Sorbonne made another decree, whereby they declare, that Henry de Valois cannot be prayed for in any eccleſiaſtical prayer, much leſs in the canon of the maſs, by reaſon of the excommunication he has incurred; and that theſe words, pro Rege noſtro, ought to be left out of the canon, leſt it ſhould be thought that he is prayed for, though the prieſt, directing his intention to ſome other perſon, means thoſe that govern, or him to whom GOD deſigns to give the kingdom. They ordain, that, inſtead of thoſe words, three prayers, Pro Chriſtianis Principibus noſtris ‡, be ſaid at maſs, out of the canon: they were printed, and are to be ſeen ſtill. Laſtly, they add, that thoſe, who ſhall refuſe to comply, ſhall be deprived of the prayers and rights of the Faculty, out of which they ſhall be expelled as excommunicated perſons; which was unanimouſly approved by all the doctors. Thoſe republican principles ſpread in ſuch a manner among the French divines, that Genebrard, one of the principal deputies of the clergy to the ſtates aſſembled at Paris in 1593, preached a ſermon before that aſſembly, wherein, inſtead of exhorting the deputies, by the word of GOD, to think only of the preſervation of the ſtate and of religion, which is the greateſt ſupport of it, he endeavoured to prove, by very bad arguments, that their aſſembly might change and repeal the Salic law, which is the fundamental law of the ſtate, and has been always inviolably obſerved from the beginning of the French monarchy to this preſent time (27).

[I] The parliament of Paris received the complaints of the duke of Guiſe's widow, who demanded that Henry III ſhould be puniſhed for the death of her huſband.] What we read in the General Criticiſm on Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (28), concerning the action brought againſt that king, is very curious; but what follows is more curious ſtill. It was imparted to me by a very learned man (29), who has collected a vaſt number of uncommon things relating to learning, and has a wonderful knowledge of all ſorts of books, tho' never ſo ſcarce and ſo little known. He was pleaſed to write

DU TILLET.

[K] I will relate an encomium which is to be found in Balzac's Entretiens.] I make no doubt that Balzac is the author of it, and that, being a great lover of an hyperbolical ſtile, he took care to exaggerate the thing. However it be, theſe are his words:

‘ France doated upon that man; for, ſhould I ſay only, that ſhe was in love with him, I ſhould expreſs my ſelf too faintly. It is no wonder if ſhe departed from her duty as ſhe did. Such a paſſion came very near idolatry: ſome invoked him in their prayers; others put his cut in their common prayer-book. His picture was every where; ſome ran after him in the ſtreets to rub their beads againſt his cloak: and one day, as he returned from Champagne, entering into Paris through St Antony's-gate, the people not only cried, long live Guiſe, but many ſung, Hoſanna filio David. Some aſſemblies, that were not ſmall, yielded in an inſtant to his good mien. No heart could hold out againſt his face; he perſuaded before he ſpoke a word; it was impoſſible to bear him an ill-will in his preſence. The firſt glance he caſt upon his enemies did immediately remove their animoſity againſt him, and produced ſuch a commotion in their blood, and ſo ſtrange an alteration in their humours, that afterwards they could not reſume their hatred, without animating themſelves a long time; and therefore, what I heard a courtier of that reign ſay, ſeems to me to be well obſerved, that the Huguenots were for the league, when they looked upon the duke of Guiſe. I leave it to hiſtory to give an account of his actions, and to carry curioſity as far as his thoughts. I will not take upon me to explain court-riddles, nor do my ſpeculations reach ſo far. It is enough for me to believe, without pretending to gueſs, that he muſt needs have been a very extraordinary man, ſince his bare name was ſufficient, after his death, to continue the war againſt two potent kings; and ſince the greateſt captain of Europe, the ſecond founder of this ſtate, Henry the Great, of relates a very remarkable thing concerning that marriage [L]. They were mutually unfaithful [M]: and, if we believe that hiſtorian, it was not the huſband, who revenged himſelf upon his wife's lover; he was contented to put her into a violent fright [N]. He left many children behind him (e).

He was ſirnamed Gaſh-Face [O], by reaſon of a wound he received in the cheek, in a fight, in the year 1575. The duke of Mayenne his brother ſet up for the head of the ‘glorious memory, took towns, and won battles, only to ruin the intereſt of a man, who was no longer in being. I will not omit a ſaying, which you will not be diſpleaſed to know. It is ſeparated from the encomium, and aſcribed to mareſchal de Rais's lady. Thoſe Lorrain princes, ſaid ſhe, had ſo noble a look, that other princes looked like citizens to them (30).’

[L] Varillas relates a very remarkable thing concerning that marriage.] He ſays (31), that the duke of Guiſe being informed, that Charles IX deſigned to have him aſſaſſinated, conſulted the ducheſs of Nemours, his mother, who told him, he could not avoid the misfortune he was threatened with, but by marrying that very ſame night (32), and that ſhe undertook to get him a wife. She ſent for the princeſs of Porcien, who did not think fit to refuſe that match. Thus the marriage was propoſed, negotiated, concluded, and conſummated, and the ducheſs proved with child of a ſon, who was afterwards the fourth duke of Guiſe; and all this was tranſacted in the ſpace of four hours. The king, being told of it the next morning, revoked the order he had given to la Tour-Gondy. Were this true, I ſhould wonder that le Laboureur knew nothing of it. He knew ſeveral particulars concerning that ducheſs of Guiſe. He tells us (33), that the prince of Porcien, not long before he died, deſired his wife, whom he ſuſpected to have a kindneſs for the duke of Guiſe, not to marry him. You are young, ſaid he to her, rich, and handſome: theſe qualifications, attended with a noble extraction, will move ſeveral perſons to court you. I approve your marrying again, and leave you the choice of a huſband all over the kingdom, except the duke of Guiſe, whom of all men in the world I hate moſt: and I beg of you, that my greateſt enemy may not be the heir of what was the deareſt to me. He died of a fever at Paris, in the year 1564: and ſix years after, his widow, having compared the memory of a dead huſband with the preſence of ſo great an object as Henry de Lorrain, duke of Guiſe, was, yielded to his merit, and married him. This account, and that of Varillas, are little conſiſtent.

[M] They were mutually unfaithful.] The galantries of the duke of Guiſe are well known: they make part of the deſcription Maimbourg gives of him, as has been ſeen above. ‘He ſpent the night before he was aſſaſſinated with a lady belonging to the queen, which was the reaſon why he came later than others to the council: nay, it is thought, that his bleeding at the noſe in the council-hall, which obliged him to aſk for ſome ſweat-meats, proceeded from his having exhauſted his ſtrength with that woman. If you will not take my word for it, believe at leaſt Thuanus, whoſe words I quote in the margin †, and admire the injuſtice of that duke. Notwithſtanding his being ſo unfaithful to his wife, he could not endure, that ſhe ſhould be unfaithful to him; for he cauſed a handſome young gentleman, called St Megrin, one of the king's darlings, to be cruelly aſſaſſinated, for ſome reports that went about him and his ducheſs ⸸. By the king of Navarre's leave, who had ſome reaſons to approve St Megrin's puniſhment (34), that action of the duke of Guiſe was a very great crime (35).’ We ſhall ſee, by and by, that an author ſays, the duke of Guiſe had no hand in St Megrin's aſſaſſination. However, he was thought to be the author of it, at the court of France (36); and the king of Navarre was ſo fully perſuaded of it, that he ſaid; I am glad my couſin the duke of Guiſe could not endure, that ſuch a ſpark as St Megrin ſhould cuckold him: all other court-ſparks, who pretend to make amorous addreſſes to princeſſes, ſhould be ſerved in the ſame manner (37). But the author, I am going to quote, does not deny the love-intrigues of the ducheſs of Guiſe; it is true, he does not pretend to warrant the truth of them.

[N] He was contented too put his wife into a violent fright.] ‘Cauſſade St Maigrin, a gentleman of Bourdeaux, became a favourite of Henry III, meerly on account of his beauty . . . . He was ſo impudent as to ſay, that the ducheſs of Guiſe had proſtituted herſelf to him ‡. The duke of Guiſe, being of all men the leaſt capable of jealouſy, as to women, was not at firſt informed of the fooliſh vanity of St Maigrin; but the thing was imparted to his neareſt relations and beſt friends: and all of them were ſo preſſing upon him, that, in order to free himſelf from their importunity, he promiſed them to revenge himſelf firſt upon his wife, and then upon her pretended lover. Accordingly, he did not lie with her the night following, contrary to his cuſtom; and the next day, he went into her chamber at four a clock in the morning, with a dagger in his right hand, and a ſilver porringer full of a blackiſh liquor in his left. He awaked the ducheſs, who was faſt aſleep, upbraided her in a few words with her unfaithfulneſs; and, with a look and voice, in which ſhe might diſcover all the ſymptoms of fury and deſpair, told her, he left it to her choice to be ſtabbed or to drink the poiſon prepared in the porringer (38).’ The ducheſs, not being able to prevail with him by her entreaties, took the pretended poiſon, and drunk it off, and, falling upon her knees before her oratory, waited for the moment ſhe ſhould expire: but as that pretended poiſon was the beſt jelly-broth that could be made, ſhe was not the worſe for it; and in an hour's time, her huſband came to her, and told her, how he had been ſollicited to make away with her, and what courſe he had taken. The friends and relations of the duke, having loſt all hopes of exaſperating him againſt his wife, reſolved to kill St Maigrin. About twenty men on horſeback waited for him, at his coming out of the Louvre, at twelve o'clock at night, and gave him thirty three wounds with their ſwords and piſtols, moſt of which were mortal. The king expreſſed no reſentment, becauſe he was told, that a man had been ſeen among the aſſaſſins, who ſeemed to be the duke of Mayenne, being extraordinary tall, and having hands like a ſhoulder of mutton.

Take notice, that this ducheſs of Guiſe had been a Proteſtant, during the life of her firſt huſband; but ſhe turned Catholic in the chappel of the caſtle of St Germain en Laye, at the preſſing requeſt of Catherine de Medicis her godmother (39).

[O] He was ſirnamed Gaſh-Face.] A famous hiſtorian makes an obſervation, which does not ſeem to me to be right. The duke of Guiſe, ſays he (40), governour of Champagne, charged the Reiſters, and defeated them near Chateau Thierry. He was wounded in the left-cheek with the ſhot of an arquebuſe, the gaſh whereof remained all his life-time, very glorious with reſpect to the Catholics, and very advantageous with reſpect to the ladies, who think that brave men are ſo every where.* He has ſome reaſon to ſay, that the marks of bravery are very acceptable to the fair ſex. Madam de Scudery ſays (41), that tho' valour is not the virtue of women, yet it is certain they love it, and ſometimes prove unjuſt to ſome other qualities for the ſake of this, by preferring ſome men, who are only valiant, to others, who have ſeveral virtues inſtead of one. It is certain, that a gentleman, ſuſpected of cowardice, will be deſpiſed by the ladies (42), and that many of them try the courage of their lovers; I mean, that they expoſe them to quarrels, in order to ſee whether they will come off with honour. How many raſh actions were done in the French armies, in the XVIth century, for the ſake of a miſtreſs, and to deſerve her favour (43)? Mezerai's obſervation cannot therefore be criticized in all reſpects; but it may be ſaid, that the reaſon he goes upon is not ſolid. I grant, the ladies love valiant men, and courageous ſparks; but it is not becauſe they fancy they are ſtout every where, but becauſe the reputation of bravery is attended with great glory, in which thoſe have a ſhare, whoſe lovers have got ſuch a ſhining reputation: and therefore, when women prefer ſoldiers to citizens, and warriors of a diſtinguiſhed valour to common warriors, they ſhew more pride and vanity than leudneſs. They think it much more glorious to captivate

the league; and, in that quality, he exerciſed a power little different from the royal. He might have taken the title of king [P]; but doubtleſs he had ſome reaſons to content himſelf with the title of lieutenant-general of the ſtate and crown of France, really attended with an almoſt deſpotical authority. He and the league ſuppoſed, that the throne was vacant, and ſo they overturned the moſt ſolemn and the moſt fundamental laws of the kingdom. I ſhall ſet down an act, which has been purloined from the records of the parliament of Paris [Q]; whereby it will appear, that, in what concerns the captivate a great courage, than to conquer a peaceful heart. They get a certain advantage by it; whereas the reſt is very caſual. Some brave men are not to be compared in their armorus embraces to ſome others, who ſeldom ſtir out of doors. Many a Roman, who had made twenty glorious campaigns, and had been loaded with military rewards, was much inferiour in this reſpect to Ovid and Horace (44), and a hundred fops not fit to handle a ſword. I do not think the braveſt man in France could have diſputed this point with Zacachriſt, or that the mareſchal de Rantzaw, who bore ſo many glorious marks of his valour, and whoſe face was much more gaſhed than that of the duke of Guiſe, came near the ſtrength of Voiture.

If we go higher, we ſhall find, that the raviſher of Helena was not the valiant Hector, but Paris, a coward, and an effeminate man; and it will appear, that Homer, who is ſo happy, and ſo natural in deſcribing paſſions, alledges the example of that coward, to cry down the impatience of thoſe, who careſs their wives in the day-time. Paris is the only man in his poems that does it. Nay, he is tranſported with ſuch an impatience, when he ſhould have been aſhamed of having juſt then ran away from the fight. Did not the poet deſign to denote by it the venereal ſtrength of poltroons? Plutarch does not ſay ſo; but perhaps he might have ſaid it, with as much reaſon as there is in theſe words of his (45): to which purpoſe I ſhall mention what Homer ſays of Paris, who, running away from the battle, went to bed with the fair Helena; for, ſince the poet mentions no other man in his poem, that lies with his wife in the day-time, he plainly intimates, that he takes ſuch a piece of incontinence to be a very ſhameful thing (46). See, in the third book of the Iliad, how Hector upbraided that run-away with his cowardice: Helena ſpoke to him thus:

Quod bene te jactas, & fortia facta recenſes;
  A verbis facies diffidet iſta ſuis.
Apta magis Veneri, quam ſint tua corpora Marti.
  Bella gerant fortes: tu Pari, ſemper ama.
Hectora, quem laudas, pro te pugnare jubeto;
  Militia eſt operis altera digna tuis (47).

On war's rough theme thy tongue be ever mute;
Such boaſts but ill with ſuch an aſpect ſuit.
To war's impetuous deity unknown,
Soft Cytherea claims thee all her own.
Let the tough hero's arm the jav'lin wield;
Exert thy proweſs in love's gentler field.
For thee let Hector, valiant Hector, fight;
Thy courage, Paris, other wars invite.

[P] The Duke of Mayenne exerciſed a power little different from the royal. He might have taken the title of king.] He heard at Lyons, that the duke, and the cardinal de Guiſe, his brothers, had been murdered, and immediately he went into Burgundy, whereof he was governor (48). He got ſome troops together, and then marched towards Paris. He was received at Troyes with the ſame honours that are paid to kings, and acted there like a ſovereign, ſending commiſſions to the duke of Guiſe's creatures, eſpecially to Roſne and St Paul, to whom he ſent orders to command in Champagne and Brie (49). He entered Paris the twelfth of February, 1589, 'where ‡, as if he had been the duke of 'Guiſe raiſed from the dead, the inhabitants expreſſed 'their joy to ſuch an exceſs, that they expoſed his 'picture with a cloſe crown to the public view, and 'erected a royal throne to him ⸸: and, had he been 'ambitious and bold enough to place himſelf on it, 'perhaps he would have found people enough that 'would have acknowledged him, in hopes of getting 'ſome governments, which he would have erected 'into dutchies and countries with homage, as Hugh 'Capet did (50).' But he refuſed that honour, and afterwards would not ſuffer, that another ſhould be poſſeſſed of it. He was contented, firſt of all, to ſettle his authority, by making himſelf the ſtrongeſt in the council of the league (51). 'He ordered every thing 'according to his mind, in ſpite of the ſixteen, and 'procured to himſelf an authority very like the ſupream power of kings. For the firſt thing, that was 'decreed in that new council, was, that, to denote the 'almoſt abſolute and ſupream power beſtowed upon 'him, he ſhould have, till the meeting of the States, 'the extraordinary and unprecedented title of lieutenant-general, not of the king, for the league acknowledged none then, but of the ſtate and crown of 'France . . . . (52). He took an oath for this new 'and odd dignity, on the thirteenth of March ‡, in 'the parliament, who confirmed the patent, ſealed with 'the new ſeals, that were made, inſtead of the king's, 'which had been broken: and, to begin the exerciſe 'of his office with an act of ſovereignty *, he immediately cauſed new laws to be publiſhed, containing 'twenty one articles, to unite, under the ſame form of 'government, all the towns, that were engaged in 'the league, and thoſe that would enter into it, the 'number of which proved very great in a little time '(53).' He took the field, and attacked the king's army more than once: he brought the Spaniſh troops into the kingdom; and, if he oppoſed the deſign of the Leaguers, who intended to make a king, who ſhould marry the Infanta, it was only becauſe he could not be concerned in that nomination, ſince he was married, and becauſe it was only deſigned for the duke of Guiſe, his nephew. He was ſo obſtinate in his rebellion, that he continued to make war againſt Henry IV, when the city of Paris had ſubmitted to that prince, reconciled to the church of Rome. He did not ſubmit, till he had ſuch advantageous offers made him by the king, that he could hardly have expected ſo great favours from a prince highly beholden to him (54). The edict, that was made in his favour, is dated at Folembray, the eleventh of January, 1596 (55).

[Q] I will produce an act, which has been purloined from the records of the parliament of Paris.] I have a copy of it drawn from the original, ſigned du Tillet. here is the tenour of that act.

An extract of the records of parliament.

'This day the Sieur duke de Mayenne, lieutenant-general of the royal ſtate and crown of France, the chambers being met together, and the king's council preſent, 'having remonſtrated to the court the cauſes of his, 'coming to this city, and leaving a great army; and 'that ſince the fourteenth day of the laſt month, the 'ſaid court did not ſit (56), and there being no preſident in it, he thought it neceſſary to come and adviſe with them about it, in order to appoint four preſidents, that this great chamber, and that of the Tournelle, 'may not remain without heads, and that he may cauſe 'patents to be drawn up for thoſe who ſhall be elected, 'being not willing to name any of them himſelf, but 'referring the whole matter to the ſaid court: whereupon having ſeveral times called upon the court to 'name them, and the king's council being heard, it 'has been remonſtrated to him by Mr Matthew 'Chartier, dean, and the eldeſt counſellor, that, up'on a vacancy of the ſaid offices, the court was uſed to 'nominate ſome perſons to the king, out of which he 'choſe one or two, who were put in poſſeſſion of 'them. But now there being no king, and conſidering the condition the town was in, the ſaid court referred it to him, and deſired him to name ſome: 'and at laſt, after many excuſes, he has ſaid, that ſince 'the court deſired it ſhould be ſo, and according to 'to the prayer he had put up in the morning to GOD, 'and his holy ſpirit, that this affair might be 'managed with ſincerity, he reſolved to name, for the 'office of firſt preſident, the Sieur Chartier, eldeſt the nomination of the preſidents of that parliament, he exerciſed all the functions of a king. He aſſembled the ſtates of the kingdom (f), at Paris, in the year 1593. He made an admiral and four mareſchals of France in that aſſembly (g), and declared, they had been called together to proceed to the election of a king who ſhould be a Catholic (h). But, when he ſaw, that he could not be elected, for he was married, and there was a deſign to elect a prince, who might marry the Infanta of Spain, he dexterouſly oppoſed it; which he did the more earneſtly, becauſe he knew, that the duke of Guiſe, his nephew, was the perſon, whom they intended to make king. He was extreamly vexed at that nomination (i). The ducheſs, his wife, could not endure it, and adviſed her huſband to make a peace with the king, rather than be ſo baſe as to acknowledge, for his maſter and king, that young lad: So ſhe called her nephew, out of contempt. Thoſe, who conſider the ſeveral attempts of the Guiſes, cannot apprehend what the Carteſian philoſopher, James Rohault, was dreaming of [R], when he wrote the epiſtle dedicatory prefixed to his Phyſics.

DU TILLET.

Formulary of proviſions in execution of the above arreſt.

‘ Charles de Lorrain, duke of Mayenne, lieutenant-‘ general of the ſtate and crown of France, to all thoſe ‘ to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting. The ‘ greateſt ſign of the authority and good will of thoſe ‘ who have governed ſtates, and what they have been ‘ moſt eſteemed for by their ſubjects, and admired by ‘ foreigners, has been their care of eſtabliſhing and ‘ maintaining the two pillars, on which the preſervation ‘ of all monarchies is founded, viz. piety and juſtice. ‘ Wherefore, ſince it has pleaſed God to call us to ‘ the management of the affairs of this kingdom, after ‘ we have conſidered, to the beſt of our power, the ‘ regulations neceſſary to promote the glory of God, ‘ our chief intent has been to fill up the places of the ‘ chief miniſters of juſtice, with perſons of a probity ‘ and integrity ſuitable to thoſe offices. And whereas ‘ it has been remonſtrated to us, and we are ſenſible ‘ that it is very neceſſary to fill up the vacancies of the ‘ preſidents of the parliament of Paris, leſt the courſe ‘ of juſtice ſhould be interrupted, as it is has been of ‘ late, having reſolved to appoint four of them, that ‘ both the great chamber of the Pleas and Tournelle ‘ may not be without heads: be it known, that, having this day communicated our deſires and intentions ‘ to the gentlemen of the ſaid court, the chambers being met, and having named the four perſons, whom ‘ we have thought worthy of thoſe offices, and whom ‘ they have approved, as it appears from the act and ‘ decree of this day, here affixed under the counters ‘ ſeal; we, conſidering the good and acceptable ſervices, ‘ which Mr &c. For ſuch is our deſire. In witneſs ‘ whereof, we have cauſed the ſeal of the kingdom of ‘ France to be ſet to theſe preſents. Given at Paris ‘ the ſecond of December, 1591, ſigned Charles de ‘ Lorrain; and upon the fold, by Monſeigneur, Pericard.’

Mr Marais, advocate in the parliament of Paris, has been pleaſed to ſend me the copy he had taken of this act. He has alſo imparted to me ſome obſervations upon my Dictionary, which give me a great notion of his parts and learning.

[R] Thoſe, who conſider the attempts of the Guiſes cannot apprehend what the Carteſian philoſopher, James Rohault, was dreaming of.] He publiſhed his Phyſics in the year 1671, and dedicated them to the duke of Guiſe, to whom he made this compliment. ‘ Though I had been at liberty to deliberate upon the ‘ choice, what protection could I have deſired for the ‘ natural truths I offer to the public, than that of a ‘ name, which has been all along deſigned for the ſupport of the greateſt truths in the world? your anceſtors have defended, with a piety that deſerves ‘ to be ever propoſed as a pattern, the divine truths ‘ of religion, againſt the profeſſed enemies of them. ‘ Thoſe illuſtrious heroes maintained the political ‘ truths at the expence of their lives; I mean the ‘ fundamendal laws of the ſtate, and the immutable ‘ rights of our ſovereigns (§ a) againſt foreign enemies, and the domeſtic fury of the rebels. And it ‘ was your highneſs's lot to be moreover the protector of the truths of nature, having in every thing ‘ elſe all the noble ſentiments of your anceſtors. Nay, ‘ we might ſee ſtill the ſame zeal ſhine, with the ‘ ſame luſtre, in the perſon of your highneſs, were it ‘ not for want of occaſion under the glorious reign of ‘ the greateſt and the wiſeſt monarch in the world ‘ (57).’ Should a poet vent the ſame things, even in very fine verſes, it might be reaſonably ſuppoſed, that he did it for his ſins, and to expiate ſome great crime. This thought of Horace might be applied to him:

(57) Rohault, epiſtle dedicatory to his Phyſics.

Nec ſatis apparet cur verſus factitet, utrum
Minxerit in patrios cineres, an triſte bidental
Moverit inceſtus: certe furit (58).

(58) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 470.

Whate'er the guilt that drew down ſuch a curſe,
'Tis ſure the man is mad, and raves in verſe.

What then ſhall we think of a famous philoſopher and a good mathematician, who is guilty of ſuch a folly; had he not committed an abominable action, which deſerved he ſhould be given over to ſo reprobate a ſenſe? but, to uſe him more gently, has he not diſhonoured his character by affirming ſuch a palpable lye? I am willing to excuſe his Carteſianiſm as well as I can; and therefore I will ſuppoſe, that Rohault did not write his epiſtle dedicatory as a philoſopher: he wholly diveſted himſelf of that character, and aſſumed that of a panegyriſt, which is the unlucky fate of thoſe, who write epiſtles dedicatory. A good leſſon to diſcourage a true philoſopher from ſuch a deſign! I go farther, and I ſay that this philoſopher, when he appeared under a character ſo foreign to himſelf, did not wholly ceaſe to be a philoſopher; and that, if he vented a groſs falſity, it was not through baſe flattery, but ignorance. It is likely he was one of thoſe philoſophers and mathematicians, who reliſh nothing but natural philoſophy and Euclid, and who deſpiſe every thing elſe, and do not vouchſafe to learn the hiſtory of their own country. Perhaps it might be further ſaid, that his great application in making experiments againſt a Vacuum, and upon the various qualities of the load-ſtone, refractions of light, &c. did not afford him time enough to read Thuanus and Mezerai; which was the reaſon why he had but this general notion of the hiſtory hiſtory of the Guiſes, that they had very much oppoſed the rebellion of the Huguenots. He was therefore ſincere in ſome meaſure: but his ignorance, not being invincible, cannot juſtify him; he might eaſily have been cured of it. Any one of his ſcholars might have given him an account of what the Guiſes did againſt Henry III, and Henry IV; and the meaneſt lawyer, or practitioner in the law, might have told him, that their attemps were diametrically contrary to the laws of the kindom, and a total ſubverſion of the principles moſt eſſential to the French monarchy, and a continued ſeries of the greateſt crimes of felony and treaſon, that can be committed. And therefore if he did not ſpeak againſt his conſcience, he deſerves at leaſt to be blamed for neglecting to get himſelf informed about the things he ſpoke of. I think this is the only fault he is guilty of, and I cannot believe that he acted againſt his knowledge, to ſet up for a flatterer; for had he had any tincture of the hiſtory of the XVIth century, he would not have been ſo bold as to praiſe his patron in the manner he did. Would he have ventured to commend him for being ready to imitate his anceſtors, if there was occaſion for it? was it not the ſame thing as if he had ſaid: When occaſion offers, your highneſs will be always ready to raiſe a rebellion in Paris; to carry on the barricado's as far as the Louvre; to force the king to run away; to expoſe him to the moſt violent invectives of the preachers; to bring an action againſt him in the parliament of Paris; to depoſe him; to have him aſſaſſinated by a monk; to exclude the Dauphin, and all the princes of the blood from the ſucceſſion; to bring a Spaniſh army into the kingdom, in order to prevent their aſſerting their right? &c. I conclude, that Mr Rohault would not have expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner, had he known, that his words did really imply ſuch propoſitions; and therefore, if he deſerves to be excuſed for ſuch a fault, it is becauſe he did not know what he ſaid.

I muſt obſerve, that the Proteſtants are not the only writers, who made a diſadvantageous deſcription of the actions and deſigns of the Guiſes; ſome Catholic authors have done the ſame. Read a piece that is aſcribed to Lewis Servin, advocate-general in the parliament of Paris (59).

GUISE (CHARLES DE LORRAIN duke of), eldeſt ſon of the foregoing, was born the 20th of Auguſt 1571. He was arreſted with ſeveral others on the day of the execution of Blois, and remained priſoner till the month of Auguſt 1591, when he made his eſcape from the caſtle of Tours (a). The league made bone-fires upon it every where, and the Pope gave public thanks to GOD for it. That young prince was received at Paris with great acclamations (b), and not only the people, but alſo the nobility concerned in the league, flocked to him. He made a ſtrict confederacy with the faction of the ſixteen; but this great proſperity proved the ruin of the party, by reaſon of the jealouſy which the duke of Mayenne conceived upon that account. I have mentioned it in the foregoing article. It is ſaid, that the ducheſs of Mompenſier fell in love with that young duke of Guiſe her nephew [A]. The latter deprived the leaguers of one of their worthies, by killing the brave St Pol with his own hands [B]. He obtained the government of Provence, when he ſubmitted to Henry IV, in the year 1594 (c). He had ſome employments by ſea and land under Lewis XIII (d); but care was taken to prevent his growing too powerful, and he was even obliged to leave France. It was the effect of the wiſe politics of cardinal de Richelieu [C]. He retired to Florence (e), and died at Cuna, in the Sieneſe, the 30th of September 1640. He married, in 1611, Henriete Catherine de Joyeuſe, the only daughter of Henry de Joyeuſe, mareſchal of France

[A] It is ſaid, that the ducheſs of Mompenſier fell in love with that young duke of Guiſe, her nephew.] Here is a paſſage of Mr Menage (1). 'The ducheſs of Montpenſier was very much in love with 'her nephew the duke of Guiſe, ſon of Henry Gaſh-'Face. I have formerly ſeen ſome paſſionate letters 'ſhe writ to him. Hence it is, that, in the Satire 'Ménippée, when every body is placed according to 'his rank, the herald cries, Madam de Montpenſier, 'place your ſelf under your nephew.' Mr Menage did not recollect all that the herald ſaid: he forgot a very remarkable clauſe: there is in the Catholicon, Madam Dowager of Montpenſier, as princeſs in your own right, place your ſelf under your nephew. See the reflexions, made upon this, by the author of the new remarks upon this Satire Ménippée (2).

[B] He deprived the leaguers of one of their worthies, by ſlaying with his own had the brave St Pol.] 'Saint Paul, a ſouldier of fortune, who got his title of nobility by his valour and good conduct in 'the art of war (3)' was one of the four mareſchals of France, created by the duke of Mayenne, in 1593. That duke, after the death of the duke of Guiſe, whoſe creature this captain was, gave him the government of Champagne, where, after he had made himſelf maſter of Rheims, Mezieres, and Vitry, he was ſo bold as to invade the duchy of Retelois, and take poſſeſſion of it in the quality of a duke, by virtue of a grant he ſaid he had received from the Pope, as the king wrote from the camp before Chartres to the duke of Nevers. And, at laſt, his intolerable pride, together with the tyranny he exerciſed in that province, occaſioned his being killed by the young duke of Guiſe, who thruſt his ſword into his heart, becauſe that prince having very civilly deſired him to withdraw the troops, he had put into Rheims to ſecure it, that pretended mareſchal, who was reſolved to be abſolute maſter of it in ſpite of him, told him haughtily, laying his hand to his ſword, that he would not do it (4). It is no unuſual thing for brave men, who revolt againſt their lawful prince, to be fond of independency. But they frequently find, that the head of the rebellion requires a greater ſubmiſſion than the true maſter. I believe Henry IV would have been more indulgent to St Paul, than the duke of Guiſe was. Note, that Mezerai lays all the blame on the duke, who, ſays he (5), deſigning to get the ſpoils of that brave man, picked a quarrel with him in the ſtreets of Rheims, and ran his ſword into his belly. The ſame hiſtorian obſerves, that Saint Pol, the day before the barricadoes, ſaved the life of that duke's father. See how thankful he was for that great ſervice.

[C] He was obliged to quit France. This was the effect of the wiſe politics of cardinal Richelieu.] A ſad experience had been made of the great power of the name of Guiſe, even when the league was diſſolved. That houſe was in a manner a ſtate within a ſtate, and it was to be feared, that the folly and the wrong zeal of the people would make an idol of it, as often as any religious war ſhould ariſe. And therefore prudence required, that their credit ſhould be ſomewhat leſſened, which the firſt miniſter took care of under the reign of Lewis XIII.

France, and widow of Henry de Bourbon, duke of Mompenſier (f), by whom he had ſeveral children [D]. The mareſchal de Baſſompierre commends him very much (g). I ſhall make a remark concerning the duke of Chevreuſe, brother to this duke of Guiſe [E], and another upon the chevalier de Guiſe [F], who was alſo his brother, and [D] By whom he had ſeveral children.] I ſhall only ſpeak of his ſons: you may ſee in another place (6) what concerns his daughters. The prince of Joinville, his eldeſt ſon, died at Florence, the ſeventh of November, 1639, in his twenty eighth year, without being married (7). His ſecond ſon was called Henry: I ſpeak of him in the following article. The third was called CHARLES LEWIS, and went by the name of duke of Joyeuſe, and died in Italy, unmarried, the fifteenth of March, 1637. Lewis, their brother, took then the title of duke of Joyeuſe; he was born in 1622. He was great chamberlain of France, and he married, at Toulon, in November, 1649, Frances Mary de Valois, the only daughter and heireſs of Lewis Emanuel de Valois duke of Engouleſme. He died at Paris, the twenty ſeventh of September, 1654, of a wound he received, in charging a party of the enemies near Arras (8). His ſon LEWIS JOSEPH de Lorrain duke of GUISE, Joyeuſe, and Engouleſme, born the ſeventh of Auguſt, 1650, married, in 1667, Elizabeth of Orleans, younger daughter of Gaſton of France, duke of Orleans, and died of the ſmall pox, at Paris, the thirtieth of July, 1671 (9), leaving behind him a ſon, called FRANCIS JOSEPH de Lorrain duke of Alençon, and of GUISE, Joyeuſe, and Engouleſme, who was born the twenty eighth of Auguſt, 1670 (10), and died the ſixteenth of March, 1675 (11). With him ended the males of that famous branch of the houſe of Lorrain. There are ſtill many of the other younger branches of that of Guiſe. See the laſt remark of the following article, and obſerve, that Roger de Lorrain, the fifth ſon of our Charles duke of Guiſe, died knight of Malta, at Cambray, the ſixth of September, 1653, being in his thirtieth year (12).

[E] I will make a remark concerning the duke of Chevreuſe, brother of this duke of Guiſe.] His name was Claudius de Lorrain, and he was the ſecond ſon of Henry duke of Guiſe. He was born the fifth of June, 1578, and his firſt title was that of prince of Joinville. He ſignalized himſelf in 1596, at the ſiege of la Fere, and, in 1597, at that of Amiens. The king being diſpleaſed with him by reaſon of ſome court-intrigues, he was obliged to betake himſelf to the war in Hungary. He was made duke of Chevreuſe, and peer of France, in March, 1612, and knight of the HOLY GHOST, the firſt of January 1620. He ſerved, in 1621, at the ſieges of St Jean d'Angely, Montauban, &c. and was honoured with the offices of great chamberlain of France, and great falconer. He was ſucceſſively governor of the upper and lower Marche, and of Auvergne, Bourbonnois, and Picardy. He married, as proxy to the king of Great Britain, the princeſs Henriette Mary of France in 1625, and conducted her into England with a magnificent train. He was at the ſiege of Rochelle, in 1628. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, the twenty fourth of Jauuary, 1657, without male-iſſue. He had only daughters (13). He married in 1622, Mary de Rohan, widow of the conſtable de Luines, and eldeſt daughter of Hercules de Rohan, duke of Mombazon (14). It is that ducheſs of Chevreuſe, who was ſo much talked of, during the broils of the court of Lewis XIII, and during the civil-war of Paris under Lewis XIV. Cardinal Richelieu cauſed her to retire from the court; ſhe made her eſcape into Lorrain, from whence ſhe went to Bruſſels. She had leave to return into France, after the death of Lewis XIII, and quickly renewed her intrigues, being ſeconded by the ducheſs of Mombazon, her mother-in-law. We ſhall ſee ſome proof of it hereafter (15). She had ſtipulated during the impriſonment of the princes, that he daughter ſhould be married to the prince of Conti (16); but it came to nothing.

[F] A remark upon the chevalier de GUISE.] He was the ſon of that duke of Guiſe, who was murthered at Blois in 1588, and was a poſthumous child, and called Francis Alexander Paris (17). He killed Baron de Lux, in the ſtreets of Paris, the fifth of January, 1613; and, within a month, he killed the ſon of the ſame baron, and was not in the leaſt moleſted by the court, nor by the judges upon that account: ſo great was the authority of that houſe! the writer, I am going to quote, will make us very ſenſible of it (18). The chevalier de Guiſe and Baron de Lux, 'met one morning it St Honoré's 'ſtreet: the Baron was on foot (19), and the chevalier on horſe-back, who alighted from his horſe, 'and bad the baron draw his ſword, as he drew 'his. The baron dreamed of no ſuch think, and 'could not imagine, that it was in earneſt; however 'he drew his ſword, but with little ſucceſs; he 'was grown old, and was no match for a young 'prince, who had lately made an end of his exerciſes. And, indeed, the chevalier gave him only 'a thruſt through the body, of which he fell down 'dead in a ſhoemaker's ſhop. As for him, he very 'ſedately got on horſe-back again, and went a ſlow 'pace to the king's great ſtables, as if he had done nothing. Thus died baron de Lux, for boaſting, as it 'was ſaid, that he had been one of the council of 'Blois againſt the life of the late duke of Guiſe . . . . . 'He had a ſon of the ſame age with the chevalier de 'Guiſe, who heard the news of that accident, with 'the juſt grief of an only ſon for the death of his father . . . . . Every one talked differently of what he 'would do if he was in his place, and every one would 'have found it a very hard matter. He had to do 'with a prince, whom he muſt kill, or be killed by 'him. If he ſhould kill him, he could not expect to 'be ſafe in any place of Chriſtendom; and if he 'ſhould be killed by the perſon who had killed his father, he would not ſatisfy his renſentment. To have 'ſatisfaction done him by juſtice, rather than by the 'ſword, was not a thing to be thought of. The 'chevalier was in the Hotel de Guiſe, from which he 'would not have ſtirred, and where no man would 'have been ſo bold as to go and aſk for him. It is a 'misfortune for gentlemen to have to do with princes, 'who are like iron veſſels againſt an earthen one, 'which cannot ſtrike, without breaking them. However the king ought to do juſtice to all his ſubjects, 'and no prince is exempt from it (20).' The young baron de Lux reſolved to challenge the chevalier de Guiſe. 'The challenge was carried by his gentleman, 'who worthily performed his maſter's order. It was a 'dangerous attempt; for, if he had been known, and 'his deſign had been never ſo little ſuſpected, he 'would have been thrown out of the higheſt windows. 'But he went thither ſo early, that every body was 'ſtill aſleep. He entered into the chevalier's chamber, 'and, awaking him in the name of the baron de Lux, 'moſt humbly beſought him, &c (21).' The chevalier went to the place appointed, and killed his enemy, and 'returned to the Hotel de Guiſe, where he 'was viſited by the braves of the court. Several 'verſes were made upon that duel under the names of 'Paris and Lucidor, becauſe the chevalier of Guiſe's 'name was Paris (22).' Take notice, that the poets declared for the conqueror. They wrote, that this prince and chevalier,

Pouſsé d'un vif reſſentiment

Empeſcher la mort de ſon pere (23).

Urged by ſtrong reſentment, had bravely ſacrificed to a juſt revenge him, who had boaſted (fond vanity!) that he might have hindered the death of his father.

People did not fail to make their obſervations upon the inequality of ſucceſs in combats, where juſtice ſeemed to be equal. If the chevalier was to have the advantage in the firſt fight, becauſe he deſigned to revenge his father's blood; he ſhould have been overcome in the ſecond, becauſe he was to give ſatisfaction to the ſon of a man, whom he had killed; and yet he was as ſucceſsful in the ſecond as in the firſt. Many people were were ſurprized at it, and made ſerious reflexions upon it. But, generally ſpeaking, ſuch quarrels are decided according to the greater or leſſer ſkill, courage, and ſtrength, of the combatants, or by the concourſe of ſome fortuitous cauſes, and not according to the greater or leſſer right. I cannot tell whether any body made two other reflexions, which naturally offer themſelves. One is, that, taking things ſtrictly, the firſt combat was contrary to the laws of good chivalry; for a young man, newly come from the fencing-ſchool, and prepared for fighting, to attack an old man, who expects no ſuch thing, who has been a long time without drawing his ſword, who has forgot all the fencing rules, in a word, whoſe legs and arms are weak, is almoſt the ſame thing as if two men ſhould attack one, or a boy of ſixteen years ſhould fall upon a boy of ten years. The ſecond reflexion is, that Meſſieurs de Guiſe were very unjuſt under the reigns of Henry IV, and Lewis XIII, to revenge themſelves ſo violently upon thoſe, who had been ſomewhat concerned in the execution of Blois. They had obtained a general amneſty for all their rebellions, and as many favours as if they had done great ſervices to their king. Should they not have been as indulgent to thoſe, who had only executed the orders of Henry III, or had not diſſuaded him from an attempt, he thought moſt neceſſary for the preſervation of his crown? ſhould they not have comprehended it under the general amneſty, which was ſo advantageous to them? one might make another reflexion concerning thoſe, who bitterly lament the loſs, which, ſay they, the princes and great lords of France have ſuffered of their authority. The power, ſay they, is too much concentred; it ſhould be divided as it was formerly. But why then do they forget the horrid couſuſions that kingdom was expoſed to, when the court was weak, under the minority of Lewis XIII? do they wiſh for the return of that pretended happy time, when a chevalier de Guiſe killed a man of quality in the ſtreets of Paris with impunity, and was not ſo much as obliged to excuſe himſelf to his prince, or the juſtice of the kingdom.

This chevalier died at Baux, in Provence (24), about a year after (25). He himſelf fired a cannon that burſt, and carried off one half of his body ..... Being carried into the city of Arles the next day, the people, crying and groaning in a ſtrange manner, unnailed his coffin, ript open his ſhroud, and, finding no alteration in his face, had his picture drawn, and ſet up in the town-houſe, as a warning for the living to lament him, and a monument to poſterity to preſerve his memory for ever. But what is more ſurprizing ſtill, the two chief towns of that province, Aix and Arles, having a diſpute about his body, and each of them ſtriving to have the honour of burying it, could not be reconciled but by this expedient, which was to give his heart to the one, and to leave the body to the other. He was alſo lamented at court, not only by his relations, but alſo by the king and the queen-mother, who paid a viſit to the duke of Guiſe, and condoled with him in his very palace. But eſpecially the princeſs of Conti, his ſiſter, was ſo afflicted, that the fineſt pens of that time made it their buſineſs to comfort her (26). Here you ſee a remainder of the idolatary of the French Catholics for the name of Guiſe. Had none been found of that name, that great ſcourge of Heretics, but thoſe, who continually endeavoured to live a Chriſtian life, a philoſopher would be leſs ſurprized at it; but what ſort of men were the greateſt idolaters of that kind? thoſe, who were moſt addicted to the common vices, ſuch as leudneſs, drinking, gaming, avarice, lying, ſlandering, and envy. Theſe are the men, who, to keep up the temporal proſperity of their religion, and to extirpate what they call hereſy, carry their zeal beyond all bounds.

[G] .... Without being brought into the leaſt trouble upon that account.] This plainly reſults from the narrative I have taken out of the book, intituled, Vrai & ancien Uſage des duels. But I will not uſe this teſtimony without examining what I find in Baſſompierre (27). ‘The queen was very angry, when ſhe heard, that the chevalier de Guiſe had killed baron de Luz. I went at the ſame time to the Louvre, where I found her weeping; and ſhe had ſent for the princes and miniſters to hold a council about that affair, which ſhe laid very much to heart. She told me then; you ſee, Baſſompierre, how I am addreſſed to, and what a noble exploit it is to kill an old gentleman without defence, and without giving him warning. But theſe are the tricks of that family, like the killing of St Paul (28) .... The council met in the other hall, whither I led the queen, happening to be near her. That action occaſioned great murmurings, and every body was offended to hear, that there was a great concourſe of nobility in the Hôtel de Guiſe, and that the duke of Guiſe was to come to the queen well attended. Whereupon the queen was adviſed to ſend Mr de Chateau-vieux to the duke of Guiſe, to forbid him to wait upon the queen, till ſhe ſent for him, and to command, in her majeſty's name, all the nobility, that were in the houſe, to retire ... (29). Mr de Chateau-vieux obſerved his orders, and, being returned, ſaid, that ſome had appeared unwilling to retire, and that the duke of Guiſe had deſired them to go away, ſince the queen commanded it. And, being asked, who thoſe refractory men were, he named three or four, and, among others, Mr de la Rochefoucaut. Some incenſed the queen againſt him, who, being maſter of the king's wardrobe, ſhould have been more willing to obey than any body elſe; whereupon it was reſolved to turn him out of the court. It was alſo reſolved, that the parliament ſhould take cognizance of that affair, and ſhould be informed of it. The queen was ſomewhat appeaſed by the quick obedience of the duke of Guiſe; and becauſe, when the chevalier came to the palace of Guiſe, after he had killed the baron, the duke bad him go into the country.’ Mareſchal de Baſſompierre adds, ‘that the duke of Guiſe, ſpoke to the queen with ſo much reſpect and ſubmiſſion, that he pacified her a little; but that Madam de Guiſe his mother ſpoke ſo haughtily to the queen, that ſhe provoked her anew; that Mr de la Rochefoucaut was ordered to leave the court (30);’ that the duke of Guiſe ſided with the cabal of the prince of Condé, and ſaid, ſpeaking of la Rocheſoucaut; ‘yes, by GOD, he ſhall come again, and I ſhall not be beholden to the queen for it (31).’ That the queen was ſo alarmed at the union of the duke of Guiſe with the prince of Condé, that ſhe ordered Baſſompierre to offer to that duke the ſum of a hundred thouſand crowns ready money, the general lieutenancy of Provence for his brother, the chevalier, the reverſion of the abbey of St Germain for the princeſs of Conti, his ſiſter, and the return of la Rochefoucaut (32); that the duke of Guiſe accepted thoſe offers, and promiſed to leave the cabal (33). I ſhall conclude with theſe words of mareſchal de Baſſompierre (34). ‘Some few days after, the young baron de Lux ſent a challenge to the chevalier de Guiſe, who killed him. I ſaw one thing more very ſtrange in the changes of the court. The chevalier de Guiſe having killed the father, the queen ordered the parliament to take cognizance of it, and to proſecute him; and yet, in leſs than a week after, though he had alſo killed the ſon of the ſaid baron de Lux, the queen ſent to him, to know how he did after the wounds he had received in this laſt combat (35).’

Baſſompierre's account ſeems to be inconſiſtent with what I have ſaid in the preceding remark, building upon d'Audiguier's narrative, which contains nothing, whereby it appears, that the judges took cognizance of that affair, or that the chevalier de Guiſe was brought into any trouble; but at the bottom thoſe two accounts may be eaſily reconciled. All that can be concluded from Baſſompierre's narrative, is, I. That the queen's council ordered that the parliament ſhould take cognizance of that cauſe. II. That this order continued till the duke of Guiſe ſided with the prince's cabal. But this interval was ſo ſhort, that it is very likely the parliament did not begin their proceedings, or that they went on ſo ſlowly, that few people heard of them; and therefore d'Audiguier is very excuſable for making no mention of them. He ſuppoſes, that the chevalier lay every night in the palace of Guiſe, and yet Baſſompierre ſays, that the duke ſent him into the country. I believe the duke told the queen, that he had taken ſuch a courſe with the chevalier; nevertheleſs I think d'Audiguier is not miſtaken. The duke knew well enough, that no commiſſaries would be ſent to his houſe, in order to ſee whether the chevalier was there ſtill. And it is to be obſerved, that all authors are agreed, that the young baron de Lux ſent his challenge to the palace of Guiſe, when the chevalier was in bed. The latter lay therefore in that houſe, and conſequently his abſence had been very ſhort, if he had been ſent into the country, as the duke affirmed. But what deſerves moſt to be conſidered, is, that Baſſompierre's narrative ſhews, ſtill more clearly than d'Audiguier's, the horrid confuſion, and the dreadful diſorders France is reduced to, when the court wants a ſufficient power to make itſelf dreaded. This is the right way of confuting thoſe republican authors, who continually ſay, that the happy time is over, when the power was divided between the king and great lords. Oh! what a fine golden age was that, in which the chevalier de Guiſe killed the father and ſon in a month's time, and yet obtained general-lieutenancies; and it was but ſiding with a prince's faction, to put a ſtop to all proceedings of royal juſtice, and to be well paid beſides! Take notice, that, though Baſſompierre was an eye-witneſs of what he relates, it does not follow, that he gives a better account of the ſmall circumſtances of things than other hiſtorians do. He is ſometimes groſsly miſtaken in that reſpect. Here is an inſtance of it; he reckons (36) but a week between the death of baron de Lux the father, and that of baron de Lux the ſon; and yet it is certain there was a month between.

[H] He ſignalized himſelf in the Carrouſel . . . . and was like to carry the prize at the running at the ring.] I ſhall comment upon theſe words, not ſo much to prove what I advance, as to have an opportunity of mentioning a law, that is obſerved in that ſort of exerciſes. 'When people run at the ring, and ſome of the competitors hit it an equal number of times, they contend for the prize among themſelves, by beginning a new race, till one only has the advantage; and if, upon the ſame day, the equality of their ſkill prevents their deciding the honour of the race, the whole company has the privilege of beginning it anew; as it happened in the great Carrouſel of the late king, in which the duke of Vendôme, the counts de St Agnan, and de Monrevel, and the barons de la Chaſtegneraye, and de Fontaines Chalandary were equal, each of them having hit the ring twice in three races, which obliged them to run at it again three times; and being ſtill equal, as by their advantage they debarred others from pretending to the prize, ſo by their equality they loſt their pretenſions to it, according to the laws of thoſe races; and, in ſuch a caſe, the right of diſpoſing of the prize belongs to the lady who gives it. Thus the races being put off, the ring remained in diſpute between the chevalier de Guiſe, the marquis de la Valette, and the marquis de Rouillac, who hit it in all their races, ſo that they were obliged to begin again; and the chevalier de Guiſe and the marquis de la Valette having hit it but twice, the marquis de Rouillac, who hit it in all the races, carried the prize (37).' The chevalier de Guiſe was of the firſt troop of the aſſailants in that Carrouſel, and took the name of Olivante de Loro. That troop was that of the knights of the ſun, and the prince of Conti was their head (38).

GUISE (Henry de Lorrain duke of), ſon of the foregoing, was born the fourth of April 1614 (a), and was one of the moſt accompliſhed lords of France, well ſhaped, ſkilled in all ſorts of exerciſes, and full of wit and courage. There would be no need of many fictions to make his hiſtory look like a romance. He was deſigned for the church, and inveſted with many abbies [A], and even nominated to the archbiſhopric of Rheims (b); 'but having promiſed to marry the princeſs Anne of Mantua [B]... cardinal de Richelieu found a way to deprive him of all his benefices, which occaſioned his retiring to Bruſſels, where he married the counteſs de Boſſu [C], whom he

[A] He was inveſted with many abbies.] 'Thoſe of St Denys in France, St Remy of Rheims, St Nicaiſe, St Peter of Corbie, Feſcamp, Mont St Michael, St Martin of Pontoiſe, Orcamp, Chambon, and Montirandé (1).' He had five hundred thouſand livres a year in benefices, if we believe the author of the State of France (2), printed in 1657. Note, that he was but a child, when he began to have that vaſt income, the ſpoils of two rich cardinals. He ſucceeded, in 1615, cardinal de Joyeuſe, his mother's uncle, in his eſtate, and cardinal de Guiſe in 1621. This I have read in preſident de Gramond (3), who obſerves, that cardinal de Guiſe had a hundred thouſand crowns a year, which the king gave to the young abbot of Feſcamp.

[B] Having promiſed to marry the princeſs Anne of Mantua.] I am going to quote an author, who is ſo far from ſaying, that the duke was deprived of his benefices by reaſon of that engagement, that he affirms he had parted with them before he engaged in that marriage. 'That prince, being a younger brother, was deſigned for the church, and made archbiſhop of Rheims: he parted with his benefices, after the death of his brother, and intended to marry Anne Gonzaga, ſiſter to the princeſs Mary, whom I have ſpoken of. Cardinal de Richelieu, being ſenſible that this match was againſt the good of the ſtate, made uſe of the king's authority to prevent it, and cauſed that princeſs to be confined to a convent. The duke of Guiſe, being extremely vexed at it, left the kingdom, and retired to Cologne, whither his miſtreſs went to him in a man's diſguiſe; but he ſent her back, and went to Bruſſels, where he found the other exiles (4).'

[C] He married the counteſs de Boſſu.] The ducheſs of Chevreuſe, who was then at Bruſſels, brought the duke of Guiſe acquainted with that counteſs (5), 'who was a young widow of a ſweet and gay humour . . . She was brought into a company, where the duke of Guiſe was; and ſhe made ſo many advances to him, that he could not forbear anſwering them. It is true, that, leſt he ſhould have an ill opinion of her conduct, ſhe immediately talked to him of marriage; and the duke declared, he deſired nothing more than to unite his fortune to her's, but in ſuch terms, as ſufficiently ſhewed that he intended only to divert himſelf during his exile. Though the counteſs ſaw through his intention, ſhe made as if ſhe had not perceived it, hoping to engage him more eaſily by a feigned ingenuity. One day ſhe carried him to a fine houſe ſhe had a league from Bruſſels, and afforded him all the diverſions that could be had in that ſeaſon, which was the moſt pleaſant in the year. The duke could not forbear expreſſing his acknowledgement, and talking to her of love as he uſed to do. The counteſs told him, that if he was as much in love as he pretended to be, he would ſhew a more earneſt deſire to marry her. The duke ſwore to her, that he deſired nothing ſo earneſtly as to ſpend the reſt of his life with ſo lovely a perſon, and that ſhe might put him to the trial. The counteſs, taking him at his word, replied, that ſhe would quickly know, whether his proteſtations were ſincere, ſince ſhe had in her houſe a notary and a prieſt to marry them. The duke was ſurprized at her diſcourſe, but diſſembled the matter, and thought he might grant her deſire without any hazard, and that ſhe would be entrapped in her own ſnares, ſince ſuch a marriage, made without the formalities preſcribed by the canons, and without the king's conſent, could not ſtand. The counteſs, perceiving that the duke was diſpoſed to do what ſhe deſired, called in Manſele, chaplain to the army, who married them, and diſpenſed them from publiſhing the bans, as if he had had the ſame authority as the archbiſhop of Mechlen. The duke ſpent the night in that noble houſe with his bride, expreſſing ſo much love to her, that ſhe

‘ he left ſoon after, and returned into France. Being out of favour again, he retired to Rome, where he had his marriage diſſolved. From whence he removed to Naples to command the army of the people, where he was ſoon after made a priſoner, and carried into Spain (c).’ This is what I find concerning him, in a book printed at Paris in the year 1657. To which I muſt add, that the duke of Guiſe had a hand in the treaty, which the count de Soiſſons, the duke of Bouillon, and ſome other male-contents, concluded with Spain (d); that he made a public journey to Bruſſels for a greater ſecurity of that treaty; that he was proſecuted as a criminal; that he was ſentenced for contumacy the ſixth of September 1641, and made his peace in Auguſt 1643 (e); that, ſome months after, he fought a duel with the count de Coligni [D], and that this quarrel was occaſioned by a difference, wherein Madam de Longueville, daughter of the prince of Condé, was concerned. He came off victorious, and

‘ was well pleaſed with the happy ſucceſs of her deſign. The next day he went home, after he had deſired the new ducheſs, that their marriage ſhould be kept ſecret, till he had obtained the conſent of the court and his family. Notwithſtanding the care that was taken to keep that adventure from being made public, it came to the knowledge of the duke d'Elbeuf, and the ducheſs of Chevreuſe, who upbraided the duke of Guiſe with it, as a very baſe thing. The reſpect he had for the ladies, prevented his falling into a paſſion againſt the ducheſs; but he fell out with the duke d'Elbeuf to ſuch a degree, that they would have fought, had not the arch-duke reconciled them. The duke of Guiſe, having loſt all hopes of revenging himſelf with ſword in hand, looked for ſome other way of vexing the two perſons, who had offended him, and thought the moſt effectual was to bring the counteſs to his houſe, and to treat her publickly as his wife. This he did, and ever after he lived in good underſtanding with her all the time he was at Bruſſels.’ The author, who relates this, ſuppoſes, that the duke of Guiſe endeavoured to get his marriage diſſolved, for no other reaſon, but that he might marry Mademoiſelle de Pons. I ſhall ſet down his own words again (6). ‘ The duke of Guiſe could not marry Mademoiſelle de Pons, without getting his marriage with the counteſs de Boſſu diſſolved, and therefore he reſolved to go to Rome, in order to ſollicit the diſſolution of it at the Rota. The action was already commenced, and the ducheſs of Guiſe, his mother, had ſent a gentleman thither to that purpoſe; but, when ſhe heard, that her ſon was in love with Mademoiſelle de Pons, ſhe ſent word to her agent to drop the proſecution. The duke ſet out at laſt, and, after many dangers at ſea, arrived ſafe at Florence, and engaged the great duke to write in his behalf to Innocent X, lately raiſed to the pontificate. When that prince came to Rome, he was very kindly received by the Pope, who at his requeſt gave a cardinal's hat to cardinal Mazarin's brother. The duke of Guiſe hoped, that this ſervice would move that firſt miniſter to favour his deſign; but, on the contrary, the French embaſſador was ordered to oppoſe it.’

I muſt obſerve, that the queſtion concerning the validity of the marriage of the duke of Guiſe, and the counteſs de Boſſu, has been debated again, not long ago. We have ſeen in the public news, that it has been declared valid by the Rota at Rome (7), and that the parliament of Paris has given a contrary judgment. It is therefore ſtill a matter of diſpute: Adhuc ſub judice lis eſt. I muſt not forget what mareſchal de Baſſompierre ſays, that the duke of Guiſe, who died in 1640, had ſuffered very much in his family by the loſs of his two children . . . . and by reaſon of the ill conduct of the third, who lived not according to his profeſſion (8). He, whom Baſſompierre calls the third ſon of that duke of Guiſe, was the ſecond, the ſame who courted the counteſs de Boſſu, who had ſo many abbies, and lived a liſe ſo unbecoming thoſe, who are deſigned for prelacies.

[D] He fought a duel with the count de Coligni.] This affair made a great noiſe, and I believe the readers will be well pleaſed to find here a particular account of it. It is a remarkable inſtance of the diſorders uſually occaſioned by the jealouſy and gallantry of the fair ſex. The following narrative may be depended upon; for, though I take it from an author, who does not put his name to his book, who is ſometimes miſtaken, and often confounds matters of fact, without taking much care to avoid anachroniſms, he was very well informed of the affair, upon this occaſion, and relates it much in the ſame manner as Mr de la Barde, a very exact hiſtorian (9). ‘ (10) The ducheſs of Chevreuſe, who fancied, that the prince was the chief cauſe of the duke of Beaufort's confinement, and of Chateauneuf's diſgrace, reſolved to be revenged of him. Though the ladies are apt to flatter themſelves in point of beauty, her glaſs had acquainted her more than once, that her charms, half worn out, ſtood in need of a younger perſon, to ſtrengthen her intereſt, and ſhe was not obliged to look for one out of her family. The daughter of the counteſs de Vertus, whom the duke of Montbaſon her father had married, was, as has been ſaid before, the moſt beautiful woman in France; beſides, he had a ſpite againſt the prince of Condé's ſiſter, who, having married the duke of Longueville, had deprived her of a lover; and ſo ſhe found it no difficult thing to bring her over to her intereſt. The duke of Guiſe, who, after his return, had declared for that handſome ducheſs, ingaged all the Lorrain princes to ſide with him; beſides, they ſeemed to be inclined to it out of reſpect for the duke of Chevreuſe, who was of the ſame family (11). Thoſe two ladies, being ſtrictly united, reſolved to begin their revenge by reflecting upon Madam de Longueville's reputation. They publiſhed the letters, written by that lady to the duke of Beaufort, who had given them to the ducheſs of Montbaſon: they alſo forged others, which they pretended to have been written by Madam de Longueville to Coligny. The princeſs of Condé, hearing, that the ducheſs of Montbaſon had ſpread that report, highly reſented it, and engaged all her friends to help her to be revenged of her. This quarrel divided the whole court, and made the queen apprehenſive it would revive the ancient enmity of the houſes of Bourbon and Guiſe. Thoſe two parties were pretty equal, becauſe the duke of Orleans, who had married a woman of the houſe of Lorrain, declared for Madam de Montbaſon; and therefore that quarrel might have been attended with dangerous conſequences. Though is was the queen's intereſt to prevent too ſtrict an union between the duke of Orleans and the prince of Condé, leſt their authority ſhould be prejudicial to her's; yet, becauſe it was more dangerous ſtill to ſuffer them to carry their reſentment to the laſt extremity, ſhe endeavoured to reconcile them. She obliged the princeſs of Condé, and the ducheſs of Longueville, to receive ſatisfaction from the ducheſs of Montbaſon; and that ducheſs declared to the two princeſſes in her preſence, that ſhe had no hand in ſpreading thoſe reports, and that ſhe diſowned them. The two princeſſes declared alſo, as it had been agreed upon, that they were willing to believe it, ſince Madam de Montbaſon ſaid it: it was ſtipulated by the ſame agreement, that this ducheſs ſhould avoid all occaſions of meeting the two princeſſes; which ſhe did not obſerve afterwards. The ducheſs of Chevreuſe, having invited the queen to a collation prepared for her in Renard's houſe, near the door of the conference, brought her mother-in-law with her. The queen was accompanied by the princeſs of Condé, who, perceiving the ducheſs of Montbaſon, had a mind to retire; but the queen detained her, and deſired that ducheſs to walk out ſomewhere for her ſake; which ſhe did ſo unwillingly, that the queen was very angry with her: and being returned to the royal palace, ſhe ſent Guenegaud, ſecretary of ſtate, to command her to retire forthwith to her ſeat of Rocheſort. That quarrel ſeemed to be at an end by the removal of the ducheſs; but Coligny, not thinking himſelf revenged of thoſe, who deſigned to ſet him at variance with the houſe of Bourbon, and was little afraid of the conſequences of that fight, though it was a true duel, fought in the middle of the Place Royale, and though part of the princes of the blood were againſt him. Notwithſtanding thoſe circumſtances, and many others, and the informations the parliament of Paris began to make at the inſtance of the king's attorney-general (f), the duke of Guiſe appeared in public, and made a campaign the year following (g) at the ſiege of Graveline, under the duke of Orleans. However, it is not to be doubted, that this duel was the chief reaſon of his going ſoon after into Italy. He was at Rome, when the Neapolitans made an inſurrection, and deſired him for their leader. He accepted their propoſal, and ſet out the 13th of November 1647 (h). The obſtacles he was obliged to overcome, in order to get into Naples (i), were ſuch, that la Calprenede and Scudery hardly invented any thing more worthy of a romantic adventurer. The duke was received by the inhabitants of Naples with an extraordinary joy; and it was ordered, the 17th of November, That he ſhould be ſtyled generaliſſimo of the army, and defender of liberty, with the ſame honours the prince of Orange enjoyed in Holland, under the protection of the moſt Chriſtian king (k). He met with many difficulties in the exerciſe of that new dignity, and gave many proofs of his ability and courage; but fortune proved contrary to him: The court of France not being able or willing to aſſiſt him, he could not maintain himſelf, and was obliged to make dangerous attempts, in which he fell, and loſt his liberty. He was taken by the enemies, who carried him into Spain, where he was a priſoner a conſiderable time. He was ſet at liberty in Auguſt 1652 (l), at the ſollicitation of the prince of Condé (m); and it is thought, the court of Spain conſented to it the more willingly, becauſe they hoped the duke of Guiſe would occaſion new broils and factions in France (n). It has been the common opinion, that the court of France neglected to aſſiſt him, becauſe they were not willing he ſhould eſtabliſh his authority in the kingdom of Naples, and thought it more for their intereſt, that the inhabitants of that county ſhould be under the power of Spain, than ſubject to the houſe of Lorrain. The duke of Guiſe being returned into France, ‘Bourbon, to which he had the honour to be related, ſent a challenge to the duke of Guiſe, by the marquis d'Eſtrades; the duke accepted it, and took the marquis de Bridieu for his ſecond. The duel was fought in the Place Royale, and the duke of Guiſe had the advantage: he diſarmed his enemy, after he had dangerouſly wounded him, and then parted the ſeconds, who fought with great courage, without any advantage on either ſide. The duke of Guiſe got a great deal of honour by that duel, which would have increaſed the conſideration his miſtreſs had already for him, if he had continued in his love; but his heart received other impreſſions ſoon after (12).’

Note, that la Barde places that duel in the year 1644, and ſays, the two ſeconds wounded one another very much (13). But Sarravius, in a letter he writ ſome few days after that action, affirms, that Mr d'Eſtrades was not wounded (14), and that the duel was fought the twelfth of December, 1643. Grotius agrees with him as to the time; for, in a letter (15) he writ from Paris, the nineteenth of December, 1643, he ſays, the duke of Guiſe and the count de Coligny had fought a duel a week before. He obſerves a circumſtance omitted by Sarravius, viz. that the count was diſarmed. I wonder Sarravius takes no notice of it: can a man write ſuch a conſiderable piece of news without obſerving whether one of the combatants was worſted, or whether they were both parted? Here we ſee an effect of the paſſions. Sarravius, as a good Proteſtant, was ſorry for the duke of Guiſe's victory. The count de Coligny, eldeſt ſon of the mareſchal de Chatillon, deſcended from an admiral de Coligny in a right line: he was a Proteſtant; and his quarrel looked like a renewing of the ancient enmity of the Guiſes and Chatillons. Upon theſe conſiderations, Sarravius could have heartily wiſhed, that the advantage had been on Coligny's ſide. He was vexed at his being worſted; he would gladly have concealed it from himſelf; but, not being able to do it, he at leaſt concealed it from others. This was the reaſon why he ſaid nothing of it in his letter to Salmaſius. Such is the diſpoſition of men upon unacceptable news. They do what they can not to believe it; and, if they cannot deceive themſelves, nor maintain that it is falſe, they will at leaſt ſpare themſelves the vexation of plainly owning the truth of it, and acquainting others with it. Sarravius writ to his friend, ſome days after, that the prince of Condé had abſolutely commanded the duke of Enguien, who had harboured the count de Coligny in his houſe, to diſmiſs him; and that the poor count retired to a miniſter's houſe (16). He died of grief (17) five months after the duel (18).

Whoever makes ſolid reflexions upon that duel, muſt needs highly commend cardinal Richelieu's prudence, in ſending the ducheſs of Chevreuſe out of the kingdom. Ladies, who make an ill uſe of their beauty and wit, to intrude into ſtate-intrigues, are the plagues of a court: the beſt way is to get rid of them as ſoon as poſſible, and ſend them to grace foreign countries. If the ducheſs I ſpeak of had continued at Paris, after the conſpiracy of Chalais, her favourite lover (19), ſhe would have played many tricks. We ſee that ſhe was hardly returned into France, but ſhe laid the foundations of that unhappy duel, which occaſioned the death of the count de Coligny, a young lord, who might have done many ſervices to the crown; a duel, in which Mr d'Eſtrades might have been killed, whoſe ability and ſword were very ſerviceable to the kingdom, as it appeared afterwards by his military actions and important embaſſies. If you trace the duel of the duke of Guiſe, and the count de Coligny to it's original, you will find the cauſe of it in the ambition of the ducheſs of Chevreuſe, who made uſe of the jealouſy of another ducheſs as a proper inſtrument for it. Thoſe two ladies, who perfectly agreed, tho' one of them was the ſtep-mother (20) of the other, contrived a ſtory, in order to caſt a blot upon the reputation of a princeſs of the blood. This was the occaſion of that duel. A plot, attended with ſuch a conſequence, without any other conſideration, is ſufficient to create an horror. But the thing will appear more horrid, if it be conſidered by what motives it was contrived. Was it out of tenderneſs for the ducheſs of Longueville's husband, was it to revenge an injury done to his honour, that a ſcandalous ſtory was given out concerning that ducheſs? No, it was through a quite different deſire of revenge: the husband's honour, far from being repaired, ſuffered the more by it. A married lady was reſolved to be revenged of the ducheſs, becauſe ſhe had deprived her of the duke of Longueville her lover, by marrying him. In order to ſucceed in her deſign, ſhe ſpoke ſome words, which, among other conſequences, occaſioned a duel mentioned in hiſtory. By this means, the ſtep-mother and the daughter-in-law have immortalized their names; for their conduct will be known as long as there are any French hiſtories of Lewis XIV's reign. Some are of opinion, that the true merit of a woman conſiſts in concealing ſo prudently her beſt qualities under the veil of modeſty, that they may afford no matter for hiſtory or converſation (21). This is perhaps too

France, did not think of forming any cabals which might accommodate the prince of Condé's affairs: he was much more taken up with love-intrigues; and, if he undertook an expedition to recover Naples [E], it was rather a meer oſtentation, than a ſolid deſign: that expedition came to nothing. He was made great chamberlain, that place being vacant ſince the death of the duke of Joyeuſe, his brother (o). He was appointed, in 1656, to go and meet the queen of Sweden, who was coming into France: a more judicious choice could not have been made; for no man was ever better qualified for ſuch commiſſions, and whatever required pomp and magnificence. He made a great figure in the famous carrouſel of the year 1662. He headed the troop of Moors. He was born for ſuch ſhews and ſpectacles; and no man did ever better deſerve to live in the time of Tournaments, and in the age of the Paladins. We are told a very remarkable thing, concerning the gift he had of making women in love with him. It is ſaid, that thoſe, who loved him, could diſcover by the motion of their heart, though they did not ſee him, whether he was preſent [F]. He died of ſickneſs, at Paris, the ſecond too rigid a morality, and there is no inconvenience in mitigating it, and ſuffering a lady to have the ambition of being placed in the temple of Fame, and in the writings of an hiſtorian: but ſhe ſhould only deſire to be mentioned by the authors, who, like Valerius Maximus, make a catalogue of the greateſt examples of piety, chaſtity, conjugal love, charity, conſtancy, &c. Women might lawfully be ambitious of having a place in ſuch books; but, when their conduct can only bring an eternal diſgrace upon them in hiſtory, it deſerves all the indignation the heart of man can conceive.

For the reſt, I ſhall obſerve, that authors do not agree as to the manner how the court expreſſed their reſentment againſt the ducheſs of Chevreuſe, at the time of the affair of Chalais. Some ſay, ſhe was baniſhed into Lorrain. It is the expreſſion of the author of the hiſtory of cardinal Richelieu, printed at Amſterdam in 1694 (22). Preſident de Gramond ſays only, that ſhe fled, and was not impriſoned by reaſon of her ſex. He adds, that if ſhe had been ſecured, it had been well for the public, both within and without the kingdom, ſince ſhe diſturbed moſt of the courts of Europe. Fuga item conſulit ſibi Duciſſa Capruſii multis rea nominibus: ſexus fragilitas, & veneratio inbibuerant nuper quo minus & ipſa in carcerem traheretur: certe magnum erat Galliæ, magnum principibus externis ab ea detentione beneficium, auctrice paſſim in res novas intra & extra Galliam eâ fœmina, aularumque ferme tota Europa omnium perturbatrice, quod ſuo infra loco reddemus (23). The true account of the matter is, that, at firſt, ſhe was ordered to leave the court, and that afterwards ſhe was kept in cuſtody, and found a way to get out of the kingdom. Per difficilia Reginæ tempora hanc diligentiſſimè coluerat, atque obſervaverat (Rohana Mombaſona) atque eâ causâ & Ludovico XIII. & Richelio inviſa, Aulâ pulſa, in cuſtodiam conjecta, poſtremò fugâ ſibi conſulere, atque in Hiſpania, & Belgio exulare coacta fuerat (24). La Barde, who ſays ſo, rightly obſerves, that ſhe became odious to Lewis XIII; for we read in la Rochefoucaut's memoirs (25), that the reaſons, which made the queen irreſolute about the return of the ducheſs of Chevreuſe, were a particular clauſe of the declaration, and a ſtrange averſion which the king expreſſed againſt her, at his death. That lady died in Auguſt 1679, in her ſeventy ninth year (26).

[E] He was much more taken up with love-intrigues; . . . he undertook an expedition to recover Naples] That expedition was in the year 1654. The duke made himſelf maſter of Caſtell' à-mare, and loſt it ſoon after (27). I ſhall ſet down a paſſage of Priolo, whereby it appears, that the duke of Guiſe's liberty was of no uſe to the Spaniards, nor to the prince of Condé. ‘Guiſius ante paucos annos dux electus Reipublicæ Neapolitanæ, & inter ſævos tumultus captus ac deductus in Hiſpaniam, nunc libertate donatur, id maxime procurante Condæo. Iberica fuit vafrities, Guiſium Galliæ redonare, & Condæo concedere; ut, qui avorum non immemor, poſſet rurſus moliri nova, & ciere turbas. At oblitus donatæ libertatis, & Condæi negligens, choreas & haſtiludia cogitavit. Rurſus ab eo tentatum iter Neapolitanum oſtentui fuit, renovaturum in animo levi ſpes acciſas per vanum ludibrium. Nullus mortalium tam vana concepit, editus atavis, qui tam grandia, tam ſolida captabant (28). —— ‘The duke of Guiſe, being a few years before choſen leader of the republic of Naples, and amidſt cruel commotions taken priſoner, and carried into Spain, is now ſet at liberty by the interpoſition of the prince of Condé. It was Spaniſh cunning to reſtore Guiſe to France, and to comply with Condé; ſince he might have trod in the ſteps of his anceſtors, and raiſed new troubles. But, forgetful of the gift of liberty, and regardleſs of the prince of Condé, he thought of nothing but tournaments and balls. The expedition to Naples, which he afterwards attempted, was very ſurpriſing; no mortal, ſprung from anceſtors, who had done ſuch great things, having ever entertained ſuch vain conceits.’ La Barde ſays, that the queen-mother had conſented to the exchange propoſed by the Spaniards, who had offered to releaſe the duke of Guiſe, provided France ſhould reſtore all the priſoners of their party. But they altered their mind ſoon after; and, hoping the duke of Guiſe would be a powerful inſtrument in the prince of Condé's hands, to foment many troubles in the kingdom, they releaſed him at that prince's requeſt. But, as ſoon as the duke came into France, he declared, that, ſince he had been ſo ill uſed by the Spaniards, he would do nothing for them, nor to expreſs his gratitude to the prince, whilſt he remained in their intereſt; but, if he forſook it, he would do any thing for him. He found, that he was highly obliged to the queen-mother, who had conſented, that, in order to have him releaſed, four thouſand priſoners, ſome of whom were conſiderable men, ſhould be reſtored to the Spaniards (29). However it be, he minded love more than war. He returned to Paris, more in love with Mademoiſelle de Pons, than he had been before his impriſonment, and reſolved to marry her (30), but, being informed that ſhe was unfaithful to him, he treated her with great indignity, and even ſued her at law, demanding the pendants, valued fifty thouſand crowns, and a piece of rich tapeſtry, which he had given her; but he had not the ſucceſs he promiſed himſelf. The loſs of his cauſe encreaſed his rage, and he reſolved to go and inſult her in her own houſe (31). She was informed of it, and avoided the inſult. Some time after ſhe left the kingdom. The duke of Guiſe, hearing of her departure (32), embarked in the king's fleet for a ſecond voyage to Naples (33). Being returned into France, he fell in love with Mademoiſelle de Gorce, who loved him more ſincerely, and, after his death, ſhe retired into the convent of the Carmelites, where ſhe took the habit (34). All this ſhews, that if he was a hero, he was not one according to the notions of Corneille, but according to thoſe of Racine and Quinaut. He was a hero always in love (35), and ſometimes like him of the Æneid: He enjoyed all the privileges of a husband; he made his miſtreſs believe ſhe was his wife, and yet never deſigned to marry her. Thus ſhe was like Dido (36), and he was like Æneas (37). It does not follow from hence, that his adventures were heroical: there is nothing in them, but what is frequently to be ſeen among citizens and ordinary gentlemen.

[F] It is ſaid, that the women, who loved him, could diſcover . . . . tho' they did not ſee him, whether he was preſent.] I do not give this particular as a certain truth; I only mention what I have read. Thoſe two lovers, that is, the duke of Guiſe and the counteſs de Boſſu, muſt needs have loved one another very much, and I wonder how their love ended before their life. They had an inward foreſight, which informed them of their arrival, a long time before they

ſaw one another: pray, madam, judge whether it was a juſt foreſight. The duke grew jealous of the count de  who was very much in love with the counteſs; and it is well known, that he was one of the moſt handſome men that can be ſeen. She did not love him, and, notwithſtanding what has been ſaid to the contrary, Angelique ſwore to me, that Madam de  loved no body but the duke of . But he was not ſo fully convinced of his happineſs as he ſhould have been: and, being daily informed, that his rival was very conſtant and paſſionate, he reſolved to know the truth of it, without being perceived, and to that end he came to Bruſſels incognito. There were great rejoicings at that time for the birth of a Spaniſh prince, called Baltazar . . . (38). ‘The duke, being arrived, ‘was told, that many young lords of the country ‘were to make a maſquerade of Indians, and to go ‘in that diſguiſe to the counteſs de Cantecroix, in ‘whoſe houſe there was to be a great aſſembly. ‘He had one of thoſe ſuits of cloaths brought to ‘him, and found it no difficult thing to have a ſight ‘of them, for there was no order to hide them. He ‘got one made for him exactly like them, and, go‘ing among the maskers, he entered with them in‘to the hall, where they danced. He ſaw there Ma‘dam de  who appeared more beautiful to him than ‘before, and the Count de  by her; for he was ‘conſtantly at thoſe aſſemblies, and ſhe could not pre‘vent it by reaſon of the reſpect that was due to his ‘quality . . . as ſoon as the duke came in, the coun‘teſs felt a certain emotion, which his preſence al‘ways produced in her. She could not think that ‘ſhe was deceived by it; and, though her lover had ‘written to her, that he was going to take a jour‘ney, ſhe curiouſly looked for him among the maſ‘kers, and diſcovered him. This made their love ‘very conſpicuous; for the lady, in the ſudden fit of ‘her joy, could not diſſemble her paſſion; and the ‘lover was likewiſe ſo tranſported, that he forgot the ‘reaſons he had ſtill to conceal his love . . . I have ‘ſeen an original letter of the duke about that effect ‘of ſympathy, which, in my opinion, was one of ‘the fineſt letters that ever was written: he com‘plained in it, that he was too happy; for he ‘owned, that it was a very great happineſs to be ‘thus gueſſed at by one’s miſtreſs; but he ſaid, it de‘prived him of the pleaſure of knowing what paſ‘ſed in her heart, when ſhe had no mind to let him ‘know it: ſuch a diſcovery was, in his opinion, one ‘of the greateſt pleaſures a lover can enjoy; and no‘thing appeared to him more moving, than a diſ‘cloſing of tenderneſs and ſincerity, when there is ‘no ground to ſuſpect, that art and precaution have ‘any ſhare in it (39).

[G] He was carried to Joinville, to be buried among his anceſtors.] I have ſaid in another place (40), that the barony of Joinville was erected into a principality in the year 1552. It fell to the houſe of Lorrain by the marriage of Ferri de Lorrain, firſt of that name, with Margaret de Joinville, eldeſt daughter of Henry, fourth of that name, count de Vaudemont, and lord of Joinville: that Ferri was killed at the battle of Azincourt in 1415 (41). Renatus II, duke of Lorrain, left by his will, dated the twenty fifth of May 1506, to Claudius his younger ſon, the ſeats of Guiſe, Elbeuf, Aumale, Mayenne, JOINVILLE, and others, which he had in France (42). The tombs of the dukes of Guiſe are to be ſeen in St Laurence’s church at Joinville. See the deſcription of that of Claudius in Remy Belleau (43).

[H] His two ſiſters died ſince, without being married.] One of them was called Mary, and was born the fifteenth of Auguſt 1615, and went by the name of Mademoiſelle de Guiſe (44). I have read ſomewhere (45) that ſhe was near marrying Uladiſlaus king of Poland. The other’s name was Frances Renata: ſhe was born the tenth of January 1621, and was put into a convent. She was abbeſs of St Peter at Rheims, and then of Montmartre (46). After the death of thoſe two daughters, there remained no male nor female iſſue of the branch of Guiſe; and it is to be obſerved, that, tho’ the four firſt dukes of that name had many children, all their poſterity is extinct, except that of Renatus de Lorrain marquis d’Elbeuf, eighth ſon of Claudius firſt duke of Guiſe. All the princes of the houſe of Lorrain, that are now in France, are deſcended from him; they are ſtill many, and in a flouriſhing condition. If the title of duke of Guiſe comes to be beſtowed upon any body, it will be a very heavy burden. I do not know who is now in poſſeſſion of that duchy; I could not receive in due time the memoirs I deſired concerning the conſequences of the laſt will of Mademoiſelle de Guiſe. She had been ducheſs of that name a conſiderable time, when ſhe died in March 1688. She left, by her will, the duchy of Guiſe, worth a hundred thouſand livres a year, to the younger ſon of the duke of Lorrain, with the principality of Joinville, which is worth not much leſs, and her fine houſe at Paris, upon condition that he ſhould bear that name, and live in France, with the king’s approbation (47). The noveliſt, who publiſhed thoſe things, adds: ‘But, beſides ‘that the king is not well pleaſed with that donation, ‘the duke d’Elbœuf pretends he has been wronged, ‘ſince he is the next heir in the male line; and there‘fore he has already entered an action againſt it to get ‘it declared void, eſpecially as to the duchy of Guiſe, ‘maintaining, that the late ducheſs could not diſpoſe ‘of it to his prejudice . . . . (48) The deceaſed lady ‘is ſuſpected of having had a marriage of conſcience ‘with the late Mr de Montreſor, a gentleman of ‘quality and merit. Nay, it was ſaid, they had ſeveral ‘children, of whom their remained two daughters. ‘This report was particularly ſpread four years ago, ‘when that princeſs made a donation to the prince ‘of Harcourt, which however had no effect. It was ‘pretended, that the money he was to give her was ‘deſigned for the marriage of thoſe two daughters; but ‘whether it be that they died ſince, or that there ‘was no ground for ſuch a report, it is certain no ‘mention is made of it in her will (49).’

(38) This is wrong chronology; for Dom Baltazar was born in 1629: the duke of Guiſe was then but fifteen years of age; and Note, That Father Anſelme, pag. 441, of his book, intituled, Le Palais de l’Honneur, ſays, that he married, in December, 164 , Honorina de Berghes, daughter of the count de Grimberghe, widow of Albert Maximilian de Hennin count de Boſſut.

GUISE (LEWIS DE LORRAIN Cardinal de). There have been three cardinals of that name. The firſt was brother of Francis de Lorrain, duke of Guiſe. The ſecond was ſon of the ſame duke. Moreri ſpeaks of both (a), but ſays nothing of the third; and therefore I ſhall only ſpeak of him. He was the ſon of Henry de Lorrain, duke of Guiſe, who was killed at Blois, and he was born in the year 1575. He was a man of ſuch a martial temper, that he breathed nothing but war, tho’ he was an eccleſiaſtic, a cardinal, and archbiſhop of Rheims. He followed the king in his expedition of Poictou, in the year 1621, and ſignalized himſelf among the moſt valiant and reſolute gentlemen of the army, in the attack of a ſuburb at the ſiege of St Jean d’Angeli (b). He fell ſick ſome days after, and was carried to Saintes, where he died, the twenty firſt of June 1621. His ſuit with the duke of Nevers about a priory turned to a quarrel, and he appeared very willing to put an end to it with ſword in hand. I ſhall mention ſome circumſtances relating to that affair [A]. He repented upon his his death-bed of his looſe life (c), and of the injury he had done to the duke of Nevers (d). Preſident de Gramond blames him with reſpect to his warlike actions, which made him dip his hands in blood; but he ſpares him as to his concubinage [B]; which, tho' infinitely

'and more inclined to war than to learning. Many 'authors have mentioned his quarrel with the duke of 'Nevers, about the collation of the priory of La 'Charité, and what paſſed betwixt them in the houſe 'of the judge that was to report their caſe. Thoſe, 'who, by their writings, produced in the proceſs, 'ſet thoſe two princes at variance, were the occaſion 'of their coming to blows, and going out of Paris, 'each with their friends, to put an end to their quarrel 'at the expence of their lives. But his majeſty hav'ing ſent the light-horſe to ſeize their perſons, he, 'who commanded them, and had expreſs orders to 'arreſt the cardinal, executed his majeſty's command, 'and brought him to Paris; where, for fear of a 'ſecond meeting, becauſe the duke of Nevers was 'always abroad, he was carried one evening to the 'Baſtile, and from thence to Bois de Vincennes (2).' Preſident de Gramond mentions ſome other curious particulars, viz. that cardinal de Guiſe, meeting the duke of Nevers in the judge's houſe, gave him ſome offenſive words, to which the duke made a ſmart anſwer; and that thereupon the cardinal gave him a blow with his fiſt, in the judge's preſence. The prince of Joinville, brother to the cardinal, immediately drew his ſword, and ſtruck ſeveral times, with the flat ſide of it, Mareſcot maſter of the requeſts, who with his majeſty's leave managed the affairs of the duke of Nevers. The king, being informed, that the duke was reſolved to fight a duel with the prince of Joinville, interpoſed his authority to reconcile them, and obliged the cardinal to aſk the duke's pardon. As for the affront done to the maſter of the requeſts, it was repaired thus: the prince of Joinville was obliged to uſe theſe words before the arbitrators. Mr Mareſcot, out of conſideration for the duke of Nevers, I am ſorry I have beaten you: I deſire you to forget it, and to believe that I ſhall be your friend for the ſake of the duke of Nevers. Preſident de Gramond makes a very ſolid obſervation upon the diſorders of that time, when a maſter of the requeſts might be beaten with impunity. That diſorder proceeded only from the diminution of the royal authority, and ceaſed as ſoon as cardinal de Richelieu humbled the princes and great lords, who had uſurped a very great part of the ſovereign power, and made them ſubmit to Lewis XIII. Does it not ſavour of anarchy, that, in a country, which has the title of a kingdom, thoſe, who have beaten a great magiſtrate, ſhould not be obliged to acknowledge, that they are ſorry for it, by reaſon of his character, but only for the ſake of the great lord he ſerved? conſider theſe words of preſident de Gramond. 'Principum 'per ea tempora ſumma erat ratio, affectabantque di'ſtingui ab omni ordine, prærogativa ſanguinis. Per 'injuriam Joinvillius percuſſerat magiſtratum, & ait 'dolere ſe ex perſona Niverni, quod percuſſerit; quaſi 'adeo infra poſitus in quem collata offenſa, ut gratis 'cædi poſſet. Erat hæc labes ejus ætatis, qua à 'principibus rex parum diſtinguebatur; quo jure 'utimur hodie, nempe anno M. DC. XLII. quo 'hæc ſcribo, externi principes parum à Regni primori'bus, parum hi à nobilibus differunt, uno ferme 'ordine habemur omnes; eoque ventum ut nemo 'publice, nemo privatim peccare poſſit ſine ultore, 'quod ejus ſapientiæ & æquitati debitum, qui ætate 'noſtra ſummam rerum tenet in Gallia (3). —— 'At that time the princes of the blood were highly con'ſidered, and they affected to be diſtinguiſhed from every 'order, by the prerogative of their birth. The prince 'of Joinville had injuriouſly ſtruck a magiſtrate, and 'ſays, he is ſorry for it in regard to the duke of Nevers; 'as tho' the offended perſons was ſo much beneath him, 'that he might be ſtruck with impunity. This was 'the reproach of that age, which made little diſtinction 'between the king and the princes of the blood; but at 'preſent, viz. in the year 1642, in which I write this, 'foreign princes differ little from the chief men of the 'kingdom, theſe but little from the nobility; there ſeems 'to be but one rank among us; and it is come to this paſs, 'that no one can offend publickly, or privately, with'out an avenger; which is owing to his wiſdom and 'equity, who, in this our age, has the management of 'affairs in France.' The abbot de Marolles affords ſome other circumſtances. About the beginning of the winter 1620, ſays he (4), the duke of Nevers had a great quarrel with cardinal de Guiſe, for the priory of La Charité, which depended on the abbey of Cluni; for, having got it conferred on the prince of Tymeraye, his ſecond ſon, by the court of Rome, upon a letter or promiſe of cardinal de Guiſe, abbot of Cluni; and the cardinal going from his word, and intending to procure it to one of the children he had by the lady des Eſſars, they went to law about it, aud their ſuit divided all the perſons of quality at court . . . . . The pacifying of that quarrel proved a difficult thing, becauſe ſome blows were ſtruck on both ſides; and the duke of Nevers, who was firſt offended, miſtruſting nothing, had no time to draw his ſword, which Fouques his gentleman held out of the judges chamber, where he was alone.

[B] The preſident de Gramond blames him with reſpect to his warlike actions . . . . . but he ſpares him as to his concubinage.] He makes uſe of this antitheſis (5): 'Militiam affectabat impatiens ſui; non miles, quia 'Cardinalis; non item Cardinalis, quia miles erat . . . . 'Indebitum certe characteri, quod in Engeriaca obſi'dione ſæpe ferrum in hoſtem ſtrinxit, immemor Ec'cleſiam neſcire ſanguinem. —— He affected the ſol'dier, thro' a kind of ſelf-impatience; being not a ſol'dier, becauſe a cardinal; and not a cardinal, becauſe 'a ſoldier . . . . He certainly acted out of character, 'ſince, at the ſiege of St John d'Angeli, he drew his 'ſword againſt the enemy, forgetting that the church is 'a ſtranger to blood.' Perhaps it will be ſaid, that he did not mention that cardinal's amours, becauſe he knew nothing of them. But I cannot believe he was ignorant of them; they were too public, and had been attended with iſſue. The Chronicle of the Favourites, printed in 1622, ſuppoſes (6), that there happened a diſpute between cardinal de Guiſe and the duke du Mayne, who ſhould get firſt into Charon's boat. The cardinal ſaid, he died firſt, and conſequently ought to have the precedence. The duke did not deny it, but repreſented that he ought to go in firſt, becauſe he had been killed in the king's ſervice, whereas the other died only of ſickneſs. The cardinal replied, that he had left his wife and children for GOD's cauſe, of which he deſired no other witneſs than the duke of Nevers, whereas the duke du Mayne had left no ſuch thing. Every body knew then, that this cardinal had kept one of Henry the fourth's miſtreſſes, viz. Charlotte des Eſſars. The memory of it was the more eaſily preſerved, becauſe that woman had been ſo fortunate as to marry a great lord; notwithſtanding the public diſgrace ſhe was under; a king of France, and then an archbiſhop of Rheims, having got ſeveral children by her (7). Mr du Hallier, who perhaps would have thought himſelf undermatched, if he had married Charlotte des Eſſars with a clear reputation, did not ſcruple to make her his wife when ſhe had loſt it. He was a man of quality, and brother of a mareſchal of France (8). He was knight of the order of the HOLY GHOST, and captain of the life-guards, and had given proofs of that military virtue, which raiſed him afterwards to the dignity of mareſchal of France; and yet, in a lawful marriage, he was contented with the leavings of a cardinal. The public did not fail to take notice of it. There are ſo many occaſions of alledging ſuch examples, that this ſort of adventures are ſeldom forgotten. But when people began perhaps to talk more of it, there aroſe ſome perſons, who laid a claim to Mademoiſelle de Guiſe's eſtate, and revived the ideas of that object. Read what follows: I take it from the Mercure Hiſtorique & Politique for April, 1688. 'The marchioneſs d'Acy, wife of the younger brother 'of count de Gamache, knight of the king's orders, 'diſputes at preſent the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Guiſe, 'by virtue of a box brought to her by an unknown 'perſon, in which ſhe found a contract of marriage 'between cardinal de Guiſe and Charlotte des Eſſars, 'mother of count de Romorantin, her father, who was 'always accounted the cardinal's baſtard. That con'tract is attended with the nuptial benediction in due 'form; and, moreover, with a diſpenſation from the 'Pope, permitting the cardinal to enjoy his benefices 'tho' he be a married man: in ſhort, nothing 'ſeems to be wanting, but a ſufficient ſupport, to diſ'pute ſo great a ſucceſſion with thoſe concerned in it.

nitely more common among the clergy than military functions, is an infraction of the canonical diſcipline. To conclude, I believe ſome reflexions have been made upon this, That the deſcendants of the ſame prince of Condé, whom Francis de Lorrain, duke of Guiſe, endeavoured to deſtroy, are become the heirs of the deſcendants of that duke [C] in the ſpace of 130 years.

‘ However, whatever place that box might come from, it is like to make a noiſe in the parliament, the more becauſe it is in the hands of a lady who has learned all the chicanery of the law by a long experience, as if ſhe had known that ſhe would have occaſion for them one day. Since this happy diſcovery, ſhe has removed the bar that was a blot in her eſcutcheon. But it is feared ſhe will be quickly obliged to put it in again: ſhe has to do with the prince of Condé, who pretends to be the chief heir of that houſe in right of the princeſs his wife; and as there is little proportion between them, it is not improbable, that the box will be found ſuppoſititious in time (9).’ Note, that the author of the Mercure ſuppoſes (10), that this cardinal de Guiſe was he that was killed at Blois; which is a miſtake.

[C] The deſcendants of the ſame prince of Condé, whom Francis duke of Guiſe endeavoured to deſtroy, are become the heirs of that duke of Guiſe.] Here I ſhall place the memoir, which I ſhould have inſerted in the remark [H] of the foregoing article, if I had received it in due time. This memoir will inform us of the proceedings occaſioned by the marriage of the duke of Guiſe with the counteſs de Boſſu, and of the pretenſions of the prince of Condé, who carried the cauſe.

‘ (11) The ſixteenth of November 1641, there was a marriage between the duke of Guiſe and Honorata de Berghes, widow of the count de Boſſu her firſt huſband.

‘ The nineth of June 1666, there was a definitive ſentence given, contrary to that of the Rota, whereby the marriage was declared valid ad quoſcunque effectus, & dictam comitiſſam veram & legitimam conjugem. Note, that the duke of Guiſe was dead; but he had produced his reaſons and vouchers at Rome in his life-time. Note alſo, that, during that time, Mademoiſelle de Guiſe obtained ſome decrees of the parliament, whereby the proceedings of the Rota were declared null, and ſuing in that court was forbidden, and all the ſerjeants in France were alſo forbidden to give any ſummons for that court, and to execute it's judgments. The counteſs de Boſſu acted all the reſt of her life as ducheſs of Guiſe. She conſtantly maintained the validity of her marriage, and always demanded the execution of it. She hoped to get it acknowledged in France by the recommendation or authority of the league, or of the king of Spain, at the treaty of Nimeguen, in 1678. But the French party was too powerful, and the miniſters of France abſolutely refuſed to hearken to any propoſitions relating to private perſons. The counteſs de Boſſu uſed vain endeavours, and died in 1679, having made the count de Berghes, one of her nephews, her heir. The count de Berghes ſettled the affairs of his ſucceſſion, and gathered together all the writings, concerning the marriage, that were diſperſed at Rome, Paris, Madrid, and Vienna, and in the Low-Countries, and elſewhere. By the favour of the truce of Luxemburg, he came to Paris, and put in his demand at the Chatelet, the third of Auguſt 1687, againſt Mademoiſelle de Guiſe, as heireſs of her late brother, that the contract of marriage, of the ſixteenth of November 1641, might be executed againſt her, and all rights reſulting from it adjudged to him. Immediately Mademoiſelle de Guiſe obtained a decree of parliament, whereby it was forbidden to proceed in the Chatelet, to ſtyle the counteſs de Boſſu ducheſs of Guiſe, to make any demand on account of that pretended marriage, and all ſerjeants were forbidden to give any ſummons to that effect. On the eighth of March 1688, Mademoiſelle de Guiſe died, after ſhe had made many wills and codicils, the laſt whereof is dated the ſecond of March 1688. The war broke out ſoon after, and kept things in ſuſpence. At laſt, the peace being concluded at Ryſwick, the count de Berghes returned into France honoured with the title of prince and knight of the golden fleece. He renewed his demand the twenty fifth of October 1698, not in the Chatelet, but in the parliament. He demanded, by virtue of a commiſſion under the great ſeal, to be admitted opponent to the execution of the decree of 1687, and the other two made long before againſt his aunt: and that juſtice ſhould be done him upon his oppoſition, and the appeal brought in by Mademoiſelle de Guiſe, and her heirs, concerning the celebration of the marriage, and the ſentence of the Rota, bringing his firſt demand from the Chatelet, petitioning that all matrimonial rights ſhould be wholly adjudged to him. Upon this illuſtrious controverſy ſentence was given on tueſday in the morning, the fifth of January 1700, in the great chamber, according to the opinion of Mr Dagueſſeau, advocate-general, Mr Robert, and Mr Nouet pleading for the parties, and Mr de Harlay being preſident, after fifteen hearings, ſeven of which were taken up by Mr Robert, ſix by Mr Nouet, and two by Mr Dagueſſeau, wherein, conſidering the petition of the prince of Berghes, the court ordains, that the information made againſt Honorata de Berghes, counteſs de Boſſu, ſhall be rejected, without minding the oppoſitions made by the prince of Berghes to the execution of the decrees of 1665, 1666, and 1687, doing juſtice, on the appellations, as an abuſe both of the celebration and the procedure made at the Rota, and the ſentences there intervening; declares the marriage to be void. In conſequence whereof, the court rejects the demands of the prince of Berghes depending upon the queſtion concerning the marriage, condemns him to coſts, and ordains, that upon other demands, he may take his courſe.’

It plainly appears from the genealogical table, printed during that law-ſuit, that Anne palatine of Bavaria, wife of the prince of Condé, was the right heireſs of Mademoiſelle de Guiſe; for ſhe is deſcended from the duke of Mayenne, ſon of Francis de Lorrain duke of Guiſe. This duke of Mayenne had a daughter, who married Charles Gonzaga duke of Nevers, by whom he had Anne Gonzaga, mother of the princeſs of Condé.

GUYET (Francis), born at Angers, of a good family [A], was one of the beſt

[A] He was of a good family.] He had two uncles, Lezin Guyet, and Martial Guyet. The firſt, who was a counſellor in the preſidial of Angers, made a map of the province of Anjou: the ſecond wrote French verſes (1). This is what Mr Portner ſays. I find ſome difficulty in it, when I compare it with what I find in Menage (2), viz. that Lezin Guyet, counſellor in the preſidial of Angers, who made the firſt map of the province of Anjou, was an echevin at Angers in 1493. But this difficulty vaniſhes by conſulting la Croix du Maine (3), who ſays, that Lezin Guyet was born in the year 1515, on the thirteenth of February. From whence I infer, that Menage's printer put one figure inſtead of another, or that Menage took one Lezin Guyet, who lived before the eldeſt brother of Martial, for him who made the map of Anjou; for he ſays, that Lezin Guyet had a ſon called Andrew, and he mentions two Andrews, one of whom was mayor of Angers in 1550, and the other echevin of the ſame town in 1519. The laſt of theſe two Andrews cannot be the ſon of him, who made the map of Anjou, ſince the author of that map was born in 1515. For the ſame reaſon, it is not likely, that he was the father of the other Andrew; but both of them might be the ſons of one Lezin Guyet, echevin of Angers, in 1493. However it be, Menage calls that family ancient; and having mentioned ſome other perſons of that name, he comes to our Francis Guyet, and calls him the moſt learned Angevin that he knows of.

beſt critics of the XVIIth century. He was born in the year 1575 [B], and was but a child when he loſt his father and mother. The ſmall eſtate they left him, came almoſt to nothing, by the ill management of his guardians: which, far from diſcouraging him from his ſtudy, made him more fond of it; and being of opinion, that Paris would enable him to perfect his knowledge and judgment by the converſation of learned men, he took a journey thither in 1599. He quickly got the friendſhip of Chriſtopher and Auguſtine du Puy, the two eldeſt ſons of Claudius du Puy (a), who had been the ornament and ſupport of good literature. His farther acquaintance with Peter and James du Puy, the ſons of the ſame Claudius du Puy, proved very advantagious to him, in order to make a great progreſs in learning; for the moſt learned perſons in Paris did frequently viſit thoſe two brothers, and many of them met every day in the houſe of Thuanus, where Meſſieurs du Puy received the company. After the death of that preſident, they held thoſe conferences in the ſame place. Guyet was conſtantly at thoſe aſſemblies. He made a journey to Rome in 1608, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Italian tongue with ſo good ſucceſs, that he could make Italian verſes, which the beſt poets of that nation would not have thought unworthy of their pen. He renewed with Reignier (b), who was then in the houſe of cardinal de Joyeuſe, the acquaintance which he had contracted at Paris; and was very much eſteemed by cardinal du Perron, and Gabriel de l'Aubeſpine biſhop of Orleans, to whom he proved ſerviceable more than once, by explaining to him many difficult paſſages, both in ſacred and prophane writers. He returned to Paris by the way of Germany, and was taken into the houſe of the duke d'Epernon to teach the abbot de Granſelve, who was afterwards ſo well known by the name of cardinal de la Valette (c): Being thoroughly ſkilled in Greek and Latin authors, he picked out of them what was moſt proper for his pupil, and explained it to him, not like a pedant, but according to the uſe, which a man, deſigned for great employments, would make of it. The pupil did very much improve under ſo learned a maſter, and conceived ſo great an eſteem for him, that he always entruſted him with his moſt important affairs. He took him along with him to Rome, when he went thither, after he had been made a cardinal, and procured him a good benefice, beſides that which he had already beſtowed upon him (d). Guyet, being returned to Paris, choſe rather to live a private life, than in the houſe of cardinal de la Valette, and pitched upon Burgundy college, to make his abode in it. There he lived the remaining part of his life, minding nothing but his ſtudies, and being contented to make his court when that cardinal was at Paris; for he could not reſolve to follow him into the armies and the provinces. He enjoyed every day the converſation of Meſſieurs du Puy, who lodged in Thuanus's houſe near Burgundy college; but, after Mr Rigaut's departure, they removed to the king's library, where they held their conferences. He chiefly applied himſelf to a work, wherein he pretended to ſhew, that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek, and that all the primitive words of the latter conſiſted only of one ſyllable. Being the firſt who had ſuch a deſign, he was willing that none ſhould have the glory of executing it but himſelf, and ſhewed his eſſays to no body. Notwithſtanding his long and continual application to that work, his labour proved of no uſe; for they found, after his death, only a vaſt compilation of Greek and Latin words (e), without any order or coherence, and without any preface to explain his project; ſo that one would think he had, even with reſpect to his paper, the ſame miſtruſt which hindered him from explaining to his friends his plan, his method, and principles. He applied himſelf to ſomething elſe: The margins of his Horace, Virgil, Lucan, Plautus, Martial, Philoxenus, Heſychius, &c. were full of critical notes [C], wherein he took a great deal of liberty [D]; for he rejected, as ſuppoſititious, all ſuch verſes as

[B] He was born in the year 1575.] This came to be known only by his heirs; for he would never tell in what year he was born. He was unwilling to be accounted ſo old as he was (4); and, hoping to live much longer than he did, he was willing that people ſhould not know his age. In all other things he hardly had a confident; but perhaps there was none he took more care to conceal, than that; and, becauſe he was not grown very hoary in his old age (5), and his ſtrength was not impaired in proportion to the time he had lived, he was unwilling to undeceive thoſe, who made him younger than he was. Had he intended to marry, one would be leſs ſurprized at his myſterious taciturnity. His ſight being ſo good, that he could read the ſmalleſt print without ſpectacles (6), might have wonderfully contributed to make him appear younger than he was. It is thought that becauſe he hoped to live much longer (7) he neglected to ſettle his affairs, either with reſpect to his works or his eſtate: He died without making his will. Thoſe, who ſhall read this remark, and have read the letters of the chevalier d' Her..... will call to mind the paſſage I quote in the margin (8). It is in the thirty ſixth letter of the firſt part. See the remark [C] of the article Gombauld.

[C] The margins of his Horace, Virgil, &c. were full of critical remarks.] Menage bought the books, whoſe margins were full of thoſe notes. All of them have not been buried in the obſcurity of a cloſet. Thoſe upon Heſiod were imparted to Mr Grævius, who inſerted them in his edition (9). Thoſe upon Stephanus Byzantinus have been likewiſe publiſhed (10). I ſhall obſerve by the bye, that Guyet was none of thoſe readers, who skip from book to book: he read a book through with the greateſt attention, before he applied himſelf to any other. Thus he wrote upon Terence, Heſiod, Horace, and Plautus. The reading of the ancient authors was his main buſineſs. As for modern books, he only read hiſtories and voyages (11). I obſerve theſe things, not only becauſe ſome perſons are curious of them, but alſo becauſe they may give a good opinion of the notes of this great critic.

[D] ..... wherein he took a great deal of liberty.] He carried his criticiſms ſo far, that he muſt needs have been in the wrong ſometimes. Guyet ſtruck out many verſes in his Virgil, pretending they were ſuppoſititious, and that the poems of that great poet were like thoſe troops, among which there are many falſe muſters; ſo that he acted like a rigid commiſſary, as ſeemed to him not to ſavour of the author's genius. The moſt compleat thing, that was found among his papers, was his notes upon Terence; and therefore they have been printed in the Straſburg edition, 1657: they were ſent by James du Puy to the learned Boeclerus. He was ſo happy as to be accounted a man of great learning, though he had printed nothing: it was well done of him to avoid the diſputes he would have been engaged in, if he had publiſhed ſome books [E]. He ſeldom confeſſed, that he was miſtaken. He grew hot when any body denied what he ſaid, and then he would jeſt in a pleaſant manner. He had a very good memory, and was a hearty, ſincere, honeſt man. He was cut for the ſtone in 1636, and bore the pains of that operation with a wonderful conſtancy. Abating this, his long life was hardly attended with any illneſs; and he was ſo happy as to die of a catarrh, which affected him only three or four days, and did not prevent the curate of the pariſh performing the uſual functions. He died in the arms of James du Puy, and Menage his country-man, the twelfth of April, 1655 (f), being eighty years old. His Life (g) was written in Latin, with great judgment and politeneſs, by Mr Portner a ſenator of Ratiſbon (h), from which I have takn this article.

commiſſary, who muſters none but true ſoldiers. He looked upon the firſt ode of Horace, and the ſecret hiſtory of Procopius, as ſuppoſititious pieces; and when the cadence, or the turn of a period, did not pleaſe his ear or his taſte, he immediately concluded it was not genuine, though the ancient Grammarians, and the beſt manuſcripts, were againſt him. But to be convinced, that he had ſometimes a depraved taſte (12), and went beyond the delicati faſtidii imputed to him, one need only read the verſes he made againſt beer, wherein he ſpeaks of all the Dutch poets with great contempt (13). Grotius made a very good anſwer to him (14):

> Duræ mentis iners, merumque rus eſt,
> Si quem baſia non movent Secundi,
> Et quos Douſa canit parente major
> Cœlo ſydereos rotante curſus,
> Et quæ ſpicula Baudio vibrante

> Baudius, thy pointed arrows, dipt in gall,
> That doom Lycambes to a ſecond fall;
> And Heinſius, by Apollo's ſelf decreed
> In verſe to write what ancient Rome might read.

[E] It was well done of him to avoid the diſputes he would have been engaged in if he had publiſhed books] Notwithſtanding his bold criticiſms, and his intrepidity in ſpeaking out his thoughts in converſation, he was afraid of the public. He dreaded particularly Salmaſius (15), who, being in Meſſieurs du Puy's houſe, threatened to write a book againſt him, if he publiſhed his thoughts about ſome paſſages of the ancient authors. Salmaſius would have proved too hard for him; he would have printed a hundred ſheets before Guyet had been able to ſend four to the preſs; for Guyet had much ado to pleaſe himſelf (16); and therefore he continued to forbear ſetting up for an author, even after Salmaſius's death. It were to be wiſhed for the ſake of the public, that many authors had had ſuch a ſcare-crow: thoſe, who ſhould forbear to print books upon ſuch an account, would be very glad of it, if they knew their own intereſt; for how many writers do we ſee, who verify this thought of Horace, or at leaſt the laſt part of it?

Happy are thoſe learned men, who, like our Guyet, are contented with being accounted men of learning upon the teſtimony of others (18). This was Guyet's caſe: Balzac, among others, was his trumpeter. See his Ludus Poëticus de Hypercritico Galeſo (19).

GUYET (CHARLES), a French Jeſuit, born at Tours in the year 1601, was admitted into the ſociety in the year 1621, where he taught the Belles Lettres for the ſpace of five years, and moral theology for the ſpace of two years. Afterwards he ſet up for a preacher, which laſted a long time. He got a perfect knowledge of the ceremonies of the church, as it appears by two books which he wrote [A]. He died at Tours the thirtieth of March, 1664 (a).

[A] This appears by two books which he wrote.] One of them is intituled, Ordo generalis & perpetuus divini Officii recitandi; and the other, Heortologia, ſive de feſtis propriis locorum, printed at Paris for Sebaſtian Cramoiſy, 1657, in folio. The explication of the holy days in each place, is one of the moſt laborious deſigns, and requires a very minute and particular account: this our author has done.

GYMNOSOPHISTS. So the Greeks called the philoſophers, who went naked [A]. There were ſome of them in Africa; but the moſt famous were in the Indies. Thoſe of Africa inhabited a mountain in Ethiopia, not far from the Nile, without either houſe or cell. They did not live in community; nor did they ſacrifice together,

[A] So the Greeks call the philoſophers, who went naked.] It would be abſurd to deny, that there were Indian philoſophers that wore no cloaths; but it might be maintained, that the Brachmans were not of that number: for beſides the authorities I have alledged in another place (1), it may be obſerved: I. That the Iarchas (2) of Philoſtratus (3) ſtrips himſelf before he ſteps into a fountain with Apollonius. II. That another Brachman pulls a letter from under his gown (4); a letter I ſay, which he wrote to a dæmon, to command him with threats to go out of the body of a young man. III. That Apollonius upbraids the Gymnoſophiſts of Ethiopia with their having left the habit of the Indian Gymnoſophiſts, hoping thereby to make people believe, that they were originally of Ethiopia. There is another queſtion to be propoſed: whether thoſe that went naked covered their natural parts. St Auguſtin maintains they did. 'Per opacas, ſays 'he (5), quoque Indiæ ſolitudines quum quidam nudi 'philoſophentur, unde Gymnoſophiſtæ nominantur; 'adhibent tamen genitalibus tegumenta quibus per 'cætera membrorum carent. —— There are certain 'naked philoſophers in the ſhady ſolitudes of India, 'thence called Gymnoſophiſts; yet they cover their ſecret 'parts.' gether, as thoſe who were in the Indies (a). Each of them had his ſmall habitation, where they performed, apart, their exerciſes and ſtudies. Thoſe, who had committed manſlaughter, were obliged to come before them, to aſk their abſolution, ſubmitting themſelves to ſuch a penance as was impoſed upon them, without which they could not return into their country. Theſe philoſophers profeſſed a great frugality; for they lived only upon ſuch things as the earth naturally yielded. According to Philoſtratus (b), they derived their origin from the Indian Gymnoſophiſts [B]. I cannot tell, whether we ought to attribute to them the aſtronomical diſcoveries, of which Lucian (c) has given their nation the glory. He pretends, that the ſcience of the ſtars had it's beginning in Ethiopia; where, by conſidering the different phaſes of the moon, they began to diſcover, that ſhe borrowed her light from the ſun. As to the Gymnoſophiſts of the eaſt, they were divided into Brachmans (d), of whom I have given a long article, and Germanes. The moſt conſiderable of theſe were called Hylobians, becauſe they lived in the woods. They lived there upon leaves and wild fruits; forbore wine and women; anſwered the queſtions of princes by meſſengers; and, by their means, kings honoured and praiſed the deity. The next degree of honour was for the phyſicians. Theſe were not ſedentary, as the Hylobians: and among other things, they pretended to remedies againſt barrenneſs [C]. They were freely entertained in peoples houſes. For this ſcience, how to get boys or girls, gave them a good title to hoſpitality. Others pretended to predictions and inchantments, and ſeemed well acquainted with the ceremonies and traditions that concern the condition of the dead: they were of an unſettled, roving, humour. Others, much more polite than theſe, had no regard to any thing that was ſaid of the other world, but what might ſerve to heighten holineſs and and piety (e). Generally ſpeaking, the Gymnoſophiſts have done credit to their profeſſion: the maxims and diſcourſes, which hiſtorians aſcribe to them (f), do not ſavour of barbarity: on the contrary, one may ſee in them a great many things, that are the reſult of great wiſdom and profound meditation. One cannot complain, that they have

'parts.' I think he is in the right: for notwithſtanding ſuch a girdle, thoſe philoſophers might have been ſaid to go naked; as we ſay, and write now-a-days, that certain nations go naked, though they wear ſuch a ſort of girdle. When Philoſtratus ſpeaks of the Gymnoſophiſts of Africa, he calls them a hundred times, ſimply and abſolutely, the naked: nevertheleſs, he does not repreſent them as having nothing on their bodies; for, on the contrary, he ſays (6), that they are dreſſed like the reapers of Athens; and reproaches them with having quitted the Indian habit, hoping, that, with the habit of Ethiopia, they ſhould gain the reputation of being true Ethiopians. I find that, to ſupport St Auguſtin's opinion, ſome (7) quote Nicolas Damaſcenus, and Diodorus Siculus. The firſt (8) relates, as eye-witneſs, that the preſents, which the king of the Indies made to the emperor Auguſtus, were carried by eight ſlaves who were naked indeed, but whoſe privy-parts were covered. Ludovicus Vives and Pererius relate this, as if thoſe eight ſlaves had been preſented to Auguſtus. Thus you ſee how careleſs the moſt learned are in their quotations. They (9) make Diodorus Siculus ſpeak as if he had affirmed, that the Ethiopians went naked, but ſo as to wear girdles, either of hair, or of foxes tails; which is a ſuppreſſing of part of the paſſage, in favour of the cauſe they maintain. They deſign to ſupport St Auguſtin's opinion, that, ſince the firſt ſin, ſhame is natural to all men, with reſpect to the parts, which Adam and Eve could not behold naked, after they had eaten the forbidden fruit. If Diodorus Siculus had advanced, that all the Ethiopians that go naked hide thoſe parts, his authority would have ſome weight. They ſhould not therefore have mentioned him, or elſe have ſuppoſed, that he expreſſed himſelf ſo. But the truth is, he does not; and therefore he does more prejudice than good to St Auguſtin's cauſe. He ſpeaks of four ſorts of Ethiopians (10): the firſt go naked; the ſecond cover their privy-parts with the tails of beaſts; the third cover themſelves with the ſkin of certain animals; and the laſt weave hair together, with which they cover themſeves from the waiſt downwards.

[B] According to Philoſtratus, they derived their origin from the Indian Gymnoſophiſts.] Apollonius had ſeen theſe, before he went into Ethiopia, and was ever ſpeaking of the admiration he had conceived for them. The Gymnoſophiſts of Ethiopia, being informed of it, affected to ſpeak to him with contempt of thoſe of the Indies: whereupon he anſwered them freely, that they ſpoke ill of the Indians, only with a deſign to perſuade people that they were not come from thence into Ethiopia upon any diſhonourable account, as it was reported they did (11). This report was (12), that the Ethiopians came originally from the Indies; that they had anciently been ſubject there to king Ganges, whom they had put to death; that, ſince that murder, the other Indians had looked upon them with abomination; that the earth would no longer bear them; that neither their corn ever grew ripe, nor their women with child came to their full reckonings, nor their cattle encreaſed; and that the ground ſunk where-ever they had a mind to build houſes; that the ghoſt of the murdered king followed, and frighted them every where; and that thoſe calamities continued, till the authors of that parricide had been ſwallowed up by the earth. It is pretended (13), that all theſe prodigies made thoſe people fly their country, and that they came to ſettle themſelves in that part of Africa, which was called Ethiopia. Others have ſpoken of that tranſmigration as has been ſhewn by the learned Marſham (14). He has ſhewn likewiſe, that there were two ſorts of Ethiopians; the one in Aſia, and the other in Africa; and alſo Indians in Africa: but he pretends, without reaſon, that, in a paſſage of Virgil, we ought to underſtand Ethiopia by the word Indis. Virgil underſtood, by that, the Eaſt-Indies, where he thought the Nile had it's ſource; and you ſee alſo, that he makes it run by the frontiers of Perſia:

Nam, quâ Pellæi gens fortunata Canopi
Accolit effuſo ſtagnantem flumine Nilum,
Et circùm pictis vehitur ſua rura phaſelis,
Quâque pharetratæ vicinia Perſidis urget, have not well maintained the dignity of philoſophy, ſince it was their method not to go to any body; but to put themſelves on ſuch a foot, even with reſpect to kings [D], that, if any body wanted them, they were obliged come themſelves to them, or ſend ſome body to acquaint them with what they wanted. Therefore Alexander, who thought it not conſiſtent with his greatneſs to go in perſon, ſent a deputation to them, in order to ſatisfy the deſire he had to be informed of them (g). Nothing can be finer than their way of educating their diſciples [E]. They aſked them every day, before they ſat down to dinner, how they had ſpent the morning; and every ſcholar was obliged to produce ſome good moral action, or ſome proficiency in the ſciences: if they failed, they were ſent to their work, without being allowed any thing to eat. We have ſeen, in the article of the BRACHMANS, the great frugality of the Gymnoſophiſts, and their extraordinary patience, in being a long while in the ſame poſture [F]. It is not unlikely, that the doctrine of the Metempſycoſis led them to eat nothing, which had animal life in it; and that Pythagoras borrowed this opinion from them: but it is ridiculous to derive the origin of the Jews from them, as Ariſtotle has done (h). It was a ſhameful thing amongſt them to be ſick; ſo that thoſe, who would ſhun that diſgrace, did burn themſelves (i). Thus Calanus, who was in the retinue of Alexander, made away with himſelf. We have ſaid elſewhere, that the doctrine of the tranſmigration of ſouls inſpired the Brachmans with a great indifference either for life or death [G]. Porphyry anſwers pertinently to thoſe, who objected, What would become of the world, if all men did live as the Brachmans did [H].

Strabo marks all this. Δύνασθαι δὲ καὶ πολυγόνους ποιεῖν, καὶ ἀῤῥενογόνους καὶ θηλυγόνους διὰ φαρμακευτικῆς. Poſſe eos & fœcundos facere & marium & feminarum procreationem medicamentis præſtare (16). This was a ſure means to make themſelves neceſſary or acceptable to ſeveral ſorts of perſons; for there are thoſe, who wiſh for a numerous family: others, having none but girls, wiſh paſſionately for a boy; and others again, having none but boys, would fain have a girl alſo. This laſt is principally the deſire of mothers: nor is it unreaſonable; for a daughter is a more convenient help and companion for a mother, than a boy.

(15) Strabo, lib. xv, pag. 491.

[D] Even with reſpect to kings.] This ought not to be generally underſtood of the Gymnoſophiſts; for, according to Nearchus, the Brachmans went to court, and followed kings in the quality of their counſellors (17).

[F] We have ſeen . . . . their patience in being a long while in the ſame poſture] Beſides what has already been related upon that ſubject in the remark [A] of the article BRACHMANS, I ſhall ſay here, that that hard conſtraint was not unuſual even among the Greek philoſophers. Socrates put himſelf ſometimes to that trial, in order to lay in a good proviſion of patience for neceſſities to come. 'Stare ſolitus Socrates dicitur pertinaci ſtatu perdius & pernox, a ſummo lucis ortu ad ſolem alterum orientem, inconnivens, immobilis, iiſdem in veſtigiis, & ore atque oculis eumdem in locum directis, cogitabundus (19). '——— Socrates is ſaid to have ſtood, from ſunriſe to ſun-ſet, in one poſture, without winking, and 'with his eyes directed to one and the ſame place, in profound meditation.' We ſhould look upon this as a piece of folly. I have heard people mention, as a great ſign of ſoftneſs and ſtupidity, the cuſtom, a certain monarch had, towards the beginning of the XVIIth century, to leave his hat juſt as thoſe, who dreſſed him, ſet it upon his head. But let us remark, that there can hardly be a more inſupportable puniſhment, than the being condemned to keep all one's life-time in the ſame poſture. That, which we look upon as moſt convenient, I mean, ſitting, would cruelly fatigue at the long run (20).

[G] The tranſmigration of ſouls inſpired them with a great indifference for life or death.] To this relates what Trajan ſaid of the Getæ (21), that they were the moſt warlike of all men, not only by reaſon of the ſtrength of their bodies, but alſo becauſe of the opinion, which Zamolxis had perſuaded them of: for, as they looked upon death only as a change of habitation, they prepared themſelves more eaſily to die, than to undertake a journey. This is ſufficient to cover Chriſtians with ſhame, in whom, generally ſpeaking, the near hopes of heaven cannot extinguiſh the immenſe love they have for life.

(21) Apud Julianum in Cæſar.

[H] Porphyry anſwers pertinently to thoſe, who objected, what would become of the world, if all men lived as the Brachmans did?] He could not fail to commend thoſe Indian philoſophers in his book of abſtinence, ſince they practiſed ſo well what he taught. He makes (22) a very advantageous deſcription of their frugality, good morals, and contempt of life. As to the objection of the worldlings, he confutes it after the ſame manner as Pythagoras has done. If all men, ſays he, became kings, human life would be ſtrangely troubleſome: muſt men therefore renounce being kings? And if all men followed virtue, they would ever continue in public employments; for thoſe that ſhould be poſſeſſed of them, ought never to forfeit that recompence of their probity: nevertheleſs, no body is ſo fooliſh as to pretend, that it is not the duty of all men to tread chearfully in the paths of virtue. There are ſeveral things, which the laws tolerate in the people, and which would not be allowed in a philoſopher.

(22) Lib. iv, de Abſtin.

The

The laws do not forbid the people to divert themſelves with women of pleaſure, or to ſpend their time in taverns; but they account the keeping of ſuch company, and ſuch a kind of life, to be ſcandalous, even in perſons of moderate probity. Therefore what is ſuffered in the common people, is not to be allowed in the virtuous: a philoſopher ought to preſcribe to himſelf the holy laws which the gods, and the miniſters of the gods, have eſtabliſhed. Theſe maxims of Porphyry may ſerve thoſe, who preſs the obſervation of the ſtricteſt morals, and who recommend ſo much celibacy. What would become of the world, ſay we to them, if every body followed your advice? Do not trouble yourſelf about that, may they anſwer (23); ſew people will take us at our word. The Anabaptiſts make good uſe of the like anſwer, touching their condemning the holding places of magiſtracy: they know well enough, that maſters will never be wanting; and that, let their cenſures and exhortations be never ſo pathetic, there will ever be more competitors than employments. This puts me in mind of a divine of the church of England, whom ſome endeavoured to perſuade, that the tenet of paſſive obedience ought to be renounced, as entirely oppoſite to the public good: Never fear, anſwered he, that the people will thereby be more apt to ſuffer themſelves to be oppreſſed: for, as you do not fear, by preaching warmly againſt revenge, to expoſe thereby your neighbour to inſults, for you know well enough, that, for all your ſermons, he will take care that his inſenſibility of a box on the ear does not draw more affronts upon him; ſo, &c. Note, that Porphyry thought, that the laws do not forbid the people, &c. may be confirmed by this paſſage of Cicero (24). 'Aliter leges aliter philoſophi tollunt aſtutias: leges quatenus tenere manu res poſſunt: philoſophi quatenus ratione & intelligentia. —— The laws provide againſt fraudulent practices one way, the philoſophers another; the laws, ſo far only as the hand can reach; the philoſophers, as far as reaſon and underſtanding extend.' And by this paſſage of Seneca (25): 'Quam anguſta innocentia eſt ad legem bonum eſſe? quanto latius officiorum patet quàm juris regula? quam multa pietas, humanitas, liberalitas, juſtitia, fides exigunt? quæ omnia extra publicas tabulas ſunt. ——. How confined an innocence is it to be good only in the eye of the law? how much farther does the rule of duty extend, than that of law? how many things do piety, humanity, liberality, juſtice, fidelity, require; all which are without the written law?' See Grotius, in the tenth chapter of the third book, De Jure Belli & Pacis.

For the reſt, the thought of St Auguſtin, which I point out in the margin (26), puts me in mind of a philoſopher. 'Your philoſopher, ſays he (27), is not over-wiſe, when he deſigns to marry, to propagate his race in France. If he was of the race of emperors and ſovereigns, I would not hinder it for any thing in the world. What! Does N. fear the world ſhould fail? If it failed in him, it could never end more gloriouſly. Let a courtier, a magiſtrate, or a mechanic, marry with my conſent: but that a philoſopher ſhould take upon him the charge of a wife and children, nay, a philoſopher of the family of Zeno, is a ſort of prodigy, which deſerves more to be expiated, than that of the cows that ſpoke, and ſaid formerly, with a dreadful voice, Rome look to thyſelf.'

HACKER (a) (JAMES), was profeſſor of divinity at Friburg in Briſgaw, about the beginning of the XVIIth century. I only ſpeak of him, to have occaſion to diſcover a pſeudonymous writer [A], who has not yet been mentioned that I know of, in the catalogues of this kind of authors.

(a) And not Hacler, as in Konig.

[A] I only ſpeak of him, to diſcover a pſeudonymous writer.] Hacker having publiſhed (1) a diſpute about predeſtination, was anſwered by a monk of Mantua, under the falſe name of Daniel Neidinger. He defended himſelf, in a reply, with this title, Diſputationis de Prædeſtinationis cauſa falſo & ementito authore Dan. Neidingero, vero autem & germano ejus fabro Fr. Andr. Urciano Ord. Min. Obſ. reg. in urbe Mantuana nuper editæ, & ibidem à tredecim diverſorum Ord. Fratribus & Patribus ſuſceptæ, in quatuor ex quibus coaluit, elementa, mendacia, hæreſes, antilogias, ſordes ſermonis, Analyſis. Autore J. Hackero. Dorſcheus, profeſſor of divinity at Strasburg (2), makes uſe of this example, to ſhew that the Roman Catholics accuſe one another of Hereſy. He ſays, that this reply of Hacker was printed in 1618, but ſince it is put in the Oxford catalogue, printed at Friburg in 1614. I ſuppoſe the firſt edition was not known to him. The ſame catalogue mentions two volumes of James Hacker, on Thomas Aquinas. They were printed at Friburg, the firſt in 1619, and the ſecond in 1621. Mr Konig does not diſtinguiſh this, and gives the title wrong.

HACKET (WILLIAM), and Engliſh Fanatic in the XVIth century, was firſt ſervant to one Mr Huſſey, and expreſſed his fidelity to him by an action perfectly brutal [A]. He afterwards married a rich widow, and ruined her in a little time by his luxurious expences. He had never ſtudied, but had a great memory, which he abuſed in repeating the miniſters ſermons over his cups. This he did only to laugh at them, and had no deſign in hearing ſermons, but to furniſh his memory for this ridiculous exerciſe. He was a very great lover of wine and women; and he corrupted a maid who came to his houſe to aſk his advice (a). He robbed alſo upon the highway. At laſt he ſet up for a prophet, and declared, I. That England ſhould feel the ſcourges of famine, peſtilence, and war, unleſs it eſtabliſhed the conſiſtorial diſcipline: II. That for the future their ſhould be no more Popes. He named the time of this deſolation of England, which, according to him, was to be the ſame year he threatened it. He began to propheſy at York and Lincoln, where, in puniſhment of his boldneſs, he was publickly whipped, and condemned to be baniſhed. He had a wonderful fluency in extemporary prayer; and had choice and very pompous phraſes, and this made the people believe it was an extraordinary gift of the HOLY GHOST. He had a very great confidence in his prayers [B]; for he ſaid, that if all England ſhould pray for rain,

(a) Potator ſcortatorque fuit enormis, virginiſque quæ ad eum conſilii cauſa acceſſit conſtuprator. Fitz Simon, in Britannomachia Miniſtrorum, &c. See citation (e).

[A] He expreſſed his fidelity to his maſter by an action perfectly brutal.] A tradeſman of Oundle in Northamptonſhire, did ſomething that cauſed an enmity betwixt him and a gentleman who had Hacket in his ſervice. Obſerve how this ſervant revenged his maſter. He familiarly and friendly accoſted this tradeſman's ſon (1), and was received in the ſame manner: then ſuddenly took him by the throat, threw him down, and bit off his noſe, and inſtead of returning it to the ſurgeon, who pretended to ſet it on again, eat it; eique naſum dentibus evulſit, nec chirurgo volenti reſtituere tradidit, ſed (ut fertur) barbara immanitate devoravit (2). Cambden does not relate this fact with the ſame circumſtances. He ſays, that Hacket embracing the ſchool-maſter, in ſign of reconciliation, bit a piece of his noſe off, and that it was the ſcool-maſter who deſired him to reſtore it, that it might be ſewed on while the wound was freſh. Ad vindictam adeo efferus (Hacquetus) ut ingenuo Ludimagiſtro, dum redintegrati amoris ſpecie amplecteretur, naſum mordicus abſciderit, & coram miſero deformi ſupplicante ut redderet, quo vulnere adhuc recente aſſueretur, canine ut ferutn (3) devoraverit (4). The variety of theſe circumſtances is not ſuch, as that we may conclude from thence, that the fact is falſe; we may only obſerve therein a ſign of the lazineſs or infirmity of a man's memory. They that hear a ſtory, attend principally to the main point and eſſence of the fact, and this they beſt retain; but not having the ſame attention to all the circumſtances, for that would be too troubleſome, they forget many of them: They are not at the trouble of loading their memory with them, which beſides is not ſtrong enough to bear all the parts of the burden, and thus ſome hours or days after, if they would tell the ſame ſtory, they are forced to ſupply the circumſtances they have loſt. Every one makes this ſupplement according to the particular character of his genius; and hence come infinite variations, which creep even into the very accounts of hiſtorians.

[B] He had a very great confidence in his prayers.] Thou haſt the power, ſaid he, to GOD, and I have the faith, therefore the thing ſhall be done. He uſed imprecations, in his prayers, againſt himſelf, and pretended that the efficacy of his imprecations was certain. He boaſted, that in diſputing with a papiſt, he propoſed to him this condition; I ſubmit inſtantly to eternal damnation (5), do you do ſo too, and one of us ſhall change his religion, according to the unhappy or happy ſucceſs of our imprecation. This was very abſurd; for the effect of the imprecation was to be the ſudden death of one or the other, and conſequently, neither of them could change his opinion. The dead man could not do it, and the ſurviver would have been far from doing it, ſince the bad ſucceſs of his adverſary's imprecation, had given ſo authentic a teſtimony to his religion. But it muſt not be expected, that ſuch extravagant viſionaries ſhould avoid contradictions. Hacket having accuſed too great lords of treaſon, propoſed to them a like form of prayer (6): for this was the name he gave his execratory oath. If after you have done it, ſays he, you do not die, I will ſubmit to the lex talionis. But if you refuſe to do it, and I do it, without any harm, you ſhall be condemned to loſe your head. The judges ſent him away as a mad man.

He impoſed on abundance of people by this ſort of prayer, and perſuaded them, that for the ſins of men, rain, and he ſhould pray to the contrary, it ſhould not rain. Edmund Coppinger, and Henry Arthington, two perſons of ſome learning, joined with him: The firſt by the title of the prophet of mercy; and the ſecond by the title of the prophet of judgment. Arthington gave out, that they had an extraordinary miſſion, and that next to JESUS CHRIST, none upon earth had greater power than William Hacket. Coppinger declared, that Hacket was the ſole monarch of Europe. They afterwards went farther, and equalled him in all things to JESUS CHRIST, without being oppoſed by Hacket; for he ſaid in his prayers, Father, I know thou loveſt me equal with thyſelf (b). They would have proceeded to the ceremony of unction, but he would not ſuffer them, being already anointed, he ſaid, by the HOLY GHOST in heaven. They aſked him at laſt, what he had to command them, and proteſted they would pay him an obedience without reſerve. He ordered them to go and proclaim through all the ſtreets of London, that JESUS CHRIST was come to judge the world, and lodged in ſuch an inn, and that no body could put him to death. They obeyed with ſo much haſte, that Arthington had not time to take his gloves. They added this to their maſter's inſtructions, England repent, repent. They drew together, by their bawling, ſuch a concourſe of people, that being come to Cheapſide, they could go no farther, nor be heard; but finding an empty cart, they mounted upon it, and diſcourſed of the important commiſſion of William Hacket [C]. They returned to him, and, when they ſaw him, Arthington cried out to the people, Behold the king of the earth. This happened the ſixteenth of July 1592 (c). They were proſecuted and tried. Hacket was ſentenced to be hanged and quartered the twenty eighth of July, and the ſentence was accordingly executed. Coppinger famiſhed himſelf in priſon: but Arthington was pardoned (d). The blaſphemies contained in the prayer that Hacket made upon the ſcaffold, are ſo horrid, that I ſhall only relate them in Latin (e) [D]. We ſhall ſee, in the remarks, ſome particulars of his fanaticiſm, complicated with rebellion. He was filled with hatred againſt queen Elizabeth [E]. The truth of this ought not to be queſtioned, on pretence that I have it from the book of a Jeſuit; for Camden's annals, contain moſt of theſe facts, and even with greater force.

men, the devils and witches had for two months, inflicted on him the very pains of hell, or within a little of them (7). Camden ſays, that by ſwearing by his eternal damnation, and with the moſt execrable imprecations, he ſeduced Coppinger and Arthington, and made them believe he frequently converſed with GOD, and that the devil had ſtigmatized him. His frequent and moſt fervent prayers, the outward ſhew of an holy life, and the cuſtom of faſting every Sunday, contributed to perſuade them of the ſame things (8). Poor human reaſon, how great are thy errors, and how great is their efficacy!

[C] Coppinger and Arthington diſcourſed of the important commiſſion of William Hacket.] They ſaid, that he partook of the nature of glorified bodies, and was to convert all Europe to the conſiſtorial diſcipline; and that the power of judgment was committed to him. They added, that ſuch as deſired to ſee him, ſhould find him in ſuch an houſe, and we foretel, that all who refuſe to obey this king of all Europe, ſhall kill one another, and that the queen ſhall be dethroned (9). Before they made this extravagant ſally, they went to a puritan miniſter, called Wigginton, and proteſted to him, that the night before, JESUS CHRIST appeared to them, not in body, but by his principal ſpirit, by which he dwelt in William Hacket, with greater fulneſs than in any other, and that Hacket was the angel who was to come before the end of the world, with a fan and crook in his hand, to ſeparate the goats from the ſheep: that he was to trample Satan under his feet, and totally overturn the kingdom of Antichriſt (10). The day they went to preach up this new kingdom through the ſtreets of London, Hacket commanded them to ſay, that JESUS CHRIST was come, with his fan in his hand, to judge the world, and that this was as true, as that GOD was in heaven. They punctually diſcharged their commiſſion, and when they were on the cart, they declared, that Hacket, already glorified as to his body, participated of JESUS CHRIT by his principal ſpirit, and that he was there with the fan to eſtabliſh the goſpel in Europe.

[D] He ſpoke blaſphemies . . . . . which I ſhall only relate in Latin.] They exceed thoſe of Caligula (11), and yet they were the concluſion to a moſt devout prayer, whence we may infer, that there is nothing ſo extravagant of which the heart of man is not capable. 'Hæc fuit ultima ejus oratio. Deus cœli, 'Potentiſſime Jehovah, Alpha & Omega, Domine 'Dominorum, Rex Regum, æterne Deus. Tu me 'noſtri verum iſtum Jehovah quem miſiſti. Miraculum aliquod ex nubibus oſtende his infidelibus, & 'libera me ab his inimicis meis. Sin minus cœlos 'ſuccendam, & te è throno detractum manibus meis 'lacerabo (12).' Camden having related the ſame blaſphemies, almoſt in the ſame words, adds, that Hacket pronounced others ſtill more execrable, Aliaque magis infanda. Converſus ad carnificem laqueum admoventem, Tune ſpurie, inquit, Hackettum Regem tuum ſuſpendes? Laqueo innodatus oculis in cœlum ſublatis, Hoccine, inquit frendens, pro regno collato rependis? venio ulturus (13). This hiſtorian obſerves, that this enthuſiaſt and his two companions, did not take their hats off before their judges, and impudently anſwered, they were above the magiſtrates; that afterwards, Hacket owned himſelf guilty (14), but anſwered in ſo blaſphemous a manner as made all that heard him tremble. There was in this perhaps a good deal of fraud; for who knows but that he had a mind to make his judges believe, that he was diſtracted. However, his other geſtures, and affected gravity, ſhewed no ſign of madneſs (15). This we have from Camden. Note, that Arthington repented, and even printed a book to teſtify his repentance (16).

[E] He was filled with hatred againſt queen Elizabeth.] He would never pray for her; and his deſign was to rob her of her crown and life, and change the whole form of the government. He heard the ſermon bare-headed, but he put on his hat when he perceived that the queen was mentioned in the prayers (17). He confeſſed to the judges before whom he was tried, that he had ſtabbed the effigies of this princeſs to the heart, with an iron pin; and that he never owned her for queen. Julii 20 & 23. palam confeſſus eſt Hackettus Regine imaginem ſe transfixiſſe ad cor ſtylo ferreo, eamque pro Regina non habuiſſe (18). A little before he was hanged, he curſed her with all manner of imprecations (19).

HADRIAN (Publius Ælius), a Roman emperor, would furniſh a very long article, ſhould we omit nothing of his principal qualities and actions. I muſt content myſelf with ſome of them, and repeat as little as may be, what we find in Moreri's Dictionary, in which this article is not very full of faults [A].

Hadrian was born at Rome the twenty fourth of January, 76 [B], loſt his father ten years after [C], and had, for his guardians, Trajan, his relation [D], and Cælius Tatianus a Roman knight. His genius ſo enclined him to the ſtudy of the Greek tongue, that it expoſed him to ſeveral railleries (a). He ſerved early in the armies, and was tribune of a legion before the death of Domitian. The army of the lower Mœſia choſe him (b) to compliment Trajan, adopted by the emperor Nerva, and it was he that brought Trajan the firſt news of Nerva's death. He regained the favour of this emperor, which he had almoſt loſt by his exceſſive expences, which had brought him into debt. He married (c), a grand niece (d) of this prince [E], and he had in the empreſs a great patroneſs (e). The ſpeech which he made before the ſenate when he was quæſtor (f), was ſo unpoliſhed, that he was hiſſed for it: upon which he applied himſelf hard to the ſtudy of the Latin tongue, and became very well ſkilled in it, and very eloquent. He attended Trajan in the expedition againſt the Daci (g); and to make his court effectually to him, he drank ſtoutly, and was nobly rewarded for it. He had been tribune of the people (h), before he went with Trajan to the ſecond Dacian war. He did ſome noble actions there, and received a preſent, which gave him ſome hopes of ſucceeding to the empire (i). He was made prætor ſome time after, and afterwards commanded

[A] In Moreri this article is not very full of faults.] It is one of the beſt. I have however obſerved, without entring into a general diſcuſſion, ten or twelve things which I think cannot be proved. I. That there was in Italy, a city called Italica. II. That Hadrian rebuilt Adria. III. That upon his return from England, he heard in Languedoc of Plotina's death. IV. That he built a temple at Niſmes to her. V. That Quadratus and Ariſtides were aſſiſted by Severus, one of the emperor's lieutenants, when they preſented books in favour of the Chriſtian religion. VI. That Jeruſalem and Ælia were two different cities in Judæa. VII. That Plutarch was Hadrian's tutor. VIII. That Hadrian recalled Epictetus, Numenius, and other learned men to Rome. IX. That he ſent others to Alexandria, to teach the ſciences there, before he went himſelf to that city. X. That he underſtood the mathematics, and wrote tracts of them. XI. That he died the twelfth of July, in the year 138, having reigned twenty years, ten months, and twenty nine days. XII. That Phavorinus was his ſecretary. We ſee, in my article, that Hadrian, died the tenth of July, and began his reign on the eleventh of Auguſt. If he had died the twelfth of July, it muſt have been ſaid, that he reigned twenty years, eleven months, and one day. Let it be obſerved, that I will not deny that he received a letter from Serenius Granius, proconſul of Aſia, exhorting him to equity towards the Chriſtians, and that he ſtudied geometry. Spartian ſays it expreſsly (1), and Mr Moreri has done well to ſay ſo too; but beſides this, he makes mention of mathematics. They that deceived him, did not know, that matheſis, in Spartian, ſignifies only aſtrology. 'Matheſin ſic ſcire ſibi viſus eſt, ut ſero 'Calendis Januariis ſcripſerit quid ei toto anno poſſet 'evenire. —— He imagined that he underſtood aſtrology 'ſo well, that in the evening of the firſt of January, 'he wrote down whatever ſhould befal him, thro' the 'whole year.' I paſs over what Mr Moreri ſays, concerning Hadrian's memory; he exaggerates the matter. He had, ſays he, ſo happy a memory, that he knew the names of places and rivers where he had paſſed, and even of all the ſoldiers of his armies. This idea exceeds what Aurelius Victor gives us in theſe words: 'Memor ſupra quam cuiquam credible eſt, locos, negotia, 'milites abſentes quoque nominibus recenſere. —— 'He had an incredible memory; and could name particularly places, affairs; and even the abſent ſoldiers:' Spartian is ſtill more particular but yet falls ſhort of Moreri. 'Nominina plurimis ſine nomenclatore 'reddidit quæ ſemel & congeſta ſimul audiverat, ut 'nomenclatores ſæpius errantes emendaverit. Dixit '& veteranorum nomina quos aliquando dimiſerat: 'libros ſtatim lectos & ignotos quidem plurimis memoriter reddidit; uno tempore ſcripſit, dictavit, audivit, & cum amicis fabulatus eſt (2). ——— He called 'many by their names, without the aſſiſtance of the roll, 'tho' he had only heard them once named; and without any order, ſo that he frequently corrected the miſtakes of the men who read the names. He could likewiſe repeat the names of the veterans, whom he had at 'any time diſmiſſed. He recited books which had been 'juſt before read to him, and even ſuch as he was a 'ſtranger to, before a great many people: he all at once 'wrote, dictated, heard, and converſed with his friends.'

[B] Hadrian was born at Rome January 24, 76.] What makes me believe that Eutropius is miſtaken in ſaying, that Hadrian was born at Italica, is the account Spartian gives us of this emperor's family. He obſerves, that Hadrian's anceſtors, originally of Adria in Italy, ſettled at Italica in Spain, in the time of the Scipio's &c. He cites Hadrian himſelf, who had thus written in the hiſtory of his life. Doubtleſs Spartian had read in the ſame book, what he adds at the ſame time, that Hadrian was born at Rome IX. Kal. Feb. in the ſeventh conſulſhip of Veſpaſian, and the fifth of Titus.

[C] Loſt his father ten years after.] His name was Ælius Hadrianus Afer. It is conjectured, that the government of Africa gave him the ſirname of Afer, and that he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from the preſident Hadrianus, in Veſpaſian's reign, who put to death the holy martyr Leontius, at Tripoli. The acts of this martyrdom, inſerted in Metaphraſtus's collection, ſay, that the preſident Hadrianus, who in perſon judged Leontius, was a ſenator. Now Suidas obſerves, that the emperor Hadrian's father was a ſenator, and that he had been prætor. Theſe grounds of Mr Triſtan's conjecture, are reaſonable enough. (3) I do not know why Caſaubon (4) has found fault with theſe words of Xiphilin; ἦν δὲ Ἀδριανὸς γένος μὲν Ἀδριανοῦ Ἄφρου υἱός; for after all the ſtir that is made, it muſt be owned, that theſe words may ſignify, that Hadrian was the ſon of Hadrian Afer. This is doubtleſs their true and natural ſignification, as Salmaſius (5) declares. So that one would be much to blame to cenſure Xiphilin for corrupting Hadrian's genealogy, in his abridgment of Dion, and making an African family of a Spaniſh. It is true, Cedrenus, miſtaking Xiphilin's meaning, fell into a groſs error, in ſaying, that the emperor Hadrian was of African extraction. Let us not forget, that Domitia Paulina, Hadrian's mother, was born at Cadiz (6).

[D] Trajan, his relation.] Hadrian's father, was couſin-german to Trajan; for he was ſon of Ulpia, ſiſter to Marcus Ulpius Trajan, the emperor Trajan's father. See Caſaubon in his commentary upon Spartian. The relation was not ſo near, according to Eutropius, who ſays, that Hadrian's mother was couſin to Trajan (7).

[E] He married a grand niece of this prince.] I ſhall ſay ſomewhere elſe, who ſhe was, and how ſhe ſucceeded in her marriage. It ſuffices to ſay here, that they who affirm (8), that Hadrian was married to Trajan's daughter, are miſtaken. It does not appear that Trajan had any children, or that Hadrian had any wife beſides Sabina, daughter of a niece of Trajan. The author of the chronicle of Alexandria, has given us a pleaſant chimera, viz. that the emperor Hadrina married the daughter of that Aquila, who made a verſion of the Bible.

commanded in the lower Pannonia, with ſo good a conduct, as procured him the conſulſhip (k). The orations he compoſed for Trajan, increaſed his intereſt with him [F]. After the raiſing of the ſiege of Atra in Arabia, Trajan being ſick, and reſolved to return to Rome, left him the command of the army. He had before given him the government of Syria; and finding himſelf near his end, adopted him (l). We examine, in the article of PLOTINA (m), whether this adoption was fictitious. What is certain, is, that Hadrian receiving, at Antioch, almoſt at the ſame time, the news of his adoption, and of the death of Trajan, cauſed himſelf to be declared emperor the eleventh of Auguſt 117. One of the firſt things he did, was to abandon almoſt all the conqueſts of Trajan, and to be contented that the Euphrates ſhould be the boundary of the empire [G]. He did not return to Rome till the year 118. The ſenate decreed him a triumph, and the title of father of the country (n), but he refuſed it, and would have the triumph given to the ſtatue of Trajan. His munificence to the people was very extraordinary [H]. The year following he went into Mœſia, to repulſe the Sarmatæ (o). During his abſence, many perſons of the greateſt merit were put to death (p); and he in vain proteſted that it was not by his orders, he was nevertheleſs loaded with all the odium of theſe violences. Never prince travelled ſo much as he; there being hardly a province in bible St Epiphanius ſeems to ſay the ſame thing (9). Triſtan (10) charges this Alexanderian chronicler with ſaying, that, according to Epiphanius, Hadrian was a Greek by nation, and came from Sinope. It is abſolutely falſe, that Epiphanius ſays it, he ſays, only, that he came from Aquila.

[F] The orations he compoſed for Trajan increaſed his intereſt with him.] I will cite Spartian's words; Defuncto quidem Sura, Trajani ei (Adriano) familiaritas crevit, cauſa præcipuè orationum quas pro imperatore dictaverat. Caſaubon applies this dictaverat to Sura, which at firſt ſight ſeems to make the hiſtorian's argument a lamentable one; for what reaſoning is this. After Sura's death, Hadrian's familiarity with Trajan encreaſed, eſpecially on account of the orations that Sura had made for Trajan. But if we examine it more ſtrictly we ſhall find, that, according to Caſaubon's ſenſe, there is only a want of clearneſs in Spartian's expreſſion. The later meant not that the ſame harangues numerically, that Sura had compoſed, increaſed Hadrian's favour, he ſpeaks only of harangues, like thoſe of of Sura. Therefore Caſaubon's interpretation, does not really differ from Salmaſius's which is very good. The ſenſe of which is this: Hadrian got farther into Trajan's friendſhip by doing him the ſame ſervices that Sura had done, in compoſing ſpeeches. I would not with Salmaſius, change the text, nor ſuppoſe with him, that Plotina's favour was neceſſary to Hadrian, to obtain from the emperor the honour of making his ſpeeches. This poſt was not conſiderable enough, with reſpect to Hadrian, that he could not obtain it, without interceſſion. There have been mere maſters of rhetoric employed in it, witneſs this paſſage of Spartian (11). 'Ælius 'Orationem pulcherrimam quæ hodieque legitur, ſive 'per ſe, ſive per ſcriniorum aut DICENDI MAGISTROS paraſſet. —— Ælius prepared a beautiful 'oration, which is ſtill extant, and was either compoſed by himſelf, or by his ſecretaries or rhetoricians.' Domitian employed others to compoſe his letters, ſpeeches, and edicts (12). It was not Nero but Seneca, who compoſed Claudius's funeral oration, which Claudius recited (13). It is true, that the old men, being great makers of compariſons betwixt the paſt and preſent times, amuſed themſelves with obſerving, that before Nero, no prince had need of a borrowed eloquence: as we are told by Tacitus, in the third chapter of the thirteenth book of his annals. Adnotabant ſeniores, quibus otioſum eſt vetera & præſentia contendere, primum ex iis qui rerum potiti eſſent Neronem alienæ facundiæ eguiſſe. Mr Spanheim obſerves, that the Roman emperors, ſometimes imployed their quæſtors, not only in compoſing, but alſo in ſpeaking for them their orations, as Suetonius, amongſt others, obſerves of Nero, and even of Auguſtus (14). For the reſt, if we believe the emperor Julian (15), it was not from ignorance, but lazineſs, that Trajan made uſe of Sura.

[G] He was contented that the Euphrates ſhould be the boundary of the empire.] St Auguſtin has made uſe of this action of Hadrian, to jeer the idolaters, who ſaid, the god Terminus would not even give place to Jupiter himſelf, at the building of the capitol, which was a preſage, that the limits of the Roman empire ſhould never ſhrink. 'Your god Terminus, ſays 'St Auguſtin pleaſantly to them (16), ſtood in greater 'fear of Hadrian, king of men, than of Jupiter king of the gods. 'Poſtea in orientalibus partibus 'Hadriani voluntate mutati ſunt termini imperii Romani. Ille namque tres provincias nobiles Armeniam, Meſopotamiam, Aſſyriam Perſarum conceſſit imperio, ut Deus ille Terminus qui Romanos terminos 'ſecundum illos tuebatur, & per illud pulcherrimum 'auſpicium loco non ceſſerat Jovi, plus Hadrianum 'regem hominum quam regem deorum timuiſſe videatur —— Afterward, at the command of Hadrian, the 'boundaries of the empire were changed in the Eaſt; for 'he yielded to the Perſians three great provinces, Armenia, Meſopotamia, and Aſſyria; ſo and that the god Terminus, who, as they imagine, takes care of the Roman 'boundaries; and who, by an auſpicious preſage, had not 'given place to Jupiter, ſeems to have been more afraid of Hadrian, king of men, than of the king of the Gods.' There is no probability, that the abandoning theſe conqueſts was the effect of any envy Hadrian had to Trajan (17). For what greater honour could be done to the memory of the late emperor, than to ſhew, that things could not be maintained in the ſame height to which he had raiſed them? we muſt ſay then, that the impoſſibility of preſerving theſe conquered countries, induced Hadrian to this conceſſion. 'Omnia trans 'Euphratem ac Tigrim reliquit exemplo, ut dicebat, 'Catonis, qui Macedonas liberos pronunciavit quia teneri non poterant (18). —— He abandoned all beyond 'the Euphrates, and the Tigris, after the example of 'Cato, ſaid he, who declared the Macedonians free, 'becauſe they could not be kept in ſubjection. He choſe rather to ſuffer in the compariſon betwixt him and his predeceſſor, than expoſe his empire to the confuſions that threatened it on all ſides. Ammianus Marcellinus ſays, that before Jovian, no emperor, or conſul, gave up an inch of ground to the enemy. Mr Valois (19) pretends he had reaſon to ſay ſo, and that Caſaubon had no reaſon to criticiſe him for it (20).

[H] His munificence was —— very extraordinary.] 'It ſeems, that he remitted all that was due from 'private perſons in Rome and Italy, and in the provinces, whatever was owing for ſixteen years paſt, 'at leaſt in the imperial provinces; for Spartian, and 'an inſcription of this year 118, ſeem to confine it to 'theſe. . . . He burnt in Trajan's Forum, the bonds and 'accompts of all that he had remitted, that no body 'might fear being called to account for it, for the future '. . . This remiſſion amounted to immenſe ſums, and 'ſome learned men, who have reduced what the hiſtorians 'write of it, to the value of our money, make it riſe to 'twenty two millions five hundred thouſand crowns of 'gold. This liberality had no preſident before him; the 'memorial of it, is not only preſerved in hiſtorians, but 'alſo in famous inſcriptions of this year, and the following, in which perhaps it was perfected, and in medals, 'repreſenting Hadrian with a torch in his hand, ſetting fire to the obligations he had remitted.' I copy this from Mr Tillemont (21) in whoſe remarks may be ſeen an examination of many difficulties concerning this. I do not enter into them; but chooſe rather to make this reflexion, that there is no bonfire for a town taken, or a battle won, that can pleaſe the people ſo much as this of Hadrian. I have read ſomewhere, that the Venetian ambaſſador, burning before Henry IV, the papers in which he owned himſelf indebted for many ſums to that republic, this prince, who loved witty ſayings, in the empire which he did not honour with his preſence. And as he was magnificent, and deſired a perſonal knowledge of every thing, he every where left ſome marks of his liberality, and exactneſs in examining the conduct of the governors. It is ſuppoſed he began his travels in the year 120. He viſited Gaul, Germany, and Britain, where he built a wall to hinder the Iſlanders, under his obedience, from being ravaged by thoſe who had ſhaken off the Roman government. He returned into Gaul in the year 121, from whence he went to Spain; it is thought it was at that time, he went to Mauritania. His firſt journey to the eaſt was pretty long; for he did not return to Greece 'till the year 125. He paſſed the winter at Athens, and was initiated in the myſteries of Ceres. He was at Rome in the beginning of the year 129 (q); and it is believed he went into Africa the ſame year, and that, after his return to Rome, he ſet out again for the eaſt in the year 130. Having paſſed through Aſia, where many kings came to compliment him, he went into Egypt in the year 132. He ſpent the winter at Athens in 135, and the ſpring following came back to Rome. He adopted Lucius Aurelius Annius Ceionius Commodus Verus, who, though he had names enough already, took beſides, that of Ælius. After this adoption, Hadrian retired to Tibur, where he built ſumptuous edifices [I], and gave himſelf up to effeminacy, and then to cruelty; for he put many people to death, either by open violence, or clandeſtine ways, and ſpared not his own brother-in-law Servianus, though ninety years of age. Lucius Verus dying the firſt of January 138, Hadrian adopted Titus Antoninus, and charged him to adopt Marcus Annius Verus, and the ſon of Lucius Verus. This emperor's dropſy oppreſſed and vexed him to that degree, that he grew as it were raging mad [K]. All imaginable remedies were employed to cure him. The relief which the magical art gave him, laſted not long (r). Abundance of phyſicians were ſent for, and, ſome ſay, he attributed his death to them [L]. To deliver him from his deſpair, it was pretended to ſayings, ſaid he never ſaw a finer fire in his life. Ageſilaus, one of the Lacedæmonian Ephori, made uſe of this thought on a like occaſion. Καὶ τὰ παρὰ τῶν χρεωστῶν γαμματεῖα συνεισενέγκαντες εἰς ἀγορὰν, ἃ κλάρια καλοῦσι, καὶ πάντα συνθέντες εἰς ἓν, ἐνέπρησαν. ἀρθείσης δὲ φλογὸς, οἱ μὲν πλούσιοι καὶ δανειστικοὶ, περιπατοῦντες ἀπῆλθον, ὁ δὲ Ἀγησίλαος, ὥσπερ ἐφυβρίζων, οὐκ ἔφη λαμπρότερον ἑωρακέναι φῶς οὐδὲ πῦρ ἐκείνου καθαρώτερον. Ita congeſtas in forum debitorum ſyngraphas, quas claria appellant, omnes coacervatas concremaverunt. Sublata flamma pecunioſi & fœneratores, qui ibi deambulabant, digreſſi ſunt. At Ageſilaus, quaſi illudens illis, negavit clarius ſe lumen vel ignem lucidiorem vidiſſe (22). —— And having heaped together the creditors bonds, called Claria, in the market place, they ſet them all on fire. At the ſight of the flames, the rich and the uſurers, who were walking there, went away. But Ageſilaus laughing at them, ſaid, he had never ſeen a more ſhining light, or a brighter fire.

[I] After the adoption of Lucius Verus, he retired to Tibur, where he built ſumptuous edifices.] Aurelius Victor (23) gives a lively deſcription of the effeminate life this emperor led in his retreat, whilſt Lucius Ælius Cæſar governed at Rome; but he makes a groſs blunder in Chronology. He ſays, that Hadrian at this time plunged himſelf into the infamous amours of Antinous; which is not to know, that Antinous's death preceded the adoption of Ælius Verus. As for his buildings, theſe are his words (24); 'Rus proprium Tibur ſeceſſit, permiſſa 'urbe Lucio Ælio Cæſari, ipſe uti beatis locupleti'bus mos, palatia exſtruere, curare epulas, ſigna, ta'bulas pictas. —— He retired to his villa at Tibur; 'having left the city to the government of Lucius 'Ælius Cæſar: while he, after the manner of the 'rich, built palaces, gave grand entertainments; and 'collected ſtatues and pictures.' Add to this a paſſage of Spartian (25): 'Tiburtinam villam mirè exædifi'cavit, ita ut in ea & provinciarum & locorum cele'berrima nomina inſcriberet: velut Lyceum, Acade'miam, Prytaneum, Canopum, Pæcilen, Tempe 'vocaret. Et ut nihil prætermitteret, etiam inferos 'finxit. —— He built his villa at Tibur in an ad'mirable manner; and gave the names of the pro'vinces, and moſt celebrated places, to different parts 'of it, as the Lyceum, the Academy, the Prytaneum, 'Canopus, Pæcile, Tempe. And that he might omit 'nothing, he had a place repreſenting the infernal 'regions.'

[K] His dropſy vexed him to that degree, that he grew as it were raging mad.] To this time is to be referred what Lampridius ſays, that Hadrian impoſed his name on a town that was called Oreſta; and that by this means his madneſs went off a little. He had this advice from an oracle. 'Et Oreſtam 'quidem urbem Hadrianus ſuo nomini vindicari juſſit 'eo tempore quo furore cœperit laborare, ut ex 'reſponſo quum ei dictum eſſet ut in furioſi alicu'jus domum vel nomen irreperet. Nam ex eo emol'litam inſaniam ferunt, per quam multos Senatores 'occidi juſſerat, quibus ſervatis Antoninus Pii nomen 'meruit, quod eos poſt ad ſenatum adduxit, quos omnes 'juſſu principis interfectos credebant (26). —— Ha'drian likewiſe ordered the city of Oreſta to be called 'by his name, when he began to be ſeized with mad'neſs, in obedience to the oracle, which adviſed him 'to take privily the houſe or name of ſome mad-man. 'It is reported, that by this means his madneſs abat'ed, during the continuance of which he had com'manded many ſenators to be put to death, and by 'ſaving them, Antoninus obtained the name of PIUS; 'having brought them into the ſenate, when every body be'lieved that they were put to death by the emperor's order.' The Sieur Triſtan (27) fell into two groſs miſtakes in this paſſage. He makes Lampridus ſay, that Hadrian recovered of his phrenſy, after he had viſited the town of Oreſta, and that this happened at the beginning of Hadrian's reign. It was eaſy to perceive, that, Lampridius ſpeaks not of a voyage of this emperor, and that what he ſays, muſt relate to the time when Antoninus was already adopted; which was but a few months before this prince's death.

[L] Some ſay that he attributed his death to the great number of his phyſicians.] Xiphilin relates (28) that Hadrian died with theſe words in his mouth, the multitude of phyſicians have killed the king, πολλοὶ ἰατροὶ βασιλέα ἀπώλεσαν. He adds, that theſe words were a kind of proverb. Pliny aſſures us, that there was an epitaph, which contained a propoſition like to this (29): Hinc illa infelicis monumenti inſcriptio TURBA SE MEDICORUM PERIISSE. I wonder that St Epiphanus has not touched upon this circumſtance of Hadrian's laſt moments, in the paſſage where he ſays, that he ſent for all the phyſicians of his empire, and laughed at them, after he had found the vanity of their preſcriptions, and even wrote a ſatirical letter againſt their art and profeſſion. Οἱ δὲ πολλὰ κεκμηκότες καὶ μηδὲν ἀνύσαντες ἐσκώφθησαν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, ὡς καὶ ἐπιστολὴν ὀνειδιστικὴν γράψαι κατ' αὐτῶν τὴν τήχνην αὐτῶν αἰτιωμένην ὡς μηδὲν εἰδυῖαν τῆς περικειμένης αὐτῷ νόσου ἕνεκα. Cum omnem operam ſine ullo fructu poſuiſſent, ab imperatore riſu ac ludibrio habiti ſunt, uſque adeo ut mordaci in illos epiſtola profeſſionem ipſam artemque damnaret, ut quæ nihil de ægritudine ſua extricare potuiſſet (30). If this ancient father was no better informed about the fact itſelf, than the circumſtance of time, his authority is of no weight, for he ſays, that after he had written this ſatire, to him, that he had done miraculous cures [M]; but notwithſtanding all theſe artifices, he would have killed himſelf, had he not been hindered (s). He ſought death, and could not find it [N]. It came at laſt the tenth of July 138. He died that day at Baiæ, in the ſixty third year of his age, having reigned twenty one years, within thirty days. The Latin verſes he addreſſed to his ſoul (t), ſhows his uncertainty as to the other world. He was a prince who had both great virtues, and great vices. He was liberal, laborious (u), civil, exact; maintained order and diſcipline, eaſed the people, did juſtice with a particular application, and rigorouſly puniſhed thoſe that did not well diſcharge their offices. He had a vaſt deal of wit, a great memory (x), and perfectly underſtood arts and ſciences, and wrote many books [O]. He was on the other hand, cruel, envious, ſatire, he departed from Rome, to go into Egypt, which is falſe. It is certain, that after the phyſicians had tried in vain all experiments to cure his dropſy, he only travelled to Baiæ. It cannot be doubted, but he had conceived a great contempt or indignation againſt them, ſince, at laſt, he gave over all courſe of diet, and eat whatever his fancy led him to (31).

[M] They pretended that he had done miraculous cures.] Obſerve what Spartian relates: a woman came to tell Hadrian, that ſhe had been admoniſhed in a dream to repreſent to him, that ſince he ſhould recover, he ſhould have a care of killing himſelf; that ſhe had loſt her ſight, for not having obeyed the inſtructions of her dream; that ſhe had received a ſecond order to come and tell him the ſame things, with a promiſe of recovering her ſight, by kiſſing his knees. The woman having executed this command, and waſhed her eyes with the water of a temple, ſaw as well as before. Another miracle: a man born blind came from the furtheſt part of Pannonia, and touched Hadrian, who had the fever; which done, the man recovered his ſight, and Hadrian's fever left him (32). Spartian had the prudence to add, that, according to the teſtimony of Marius Maximus, there was nothing but impoſture in all this. We ſhould conjecture as much, though we knew nothing of what Marius Maximus ſaid. There is no difficulty in perceiving, that Antoninus, Hadrian's adopted ſon, uſed this ſtratagem to give him ſome hope, and to remove the melancholy which oppreſſed him. How often have theſe tricks been plaid ſince that, to foſter ſuperſtition, and even ſtate-cabals. Fallacies, you will ſay, are lawful, upon children and the ſick. By the ſame argument we may prove them lawful upon the people, who are always children, and diſtempered in ſome reſpects. But omitting theſe reflexions, which would fall on too many formidable perſons, let us ſay a word of Grammatical criticiſm, to the great Salmaſius. He will not have the man that came from Pannonia, to be blind from his birth, but only for a long time; and therefore, inſtead of reading Natus Cæcus, he reads Vetus Cæcus. His reaſon is, that it cannot be believed that people born blind, recovered their ſight, and that it is more credible that this might happen to people blind for ſeveral years. Obſerve, that in the following note he confutes Caſaubon, who underſtood by the word Simulationem, a magical charm, a conjuration. This ſenſe is unworthy of Caſaubon. Simulatio, in that place, only ſignifies a counterfeiting. Salmaſius explains it ſo, and hits it right: but upon that hypotheſis, what becomes of the difference he finds betwixt one born blind, and one blind for a long time? does he not ſee, that it was as eaſy for Antoninus to ſuborn one counterfeiting blindneſs from his birth, as for three days, and that it is as eaſy for one as the other to recover his ſight, by touching a prince that had a fever, and to cure this fever at the ſame time? But what is this to the purpoſe? he had read Vetus Cæcus in the Heidelberg manuſcript; he knew there was Veteres Cæci in Juvenal, and antiqua cæcitas in Marcellus; would a man loſe theſe diſcoveries for the ſake of good reaſoning?

[N] He ſought death, and could not find it.] So that Severian's prayer was heard, which he made when he was a dying. Ὅτι μὲν οὐδὲν ἀδικῶ, ἔφη, ὑμεῖς ὦ θεοὶ ἴστε· περὶ δὲ Ἀδριανοῦ τοσοῦτον μόνον εὔχομαι, ἵνα ἐπιθυμήσας ἀποθανεῖν, μὴ δυνηθῇ. Vos, inquit, Dii immortales, quos habeo innocentiæ meæ teſtes hoc unum rogo, ut Adrianus quamvis mortem obire percupiat, tamen non poſſit. (33). —— Immortal gods, cried he, ye witneſſes of my innocence, I have but one favour to beg of you, which is, that Hadrian may paſſionately deſire to die, and yet may not die. This prayer beſpoke a ſoul exceſſively vindictive; no imprecation was ever more ſevere; witneſs theſe words in the ninth of the Revelation, and ſixth verſe: And in thoſe days ſhall men ſeek death, and ſhall not find it, and ſhall deſire to die, and death ſhall flee from them. If we had Hadrian's letter in which he deſcribed the deplorable condition of a man who could not die, tho' he deſired it (34), we ſhould ſee ſomething very tragical; for a pen ſo eloquent and learned as his, could not chuſe, but excellently repreſent the miſeries he felt. He promiſed impunity, and even a reward, to whoever ſhould kill him, and finding no body that would do him that good office, he wept like a child (35); becauſe, tho' he was ſtill able to cauſe the death of others, he could not kill himſelf (36). His diſcontents and ſuſpicions, induced him to take off a great many perſons, and it was perhaps on that occaſion, that perceiving the public was not ſatisfied about the juſtice of his jealouſies. He ſaid that princes were much to be pitied, ſince it is never believed, that deſigns are formed againſt their lives, till they are killed. 'Scis ipſe quid avus tuus Adrianus dixerit, miſera 'conditio imperatorum quibus de affectata tyrannide 'niſi occiſis non poteſt credi. Ejus autem exemplum 'ponere quam Domitiani, qui hoc primus dixiſſe 'fertur, malui (37), tyrannorum enim etiam bona 'dicta non habent tantum auctoritatis quantum de'bent (38). —— You know what your grand-father 'Hadrian ſaid, Hard is the fate of princes, whom 'no body will believe with regard to conſpiracies form'ed againſt them, till they are ſlain. I choſe rather 'to name him here, than Domitian who is reported 'to have firſt made this obſervation; becauſe even the 'good ſayings of tyrants have not that weight which 'they deſerve.'

[O] He wrote many books.] He wrote both in verſe and proſe. There remain ſome fragments of his Latin poems (39), and ſome of his Greek verſes in the Anthology. You will find in Caſaubon and Salmaſius, (40), the epitaph of his hunting-horſe (41), in Latin verſe. This emperor had ſuch a love for this horſe, that he built a tomb for him (42). Stephanus Byzantinus twice cites a poem, intituled Alexandreis, whoſe author's name was Adrian: it is not generally agreed that this is a work of our emperor. He wrote abundance of verſes upon his amours (43). He made others alſo in the praiſe of Plotina, his benefactreſs (44). We cannot tell whether a collection of his witty ſayings were publiſhed: for Spartian's words (45) may only ſignify, that many of them were remembered: but it is certain he publiſhed ſome diſcourſes, and ſome orations (46), ſome citations from them are ſtill extant. We find in Soſipater, that he had ſaid in the firſt book of his diſcourſes, that Auguſtus was not very learned. 'Tametſi Auguſtus 'non pereruditus homo fuerit, ut id adverbium (o'biter) ex uſu potius quàm ratione protulerit. —— 'Auguſtus was not very learned, for he made uſe of 'the adverb (obiter) rather from common uſe than 'from particular choice.' By the way here is an authority for thoſe who in languages would have cuſtom ſubmit to reaſon. Here is alſo a great example for thoſe whoſe moſt ſerious ſtudies are a rigorous examination of their native tongue; for it appears by the paſſage of Soſipater that our emperor was, with reſpect to Latin, what Vaugelas was with reſpect to French (47). Aulus Gellius (48) quotes the ſpeech that Hadrian ſpoke before the ſenate for the inhabitants of Italica, his father's native place. But this emperor's chief work was, doubtleſs, the hiſtory of his life. He was willing it ſhould appear under another's name, probably that he might have the vious, unchaſte, ſuperſtitious, and addicted to magic. What more abominable than his paſſion for Antinous (y). I omit his exceſſive curioſity [P]. He publiſhed no edict againſt the Chriſtians; 'tis however believed, that his exceſſive ſuperſtition occaſioned their being perſecuted. He had regard to the apologies which Quadratus and Ariſtides preſented to him on their behalf. The Jews having again taken arms in his reign, defended themſelves for three years againſt the forces he ſent into their country: after which they were worſted, and treated with the utmoſt ſeverity (z). They tell a ridiculous ſtory, about a queſtion they pretend was put by this emperor to a rabbi on the article of the reſurrection. I ſpeak of it in the article BARCHOCHEBAS (aa), as alſo the things done then in Judæa. Many particular facts which ſerve to acquaint us with Hadrian's character, his jealouſy againſt thoſe that excelled in arts, &c. will be found in ſeveral places of this Dictionary as we have occaſion to ſpeak of the perſons concerned in theſe facts. The alphabetical index will point out the particulars. The ſenate only granted the continuance of Hadrian's acts, to the tears and intreaties of Antoninus (bb); for they had reſolved to repeal them. But when once this reſolution was evaded, Antoninus obtained whatever he had a mind to, viz. the Apotheoſis of Hadrian. He built a temple to him at Puzzolo, and eſtabliſhed there ſome games with ſome ſocieties of prieſts, and other things belonging to the deification (cc). Hadrian had not waited till that time to taſte divine honours, having himſelf ſeized on the celeſtial crown. He conſecrated to himſelf an altar in Athens in the temple of Jupiter Olympius: And as he paſſed through many cities of Aſia, he multiplied the temples he built to himſelf (dd). There is no probability, that he deſigned them for JESUS CHRIST; and no body knows whence Lampridius took what he ſays upon that head [Q]. It does not appear that the more liberty to commend himſelf. Phlegon, one of his freed men, a learned man, put his name to his maſter's work (49). Hadrian compoſed ſome books in imitation of Antimachus, a Greek poet, of whom he was a great admirer (50). Theſe books were very obſcure. Spartian had preſerved the title of them; but it is a queſtion whether the manuſcripts retained it right. So that this very title is a riddle, and a rack to the critics. Salmaſius turns himſelf a hundred ways, in order to draw his concluſion; and after he has fixed the reading that he thinks the only good one, he is as much at a loſs as before. 'Solam 'eam eſſe veram (lectionem) mihi perſuadeo; quomo'do tamen explicanda ſit juxta cum ignariſſimis ſcio '(51). ——— I am perſuaded, that this is the only 'true reading, but am quite ignorant how it is to be 'explained.' If this work of Hadrian had been handed down to us, it might have well been ſaid to the author when he was writing it: You are going,

To make racks for future Salmaſius's;

The very title will make them ſubmit and give up their arms. It is not well determined, whether Hadrian wrote concerning the military art. It is certain he made ſome fine regulations (52), and eſtabliſhed an excellent diſcipline among his troops. Vegetius owns that he made uſe of Hadrian's regulations; but as he acknowledges the ſame thing with reſpect to thoſe of Trajan and Auguſtus, which yet affords no grounds to pretend that theſe two emperors wrote books upon this ſubject, it is plain that Geſner had no reaſon to ſay, on the authority of this paſſage of Vegetius, that Hadrian wrote concerning the military art (53). Some will have (54) him to have written on Tactics, and that Urbicius's work upon this ſubject is Hadrian's, excepting Urbicius's additions. Rigaltius has publiſhed a fragment of it.

[P] I omit . . . his exceſſive curioſity.] I might give it this name, tho' he had not deſired to penetrate into futurity, ſo much as he did either by aſtrology or magic. There are other reaſons enough to make him be thought of too inquiſitive a ſpirit. He is called by Tertullian (55), curioſitatum omnium explorator — An enquirer after all ſorts of curioſities; and by Ammianus Marcellinus, futurorum ſciſcitationi nimiæ deditus —— too much addicted to enquiries about futurities. I ſhall not examine whether it became a prince to be ſo fond of beholding upon the place, whatever he met with in books concerning the ſeveral countries of the world. Peregrinationis ita cupidus ut omnia quæ legerat de locis orbis terrarum, præſens vellet addiſcere (56). The voyages he undertook to ſatisfy himſelf in this point, were not uſeleſs to the provinces; therefore let us not cavil with him on this account. Let us ſuffer him to aſcend Mount Ætna to ſee whether the riſing ſun has the ſame colours as the rainbow (57), and to get upon Mount Caſſius to ſee the ſame luminary riſe (58): but who can pardon him for imploying an infinite number of ſpies, to inform him of all the ſecrets of families: what a woman wrote to her huſband, what an huſband ſaid to his wife. Erat curioſus non ſolum domus ſuæ, ſed etiam amicorum, ita ut per frumentarios occulta omnia exploraret, nec adverterent amici ſciri ab Imperatore ſuam vitam priuſquam ipſe hoc Imperator oſtenderet (59). It is not to be doubted but that the intelligence the ſpies gave him facilitated his enterprizes of galantry; for he gave no better quarter to his friends in theſe matters, than to indifferent people. It is thus I could willingly underſtand the words of Spartian (60). Et hoc quidem vitioſiſſimum putant (he ſpeaks of his ſpying) atque huic adjungunt quæ de adultorum amore ac nuptarum adulteriis, quibus Adrianus laboraſſe dicitur, aſſerunt, jungentes quod ne amicis quidem ſervaverit fidem. Sovereigns have ſo many other ways to make themſelves formidable, that they ought to leave this to paraſites, and yet you ſee ſome in all ages, who ſpare nothing to be exactly informed of all that is ſaid in houſes. Hadrian's curioſity was doubtleſs the cauſe, that almoſt all his greateſt friends, and they whom he had raiſed to the greateſt dignities, incurred his enmity. He greedily ſwallowed all reports brought him concerning his friends, Facile de amicis quidquid inſuſurrabatur audivit (62). For the reſt, ſince I have conſidered him in this remark, as a curious traveller, I will finiſh it, by ſaying, that he marched on foot as a common ſoldier (63), and that he never covered his head in any weather (64). He ſuffered by it at laſt (65).

[Q] It is not at all probable, that he deſigned the temples, which he built, for JESUS CHRIST; and no body knows whence Lampridius took what he ſays on that head.] However let us ſee what Lampridius ſays (66); 'Chriſto templum facere voluit (Alexander 'Severus) eumque inter Deos recipere, quod & Adria'nus cogitaſſe fertur, qui templa in omnibus civitati'bus ſine ſimulacris juſſerat fieri, qui hodie idcirco 'quia non habent numina, dicuntur Adriani, quæ ille 'ad hoc paraſſe dicebatur, ſed prohibitus eſt ab iis qui 'conſulentes ſacra repererant omnes Chriſtianos futu'ros, ſi id optato eveniſſet, & templa reliqua deſe'renda. ——— Alexander Severus reſolved to build a 'temple to CHRIST, and to receive him into the 'number of the gods. Hadrian is reported to have in'tended to do the ſame, and ordered temples without 'images to be built in every city, which becauſe they are 'not dedicated to any particular deity, are called Ha'drians. Theſe he is ſaid to have deſigned for that pur'poſe, but was hindered by ſome, who having conſulted 'the that any other, beſides himſelf, had any knowlege of his author.

‘ the oracles, found, that if he ſhould do ſo, all the world would turn Chriſtians, and the other temples be deſerted.’ Caſaubon, without doubt, is not to be blamed, for rejecting this as a fable. What I think probable here is this fear of the Heathens, that their temples ſhould be deſerted, if Chriſtianity was publickly tolerated. This does more honour to the Chriſtian faith, than the alarms that have appeared in the writings of a refugee miniſter (67), who, oppoſing the toleration of religions, has ſaid, amongſt other things, put a Mahometan, a Socinian, a Papiſt, and a Calviniſt preacher, in the ſame town, and let not the magiſtrate intervene by his authority, nor GOD by his ſpirit and his miracles, and you will ſee quickly the truth intirely oppreſſed. Here you ſee people who are afraid they ſhould preach to walls and benches, vox clamantis in deſerto, unleſs there be no body beſides themſelves in a town. I do not wonder then they are ſuch enemies to a toleration (68).

HADRIAN, cardinal, prieſt of the title of St Chryſogonus (a), was a native of Cornetto, in Tuſcany [A]. He was nuncio to Innocent VIII, in Scotland [B], and then in France: and after he had been clerk and treaſurer to the apoſtolic chamber, he was honoured with a cardinal's cap by Pope Alexander VI (b), whoſe ſecretary he had been (c). This cardinal's life was a ſcene of odd changes, the end whereof was far from being honourable. He narrowly eſcaped on the day in which Alexander VI poiſoned himſelf by a miſtake [C]. Afterwards he ſo incurred the enmity of Julius II, that he was forced to hide himſelf in the mountains of Trent, fulminated with the ſevere decrees of this Pontiff (d). Being recalled by Leo X, he had ſo little gratitude for this favour, that he engaged in a conſpiracy againſt him [D]. This Pope forgave him this fault; and granted letters of pardon for him (e); but the cardinal did not truſt to them [E]; or had not the power to withſtand the remorſe of conſcience, which the preſence of the objects might render more importunate: he made his eſcape by night, and it was never certainly known what became of him [F]. He was one of the firſt that attempted the reformation of the Latin tongue in [A] In Tuſcany.] I ſpeak this with reſpect to the ancient diviſion of Italy, for at preſent Cornetto is in the country called St Peter's Patrimony.

[B] He was nuncio in Scotland.] I do not find he was nuncio in England, yet notwithſtanding it is true that he gained the affection of king Henry VII, who made him biſhop of Hereford, and of Bath and Wells (1).

[C] He eſcaped narrowly the day when Alexander VI poiſoned himſelf by a miſtake.] There is ſomething very ſingular in this adventure, It is thus related by one of our hiſtorians (2). Alexander the ſixth's baſtard longing for cardinal Hadrian Cornet's ſpoils (3), had agreed with the Pope to go and ſup with the cardinal at his villa, and had ordered thither ſome bottles of excellent wine, but which he had prepared with a mixture to poiſon their hoſt. Now it happened, that the father and ſon coming betimes, and being very thirſty, by reaſon of the heat of the ſeaſon, asked for ſome wine, and whilſt the ſervant, who knew the ſecret, was out of the way, another gave them ſome of this. The father, who drank it pure, died the ſame day, which was the ſeventeenth of Auguſt 1503. The ſon, who was more vigorous, and had diluted it with water, had time to have recourſe to antidotes, and having cauſed himſelf to be wrapt up in a mule's belly, he eſcaped; but it left him ſo weak, that he was not able to act when he had the utmoſt occaſion for it. Hadrian had not been promoted to the cardinalſhip above two or three months. Guicciardin deſerves to be read concerning the death of this Pope (4).

[D] He engaged in a conſpiracy againſt Leo X.] Cardinal Alfonſo Petrucci was the head of it; they aimed at Leo the tenth's life. Some (5) ſay, that our Hadrian engaged in it with the hopes of being Pope, and that theſe hopes were grounded upon ſome prediction, which promiſed the Papacy to one Hadrian of mean birth, but illuſtrious by his learning. As all this agreed to Hadrian de Cornetto, he applied it to himſelf, and thereby loſt all his honour, and the repoſe of his life. We may venture to ſay, that there are no greater peſts to mankind, than thoſe pretenders to predictions; for they find but too many ignorant and turbulent ſpirits, whom they engage in fatal enterprizes. A well governed ſtate ought not to ſuffer ſuch people, which way ſoever they boaſt to have conſulted heaven, whether by the ſtars, or by the apocalypſe. Moſt of them are impoſtors, who have no other aim, than the diſturbing the public peace. He who deceived cardinal de Cornetto, was a magician in the Apennine mountains, as Mr Varillas ſays, who tells this ſtory at large. See the 276th page of his Secret Hiſtory of Florence. But Paul Jovius ſays, it was a ſorcereſs. Certam ſpem adipiſcendi Pontificatus conceperunt ex oraculo fatidicæ mulieris. Thus he ſpeaks about the beginning of the fourth book of the hiſtory of Leo X.

[E] Leo X granted letters of pardon for him; but he did not truſt to them.] Mr Varillas obſerves, that two things made cardinal Hadrian diffident; one was, that cardinal Soderini and he were fined ten thouſand crowns a-piece, though they had proſtrated themſelves at the Pope's feet, and the Pope had declared, in a full conſiſtory, that he would pardon the cardinals, who were accomplices in the conſpiracy, if they confeſſed their crime immediately, and asked his pardon before their brethren. The other, was the marks of indignation, which, in ſpight of his endeavours, appeared in Leo's countenance. See the 283d, and 284th pages of the Secret Hiſtory of Florence.

[F] It was never certainly known what became of him.] It is worth while to hear Pierius Valerianus upon it, who places our cardinal at the head almoſt of his catalogue of unfortunate learned men. Noctu clam fugam arripuit, neque quò abierit, neque ubi ſit quatuordecim jam annorum ſpatio quiſpiam potuit explorare. He adds, that it was thought his ſervant killed him, for the ſake of the piſtoles the cardinal had ſewed up in his waiſtcoat. Conſtans tamen opinio eſt eum in ſuto in interiorem toracem auro oneratum comitiis famuli perfidia oppreſſum, auroque ſurrepto cadaver in ſolitarium aliquem locum abjectum occultari. Father Oldoini obſerves, that he was diveſted of the purple and his benefices; that he fled into Turkey, and died clandeſtinely, on what day or year no man knows (6). This agrees with Leander Albertus, in his deſcription of Italy, Noſtra inſuper ætate, ſays he, magna illuſtrandæ patriæ principia jecerat Adrianus Cardinalis ex hac urbe (Cornetto) cum literarum ſtudio, tum cæremoniarum, ſed qui metu Leonis X. Pontif. Max. clam Roma profectus, exinde nunquam apparuit. The author of the Secret Hiſtory of Florence ſays (7), that cardinal Hadrian went from Rome in the diſguiſe of a reaper; that he travelled only by night till he came into his country, where he ſpent the reſt of his days in changing hiding-places; ſo fully perſuaded was he of the magician's prediction. Here are two things borrowed from Paul Jovius (8); the reſt is perhaps the author's invention. Guicciardin is ſtill more general than Paul Jovius. Adriano partitoſi occultamente, quello che s'aveniſſe di lui, non fu mai piu, che ſi ſapeſſe, nè trovato nè veduto in luogo alcuno (9). He ſays this under the year 1517, whence we may conclude, that Pierius Valerianus's dialogues, de Infelicitate Literatorum, were compoſed in 1531. Moreri has placed our Hadrian's flight in the year 1518. Why did he not follow Guicciardin's chronology? He ſends this fugitive to Venice and Riva, in the dioceſe of Trent. I fear he confounds the exile under Julius II with that under Leo X.

in a right manner. He ſtudied Cicero with excellent ſucceſs, and made abundance of admirable diſcoveries concerning the purity of this language. The treatiſe he wrote de Sermone Latino, while he abſconded in the Alps, is a proof of it. Whilſt he was labouring upon this he laid aſide a very conſiderable work, which was a Latin tranſlation of the Old Teſtament [G]. Some reckon it amongſt the works he compoſed (f). It is pretended alſo, that his tract de Poëtis is ſtill extant. As to his treatiſe de Vera Philoſophia, there is no doubt it was printed at Cologne in 1548. He wrote in verſe [H].

HADRIAN VI was born at Utrecht, in the year 1459 (a) [A]. The genius which was diſcovered in him in his childhood, obliged his father [B] to deſign him for learning, though he had not wherewithal to maintain him in the ſchools. But the univerſity of Louvain, ſupplied this domeſtic indigence. The young man was admitted in a college, where a certain number of ſcholars were maintained gratis. We are told, that he uſed to read by night, by the light of the lamps [C] that were hung up in churches, or the corners of the ſtreets: which was both a ſign of his poverty and of his ſtudious temper. He made very great progreſs in all kinds of ſciences, and if he was not a poet [D], nor a polite writer, it was becauſe

[A] He was born at Utrecht.] This town, in Latin, is called Trajectum ad Rhenum, as Maeſtricht is called Trajectum ad Moſam. Some (1) who only ſay, that Hadrian was Trajectenſis, have cauſed others (2) to make him a native of Maeſtricht. So true it is, that the leaſt inaccuracy occaſions ſome author to ſtumble. Probably Father Labbe perceived Bellarmin's negligence; for in his commentary upon this Jeſuit's eccleſiaſtical writers, he does not uſe the word Trajectenſis, but Ultrajectenſis. It is ſo certain, that Trajectum alone rather ſignifies, Maeſtricht than Utrecht, that Mr de Marolles is not excuſable for taking (3) Trajectenſem urbem for Utrecht, in the ſecond book of Gregorius Turonenſis. The ſubject was concerning the retreat of St Servaſius, biſhop of Tongres, and that was another reaſon for his not miſtaking Maeſtricht. I doubt not but the learned Onuphrius Panvinius has taken Trajectenſis here, for a man born at Maeſtricht. Adrianus VI, ſays he (4), Trajectenſis, Flander vel Brabantinus. An error a thouſand times more pardonable than that of a German writer, who ſays (5), Adrianus VI. patria Derthuſienſis Germanus. Some make him born in Italy (6): Ut plane ridiculi ſunt qui in ſuis ad Alphonſi Ciacconii hiſtoriam additionibus natales Adriani majoreſve Italiæ vindicant. Jerome Niger, an Italian author, ſaid of this Pope, he ſpeaks Latin always well enough for a Spaniard (7).

I think the firſt opinion is the righteſt, ſince Valerius Andreas, who has made a great many enquiries concerning Pope Hadrian VI, ſays not a word of the other trades aſcribed to his father. As for the ſon, he was called Hadrianus Florentius, that is, Hadrian, ſon of Florent: It was the cuſtom of the country, and ſtill remains amongſt the vulgar.

[D] And if he was not a poet.] One of the things that made him decried by the Italians, was his ſlighting of poetry, and delicacy of ſtile, two things by which a great many under Leo X had made their fortunes, and upon which they had valued themſelves moſt in that country, for fifty or ſixty years. Hadrian had his reaſons for it, for the poets had produced the ſame ill effects, which they afterwards produced in France (10). ‘ Quod unum ei viri elegantes defuiſſe prædicant, eloquentiæ cultioris flores, & poëtarum amœnitates contemnere erat ſolitus, ſive quod putaret eas ſibi aliquid ‘ de graviſſimorum ſtudiorum autoritate detrahere, ‘ ſive quod caſtis & piis ingeniis poëtarum luſus pravos ‘ mores importare & religionibus officere arbitraretur ‘ (11). —— In this only he was deficient, in the opi‘nion of the admirers of polite learning, that he uſed to ‘ deſpiſe the flowers of eloquence, and the charms of ‘ poetry; whether becauſe he thought they would leſſen ‘ the application to his more ſevere ſtudies, or becauſe he ‘ was of opinion, that the licentiouſneſs of poets corrupted the morals of chaſte and pious minds, and were detrimental to religion.’ He was ſo little diſpoſed to favour them, that one of the reaſons of Paul Jovius's experiencing his kindneſs, was becauſe he had not joined poetry to the ſtudy of the liberal arts. ‘ Jovium ‘ omnino eo . . . . ſacerdotio eſſe perornandum, quem ‘ audiviſſet optimis diſciplinis liberaliter eruditum, & ‘ ſcriptorem annalium valde elegantem, nec tamen ‘ eſſe poëtam, ut cæteri qui cultio res literas ſectarentur (12). —— That Jovius ſhould certainly have that ‘ benefice, who, as he was informed, was well verſed in ‘ the moſt uſeful learning, and a very elegant annaliſt, ‘ and yet not a poet, as at that time all thoſe were who ‘ cultivated polite literature.’ The Paganiſm which the poets ſcattered in their works, contributed not a little to this Pope's coldneſs for them, for he underſtood not raillery in this point. He was no complaiſant man in theſe matters (13). He turned away his head when he was ſhewn the ſtatue of Laocoon, and ſaid theſe were the images of impiety. ‘ Ornamenta inſignis picturæ & ſtatuarum priſcæ artis nequaquam magni fecit, adeo ut Vianeſio Bononienſium legato commendante ſtatuam Laocoontis, quam in Belvederii viridariis Julius ingenti pretio coemptam ad loci dignitatem ‘ collocarat, averſis ſtatim oculis tanquam impiæ gentis ſimulacra vituperaret. —— He was no admirer ‘ either of fine painting, or of antique ſtatues; ſo that ‘ when Vianeſius, the embaſſador from Bologna, was com-

becauſe he did not value it. His manners were exemplary; and no man was ever known to intrigue leſs than he. A living was given him in Holland [E], without his expecting it. The meer reputation of his probity and learning, ſued for him with thoſe that raiſed him (b). He took his doctor's degree at Louvain, the twenty firſt of June, 1491. A little after he was made canon of St Peter and divinity profeſſor in the ſame city, and afterwards dean of St Peter, and vice-chancellor of the univerſity. He was removed from this collegiate life, to court, in 1507, in order to be preceptor to the arch-duke Charles, then ſeven years of age (c). He made no great progreſs in Latin under him [F]; and it was ſaid, that Chievres, this young prince's governor, was the cauſe of it (d). There is nothing commonly more diſagreeable to children than ſtudy; corporeal exerciſes are much more their delight. It was therefore ſaid, that Chievres, deſiring to have the ſole poſſeſſion of his pupil, and all the glory of his progreſs, cultivated his inclination and his biaſs, and was indifferent about his improvement by the leſſons of the Louvain profeſſor. However, the preceptor had as noble recompences as any man of that employ ever had; for it was Charles the fifth's intereſt that raiſed him to the Papacy [G]. Before this he was

The poets made him ſenſible, that it was not ſaid without reaſon, Genus irritabile vatum. —— Poets a touchy race. Here is an epigram that Sannazarius regaled him with.

I will tranſcribe below, Pierius Valerianus's invective. Paſquin's ſtatue was continually checkered with ſatirical verſes againſt Hadrian. I ſhall ſay in another place (15), why he did not demoliſh it as he had reſolved.

[E] The living which was given him in Holland.] Paul Jovius ſays (16), that Margaret Maximilian the emperor's daughter, governeſs of the Netherlands, procured him this living, and that he was a little after preferred to the deanry of Louvain. He is miſtaken in making this princeſs governeſs of the Netherlands at that time: for ſhe was not ſo till after the death of the duke of Savoy, her ſecond actual husband. I uſe this word, becauſe the firſt prince (17), to whom ſhe was betrothed, returned her before the conſummation of the marriage, and becauſe I give no credit to thoſe who ſay the duke of Savoy did not conſummate his marriage with her (18). At the moſt, ſince he died in 1504, it is clear, that Margaret of Auſtria was not governeſs of the Netherlands, when Hadrian was promoted to the deanry of Louvain, which was in the year 1497 (19). Paul Jovius muſt have confounded this Margaret, with the widow of Charles the Hardy, laſt duke of Burgundy, ſiſter to Edwad the fourth king of England. She was alſo called Margaret, and was at the charge of Hadrian's promotion to his doctor of divinity's degree (20). They who tell us this, ſay indeed, that this doctor had the deanry of St Peter's at Louvain; that of Nôtre-Dame at Antwerp; a canonry, and the treaſurer's office at Nôtre-Dame le Grand of Utrecht, and the provoſtſhip of St Saviour in the ſame city; but they ſpeak not of any benefice, with cure of ſouls, or any parochial church. This pariſh is perhaps another confuſion of Paul Jovius. Cardinal Pallavicini (21), has corrected nothing in this narration of that writer.

[F] Charles V made no great progreſs in Latin under him.] Every body has heard how this emperor, upon hearing a ſpeech made to him in Latin, and not underſtanding it, cried out, with a ſigh, Hadrian told me how it would be. Paul Jovius ſpeaks of it, as of a thing that happened in his preſence (22): Audivi ego Cæſarem, quum Genuæ Latinam orationem à quodam recitatam nequaquam præclarè intelligerat, ſuſpirantem hæc verba ore protuliſſe; agnoſco, inquit, nunc maximè & cum dolore quidem magiſtri mei divina monita, quum hos flores & elegantias Latini ſermonis percipere nequeam, & meminerim eum ſæpè prædixiſſe, me aliquando puerilis incuriæ pœnas daturum. This hiſtorian had been ſaying, that Hadrian, not being able to ſtand it out againſt Chievres, contented himſelf with forewarning his young ſcholar, that he would repent his negligence hereafter. Hadrianum authoritate imparem, & natura leniſſimum, officio facile deceſſiſſe, ita tamen ut diſcipulo perblande diceret, futurum aliquando ut eum præſentis negligentiæ pæniteret. Charles V experienced it at Genoa, and frankly confeſſed it. Camerarius (23) would have Hadrian reſponſable for this emperor's uſing an interpreter, when ſpeeches were made in to him Latin, as if he had been more ſollicitous to inſtruct his pupil in the Catholic religion, that in good letters; but this confeſſion of the emperor, is ſufficient to excuſe the tutor. Mr Varillas (24) enters into a long diſpute againſt the Spaniſh hiſtorians, pretending that it is falſe, either that Chievres was guilty of what he is accuſed of with reſpect to his pupil's Latin, or that Charles V was ignorant of this language, or that he was unluckily ſenſible of this defect upon the hearing an oration which was made to him. As to the laſt fact, which the Spaniards, as he ſays, ſuppoſe to have happened in Germany, he maintains, that it is not related in any author of other nations. Would he have ſpoke thus, had he known the ſtory of the oration at Genoa, mentioned by Paul Jovius?

[G] It was Charles the fifth's intereſt that raiſed him to the Papacy.] Paul Jovius obſerves, that Hadrian had a ſhare in the numerous promotions of the year 1517 (25), by virtue of Maximilian the emperor's letters (26). He adds ſome other reaſons. As to the Papacy, it is a very common opinion, that Hadrian came to it, by the ſtrong intereſt of the emperor Charles V. 'Cæſare urgente Leoni demortuo abſens '(raro & inuſitato ſanè exemplo) Pontifex Max. un'dequadraginta patrum purpuratorum ſuffragiis crea'tur (27). —— In compliance with the preſſing ſollicita'tions of the emperor, he, upon the death of Leo, was, 'tho' abſent, (a thing very uncommon) elected Pope, 'by the ſuffrages of thirty nine cardinals. It is ſaid, that Amyot owed the place of grand-almoner of France, to a converſation which happened on the ſubject of Charles V, at the table of Charles IX. 'This em'peror was praiſed for many things, but eſpecially for his 'making his preceptor Pope . . . . The merit of this 'action was ſo heightened, that it made an impreſſion 'on Charles IX, ſo as to ſay, that if occaſion offered 'he would do as much for his (28).' It is therefore a pretty general opinion, that Pope Hadrian VI, was the creature of Charles V. But yet it ſeems, that this emperor procured him the papacy, but indirectly, and by accident. Paul Jovius, who has dived well enough into the intrigues of this conclave, tells us, that Julian de Medicis, the head of the ſtrongeſt faction, did not concern himſelf for Hadrian, till he found he could do nothing for himſelf (29). It is true, Hadrian's attachment for the intereſt of Charles V, made Julian's faction very favourable to him, when they could not carry it for the latter. They mention an inſcription wherein Hadrian owned himſelf obliged to his imperial majeſty for all his greatneſs (30). This inſcription was compoſed, ſay they, was ſent embaſſador in Spain, to king Ferdinand, and ſome ſay he managed things with much greater addreſs [H], than could be expected from a man who had ſo long imbibed the univerſity air. He ſoftned this monarch, who was much diſſatisfied with his ſon-in-law's treatment of him, and with the zeal the nobility had expreſſed for the Auſtrian princes. Hadrian removed theſe ill impreſſions, the conſequences whereof were to be feared, and was honoured a little after with the biſhopric of Tortoſa [I], and continued his embaſſy notwithſtanding. He diſcharged the functions of it till Ferdinand's death (e). After which he ſhared the regency with cardinal Ximenes (f) [K]. Deo iſtic nec ſeritur, nec metitur.* This doth not hinder the creation of this Pope to have been only an effect of chance and ſpleen. Read theſe verſes of Pierius Valerianus, which are as fine as ſatirical (31).

Who ſcorn to own the floating veſſel's ſway,
May learn from hence the viper to obey;
That the grave fathers, ſwoln with mutual gall,
Might chuſe a leader hated by them all;
And he, to'ards all with malice prepoſſeſt,
Revenge on each the malice of the reſt.

Naudé relates (32) that Peter Martyr, not the Florentine heretic, but the apoſtolic protonotary, a native of a little town of the duchy of Milan, ſaid, ſpeaking of the election of Hadrian VI: Cardinalibus hoc loco accidit quod in fabula de Pardo ac Leone ſuper Agno raptando ſcribitur; fortibus illis ſtrenuè ſe dilacerantibus, quodcumque quadrupes iners aliud prædæ ſe dominum fecit. That is, according to Lewis de May's verſion, author of the notes on the Coups d'Etat. It happened to the cardinals, on this occaſion, what the fable tells of the leopard and the lion, in contending for a lamb: whilſt theſe two generous animals were tearing one another, in conteſting valiantly for the prey, one of the moſt cowardly and brutiſh of beaſts, made himſelf maſter of it.

[H] In his he embaſſy managed things with addreſs,] Mr Varillas is of another opinion. According to him (33), Hadrian was fit for nothing but to dictate in a college; he underſtood neither politics nor court intrigues, for which this is given amongſt other proofs, that, in his embaſſy to Arragon, he did not anſwer Chievres expectation. But who told Varillas that this was a ſign of his inability? Hadrian hated Chievres on many accounts (34); and inſtead of negotiating according to his views, he did him ill offices underhand. This no doubt was ill anſwering this lord's hopes, but was no ſign of inability.

[I] He was honoured with the biſhopric of Tortoſa.] Many authors (35) whom I have conſulted, agree, that Ferdinard gave Hadrian this biſhopric. But Mr Varillas ſays (36), that it was given him after this prince's death, as an amends for the power he was deprived of. We muſt know, that cardinal Ximenes, nominated regent of the kingdom by Ferdinand's will (37), would fill that poſt in ſpight of the commiſſion that Hadrian had brought from Flanders, to be regent of Caſtile and Arragon, in caſe of Ferdinand's death. The cardinal was more reſolute than Hadrian in his pretenſions; for the latter was brought to be content with part of the regency, and Mr Varillas ſuppoſes he was made biſhop (38), to make him amends. I have juſt been looking in a book (39) later than Mr Varillas's, where I find, that the author ſuppoſes our Hadrian was not biſhop at the time of the diſpute about the regency. Relating the circumſtances of this diſpute, he calls him only dean of Louvain, and he ſays (40), that Ximenes pretended that this dean having conſented to have it only as a ſecond, the dignity and rank he bore in Caſtile, not permitting a SIMPLE PRIEST, as the dean was, to pretend to a precedency over a cardinal archbiſhop, he would allow him only what ſhare he thought fit. The biſhop of Niſmes ſays expreſly (41), that the dean came not to the biſhopric of Tortoſa, but by Ximenes's recommendation after Ferdinand's death; and as he cites Alvara Gomez (42) and Peter Martyr (43), it is probable that Paul Jovius and the Biographers of the Netherlands, are miſtaken. The manner of Ferdinand's receiving the dean, does not intimate that he made him a biſhop: He had penetrated the true ſubject of his embaſſy, he had treated him as a ſpy, and when Hadrian ſollicited for a ſecond audience, he angrily anſwered what would he have; does he come to know whether I am dying? tell him I am not to be ſeen to day. However he ſaw him a few days after, by the advice of his miniſters, and told him, that he was not well enough to treat with him about buſineſs, and ordered him to retire to Guadalupa, to the convent of St Jerome . . . . . . He gave him officers, in appearance, to ſerve him, but in effect to guard him, and to hinder ſuſpected people from having any commerce with him (44).

[K] He ſhared the regency with cardinal Ximenes.] There is great probability in one of the circumſtances related by Mr Varillas. He ſays, (45) that one of the arguments urged to the dean of Utrecht (46), during his diſpute with Ximenes about the regency, was the repreſenting came a time when his authority was much greater. Ximenes took too much upon him, for which reaſon the arch-duke Charles ſent him home, when he went in perſon to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms of Spain; and ſome time after he gave the government to Hadrian in a very honourable manner, I mean, when he departed for Germany, where the imperial crown called him (b). Hadrian found himſelf much embarraſſed with the government of ſo many kingdoms, becauſe there aroſe a dangerous ſedition, which he could not have been able to ſurmount, had he not had two colleagues aſſigned him, viz. the Conſtable and Amirante of Caſtile. The invaſion of Navarre by the French, was another great trouble during his government. He came off with honour, and while he was enjoying the ſatisfaction of having recovered Navarre, he received the news of his election to the papacy (i). I have omitted to ſay, that Leo X, gave him a cardinal's cap in the year 1517. After his death, the ſeveral factions of the conclave terminated in the election of Hadrian (k), which highly diſpleaſed the people of Rome [L]. The new Pope embarking in Catalonia arrived at Rome the thirtieth of Auguſt [M]. He refuſed to change his name; and in every thing expreſſed his averſion to pomp and pleaſures, which was a thing againſt which preſcription was very old. His Pontificate laſted but till the fourteenth of September 1523. He had a great partiality for the emperor Charles V, and very little ſatisfaction in his triple crown [N]. It was perhaps his diſcontent, that gave occaſion repreſenting to him, ‘that if he attempted to execute the commiſſions he had brought from Flanders, he would kindle a civil war in Spain, and be anſwerable to GOD for all the murders, and other crimes, that ſhould be committed; as he himſelf had previouſly confeſſed, in his excellent commentary on the Maſter of the Sentences, where he had taught, that a man raiſing diſturbances in a ſtate, when he might forbear it, without hazarding his conſcience, and his honour, was reſponſible for all the ſubſequent calamities. We have ſeen, above, that the dean was an honeſt man, and that he was not well ſkilled in the matter he pretended to. He was ſo charmed with the deference that was paid him, in referring to himſelf an affair wherein he was a party, and with the honour done him in citing the writings he had formerly dictated in the univerſity of Louvain, and afterwards printed, that he promiſed to ſubmit to what the council of Spain ſhould determine, provided an expedient was found to ſecure his reputation, and hinder the arch-duke's commiſſions from being turned into ridicule.’ Here is exactly the fable of the Raven and the Fox, only with this difference, that the Raven loſt his prey for future praiſes, whereas honeſt Hadrian loſt his, for praiſes given his ſinging in times paſt.

[L] His election ..... highly diſpleaſed the people of Rome.] What they call in the conclave, being elected by inſpiration, had a great ſhare in Hadrian's fortune. The cardinal de Medicis, at the head of all the young cardinals, a faction more powerful than that which is ſometimes calle the Flying Squadron, had no ſooner reſolved upon the election of the cardinal of Tortoſa, but he made his party promiſe to give him their voices all at once. This was done. The opening of the balots, ſhewing that a candidate was propoſed, of whom it ſeemed no body had yet thought, cauſed a great ſurprize. Cardinal Cajetan gave freſh encouragement, by adviſing thoſe that were neareſt him to take this ſide, ſince it was as he ſaid, that of GOD and men (47). Immediately many of them eſpouſed his intereſt with a good grace, by I know not what motive of religion; others, who knew not ſo much as the cardinal of Tortoſa's name, heſitated, but nevertheleſs followed the prevailing opinion: the torrent of inſpiration hurried them along, and made them forget all their intereſts. None but cardinal Urſini reſiſted this inſpiration of the conclave. Julian de Medicis was overjoyed, but the others fell into a ſad dejection; and the people were ſo inraged at their choice, that they loaded them with a thouſand abuſes, upon the coming out of the conclave. ‘Id populus adeo indignanter tulit, ut quum patefacto Conclavi Cardinales domum redirent, paſſim maledictis inceſſerentur, quod infamibus comitiis non modo urbem Romam ſuo antiſtite orbatam prodidiſſent, ſed quod inſaniæ proximum videretur, Italiam etiam Pontificatus honore ſpoliaſſent (48). —— The populace were ſo enraged at it, that they loaded the cardinals with curſes as they went home, upon the breaking up of the conclave, calling out, that they had by their infamous cabals, not only betrayed the city of Rome, which was deprived of it's head, but had alſo, which appeared to be next to madneſs, robbed Italy of the honour of the popedom.’ One of them thanked the people, for ſuffering them to come off ſo cheap, whereas if they had had their deſerts, they ſhould have been ſtoned. Adaperto conclavi quum globus Cardinalium Hadriani pontem eſſet prætervectus, & opifices puerique minacibus oculis voceque & manibus obſtreperent, nec à fœdiſſimis probris abſtinerent, Sigiſmundus Gonzaga Cardinalis renidenti vultu his egit gratias, quod adverſus extrema ſupplicia meritos contumeliis eſſent contenti, nec lapidibus publicam injuriam vindicarent (49). The peoples indignation was founded upon their having had no regard to the ſtain of original ſin, and the fear that the new Pope would keep this ſee elſewhere than in Rome.

[M] He arrived at Rome the thirtieth of Auguſt.] Francis Swertius (50) ſays, that Didacus Stunica has made a relation of this voyage. I doubt it much; for Nicolas Antonio does not ſpeak of it, tho' he ſpeaks of another relation of a voyage written by this author, of leſs conſeqence than this would be. Probably Swertius has confounded the one with the other. The relation mentioned by Nicolas Antonio, is that of a voyage which Stunica made to Rome in 1520, which Schottus has inſerted in the end of his Spaniſh Bibliotheque. Inſtead of Didacus Stunica, he ſhould have called him Blaiſe Ortiz, for it is he who compoſed a relation of the voyage of Hadrian VI. It was printed at Toledo, in the year 1548. The author went from Spain to Rome with this Pope (51).

[N] He had ..... very little ſatisfaction in his triple crown.] This is ſignified in the inſcription he would have engraven on his tomb; Adrianus VI hic ſitus eſt, qui nihil ſibi infelicius in vita duxit quam quod imperaret —— Here lies Hadrian VI, who eſtemed no misfortune, which happened to him in life, ſo great, as his being called to govern. Father Labbe (52) ſays, this epitaph was put on his tomb in the church of St Mary dell'Anima, but he is miſtaken; the cardinal, who erected him a mauſoleum in this church, put a much longer and more pompous inſcription on it. It is to be ſeen in abundance of authors. The other was only engraven on the tomb where he was proviſionally depoſited in St Peter's church. See Paul Jovius at the end of this Pope's life. We need not wonder that Hadrian VI thought the papal crown ſo heavy, for the general affairs of Chriſtendom were in great confuſion in his pontificate, and he was not ſufficiently acquainted with the genius of the Italians, to avoid offending them in a thouſand inſtances. The news he daily received of the progreſſes and menaces of the Ottomans, and his little experience in the affairs of Italy, ſo diſturbed his head, that he could not forbear ſaying, he had more ſatisfaction in governing a college of Louvain, than in governing the whole Chriſtian church. Neceſſe erat Pontificem rerum Italicarum penitus ignarum, & tum primum urbium ſuarum & provinciarum regulorumque nomina perdiſcentem, in omnibus conſiliis vehementiſſimè conturbari, adeo ut quum his curarum fluctibus jactaretur, aliquando diceret, ſibi fuiſſe jucundius Lovanii gymnaſium cum ſtudiorum laude moderari, quam Romæ pontificia in ſede Chriſtianam rempublicam adminiſtrare (53). If he had not been able to know, of himſelf, that his irreſolutions and delays cauſed miſchief and murmurs, he would occaſion to ſuch a behaviour, as made him paſs for a hater of mankind [O]. The Italians have publiſhed heinous calumnies againſt him [P]; and even they, who inſtead of defaming him in his morals, acknowledge his probity and zeal, fail not to ſay, he was not fit to be Pope [Q]. His very ſobriety has not eſcaped railleries [R]. The joy that was expreſſed for his death, was in reality a great commendation would have known it by the reproaches he received from Ferdinand's ambaſſador, even to his face, who began his ſpeech thus: 'Fabius Maximus, ſanctiſſime 'pater, rem Romanum cunctando reſtituit, tu vero 'pariter cunctando rem Romanam ſimulque Europam 'perdere contendis. —— Moſt holy father, Fabius 'Maximus, by delays, reſtored the affairs of Rome; 'but you, by delays, endeavour to ruin, not only Rome, 'but all Europe.' This exordium ſo confounded the Pope, that as the cardinals hated him, they were ready to break out into laughter (54).

[O] His behaviour made him paſs for a hater of mankind.] Pierius Valerianus (55) makes him a man who avoided human ſociety, and who in the cavalcades kept at as great a diſtance as poſſible from the courtiers; he put ſpurs to his horſe when he ſaw others approach him. To ſee this author's ſatire in all it's extent, we muſt chooſe certain editions, for there are ſome that have been expunged in this particular. That of Baſil, of 1575, is not of this number, as Father Theophilus Raynaud has obſerved (56), who has taken this Pope's part, againſt the humaniſts of that time.

I do not mention the Capitolo of Bernai againſt this Pope; I only ſay, that this paſſage is not to be taken literally:

> Baſta ch'egli hanno fatto un Papa ſanto
> Che dice ogni mattina la ſua Meſſa,
> E non s'el tocca mai ſe non col guanto.
>
> Sufficient 'tis we have got a ſaint for pope,
> Who every morning mutters o'er his maſs,
> And toucheth not himſelf without a glove.

It is a burleſque, familiar, and even a proverbial hyperbole amongſt the Italians, Gli hippocriti, ſays Aretin Giorn. I della II parte, che non ſel toccano mai ſe non col guanto. —— The hypocrites who never touch themſelves but with a glove. I owe this obſervation to Mr de la Monnoie.

[P] The Italians have publiſhed heinous calumnies againſt him.] They were not contented to accuſe him of prodigious avarice, but gave out (57), that they had at laſt diſcovered the reaſon of his retiring every day into a corner of the Vatican, where he ſuffered no body to enter; that it was not like Numa, to conſult heaven how to govern well, but to careſs an handſome woman; his nymph Egeria. They added, that the diſtemper he died of, proceeded from too much uſe of venery (58); and that he was not contented to divert himſelf with women, but alſo muſt have handſome boys (59). This was not all. They publiſhed that he was a magician, and that his friends, deſiring to elude the proofs that were taken from I know not how many magical inſtruments, which were found in his chamber after his death, ſaid, that laboured to find the philoſopher's ſtone. As it could not be denied, that he had the outward appearance of an honeſt man, and was a lover of reformation and juſtice, they ſaved themſelves by ſaying, that he was only a hypocrite; and that this vice is more common in Germany, than is imagined. See, concerning all this, a letter of Chriſtopher Battus, to Jerome Saulius, in the ſecond volume of Wolfius. We read in the ſupplement of the abbot of Urſperg's chronicle (60), that they found amongſt this Pope's ſecret papers, ſome magical books, and that ſome pretend he came to the Papacy by this wicked art.

Note, that Gerard Moringus obſerves, that this honeſt Pope underſtanding that the Italians formed evil ſuſpicions upon his bringing ſome youths from Spain, ſent them immediately back into their own country. 'Si 'quando antea, tum maxime ſpeciem omnem impudi'citiæ amovit. Eoque cum adoleſcentes aliquot ho'neſtæ tum indolis tum ſtirpis in gratiam parentum 'in familiam aſcitos, ex Hiſpaniis ſecum in urbem 'duxiſſet, intellexiſſetque Italos ex convictu illorum, 'neſcio quæ abominanda, noſtratibus inuſitata ſuſpicari, 'ſtatim in Hiſpanias remiſit, in academia Salmanticenſi 'plenius literis imbuendos, quibus antea domi ipſius 'à pio ſimul & erudito viro Theodorico Hezio ſe'cretario ipſius utcumque imbuti fuerant eo jubente '(61). —— If at any time before, he then more par'ticularly removed the ſmalleſt appearances of impurity. 'Therefore, having brought over with him from Spain, 'ſome youths of good parts, as well as of good birth, whom 'he had, at the deſire of their relations, taken into his 'family; and hearing that the Italians took occaſion, 'from this, to ſuſpect I do not know what abominable 'practices, quite unknown to our countrymen, he preſently 'ſent them back to Spain, to finiſh their ſtudies in the 'univerſity of Salamanca, which they had begun, while 'in his family, under the pious and learned Theodoric 'Hezius, his ſecretary.' The ſame writer expreſſes an extream indignation againſt the author of the letter I have quoted, which Wolfius has inſerted in the ſecond volume of his lectures. 'Battus quidam Parmenſis 'quandam de ejus defuncti relicta fama epiſtolam edi'dit, Latinam quidem illam ac terſam, ſed adeo im'pudenter mendacem, ut ipſa mentiendi impudentia, 'dicam an inſcitia, vel apud malevolos fidem ſibi ab'roget. Quid os impurum eo impulerit, nihil eſſe 'aliud reor, quam id quod Comicus habet, Mala mens, 'malus animus (62). —— Battus of Parma publiſhed an 'epiſtle concerning his character, in elegant Latin in'deed, but filled with ſuch notorious falſhoods, that 'the groſſneſs, or ſhall I ſay the folly, of his lies, 'will deprive him of credit even among the moſt mali'cious. I cannot imagine what could tempt him to ſuch 'impudent abuſe, except, as the comic poet has it, 'mala mens malus animus, the wickedneſs of his own 'heart.'

[Q] Even they who acknowledge his zeal, fail not to ſay, that he was not fit to be Pope.] Few will read this place, without perceiving that cardinal Palavicini is pointed at, and thinking of the new goſpel, in which many maxims of his hiſtory of the council of Trent have been ſo ſeverely cenſured. Hadrian VI was, in the cardinal's opinion, an excellent eccleſiaſtic, but an indifferent Pope. Fu Eccleſiaſtico ottimo, Pontefice in verita mediocre (63). He was leſs eſteemed in the opinion even of the people, who judge of things only by the event; for, in conſequence of the bad ſucceſs of his reign, he was reckoned even leſs than an indifferent Pope (64). This honeſt Flemming, not finding in Italy the candour and ſincerity, in which he had been trained up, entered into a general miſtruſt: he believed that ſnares were laid for him every where; he durſt truſt only thoſe of his own country, who, with their openneſs, without experience, did him more injury, than the Italians would have done with their diſſimulation. The Janſeniſt, who wrote the new goſpel, has made a malicious uſe of all cardinal Palavicini's conceſſions concerning the good qualities of this pope; but at the bottom, the cardinal is not ſo much in the wrong, as may be pretended. It is true, if the Chriſtian church was what it ought to be, the ſame virtues which would furniſh out a good clergyman, would ſuffice for a Pope; but (65) in the ſtate in which the church of Rome has long continued, under an head whoſe ſpiritual power is ſo incorporated with the temporal, that the preſervation of the one depends upon that of the other, it is folly to pretend, that a Pope, who underſtands not the arts of courts, and the ſlights of politics, can diſcharge his duty. See the remark [U] of the article BELLARMIN, at the end. To accompliſh the Proteſtants prophecies, there need be but four or five Popes ſucceſſively, ſuch as ſome have been, who were otherwiſe rigid moraliſts. However, it is worth while to ſee Dr de Launoi's letter (66) wherein he makes our Hadrian's apology againſt cardinal Palavicini.

[R] His very ſobriety has not eſcaped railleries.] He was ſo little uſed to the dainties of Rome, that there was no fiſh he preferred before ſtock fiſh; ſo that the price of this fiſh roſe conſiderably in his pontificate, not without the laughter of all the fiſh-market. Inſtead of praiſing him for this, Paul Jovius has had the boldneſs to ſay, that he had no better taſte with reſpect to good diſhes, than judgment for the adminiſtration of affairs. I ſo weaken the force of this author's Latin, that it is neceſſary dation of him [S]. I cannot tell whether they were Catholics or Proteſtants, who gave out firſt that he permitted ſacrifices to be made to the heathen gods, in order to ſtop the peſtilence [T]. Guicciardin has not ſpared him more than others; for he pretends (l) that they who elected this barbarian to the popedom, were led rather by a blind fury, than by choice and deliberation (m); and that being unable to aſſign any reaſon for their extravagant conduct, they excuſed themſelves by imputing it to the Holy Ghost, who was uſed, as they ſaid, to inſpire the cardinals, during the election of the Popes (n). Hadrian's body was depoſited in the Vatican church, betwixt thoſe of Pius II and Pius III, and removed afterwards to St Mary dell' Anima. William Enckevort, the only cardinal he had made, took all the care of it, and neceſſary to tranſcribe it word for word. Modo Merlucciæ plebeio admodum piſci Hadrianus Pontifex, ſicuti in adminiſtranda republica hebetis ingenii vel depravati judicii, ita in eſculentis inſulſiſſimi guſtus ſupra mediocre pretium ridente toto foro piſcario jam fecerat (67). The court of Rome went from one extream to another; for never was there a Pope, whoſe table was ſo delicate, as that of Leo X. Men got into his favour by the invention of ragoos; and there were four nice judges of good eating, who became his minions. They invented a ſort of ſauſage, which aſtoniſhed Hadrian VI, when he examined the expences of his predeceſſor. ‘Mire favit Pogio ſeni Pogii Hiſtorici filio, itemque Moro nobili à gulæ intemperantia . . . . . & Brandino Equiti, Marianoque Sannioni cucullato facetiſſimis helluonibus, & in omni genere popinalium delitiarum eruditiſſimis. Nam inter alia portenta inſanientis eorum gulæ lucanicas conciſis pavonum pulpis farctas commenti fuerant, quod obſonii genus mox ſucceſſor Hadrianus, vir Batavæ frugalitatis, mirabundus expavit, quum ſumptuarias rationes Leonis inſpiceret (68). —— He was wonderfully taken with old Poggius, ſon to the hiſtorian of that name, with Morus a noted Epicure . . . . . Brandini, a knight, and Mariana, a merry monk, who were all good fellows, and nice critics in good eating. For, among other prodigies of their luxury, they invented a ſort of ſauſages ſtuffed with the delicateſt parts of peacocks, which aſtoniſhed his ſucceſſor Hadrian, a man of Dutch frugality, when he looked into the expences of Leo's table.’ For his part, he kept no ſuch uſeleſs officers as thoſe, and was ſo much the reverſe of Leo X, that his charge was not above twelve crowns a day. The Romans ſatirized this great frugality, and ſaid, that the Vatican was grown like thoſe houſes which were deſerted becauſe they were haunted by ſpirits. Familiam adeò ſordidam & exiguam alebat, ut ſumptus quotidianus duodecim aureos non excederet. Quid plura? Vaticana domus non jam domus illa Pontificia, & ocellus urbis ut quondam, ſed domus aliqua, ut poëtæ tradunt, quæ propter lemurum formidinem vacua & deſerta ſit, præ ſolitudine videbatur. Thus ſpeaks Chriſtopher Battus, whom I have cited above. Paul Jovius's words give us to underſtand, that there were ſome people at Rome, who, in complaiſance to this Pope, valued his favourite fiſh. We ſhall ſee, in the article of the chancellor DU PRAT, that this was not the firſt time that great men have brought into faſhion, ſome diſhes which were deſpiſed before. I believe likewiſe, that Hadrian's preference of beer to wine, was no leſs laughed at, than that of the ſtock-fiſh to all other fiſh. His common drink was beer, to which his laſt ſickneſs was attributed. He had a great care of his health, and he dined at ſo conſtant an hour, that he abruptly quitted the moſt important affairs, when he had notice that dinner was ready: but he eat little. Ferunt Hadrianum alioqui vegetæ viridiſque ſenectæ contraxiſſe morbum aſſiduo cerviſiæ potu . . . . Nam per ſe cibi parciſſimus erat, & in tuenda valetudine apprime diligens & moroſus, tanta horarum definitione, ut denunciante Architriclino paratas eſſe epulas, vel maximarum rerum colloquia protinus abrumperet (69).

[S] The joy that was expreſſed for his death was, in reality, a great commendation of him.] Becauſe nothing rendered him more odious than his deſire to put a ſtop to the crying ſins, and to imploy the ſevereſt puniſhments againſt them. The report was, that he was going to publiſh ſome terrible bulls againſt Judaizers, ſcoffers at holy things, Simoniſts, Uſurers, and Sodomites. This laſt article alarmed both the court and city; and ſome young men there, after his death, fixed feſtoons upon his phyſician's gate, with this inſcription in capital letters, TO THE DELIVERER OF THE COUNTRY. Ultimo inquirere punireque decreverat juventutis corruptores, ejus enim criminis non omnino falſa ſuſpicione urbs ipſa conniventibus legibus infecta credebatur. Quâ inopinatâ & gravi ſeveriſſimæ legis mentione, maculoſos quoſdam cum aulæ tum civitatis veluti deſperata publica ſecuritate terruerat, adeo ut non defuerint petulantiſſimi juvenes, qui Joanni Antracino Pontificis Medico poſtes feſta fronde per intempeſtam noctem protinus exornarent, cum titulo uncialibus literis inſcripto in hæc verba, Liberatori Patriæ S.P.Q.R. (70). Could the joy at ſuch a ſovereign's death, be any thing elſe than a proof of his virtue? Paul Jovius relates, that this joy was exceſſively great. ‘Morte ejus plerique & præſertim veteris aulæ ſectatores effuſiſſime ſunt lætati, & ſecundum eos nonnulli Romanorum qui detrimenta rerum ſuarum ſenſerant. —— Moſt people, eſpecially the courtiers of the former Pope, rejoyced exceedingly at his death; and next to them, ſome of the citizens of Rome, who had ſuffered in their particular affairs.

[T] I cannot tell . . . . . who they were, who firſt gave out that he permitted ſacrifices to be made to the heathen gods, in order to ſtop the peſtilence.] I have not yet had time to proceed far in the ſearch of the original of this lye. I have only traced it to a book printed at Amſterdam, in 1661 (71), wherein are theſe words. ‘Is (Adrianus VI.) ad avertendam peſtem quæ graviſſime in urbe ſæviebat, Mago Demetrio Græco conceſſit ſylveſtrem taurum Diis Gentilium ad placandam eorum iram mactare, ceſſavitque lues. —— Hadrian, in order to avert a plague which then raged violently in the city, allowed Demetrius, a Greek magician, to ſacrifice a wild bull to the heathen deities, to appeaſe their wrath, and accordingly the plague ceaſed.’ The author cites Paul Jovius in the twenty firſt book of his hiſtory; but we muſt believe in charity, and for his honour, that he had not read this hiſtorian. Let us ſee what Paul Jovius ſays; the paſſage deſerves relating. He only ſays, that the Pope did not ſeverely forbid the communication with the infected houſes, and that this method, which was very different from the cuſtoms of Italy, occaſioned the death of abundance of people. He is not ſaid to have given leave to the magician to make this ſacrifice; it is only ſaid in general, that no body durſt oppoſe the populace, who favoured this Demetrius: beſides, it is not ſaid that this man pretended to ſacrifice the bull to the heathen Gods; and as to the ſucceſs, it is only ſaid, the plague decreaſed. What then do they think of, who cite Paul Jovius, when they vent ſo many circumſtances which he has not mentioned? ‘Exorta eſt in Urbe peſtilentiæ lues, quæ quum ſeveris legibus more noſtro Pontifici minime coërcenda videretur, contactu ægrorum ita exarſit, ut multa funera in compitis viſerentur, appareretque vaſtari Urbem, haud multo dierum ſpatio, niſi Græculus quidam nomine Demetrius Spartanus, ſedandæ peſtilentiæ, faventi ei turba hominum, negotium ſuſcepiſſet, nemine ſuperſtitionem vetare auſo. Nam ferum taurum, cui dimidium cornu diſſecarat, magico carmine dextram in aurem prolato repente ita manſuefactum reddiderat, ut injecto tenui filo ad integrum cornu, quo vellet perducens, peſtilentiæ placando numini ad Amphitheatrum immolaret. Nec credulæ multitudinis ſpem ex toto fefellit, quum ab ea inanis ſacrificii proſpera litatione, miteſcere morbus cœpiſſet (72). —— The plague broke out in the city, and the Pope not thinking it proper to confine the infected, by ſevere laws, according to the cuſtom of Italy, it raged ſo, by the touching of the ſick, that the ſtreets were crouded with funerals, and it ſeemed as if the city would have been laid waſte in a very few days, if one Demetrius Spartianus, a Greek, had not undertaken to ſtop the peſtilence, who, being favoured by the populace, no body durſt oppoſe his ſuperſtition.

and erected a ſtately monument to him (o). Let it not be forgotten, that this Pope was an author [U]. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that a man who owed his advancement to his learning, ſo little countenanced men of letters [X]. He did not diſſemble the great abuſes he obſerved in the church; he publickly acknowledged them, and that in a very ſtrong manner, in the inſtruction he gave the nuncio who was to ſpeak in his name at the Diet of Nuremberg [Y]. He therein deplored the ſad life of the clergy, and the corruption of morals which had appeared in ‘ſuperſtition. He took a wild bull, and having cut the half of one of his horns in two, by repeating ſome magical verſes in his right ear, he became preſently ſo tame, that leading him about at pleaſure, by a ſlender thread, which he tied about his entire horn, he ſacrificed him at the Amphitheatre to appeaſe the deity. Neither did he entirely beguile the hopes of the credulous multitude, for from the time of this vain ſacrifice, the plague began to aſſuage.’

[U] Let us not forget that this Pope was an author.] His Quæſtiones and Expoſitiones upon the fourth book of the Maſter of the Sentences, were printed at Paris in folio, in the year 1512, and in 1516 (73), and his Quæſtiones quodlibeticæ duodecim, at Louvain, in octavo, in 1515, and at Paris in folio, the year following. During his ſtay in Spain, he compoſed Computum hominis agonizantis, & Sermonem de ſacculo pertuſo. After his pontificate, he publiſhed Regulas Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ, and writ many letters to the princes of Germany, &c. which were printed with the Councils, or elſewhere.

I have ſomething to obſerve concerning his work upon the Maſter of the Sencences. The Sieur Konig (74), deceived by their ambiguity, who have ſaid in IV ſententiarum quæſtiones & expoſitiones (75), affirms, that our Hadrian publiſhed queſtions on the four books of the ſentences. Here is a new proof of what is ſaid in the firſt remark of this article, that an author cannot be ever ſo little unexact but he throws another into falſhood. Would it not have been better to have ſaid in quartum ſententiarum, or in IV librum ſententiarum, than to uſe the number IV, which ſignifies as well Quatuor as Quartos. Father Oldoini (76) has committed the ſame error as the Sieur Konig. Mr Varillas deſerves to be heard concerning this book of Hadrian: his commentary, ſays he (77), upon the Maſter of the Sentences, was admired, and certainly if this book was not the ſubtleſt of three hundred of the ſame nature, which were then to be found in the libraries; it was at leaſt the cleareſt and moſt methodical. The author had maintained (78) in the moſt deciſive manner imaginable, that it was certain the Pope might err even in matters belonging to faith, and it is pretended he did not change his opinion when he was Pope, as did Pius II, for he altered nothing in this part of his book, in the edition of it which was printed at Rome, during his pontificate.

[X] It is ſtrange .... that he ſo little countenanced men of letters.] We have ſeen, in the remark [D], his notions of the poets. This might more eaſily be pardoned him than the ſinking the funds which had been imployed for the maintenance of learned men, who came from Greece into Italy, to whom the weſt is indebted for the reſurrecton of polite learning. Cardinal Beſſarion maintained at Rome, part of theſe great genius's, and eſtabliſhed an academy for them in the Vatican. But the greateſt number ſubſiſted upon the bounties of Pope Nicolas V. . . . . (79) Of all his ſucceſſors, there was none but Hadrian VI who ſuppreſſed theſe gratifications, by an oeconomy which doth no honour to his memory (80). Let us ſee the obſervation of another author (81). ‘All the learned of his time promiſed themſelves advancement on his coming to the pontificate, becauſe he owed all his fortune and exaltation to learning. And therefore they could not but be aſtoniſhed to ſee him ſo ill diſpoſed towards all who delighted in polite literature, calling them Terentianos, and treating them in ſuch a manner, that it was thought he would have brought in barbariſm again, had he not died in the ſecond year of his ſupream dignity. Paul Jovius ingeniouſly ſays *, that he thus ill treated the wits of his age, with the ſame ſenſe and judgment, as he preferred the Dutch ſtock-fiſh, before all other diſhes, and the beſt fiſh in Italy.’ Paul Jovius does not ſay this See his text in the remark [R]. The reader will be glad to know where la Mothe le Vayer has taken what he ſays; for that reaſon I ſhall give a fine paſſage here, of Pierius Valerianus. ‘Fuit & ſub Hadriano VI par bonarum omnium litteratum infortunium. Nam cùm is Leoni Decimo ſuffectus eſſet, ad quem utpote litterarum Principem magnus litteratorum numerus confluxerat, dum non minora de Hadriano ſibi quiſque pollicetur, ecce adeſt muſarum & eloquentiæ, totiuſque nitoris hoſtis acerrimus, qui litteratis omnibus inimicitias minitaretur, quoniam ut ipſe dictitabat, Terentiani eſſent, quos cùm odiſſe, atque etiam perſequi cœpiſſet, voluntarium alii exilium, alias atque alias alii latebras quærentes, tamdiu latuere, quoad Dei beneficio altero Imperii anno deceſſit, qui ſi aliquanto diutius vixiſſet, Gottica illa tempora adverſus bonas literas videbatur ſuſcitaturus (82). —— Learning laboured under the ſame misfortune, under Hadrian VI. For he having ſucceeded to Leo X; to whom, as to the great protector of learning, a great many learned men had flocked, and they expected no leſs favour from Hadrian; but he, on the contrary, proved a violent enemy to poetry, eloquence, and all polite learning; and threatened all ſcholars with his diſpleaſure, becauſe of their being Terentiani, as he called them. They therefore being thus hated, and ſome of them perſecuted by him, retired, ſome into a voluntary baniſhment, others into ſuch retirements as they could find; where they continued till, by the goodneſs of GOD, he died in the ſecond year of his Pontificate, who, if he had lived a little longer, would probably have plunged us again into Gothic barbarity and ignorance.’

[Y] He acknowledged the abuſes . . . . . in a very ſtrong manner, in the inſtruction he gave to the Nuncio, who was to ſpeak . . . . . . at the Diet of Neuremberg.] This Nuncio's name was Francis Cheregat. This was a part of his inſtruction. ‘Dices nos ingenuè fateri, quod Deus hanc perſecutionem à Lutheranis illatam, eccleſiæ ſuæ inferri permittit, propter peccata hominum, ſacerdotum maximè, & eccleſiæ prælatorum. Clamant ſcripturæ peccata populi derivari à peccatis ſacerdotum, proptereaque, ut ait Chryſoſtomus, Salvator noſter curaturus infirmam civitatem Jeruſalem, ingreſſus eſt priùs templum ut peccata ſacerdotum primò caſtigaret, inſtar boni medici, qui morbum à radice curat. Scimus in hac ſancta ſede aliquot jam annis multa abominanda fuiſſe, abuſus in ſpiritualibus, exceſſus in mandatis, & omnia denique in perverſum mutata, nec mirum, ſi ægritudo à capite in membra, à ſummis Pontificibus in alios inferiores prælatos deſcendit. Omnes nos prælati, videlicet eccleſiaſtici declinavimus, unuſquiſque in vias ſuas, nec fuit jam diu qui faceret bonum, non fuit uſque ad unum. —— You ſhall acquaint them that we ingenuouſly own, that GOD has ſuffered his church to be perſecuted by the Lutherans, becauſe of the ſins of men, eſpecially of the prieſts and prelates of the church. The ſcriptures teſtify, that the ſins of the people proceed from the ſins of the prieſts. For this reaſon St Chryſoſtom obſerves, that when our Saviour was about to cure the city of Jeruſalem of it's diſeaſes; he firſt of all went into the temple, that he might firſt chaſtiſe the ſins of the prieſts, like a good phyſician, who ſtrikes at the root of the diſtemper. We are ſenſible that for ſome years paſt, there have been many abominations in this holy ſee, abuſes in ſpirituals, exceſſes in mandates, and, in fine, every thing changed to the worſe; and it is not to be admired, if the diſeaſe has deſcended from the head to the members, from the Pontiffs to the inferior prelates. All we prelates, I mean eccleſiaſtic, have gone aſtray, every one into his own in the perſons of ſome Popes. He had long wiſhed to introduce among the clergy, a reformation of manners. He had laboured to effect this, whilſt he was dean of St Peter's at Louvain, but the fruitleſſneſs of his pains had obliged him to deſiſt from his enterprize [Z]. The juſteſt cenſure which can be made of him, is his contradicting the good rules he had given againſt the purality of benefices [AA]. Note, that when he canonized ‘ paths, and there has not been one for a long time ‘ who has done good, no not one.’ A Proteſtant writer imagines, that the cardinals ſo ſtrongly reſented this Pope's diſhonouring the court of Rome in this manner, in the diet of the empire, and burning a man for the crime of beaſtiality, that they ſhortened this Pope's life. Nec tamen tam fœlicibus ad perfectum Papatum rudimentis profecit, quo minus illi purpuratæ Partæ offenſæ, quòd comitiis Noribergenſibus dedecoraſſet rem Romanam, & quòd quendam jumento ſuo pro ſuo arbitatu uſum, homo Batavus & ad Papalem venerem frigidus, cremaſſet: filum illud diu regnandi, & videndi, abrumperent (83).

[Z] He had laboured to bring about a reformation of manners, whilſt he was dean, but the fruitleſſneſs of his pains made him deſiſt from his enterprize.] As ſoon as he was raiſed to the deanry of St Peter's at Louvain, which is a very conſiderable preferment, with fine privileges annexed, he ſet himſelf more than ever to preach by his own example; knowing that his endeavours to bring his colleagues into the right way, would be more effectual, if he himſelf practiſed the duties of temperance. He perſiſted to live frugally; there was more neatneſs than magnificence at his table; and when he entertained, he preſſed no body to drink, and never began thoſe healths which oblige the company to drink round. Neither did he ſuffer any perſon to begin any ſuch healths to him; he ſet himſelf above all this pretended German civility. His feaſts laſted but an hour, and he cauſed ſome piece of ſcripture to be read part of the time: he would have had it read during all the meal, but for fear of diſguſting ſome of his gueſts. Neque temere ultra horam accumbebat, etiamſi convivas magnos haberet, atque interim fere adhibito lectore, qui aliquid e literis ſacris recitaret, ut non minus mente, quam ventre convivæ delectarentur, ſed id tantum ad tempus ne lectio longior cuiquam fortaſſis moleſtiæ eſſet (84). He alſo continued a very chaſt life: There was nothing of wantonneſs in his geſtures or diſcourſes: nor would he ſuffer any obſcene words in his preſence; though otherwiſe he delighted in a virtuous facetiouſneſs. Nor did he only abſtain from all actual impurities, but carefully avoided the appearances and ſuſpicions of it. He particularly made it his duty to poſſeſs his colleagues with the ſame practical morality. He vehemently exhorted them to it, in the diſcourſes he made at the chapter meetings, and ſharply cenſured ſuch as he knew addicted to drinking and gaming, and eſpecially thoſe who kept concubines (85), omitting nothing that could oblige them to refrain from that evil commerce. But he met with ſo many obſtacles, becauſe ſome of the more aged and potent oppoſed his deſign, that he renounced it. His zeal had like to have coſt him his life; he had been poiſoned, if his phyſician had not found a good antidote againſt arſenic. It was thought this was done by a canon's concubine, were he was invited to dinner. Sed in re longe honeſtiſſima tantum difficultatis habuit, obnitentibus quibuſdam è ſenioribus ac potentioribus, & præſertim non ſuppetente auxilio, ſine quo hujuſmodi non temerè confici queunt, ut negotium magna ex parte infectum relinquere debuerit. Quinimo parum abfuit, quin per eam ipſam cauſam, veneno perierit. Id concubina unius e Canonicis, a quo ad prandium vocatus erat, boluſculo ejus, quod primum omnium menſæ inferri ſolenne eſt, indidiſſe putabatur (86). When he ſaw there was no hope of reformation, and that his endeavours procured him many enemies, he totally deſiſted and declared, that the deans of chapters were much leſs reſponſible for theſe diſorders, than the biſhops, for the deans were obliged to receive thoſe whoſe corruption was grown inveterate. But nothing obliged the biſhops, or their vicars, to confer orders and benefices, as they did, upon infamous debauchees. Dum ſpem nullam fructus conſpiceret, nihilque aliud ſibi quam odium & malevolentiam quæri intelligeret, in totum conatu ſuſperſedit, ſatis habens, ſignificaſſe ſibi diſplicere, poſtquam aliud præterea non poſſet, prædicans tamen culpam eam non tam Decanis Collegiorum, qui jam obſtinatos & in ſordibus illis inveteratos exciperent, quam Epiſcopis, eorumque vicariis præſtandam, qui quoſcunque ſine delectu, quantumvis probroſos & infames, ad ordines & beneficia admitterent; nulla aut exigua, in retroactam vitam inquiſitione facta (87). All this is taken from a book written by a prieſt. Let it not then be objected, that theſe are ſlanders of Proteſtants.

It is certain, that the dean ſhewed the true cauſe of the evil: the negligence of the biſhops, or their vicars, was the ſcource of the diſorder. They did not examine whether they, who were admitted to benefices, had lived well, and given good proofs of a conſtitution which could abſtain from bodily pleaſures. This want of enquiry was a gate through which abundance entered into the church, who were already bent towards ſenſuality: a bent which is difficultly rectified, which gathers ſtrength continually, till it grows into habit, an almoſt incurable diſeaſe. You ſee then why our Hadrian's exhortations could have no effect upon canons long practiſed in drunkenneſs, and the pleaſures of concubinage. They were ſo beſotted with this courſe of life, that they could not imagine how it was poſſible to live without it. It is infinitely harder to perſuade a bachelor of forty five or fifty years to marriage, than a widower of ſixty, who has juſt loſt his wife: ſo great is the power of cuſtom. The concubine, on her part, finds it as hard to part with her canon, after having been ſo many years at bed and board with him. Where ſhall I go, ſays ſhe, what ſhall I do? where ſhall I find ſo good a bed, ſo good a table, ſo good a fire? and therefore you will find her, and her companions, very ready to oppoſe the deſigns of a reformer. The dean of Louvain needed a more undaunted courage; for the poiſon of theſe concubines was as formidable as the dagger of an aſſaſſin. Not finding he had any call to martyrdom, he choſe rather to leave things as they were, than to expoſe himſelf to hatred, and even death, by going to reform them. In magnis voluiſſe ſat eſt, was doubtleſs his maxim.

[AA] He may be juſtly reproached with having contradicted the good rules he had given . . . . . againſt the plurality of benefices.] When he was only profeſſor of Louvain, he maintained, that this plurality was vicious; and that a man, who had once gotten a living that was ſufficient to maintain him handſomely, ought to be content with it, and ſtop there. But when he was at the the arch-duke of Auſtria's court, he accepted many preferments, and forgot his former doctrine. This inconſtancy gave ſcandal to ſome people. Honores & ſacerdotia quædam magnifica acceſſere, non ſine admiratione, & fortaſſis offenſione aliquorum, qui eum diverſum facere incuſabant, atque aliquando docuiſſet. Docuiſſe quippe, non eſſe fas cuiquam multa habere beneficia, ſed uno aliquo ad honeſtam mundamque ſuſtentationem vitæ ſufficiente, quietum ac contentum eſſe debere (88). The author I borrow theſe words from, declares he will not examine whether this conduct was cenſured juſtly or unjuſtly (89); but yet he undertakes to juſtify it, and uſes the moſt plauſible arguments which can be offered upon ſuch a ſubject. He ſays, amongſt other things, that it ſhould not be thought ſtrange, that Hadrian thought that lawful in himſelf, which would have been unlawful in others, who had not the ſame extraordinary qualities, or poſts at court, that he had. The great talents that God has given a prieſt, are much more ſerviceable to the church, when they are accompanied with a large revenue; and it cannot be denied, but that an eccleſiaſtic, who has employments at court, is neceſſarily obliged to greater expences. The author adds to this, many other arguments of the ſame nature, and which have all the fault of being fit to be employed in an apology for the caſuiſts, like that of Father Pirot. I mean, they may ſerve to juſtify thoſe, who being in great poſts, heap all the vacant places upon their own heads. May not it be ſaid on their behalf, that they will make a better uſe of them than others, and that they are neceſſary for them, that their great qualities may have liberty to act in their whole extent, for the profit and advantage of the ſtate. The author adds, that it is falſe, that Ha-canonized Antoninus and Benno, he did not ſuffer the expences which were uſual in ſuch ſort of ceremonies, fobidding them as a thing repugnant to the ſanctity of canonization (q). A learned Jeſuit was cenſured for having cited this fact [BB]. This Pope's ſucceſſors, were of another opinion; they have tolerated worldly pomp in canonizations, to that exceſs as to offend the vulgar by it [CC].

drian oppoſed the plurality of benefices, either in his books or lectures. He has rather countenanced it, continues he, as appears by his commentary upon Lombard. Neque vero ipſe Hadrianus uſquam diverſum aut docuit, aut ſcripſit, ut ei falſo intendunt, ſed potius contra. Legat eum qui velit, in quartum Petri Lombardi ſcribentem, ubi de reſtitutione agens, quæſtionem illam ex profeſſo differit (90). All that this author mentions afterwards from this commentary, is not much to his purpoſe. If what he pretends might be inferred from it, it would only be by an oblique and very indirect conſequence; and he ſays nothing of the quodlibetic oration, that it is affirmed Hadrian printed againſt the plurality of benefices. We will cite a Proteſtant writer, who tells us the anſwer this Pope made to thoſe that asked him why he did not remove a corruption, which he had ſo well condemned. ‘ Imò cùm Lovanii olim edidiſſet Quodlibeticam Orationem contra pluralitatem beneficiorum, monentibus ‘ cur ipſe qui jam poteſtatem tollendi haberet, quod ‘ antè reprehendere tantum potuiſſet, omnia beneficia ‘ maximè ex Inferiore Germania ſupplicantibus intercíperet, reſpondit: cum parvuli eſſemus loquebamur, ſapiebamus, faciebamus ut parvuli: nunc autem poſtquam viri facti ſumus, reliquimus ea quæ ‘ ſunt parvuli. Sic homo Trajecti non ſolum ex ‘ viliſſimis parentibus ortus, verum etiam uſque ad ‘ ipſum magiſterium, mendicitate, & eleemoſinariis ‘ ſumtibus educatus, ad inſuetæ fortunæ pruritum ‘ exiliit, ſic in illa ſede promovit, hanc reformationem ‘ promiſit (91). —— He having long before publiſhed ‘ at Louvain a quodlibetical oration againſt plurality of benefices, ſome took the liberty to ask him, why he, who ‘ now had the power of removing that abuſe, which before he could only condemn, did now himſelf lay hold ‘ on all the vacant benefices, eſpecially in the Low-Countries, he anſwered, when I was a child, I ſpake as a ‘ child, I thought as a child, and acted as a child, but ‘ when I became a man, I put away childiſh things. ‘ In this manner, that man born at Utrecht, of mean parents, and who, till he arrived at the degree of maſter ‘ of arts, was maintained by the charity of others, was ‘ ſwelled with his uncommon fortune, and thus when he ‘ arrived at the Papal chair did he promote this promiſed reformation.’ I imagine, the Walloon miniſter I am going to cite, took the following reflexion from this Latin (92): ‘ Pope Hadrian VI, preceded him. ‘ There were ſome who wondered to ſee him act a‑ ‘ gainſt a certain oration he had made at Louvain, being there Magiſter Noſter, diſapproving the multiplicity of benefices, and their crouding them under one ‘ hat: when, being Pope, he did the ſame thing, eſpecially with reſpect to the benefices in the Netherlands. He anſwered them in the words of St Paul, ‘ When I was a child, I ſpake as a child, &c. 1 Cor. ‘ 13.’ Mention is made of this, in the News from the Republic of Letters, 1684 (93).

[BB] He prohibited the expences . . . . of canonization. A learned Jeſuit was cenſured for having cited this fact.] He found himſelf publickly accuſed of maintaining, that the charges of canonization are contrary to the purity and holineſs of this act. His accuſer's name was Sebaſtian of St Paul; he had been divinity profeſſor at Louvain, and twice provincial of the Carmelites in the Netherlands. Obſerve how this Jeſuit defended himſelf. He ſaid (94), that he only reported what he had read in Blaſius Ortizius, canon of Toledo, and a domeſtic of Hadrian VI. II. That having cited this in Italic, and named his author, he had reaſon to complain of being calumniated by his critic, who has ſuppreſſed theſe circumſtances; for an accuſation is not only unjuſt, when it affirms a falſhood, but alſo when it conceals the truth. An ignoras certam eſſe apud Theologos ſententiam, quod accuſatio eſſe poſſit graviter injuſta, non tantum ex falſi impoſitione, ſed etiam ex reticentia veri (95). III. That from his alledging a thing as glorious to Hadrian VI, it does not thence follow, that he taxes the other Popes with error, who approve or appoint the great expences of canonization. IV. That he praiſed Hadrian as a pontiff moved with an honeſt zeal, and acting according to the inſtincts of conſcience, of which we may, and on many occaſions ought, to follow the innocent error (96). V. That he did not give his approbation to Hadrian's motive, which was, that theſe expences were repugnant to the purity and holineſs of canonization. VI. That he doubts not but they are founded upon many weighty reaſons. VII. That Hadrian VI might err in that point as a private doctor, without prejudice to the infallibility of Popes pronouncing ex cathedra. VIII. That Baronius relates ſome much more notable errors of ſome Popes without being obnoxious, to be accuſed of injuring the holy apoſtolic ſee.

Who doth not here ſee the fatal marks of pre-engagement? A Roman Catholic is a true ſlave in his judgment: there are a thouſand inſtances in which he cannot commend good actions. Can any thing be more ſelf-evident than that Hadrian VI merits approbation both for what he did, and for the reaſon why he did it? And yet here is a Jeſuit, who not being able to praiſe him without indirectly cenſuring the other Popes, is forced to tread upon thorns in juſtifying himſelf; nor can he get off but by ſuppoſing our Hadrian in an error, but that his errors, being accompanied with a good intention, excuſe him. This is all the glory a Pope can promiſe himſelf, who ſets up to reform corruptions. He ſhall be excuſed for the errors of his conſcience, and be ſaid to have erred, not as a Pope, but as a private doctor. Great goodneſs indeed.

[CC] . . . His ſucceſſors have allowed them to that exceſs as to offend the vulgar by it.] Every body was ſcandalized in Paris, in 1622, to ſee the pomp wherewith the barefooted Carmelites celebrated the canonization of St Thereſa. There came out the ſame year a little book, wherein it is feigned the good women murmured very much. One of them complains that ſhe was burnt there. Pray, couſin, ſays a young married woman, was you at this fire? For my part, I never ſaw ſuch diſorder, nor ſo much miſchief; one of my brothers too had his whole face deſtroyed, and there is no likelihood of his recovery. But to what purpoſe are all theſe ſuperfluities, ſays a toothleſs old woman? In my younger days I never heard of canonizing ſaints in this faſhion, it is rather canonading than canonizing. Softly, ſoftly, aunt, ſays a merchant's wife of St Denis's ſtreet, a great deal more has been done at Rome. Theſe are public rejoicings; there is no danger ſometimes in ſuperfluities, when we are induced to them by a pure and ſincere affection; and beſides, what the Carmelites have done, was by the command of the queen, who has ſupplied this expence, becauſe St Thereſa was a native of Spain. No matter for that, ſays a citizen's wife, living near Saint Leu, GOD has been a thouſand times more offended than honoured by it; and I promiſe you, I do not at all approve of theſe things: how many maids do you think have been run away with? All the corn round about is beaten down and burnt: they have taken the month of Auguſt for it, rather than July. For my part, ſays an advocate's wife of the great council, I would have been of opinion, that all theſe ſuperfluities ſhould go to the adorning their church, at leaſt it would have remained there for them, and they would have been more eſteemed for it, and not to evaporate ſo much wealth into ſmoak, this would have kindled the fire of devotion in the hearts of thoſe who came to viſit them; whereas, on the contrary, all the air and fields round about have been ſet on fire with there fuſees: I had a ruff of five ſtories utterly ſpoiled: beſides, if the fire had been lighted at eight of the clock, ſo many cloaks had not been loſt; all the ſcholars were there in arms (97). After all, it muſt be ſaid here, as on many other occaſions, there is nothing but is good for ſomething or other; the greateſt abuſes have a fair ſide. If canonizations could be made without vaſt expences, they would be more common: it is well that the impoſſibility of ſupplying the expence is a barrier to the greedineſs of the monaſtic orders. Subjects of canonization would not be wanting; every community would have as many of them as the others; and if the charge was but little, the other engines would eaſily be prepared.

HADRIAN.

HADRIAN (CORNELIUS DE), in Dutch Hadrianſen (a), a famous Dutch preacher in the XVIth Century, was of Dort: he became a Franciſcan, and was guardian of the convent, and lecturer of divinity (b). He underſtood Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, well, and publickly taught theſe three languages (c). He preached thirty years at Bruges, and never was concerned at the ſlanders which were publiſhed againſt him. He died at Bruges, at ſixty years of age, the fourteenth of July, 1581. He compoſed a treatiſe concerning the ſeven ſacraments. John Lernutius had ſeen in manuſcript many very learned ſermons of this friar (d). The works which came out under his name, after his death, were mixed with buffoonry, and immodeſt jeſts. Sanders pretends, that the heretics foiſted them in, to defame the memory of this good and innocent monk (e). He ought to have proved this, or not to have ſaid it. The Proteſtants ſpeak of this Franciſcan, as of a violent declaimer (f); and there are books which ſay that, he had introduced among women, a new ſort of devotion, which was, that he appointed them certain days, in which they were to ſtrip themſelves ſtark naked before him [A], that he might give them a gentle diſcipline for the expiation of their faults (g). There is nothing that theſe people are not able to perſuade women to, under the ſpecious pretence of devotion [B], when they have the talent of prating, and are celebrated for their preaching. I have read ſomewhere, that George Caſſander, who taught the Belles Lettres at Bruges, whilſt Cornelius de Hadrian taught divinity there, found himſelf obliged, in the year 1554, to baniſh himſelf [C], in order to avoid the calumnies of this colleague.

[A] His devotees were to ſtrip themſelves ſtark naked before him.] If Gyges's maxim were true, that a woman diveſts herſelf of her modeſty with her cloaths (1), our Hadrian's affairs had been in a good caſe, ſuppoſing him not to have been viſionary enough to fancy, that his giving ſome laſhes to the naked bodies of the penitents, would have a ſingular virtue to expiate their ſins. The world is ſo ready to conſtrue things perverſly, that there are few who will attribute the conduct of this friar, to any other principle than what ſomebody calls an inquiſitiveneſs into the pleaſures of others. Ἔοικε ἤ τε μοιχεία, πολυπραγμοσύνη τῆς ἀλλοτρίας ἡδονῆς εἶναι, καὶ ζήτησις καὶ ἔρευνα τῶν φυλαττομένων καὶ λανθανόντων τοὺς πολλούς. Videtur adulterium curioſa in alterius voluptatem eſſe inquiſitio eorumque indagatio, quæ abſconduntur & pleroſque latent (2). ——— A curious prying into other peoples pleaſures, and breaking in upon their ſecrecy, ſeems to be a ſort of adultery. If it were true, as ſome learned men have affirmed (3), that in the primitive church, thoſe who were baptized, of what age or ſex ſoever, were as naked as they came into the world, one might better apprehend how this man, by his fine tongue, and great airs of piety, might bring his devotees to his ends. The ſacrament of penance, ſaid he perhaps to them, ought to be adminiſtred as baptiſm formerly was; the puniſhment of the laſh, to which I condemn you, makes part of this ſacrament; therefore, &c. Meteren (4) relates ſo fully, and with ſo many circumſtances, what concerns the devotees of this friar, that one may believe it to be true.

Henry Stephens tells a ſtory that has ſome relation to this. ‘ They went ſo far, ſays he (5), as to require ‘ (as I have read it) that they ſhould be allowed in confeſſion to handle the parts which have been the inſtruments of the ſin that is confeſt. And one of them ‘ who made that requeſt, being told by a biſhop that ‘ it would be a ſhameful thing, if men and women ‘ were obliged to ſhew them their privy-parts; he anſwered, that if a confeſſor may honeſtly conſider ‘ with the eyes of the mind, (which are much more ‘ precious than thoſe of the body) not only the members that have committed filthy actions, but alſo the ‘ very filthineſs committed by them, which are diſcovered to him in confeſſion; much leſs ought it to be ‘ thought an immodeſt thing to look upon thoſe very ‘ members with the eyes of the body.’ He further alledged, ‘ that a confeſſor, being a ſpiritual phyſician, ‘ ought to feel his patient, as the phyſician of the ‘ body feels and handles his patient. And mixing ‘ ſome blaſphemies and prophanations with his jeſting ‘ diſcourſe, he brought in theſe words of our Lord, ‘ Go, and ſhew thyſelf to the prieſt, as if it had been ‘ the cuſtom to ſtrip, and ſhew themſelves naked to ‘ the prieſt.’

Dr Boileau mentions what concerns our Hadrian. Inter exempla, ſays he (6), tam infauſtæ notitiæ recenſere non pertimeſcam, Hiſtoriam hominis cucullati & cordigeri conventus Brugenſis anno circiter MDLXVI cui nomen erat Cornelio Adriaſem (7) origine Dordracenſis, adverſus hæreticos Guezios ſtomachoſiſſimi concionatoris; qui puellas ceu fœminas quaſdam Sacramento fidelitatis & obedientiæ ſibi adſtrictas & ſpecie pietatis devotas non quidem aſperatis & nodoſis funibus verberabat, ſed nudata earum femora, & nates inhoneſtis vibicibus rorantes virgis betuleis aut vimineis ictibus molliter inflictis perfricabat, uti refert Emanuel Meteren Hiſtoriæ Belgicæ fol. cliij. & cliv. edit. Amſtelodamenſis ann. 1570 (8). Theſe words are to be found in his curious Hiſtoria Flagellantium. The French tranſlator has not underſtood them; for he tranſlates them as follows: ‘ Amongſt all theſe woeful examples of rigid ‘ piety, I ſhall venture to report, on the teſtimony of ‘ Meteren *, a ſtory of a Franciſcan of a convent at ‘ Bruges, called Cornelius Adriaſem, originally of Dort, ‘ who lived about the year 1566, and was a violent ‘ preacher againſt the Heretics, called Gueux: This ‘ monk had ſome girls and married women, who, ‘ under the appearance of religion, and under the oath ‘ of fidelity and obedience, were ſo devoted to him, ‘ that he was not ſatisfied with beating them with ‘ cords, with large knots; but beſides, he gently whipt ‘ their thighs and naked hips, with rods of oſier, or ‘ birch.’ The Latin paſſage is ſo far from ſaying that this monk made uſe of cords with large knots, that the contrary is evident from it.

[B] There is nothing but theſe people are able to perſwade women to, under pretence of devotion.] I have ſpoken elſewhere of the great docility of the ſex. See the remarks of the articles FRATRICELLI and GUILLEMETE.

[C] George Caſſander . . . found himſelf obliged . . . to baniſh himſelf.] The paſſage which I am going to quote, as a proof of this, contains a parentheſis, which concerns the whipping I ſpoke of above. ‘ Quum ‘ ante annos circiter XL (they are the words of Vulcanius, in an epiſtle dedicatory, dated from Leyden, on new-years-day, 1595) (9) Georgius Caſſander vir doctiſſimus Brugis Flandrorum communi utriuſque noſtrûm ‘ patria publicum bonarum literarum profeſſorem agens, ‘ ut collegæ cujuſdam ſui qui ſacras ibidem literas docebat, (illius inquam furioſi Theologi, à quo poſtea ‘ cùm ſe in Seraphicam familiam dediſſet, famoſa illa ‘ Gynopygica diſciplina Cornelianæ nomen invenit) calumniis cederet, voluntarium ſibi ipſi exilium indixiſſet. —— When about forty years ago, the learned ‘ George Caſſander, who publickly taught the Belles ‘ Lettres at Bruges in Flanders, our common country, ‘ went into a voluntary baniſhment, that he might avoid ‘ the calumnies of one of his colleagues, who taught divinity there; I mean that furious divine, from whom, ‘ after he had entered into the Seraphic tribe, the famous ſtripping diſcipline, got the name of the Cornelian.’

HAY, a family of Scotland. It owes the beginning of it's nobility to a very famous action. It is ſaid, that the Danes having invaded Scotland in the reign of Kenneth III, about the year 980, a battle was fought betwixt them and the Scots in which the latter being put to flight, retired towards Perth. They were obliged to paſs through a very narrow way, betwixt the mountains and the river Tay. A countryman, with his two ſons, who happened to be there, all men of undaunted courage, made himſelf maſter of the defile, exhorted the fliers to make head againſt the enemy and ſtopt the paſſage againſt thoſe who endeavoured to continue their flight. He did more, he armed himſelf with what came next to his hands, and followed by his two ſons, who were armed with a piece of their plough, he fell with ſuch fury upon the Danes, and ſo encouraged the fliers by his example, that victory declared for the Scots. The enemy was put to flight in his turn, and Scotland was preſerved from the ſlavery the Danes had deſigned to reduce it to. This peaſant, known afterwards by the name of HAY, was the founder of the family I ſpeak of. He and his two ſons ſignalized themſelves in an extraordinary manner in the fight; they cauſed a great conſternation, and made a great ſlaughter wherever they fought. This noble action which ſaved their country, met with a ſuitable recompenſe [A], and ſince that time this family has been one of the moſt eminent of the kingdom. It has produced ſeveral branches [B], and many perſons of great merit [C]. The earl of Errol is at preſent the head of it. He is married to Anne Drummond, ſiſter to the earl of Perth (a).

[A] This noble action . . . met with a ſuitable recompenſe.] HAY was conducted by all the army to the king's palace, and received in the meeting of parliament the higheſt degree of nobility. The king gave him a conſiderable part of the enemies ſpoils, and the flight of a falcon in good lands: that is, a falcon was let looſe, and notice taken where he perched, and all the lands ſituate betwixt his riſe and the place where he reſted, were given to Hay. The place where he ſtopped, is ſtill called Falcon-Stone. By this means Hay was poſſeſſed of the moſt fertile ſoil in Scotland, ſituate where the battle was fought, along the river Tay. King Kenneth gave him a coat of arms, which were argent three eſcutcheons gules, to ſignify that the courage of three men had ſaved the kingdom (1).

[B] This family has produced ſeveral branches.] They are ſpread not only in Scotland, and England, but alſo in France, and eſpecially in Normandy (2). I only mention the branch of the earls of Tweedale and Kinnoul, which ſtill ſubſiſt (3).

[C] . . . and many perſons of great merit.] We have no accounts of the condition of this family, from the reign of Kenneth III, to the reign of Robert Bruce; for Edward I king of England, taking advantage of the diviſions of Scotland, at the time when Robert Bruce and John Baliol were diſputing for the crown, made an irruption into the kingdom, and carried away, not only the public records, but alſo the papers and documents of particular families; thoſe of the family of Hay were carried away, as well as many others. During this civil war, ROBERT HAY ſtuck to the intereſts of Robert Bruce with an entire fidelity, and did him ſo conſiderable ſervices, that he was rewarded for them with the place of hereditary high-conſtable of Scotland, in the year 1313, and that he might ſupport that dignity with a ſuitable luſtre, the ſame prince gave him great poſſeſſions in land, in the county of Aberdeen. This office has ſtill remained in the family, and is enjoyed at preſent by the earl of Errol, who is reckoned the nineteenth of his family; who has enjoyed it. NICOLAS lord HAY was killed in 1332, with 280 gentlemen of his family, at the battle of Duplin, taking the part of king David Bruce againſt Edward Baliol. DAVID lord HAY, his ſucceſſor, accompanied king David Bruce in the war againſt the Engliſh, and was killed in the year 1344, at the battle of Durham. THOMAS lord HAY, married king Robert the ſecond's daughter, who brought him for her dowry, the barony of Inchtuthill, in the county of Perth, about the year 1376. WILLIAM lord HAY was deputed in the year 1423, with ſome other gentleman, to deliberate about the means of reſtoring king James I to liberty, who was kept priſoner in England. He ſucceeded in that affair, and a little time after was created earl of Errol. WILLIAM HAY, earl of Errol, high-conſtable of Scotland, and ſheriff of the county of Aberdeen, accompanied James IV, to the battle of Floudon, in the year 1513, and was killed there with his prince, together with eighty ſeven gentlemen of his name. Francis Hay, earl of Errol, by his conſtant adherence to queen Mary, and the Romiſh religion, was expoſed to great misfortunes, his houſes were demoliſhed, his eſtate pillaged, and himſelf impriſoned: but under king James VI, ſon to queen Mary, he was in favour. He was one of the Scotch lords, who was ſent into England in 1604, to ſettle the union of the two crowns. His ſon aſſiſted at the coronation of Charles I in Scotland, in the year 1633. GILBERT HAY, earl of Errol, had a great ſhare in the the friendſhip of Charles I, and made a conſiderable figure in the parliament at Edinburgh, at the time of Charles the ſecond's reſtoration. JOHN HAY, earl of Errol, at preſent high-conſtable of Scotland, is his ſon (4).

He taught in ſeveral places, in Poland, France, and the Netherlands. His chief theatre was the college of Tournon, where he taught divinity, mathematics, and Hebrew. He died the twenty firſt of May, 1607, at Pontamouſſon, where he was chancellor of the univerſity. He imployed himſelf much in controverſy, and wrote ſeveral books againſt the Proteſtants [A]. This apology was made againſt the libel of James Pineton de Chambrun, preacher at Niſmes, and printed at Lyons in 1586. in Bibliothecam Sanctam Sixti Senenſis, and a Latin tranſlation of ſome letters of Jeſuits, written from Japan and Peru. It was printed at Antwerp, in 1605, in 8vo. See Father Alegambe.

[B] A Jeſuit of his name, was baniſhed by an arrêt of the parliament of Paris.] His name was ALEXANDER HAY. 'He was convicted of ſeveral ſeditious diſcourſes againſt the king, after the reduction of Paris, ſo far as to ſay, that if he paſſed by their college, he would gladly throw himſelf headlong out of the window to break his neck by that means.' This we read in Mezerai's great hiſtory (3). The author of the Anti-Coton will inform us of the date of the decree of the parliament. 'There were informations given Alexander Hayus, a Scotch Jeſuit, who had taught publickly, that we ought to diſſemble and obey the king for a time ſeemingly, frequently ſaying theſe words, Jeſuïta eſt omnis homo. —— A Jeſuit is all to all men. This Jeſuit was moreover charged with often ſaying, that he would be glad, if the king paſſed by their college, to throw himſelf from the window, and break his neck. For which reaſon, by a decree of parliament, of the tenth of January, 1595, the ſaid Hayus was condemned to perpetual baniſhment, and enjoined to continue it, upon pain of being hanged and ſtrangled, without any form of proceſs (4).' The author of the Remerciment des Beurrieres, having ſaid the ſame thing, adds (5) 'that this Jeſuit having afterwards repeated and confirmed theſe words in the city of Prague, and as the grandees of the kingdom having ſollicited to have him brought back into France on that account, it was anſwered, that he had eaten ſome peeled barly, not well boiled, and was found dead as ſuddenly as the provoſt-marſhal of Pluviers, ... who was ſtrangled at the Chatelet, with a ſtring of his drawers, which was not ſtrong enough to bridle a fly.' Alexander Hayus, if we believe Paſquier (6), in the time of the troubles, was teacher of the firſt claſs of the Jeſuits college at Paris.

HAILLAN (Bernard de Girard lord of) hiſtoriographer of France, deſcended from an ancient and noble family [A], was born at Bourdeaux about the year 1535. He ſet up early for an author, and after having appeared in the Republic of Letters, in the quality of a poet and tranſlator [B], he applied himſelf to the writing of hiſtory, and ſucceeded ſo well, that by his firſt performances of this nature, he obtained of Charles the IX, the title hiſtoriographer of France, in 1571 [C]. In 1576,

[A] He was deſcended from an ancient and noble family.] When he ſpeaks of the materials he collected to compoſe the Hiſtory of France, he does not forget the aſſiſtances of his relations. 'Francis de Girard, my brother, lord of Haillan, ſays he (1), ſent me from Bourdeaux, many papers, concerning the affairs of Guienne, collected by the late Lewis de Girard, our father; and by Giles, Mark, and Richard de Girard our grand-father, and great-great-grand-father; the two laſt whereof lived in Bourdelois, in nourable poſts, at the time that the city of Bourdeaux, and the country of Guienne were reduced to the obedience of the French in 1451.' He tells us, in another place (2), that his father was a 'curious man in the antiquities of his country, who for above forty five years was lieutenant in the admiralty of Guienne; and afterwards, adds he, Francis de Girard, lord of Haillan, my brother, was for above ten years in the ſame admiralty, under the late kings of Navarre, Henry and Antony.'

[B] After having appeared in the quality of a poet and tranſlator.] In 1559, he publiſhed a poem at Paris, intituled, The Union of the Princes, by the marriages of Philip king of Spain, and the lady Elizabeth of France, and of Philbert Emanuel, duke of Savoy, and the lady Margaret of France (3). He publiſhed in the ſame city, the ſame year, another poem, called The Tomb of the moſt Chriſtian king Henry II, and a Latin work, intituled, Regum Gallorum Icones à Faramundo uſque ad Franciſcum 2. Item Ducum Lotharingorum à Carolo primo uſque ad Carolum tertium verſibus Latinis expreſſæ (4). I may take for a tranſlation, the tract concerning the duties of men, which he printed at Blois in 1560, in 8vo; for he took it from Tully's Offices. He publiſhed the ſame year at Paris (5); The Roman hiſtory of Eutropius, containing, in ten books, all the tranſactions in peace and war, from the beginning of Rome, to the year MCXIX, of the ſame, tranſlated from the Latin. Eight years after he printed (6) The Lives of the greateſt, moſt virtuous, and moſt excellent Commanders, and other illuſtrious perſons, both Greeks and Barbarians, written by Æmilius Probus, and tranſlated from the Latin (7).

[C] He obtained of Charles IX the title of hiſtoriographer of France, in 1571.] This he tells us himſelf, in an epiſtle dedicatory, dated at Paris in July, 1576, where he thus ſpeaks to Henry III (8). 'It is now five years ſince the late king, your brother, your ſelf, Sir, and the queen your mother, having ſeen my book concerning the State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France, which was printed, and the two firſt books of the Hiſtory of France, only in manuſcript, it pleaſed the late king, at your's, and the queen your mother's requeſt, to command me (and you, Sir, did the ſame) to write in French the Hiſtory of the kings of France, your predeceſſors, hitherto ill written by our countrymen, and negligently or enviouſly handled by ſtrangers. And to furniſh me with means and courage to undertake this work, it pleaſed the king, your brother, at the inſtance and requeſt of Mr de Villequier, who always loved me, and my writings, and who is at preſent almoſt the only worthy witneſs of the long ſervices, which, in more ways than one, I have done you ſince your childhood, to give me the place of hiſtoriographer of France, and to promiſe to raiſe and prefer me, which alſo, Sir, you aſſured me of on your part, and that my long and faithful ſervices, and my ordinary labours, ſhould receive their fruit.' As this paſſage may ſerve for the proof of a thing which I have advanced in the text of this article (9), I was willing to give it intire. But that we may not be obliged to mention this again, here is a ſtronger proof ſtill. This hiſtorain having ſaid that Henry III, loved always to hear and ſpeak the truth, gave hopes to men of learning, that he would be their ſupport, and ſometimes would read and hear hiſtories (10), adds, 'which I can truly ſay, as having known it from your infancy, at the time when I had the honour to be near your perſon, to ſerve you, and that not in the loweſt rank, ſometimes to diſcourſe with you about many fine hiſtories, both of the kings your anceſtors, and of other kingdoms and ſtates.' The paſſage which I take from the epiſtle dedicatory of his State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France, is ſtill more deciſive. 'I have learned, Sir, ſays he, addreſſing himſelf to Henry III, by the education I have had, and the communication of the affairs which I have ſeen, being near you, for the ſpace of twelve years before your acceſſion to the throne; and by many affairs which I have managed and ſeen for the ſervice of the kings your predeceſſors, and your's, both within and without the kingdom, how one ought to ſpeak and write of kings and their affairs (11).' See alſo what will be related in the remark [L] (12).

'Note, that he publiſhed at Paris, in 1571, A brief Hiſtory of the earls and dukes of Anjou, from Godfrey Griſegonnelle, to Henry, ſon and brother to the kings of France, and duke of Anjou, Bourbonnois, and Auvergne (13). He alſo publiſhed there the ſame year, A Promiſe 1576, he publiſhed a hiſtory, which reaches from Pharamond, to the death of Charles VII (a). He was the firſt who compoſed a body of the French hiſtory in French. Henry III, was very well pleaſed with this; and ſhewed his ſatisfaction, by the advantageous and honourable gratifications he made the author [D]. He had him in his own ſervice before his coming to the crown (b). The reaſons which induced du Haillan to conclude his work with Charles the ſeventh's death, are very good, and ſhew that he underſtood the duties of an hiſtorian [E]. However, he afterwards promiſed to Henry IV, to continue miſe and Deſign of the Hiſtory of France (14). Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who tells me this, does not ſpeak of a work which du Haillan had publiſhed in 1570, intituled, Of the Fortune and Power of France, with a ſummary diſcourſe on the Deſign of a Hiſtory of France (15). He publiſhed the ſame year a book (16) that has been reprinted very often (17), which he dedicated to the duke of Anjou. He ſays in his advertiſement to the reader (18): 'This book, concerning the State and Succeſs of 'the Affairs of France, which I preſent to you, clad in 'a new dreſs, much longer and finer than it wore for'merly, was born ten years ago, and was preſented 'to you at it's birth, being then very ſmall. Two 'years after I took it out of it's infancy, and cloath'ing it in a longer habit, I gave it, by your com'mand, to the late king Charles your brother.' Thus he ſpeaks in the epiſtle dedicatory, of an edition in which this work appeared in a dreſs entirely new, and much larger, finer, and richer than it was before (19). The author reviſed and enlarged it in 1594, and dedicated it to Henry IV. Zeiller ſays, this book is often cited and commended; and that he has, in his 190th letter, given d'Aubigné's judgment about it (20). I have not ſeen that letter, but I am certain it contains a blunder: for d'Aubigné in the preface which Zeiller cites (21), paſſes no judgment on du Haillan's writings, contenting himſelf only to name him. His criticiſm only concerns la Popeliniere, and Thuanus. This therefore is a great fault of Martin Zeiller; his omiſſion is not a ſmall one, for that author did not know that du Haillan writ the Hiſtory of France. Konig likewiſe is ignorant of it.

[D] Henry III ſhewed how well ſatisfied he was with it, by the advantageous and honourable gratifications he made the author.] La Popeliniere, omitting the title of hiſtoriographer of France, conferred on du Haillan by Charles IX, touches only the recompences of Henry III. This omiſſion may be excuſed, conſidering the difference which is betwixt a bare title, and a place ſettled, with a ſalary annexed to it. Now ſuch was the employ that Henry III conferred on him. However, let us ſee what la Popeliniere ſays (22). 'Henry III, the firſt of princes, ancient or 'modern, not only gratified the Sieur du Haillan of 'Bourdeaux, one of the ſecretaries of his finances, 'with ſeveral bounties, as an acknowledgment of 'the pains he had taken in the firſt body of his 'French hiſtory. But alſo honoured him afterwards 'with the firſt place of hiſtoriographer of France, 'which he erected into a laſting title of office, with a 'fixed ſalary of 1200 crowns per annum, and made 'him one of his privy-counſellors, at the inſtance of 'chancellor Chiverny, that he might there be the bet'ter inſtructed in the knowledge and account of the 'moſt important affairs of the kingdom. So that 'Henry III was the firſt who raiſed the bare and ſim'ple title of hiſtorian, to the honourable degree and 'title of hiſtoriographer of France, in the perſon of 'Bernard de Girard, Sieur du Haillan, after his dedi'cating and preſenting to him his Hiſtory of France, 'collected from preceding authors, as the firſt body of 'hiſtory in a French dreſs.' We read in the French Mercury (23), 'that Henry III as an acknowledg'ment of the pains du Haillan had taken in the firſt 'book of his French hiſtory, gratified him with a place 'of ſecretary of his finances.' I do not know what this firſt book of the Hiſtory of France, is, which was recompenſed in this manner: for du Haillan publiſhed the Hiſtory of France all at once; and he does not ſay in his epiſtle dedicatory, that he had already obtained any recompence, He only ſays (24), that Charles IX had given him the place of hiſtoriographer, with fair promiſes, and that Henry III, then duke of Anjou, had alſo promiſed him ſome benefactions. I fancy that the compiler of the Mercury was afraid of being cenſured for tranſcribing the paſſage of la Popeliniere word for word, and that to prevent it, he quoted him with ſome alterations, but he did not ſucceed well in it. He changed the firſt body of his French hiſtory, into the firſt book of his French hiſtory, Theſe two phraſes are widely different. The former ſignifies, that du Haillan was the firſt who publiſhed a body of French hiſtory: the other ſignifies, that the firſt book of the French hiſtory, written by du Haillan, was printed by it ſelf, before all the reſt. The author of the Mercury ſuppoſes, moreover, that this firſt book procured him the ſecretaryſhip of the finances, from Henry III; but la Popeliniere, the Mercury's author, ſays no ſuch thing; he ſuppoſes that du Haillan was ſecretary of the finances before the publiſhing of the Hiſtory of France. It muſt however be acknowledged, that his narrative is ſomewhat confuſed: he has inſerted an afterwards, which perplexes the ſenſe; it being a term which but ill agrees with the words following. The Mercury adds, I. that after the recompence for the firſt book, the hiſtorian obtained a better, when he dedicated his Hiſtory of France to Henry III, for he was honoured with the place of counſellor and hiſtoriographer of France. II. That he afterwards wrote the State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France; this is falſe, this book was printed before the death of Charles IX (25). III. That he was made genealogiſt to the knights of the order of the HOLY GHOST, at the creation of that order. He might have ſaid, that he had, in commendam, an abbey which the famous Abelard had poſſeſſed (26). Note, that in the firſt edition of his hiſtory, he only ſtiles himſelf hiſtoriographer of France, but in the latter he is ſtiled counſellor to his majeſty, ſecretary of his finances and chamber, and hiſtoriographer of France. Note alſo, that in 1584, he was not yet rewarded. We ſhall ſee his complaint below (27).

[E] The reaſons which induced him to conclude his work with Charles VII, . . . ſhew, that he underſtood the duties of an hiſtorian.] I mean chiefly, the reflexion he has made, that a man expoſeth himſelf to an unlucky alternative, who writes the hiſtory of monarchs lately dead. He muſt either diſſemble the truth, or provoke perſons who are moſt to be feared. The firſt of theſe inconveniencies ſhocks an hiſtorian's honour and conſcience, the other offends againſt his prudence. It is beſt therefore to ſay nothing. This was one of du Haillan's reaſons with reſpect to the reigns that followed Lewis XII (28). He adds (29) a general reaſon of great weight; viz. that there were already particular hiſtories of all the reigns after Charles VII, and that in the common opinion it was almoſt impoſſible to equal the writers of ſome of theſe works. This conſideration ought to affect an honeſt man, and a famous hiſtorian. He ought to ſave the reader the diſcontent of purchaſing the ſame thing twice. The reſpect he owes the public requires this, and juſtice will not allow him to tranſcribe the hiſtories which others have wrote: this is robbing another of his property. His own reputation and prudence, oblige him to ſeek a more difficult and certain way to glory. To copy or give a new form to the writings of others, is too cheap a labour to be honourable, and expoſes you to the infamy of plagiary. You will be reckoned a vain man, if you pretend to equal their glory who are thought incomparable, and you run the risk of being ſtill accounted inferiour, though you ſhould equal or exceed them. Ought a wiſe man to encounter the prepoſſeſſions of the public? It is pity but ſuch reaſons ſhould make as great impreſſions on every body, as they did on du Haillan (30), libraries would not be ſo thronged with books, containing the ſame things. Let us here give the deſcription he has made of the inconveniencies which the authors of the hiſtory of their own times fall into. 'For as much as all 'thoſe hiſtories which treat of king Francis I were 'written in his, or his ſon Henry's time, the authors 'have perhaps more enlarged on the praiſes of this 'king, than was ſuitable to his merit, (though he was 'a great and excellent prince) or to the duty of an 'hiſtorian, or to truth. This is the conſtant fault of 'thoſe who write the hiſtory of their own times, and 'of the princes under whom they live. For where is continue this hiſtory to his time [F]. But he has not made this promiſe good. The reaſon which obliged him to continue it, is not for the honour of Philip de Comines (c). He had the courage to confute many traditions, which an indiſcreet zeal for the

‘ the man who would dare to touch upon the vices of his prince, or blame his actions or thoſe of his miniſters, and relate the plots, deceits, and treaſons which are acted in his reign, or ſay, that his prince committed ſuch an injuſtice, was guilty of fornication; or that a certain man ran away in a battle, and that another committed ſuch a treaſon, ſuch a one was guilty of a robbery, and another of a treachery, and a third of ſuch another villany? There is no body bold enough to do this. And therefore they who write the hiſtory of their own times, are agitated by ſeveral paſſions, and are obliged, either to lie openly, if they univerſally and throughout praiſe their princes, or favour their nation, if they always blame their enemies; or to diſſemble and palliate the truth, or to make a motley piece of work of it, or to gild over their writings, and the actions of their princes with fine words, or (if they reſolve to ſpeak the truth) they are forced to conceal their names, and print their works without them. They who write the hiſtory of their predeceſſors, may (if they will) avoid this fault, and run boldly in the field of truth, with all aſſurance and liberty of language (31).’ Many readers will here call to mind the words of the emperor Peſcennius Niger. Praiſe Marius, or Hannibal, or ſome other great general, of former ages, ſaid he to an orator who preſented himſelf before him, to ſpeak a panegyric in his praiſe; for it is ridiculous to praiſe the living, eſpecially if they be emperors: rewards are expected from them, they are feared, they can kill and baniſh. Quum imperatori facto quidam panegyricum recitare vellet, dixit ei, Scribe laudes Marii vel Annibalis, vel alicujus ducis optimi vita functi, & dic quid ille fecerit ut eum nos imitemur. Nam viventes laudare irriſio eſt, maxime imperatores, à quibus ſperatur, qui timentur, qui præſtare publice poſſunt, qui poſſunt necare, qui proſcribere: ſe autem vivum placere velle, mortuum etiam laudari (32).

Let us ſay, by the by, that we muſt not make du Haillan’s ſecond reaſon a general rule (33); for there are many caſes, in which it is very reaſonable to write the hiſtory of the ſame reigns which have already been written by others. As I. when a man has many new things to ſay, or when he can illuſtrate and rectify the preceding hiſtories in many places. II. When the deſign is to collect into one body all the facts belonging to a hiſtory, ſome whereof lie in ſome books, and others in ſome others. III. When the taſte of the readers requires a new language, and a new turn. At preſent, for inſtance, moſt people would chuſe rather to be ignorant of hiſtory, than to read the authors who compoſed it, in the fifteenth or ſixteenth century. And therefore, though an hiſtorian ſhould have nothing to ſay but what was already printed, yet it would be commendable to publiſh an hiſtory, provided the turn and the ſtile could allure the reader, and the public appeared altogether diſguſted with the other hiſtorians. Whence it appears, that if there are ſo many books containing the ſame things, it is not always the fault of the authors, but frequently of the readers, who will not be at the pains of ſeeking hiſtorical facts ſeparately, or of turning over books written in old French. It is therefore for their convenience and profit, that ſome authors publiſh hiſtories, which teach nothing new, and only connect together in a better ſtile, the different pieces of other authors. If you have diſcovered ſome new facts, will it be ſaid to you, be contented to publiſh them, and nothing elſe, why do you from thence take occaſion to make a large book, in which you crowd ſo many trite ſtories? This cenſure is juſt on many occaſions, but not when their new diſcoveries may be diffuſed upon a very long train of events. They muſt then be incorporated with former narrations; the intereſt and convenience of the reader requires it. We ſhall ſee, by and by, that upon this principle, our du Haillan changed his reſolution.

What has been ſaid of hiſtorical books, may be applied to other works. There are but too many I own which contain nothing but what is found in an hundred others; but on the other ſide, it would be a thing prejudicial to the republic of letters not to dare to put in a book, what other books have already publiſhed (34). A divine of Leyden pretends, that it is of great uſe to publiſh ſeveral books upon the ſame ſubjects, when they are important; he aſſerts alſo, that it is an excellent way to leſſen the multitude of books which burden and oppreſs ſo many people. The reaſon of this paradox is, that a conſiderable number of books upon certain ſubjects, would imploy the public, and by that means abundance of other books would be neglected, and leap at once from the Bookſellor’s to the Grocer’s ſhop. Let us ſee this author’s words, in which we ſhall find an excellent thought of St Auguſtin. ‘ Id (ſcribendi cacoëthes) nunc his temporibus in immenſum eſt auctum, ut omnem medelam ſuperaſſe videatur, nec alio modo poſſit coerceri, quam ſi plures divulges libros; quam rationem agendi forte paradoxam aliquis dixerit, optimam tamen nemo jure negaverit. De multitudine librorum utilium immenſo numero non eſt quod jure conqueramur, qui non facile nimis augentur. Quamvis enim de rebus iiſdem ſcribunt plures, modo illæ ſint cognitu dignæ, nullum id nocumentum veritati videtur inferre, quæ ſic ad plures ſibi viam pandit, cùm lectorum alii his potius, quàm illis ſcriptoribus delectentur, quamvis de eodem argumento commentatis. Quod rectè obſervavit Auguſtinus lib. 1. de Trinitate cap. 3 Neque enim omnia, quæ ab omnibus conſcribuntur, in omnium manus veniunt. Et fieri poteſt, ut nonnulli, qui etiam hæc noſtra intelligere valent, illos planiores non inveniant libros, & in iſtos ſaltem incidant. Ideoque utile eſt, plures à pluribus fieri diverſo ſtylo, non diverſa fide, etiam de quæſtionibus eiſdem, ut ad plurimos res ipſa perveniat, ad alios ſic, ad alios autem ſic. Quâ ratione inutiles libri ſenſim eliminantur, ut alii poſtea non ſit uſui, quàm ut piperi & thuri involvendo inſerviant (35). —— This (itch of writing) is prodigiouſly increaſed in our days, and ſeems to be paſt remedy, neither can it be checked any other way than by publiſhing ſtill more books; this may appear a paradox to ſome, but the reaſon will appear evident. For no body can juſtly complain of the great number of uſeful books which can hardly be too great. For though many write on the ſame ſubjects, provided they be uſeful ſubjects, truth cannot ſuffer thereby; but by this means gains more votaries, ſince ſome readers are more pleaſed with ſome books than with others, tho’ treating on the ſame ſubjects. This St Auguſtin rightly obſerved. All books, ſays he, which are written, do not come into the hands of all. And it may happen, that they who are able to underſtand this book of mine, may not meet with the books which are written in a more intelligible manner, and may only light on mine. Therefore it is uſeful that different perſons ſhould write on the ſame point in a different ſtile, though not containing a different doctrine, that ſo the doctrine it ſelf may arrive at a greater number of perſons, to ſome in one dreſs, to others in another. By this means uſeleſs books are baniſhed by degrees, and come to be only employed to wrap up ſmall wares.’

[F] He promiſed to Henry IV to continue this hiſtory to his time.] I prove it by this paſſage (36): ‘ I have alſo written a book concerning the monarchy of France, which will ſoon be preſented to your majeſty, with a deſcription of all the ſecrets and affairs of the eſtabliſhment, greatneſs, and power of your kingdom, and of the kings your predeceſſors. Their hiſtory, which I have compoſed and finiſhed at the death of Charles VII, ſhall be quickly followed by that of the other ſucceeding kings, down to your majeſty; then your’s will appear, if you pleaſe, to have it publiſhed.’ This is what du Haillan ſaid to king Henry IV in an epiſtle dedicatory, dated in October, 1594. He had acquainted his readers with the change of his reſolution ten years before; for dedicating to Henry III the ſecond edition of his Hiſtory of France, corrected and enlarged in 1584, he ſpeaks to him in this manner. ‘ Though in my epiſtle dedicatory to your majeſty, and in the preface of the firſt edition, I ſaid, that I would proceed no further, nor write the hiſtory of Lewis XI, becauſe it was already done by Philip de Comines, Sieur d’Argenton; yet having ſince changed my reſolution, I have began it with hopes of finiſhing it this next winter, if I find that this my labour ſhall be acceptable to you.’ It is the glory of France had propagated, and to ſpeak freely upon ſome tender points, as for example, concerning the maid of Orleans [G]. This liberty gave offence to narrow minds, and ſuch as would have every thing ſacrificed to policy. I do not know whether is not amiſs to ſee the reaſon of his change; for beſides that, we ſhall thereby ſee his judgment concerning Philip de Comines, we ſhall find that he was under one of thoſe caſes in which it is permitted to write a hiſtory after other writers. 'That which has cauſed me, ſays he (37), to alter my reſolution, and to treat of the ſaid king Lewis was, that the Sieur d'Argenton began his hiſtory, called Memoirs, but from the fifth year of his reign, and that all the cauſes of the wars, and of the great affairs this king had, are compriſed betwixt the beginning of his reign, and the time wherein Philip de Comines begins to write, and in that part of hiſtory which he has treated, he has concealed many things, which I have diſcovered, and extracted from many books, memoirs, and diſpatches of that time, and from many ſecret diſcourſes, written either in his reign, or a little after his death, free from fear, hatred, flattery, praiſe, or paſſion, into which they often fall who write the hiſtory of their own times, and by the two laſt of which Philip de Comines has been influenced, being moved thereto either by his great affection towards his maſter, or the benefactions he had received from him, or the fear of his ſucceſſor. And therefore he has not ſaid what others might ſay, and what other hiſtorians have ſaid of the actions, vices, and craft (38) of that king; and praiſing him more than he ought, he in many places acts the part of an orator, and of a panegyriſt, and not of an hiſtorian; and in his long digreſſions on the affairs of foreign potentates, he tranſgreſſes the bounds of hiſtory, and of an hiſtorian.' For the reſt, none of the promiſes du Haillan made, of continuing the Hiſtory of France, came to any thing. Nothing of this kind was found amongſt his papers after his death (39); the Bookſellers, who added a continuation to his work, as far as the year 1615 (40), and afterwards as far as the year 1627, took it from Paulus Æmilius, Philip de Comines, Arnoul Ferron, du Bellay, &c.

[G] He had the courage to confute many traditions . . . . and ſpeak freely . . . . concerning the maid of Orleans.] Let no body wonder at the length of the paſſage I am going to cite; it is inſtructive, and ſhews the true character of an hiſtorian, and the ridiculous offence which is taken by ill-turned heads, from his boldneſs in preferring truth before all things. This wrong turn of mind is of all times and places. It is worth while to obſerve, how celebrated authors have contemned and oppoſed it. Du Haillan's words are as follows (41). 'I have not acted the part of a flatterer, nor of a courtier, but that of an hiſtorian, and I have ſpoken the truth. I have not imitated flattering painters, who drawing a face, if it happen to have any imperfection or deformity in it, leave it out, or paint it to advantage. My reſolution was to paint the uglieſt as well as the fineſt features, and to ſpeak boldly and freely of every thing with an unuſual liberty, which will be praiſed and admired by all good readers; as I have formerly done in my Hiſtory of the State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France; in which I have boldly ſpoken many things, which, before me, no body would, nor durſt, ſay, and poſſibly did not know. For both in that work, and in this I have encountered many commonly received opinions, ſuch as the coming of Pharamond into Gaul, the inſtitution of the Salic law, which is attributed to him, the creation of the peers of France, aſcribed to Charlemagne, and other particular points, having with boldneſs and truth affirmed, that Pharamond never paſſed the Rhine to enter Gaul, and that he did not make the Salic law to exclude the daughters from the ſucceſſion of our crown, becauſe he never came into our France. Whereupon, ſome who pretend to ſpeak of every thing, and know nothing, and who think by their ill-grounded opinions to overturn thoſe which are built upon judgment and reaſon, have ſaid, that I went about to deſtroy the principles of our hiſtory, by denying the inſtitution of this law by Pharamond. But, Sir, this is not my deſign, but only to reject an ancient error, the Salic law being, in my opinion, ancient and approved enough, ſince it has been practiſed as a law, from the beginning of our firſt kings (as you may ſee more at large at the beginning of the firſt book of this hiſtory in the life of Pharamond) and my opinion thereupon, can give no advantage to ſtrangers, nor ſcandalize our natives, except ſuch as are ſcandalized with every thing but what themſelves ſay and do. Some have found fault with my liberty of language in this particular, and in that of the peers of France, and in others, ſaying, that I act againſt the duty of an hiſtorian, by robbing France of an ancient opinion ſhe had of the coming of Pharamond into Gaul, of the Salic law made by him, and the inſtitution of the peers of France, and that it is a crime to abrogate things grown old in opinion, and written by ignorant people, who never read good books, and believed by others as ignorant, who have neither ſenſe nor underſtanding to read, or underſtand, good and ancient authors, but rather amuſe themſelves with old trumpery, as unpoliſhed as their own heads. Good hiſtorians (Sire) ought not in their words or writings to follow the opinions of the vulgar, but only faithful true ones, and ſuch as are approved by authors, or by good arguments and conjectures, which when they are numerous, and well applied, ſerve for a true and certain teſtimony, when, by the injury of time, the proof of the truth by writing is wanting. I have therefore (Sire) in theſe things, and many others, rejected the common opinon for the true. In which I preſume I have done good ſervice to the Hiſtory of France, diſingaging it from many forgeries and fables, which render it diſagreeable, and ſometimes contradictory, delivering the readers from uncertainty in many points, concerning which they could not come at a right judgment in it. In which I am certain of pleaſing men of judgment, for it is ſuch whom I ſtudy to pleaſe, and not thoſe who ſhall diſlike my opinions and writings.' If you would know what he ſays of the maid of Orleans, read this other paſſage (42). 'The miracle of this maid, whether it was invented and feigned, or true, raiſed the courage of the nobles, the people, and the king, who had loſt it; ſuch is the force of religion, and frequently of ſuperſtition. For ſome ſay, that this Joan was a whore to John, baſtard of Orleans, others to the Sieur Baudricourt, others to Pothon, who being politic and prudent, and ſeeing the king at his wits end, and the people ſo diſcouraged by continual wars, that there was no raiſing their hopes and ſpirits, bethought themſelves of imploying a miracle, made up of a falſe religion, which of all things in the world is moſt apt to raiſe and animate the courage of men, and to make even the moſt ſimple believe what is not. And the people were very much diſpoſed to receive ſuch ſuperſtitions. They who believe ſhe was a maid ſent from GOD, are not damned; neither are thoſe who do not believe it. Many think this laſt article an hereſy; but I ſhall ſuſpend my belief on either ſide. Theſe lords for ſome days together, inſtructed her in all ſhe was to anſwer to the queſtions which ſhould be put to her by the king, and them, when ſhe ſhould come into his preſence (for they themſelves were to interrogate her) and that ſhe might know the king, (whom ſhe had never ſeen) when ſhe ſhould be brought near him, they made her, every day look ſeveral times on his picture. On the day appointed, in which ſhe was to come to his chamber, which being by their appointment, they failed not to be there. And when ſhe came in, the firſt who asked her what ſhe would have, were the baſtard of Orleans and Baudricourt; who asked her what ſhe wanted, ſhe anſwered ſhe deſired to ſpeak with the king. They ſhewed her one of the other lords who was there, ſaying that he was the king, but ſhe being before inſtructed in every thing that was to be ſaid and done to her, and in what ſhe was to ſay and do, ſaid that he was not the king, and that the king was hid behind the bed, (where indeed he was) and going to him, ſhe ſaid to him, what has been above related. This feigned and counterfeit invention of religion, was of ſuch advantage to the kingdom, that it raiſed the drooping and diſpirited courage of the people from deſpair. At laſt ſhe was taken by the Engliſh before Compeigne, whether he did well to publiſh ſome things, which he knew only by hear-ſay [H]. He was much criticiſed, and he ſhowed how it vexed him, by the haughtineſs wherewith he anſwered his cenſurers [I]. He has not been unjuſtly cenſured in every thing as

[H] He publiſhed ſome things which he knew only by hear-ſay.] It was upon ſuch foundation that he publiſhed that Charles VIII. was ſuppoſititious. See the News from the Republic of Letters (43). Varillas confutes this ſtory (44).

[I] He ſhewed how much he was vexed being criticiſed, by the haughtineſs wherewith he anſwered his cenſurers.] As the works he had publiſhed before the hiſtory of France, had been criticiſed, he doubted not but this would have the ſame fate. And therefore he ſhewed his contempt of it before hand, and placed on the backſide of the title, a ſonnet, which has ſomething of the Gaſcon in it. Theſe are the ſix laſt lines,

Mille & mille ignorans, ſuperbes envieux,
Meſdiſans, eſtourdis, vains & preſumptueux,
Te voudront attaquer une indigne querelle.
Mais ne crains tout cela, ains paſſe hardiment,
Car leur preſumption, ny leur ſot jugement,
Ne pourront empeſcher ta carriere immortelle.

Tho' baſely attacked by thouſands of ignorant, proud, envious, malicious, vain, and preſumptuous, men, do not fear, but march boldly on; for neither their preſumption, nor fooliſh cenſures, ſhall be able to ſtop thy immortal carreer.

In the very beginning of this preface, he makes this obſervation. 'If this hiſtory of France cannot pleaſe every body, as I well know it will not pleaſe the nice, the ignorant, and the envious (and ſuch I will not pleaſe) who will paſs their fooliſh, ignorant, and envious judgments on it, I am certain it will pleaſe thoſe amongſt you who are writers, who know by experience what labour is, who have a judgment free from all paſſion, and who generouſly excuſe the faults and inadvertencies which may be met with in ſo great a work.' The laſt part of this paſſage is conſiderable, and moſt true in certain reſpects. No ſort of readers are more prone to criticiſe, or more raſh and unjuſt in their cenſures, than they who write nothing. An author has more reaſon to promiſe himſelf ſome ſupport and equity amongſt authors, than amongſt ſuch as know not by experience, the difficulties of writing. Provided only there be no emulation in the caſe; as ſometimes there is not; for authors do not always take the ſame road: the reputation of one, is not always of the ſame kind with that of another. And, in this caſe, it is better to be judged by a laborious author, than by lazy readers. In the other caſe, a reader proves more equitable. But to return to du Haillan, he ſpeaks thus towards the end of his preface: 'In the mean time, I will conſider the enviers and ſlanderers of me and my works, who will caſt the darts of their malice againſt both. Being able to ſay with truth, readers, that in my fortune, actions, and writings, I have never been envied or hated by any, but by the ignorant and the wicked, and thoſe whoſe name, bodily health, and reputation, have been tainted with ſome vice.' The ſtorm of criticiſm which he foreſaw actually happened (45). Let us ſee what he obſerves in the epiſtle dedicatory (46) of the ſecond edition (47). 'This work . . . . . was no ſooner born, but it was barked at, and bit by the envy and obloquy of all ſorts and ranks of people, ſome openly my enemies, and others my pretended friends; nay, there were ſome, who carrying it fair with me, as they did in all their actions, and courting your favour by indirect and oblique ways, of which they were extreamly greedy, went about to purchaſe it by impoſture and calumny, at the expence of my reputation and that of my hiſtory, cenſuring it in your preſence, (Sire) for that for which it has ſince been moſt eſteemed, and which will give it the greateſt honour and favour with poſterity; I mean the ſimple truth, and the freedom with which I have wrote.' He expreſſes ſtill more reſentment, and confidence, at the end of his preface. 'They, ſays he, according to their uſual malice, were of the number of my aſſailants; but I have reſolved to deſpiſe their ignorance, and laugh at it, covering my ſelf with the veil of truth, and the benevolence of ſuch of my readers, as have read and ſhall read my book with judgment, and have approved, and ſhall approve it; for it is for you that it is written, and not for the envious, ignorant, and malicious, who can ſee nothing that is good, and know not how to judge of, or eſteem what is praiſe-worthy.' Amongſt the things he ſaid to his critics, I have met with one that deſerves conſideration. 'If ſometimes I name men, whoſe name the too tickliſh reader will ſay, is not an affair of ſtate; I will anſwer him, that it ſeemed ſo to me, that I have a judgment as well as he, and (let him be who he will) I know better what I write, than he knows how to judge of my writings (48).' This is what many other authors may and ought to repreſent to their critics. A man who has been employed many years upon one kind of work, knows better than another what are the properties of it. He has not, if you will, ſo good a taſte and judgment as another, generally ſpeaking; but ſince he has ſtudied certain ſubjects, and applied himſelf to them for a long time, we ought to believe, that he judges better of their nature, and the ornaments which belong to them, than they who have not made them their particular ſtudy. And therefore we ought not to imagine, that certain authors act imprudently, when on ſeveral occaſions, they prefer their own judgment, before that of their friends, or their enemies, though otherwiſe more knowing than themſelves. A writer leſs intelligent, generally ſpeaking, than his readers, will yet have more views than they upon the ſubjects he treats of; and whilſt they know not whether he had reaſon to ſay ſuch or ſuch things, he will know that he was induced to it by many reaſonable motives, grounded upon the character of his work. Hence ariſe infinite ill-grounded cenſures, and hence we alſo ſee how requiſite it is to ſtudy well the rules, before we pronounce whether a work be good or bad. For example, to judge well of this hiſtory, with a commentary annexed, which I call an Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary, a man muſt have ſtudied the rights and privileges of an hiſtorical commentator; and hereupon I might ſay, with du Haillan, I know better what I write, than ſuch a one knows how to judge of my writings. I have ſtudied the nature and properties of compilations; if they every where pleaſed one kind of people, they would not be good. They who know not the character of them want to find in them only what pleaſes their own palate.

Here are two other paſſages of du Haillan, which will inform us that he was criticiſed and vexed at it. 'My works, Sire . . . . . have not been able to avoid the barkings and bitings of calumny and envy, and of railers and ſlanderers, with whoſe ſtings, not only my writings have been pricked, but alſo the courſe of my fortune, has been wounded, ulcerated, and ſtopt; it ſeems that ſome rays of virtue and ability, which my enemies diſcovered in me, were offenſive to the eyes of their ignorance and malice, and that my luſtre could not be born by them. Nay, Sire, in your preſence, I have been ſo ſlandered and ill uſed, that it is not long of my enemies, if I have not forfeited your favour and good opinion, in which alone I have ever ſowed the hopes of all my happineſs, and the ſeeds of my moſt humble and devoted ſervice. But your goodneſs and wiſe judgment, Sire, has made them appear impoſtors, and delivered me from the fears of the miſchief with which they threatened me (49).' He ſpoke thus to Henry III, in 1580, dedicating a new edition of one of his books to him. The preface of the ſame book thunders againſt du Haillan's critics, I have taken what follows from it. 'There are ſome phantaſtical wits (the number whereof is endleſs) accuſtomed as I ſhall ſhew by a paſſage of Sorel [K]. His manner of ſpeaking of himſelf, is a teſtimony that he was not diſintereſſed enough, either as to his glory or fortune. He diſplays too much his labours, and the ſucceſs of his books, their ſeveral editions, tranſlations, &c. and he too palpably manifeſts his deſires of reward [L]. I do not know accuſtomed to ſlander and abuſe every thing, being ſtupified with ignorance and preſumption, who do not reliſh it. Of theſe ſome are danglers about the court, others are lawyers, others collegians, others ſome young coxcombs, lately come from the univerſity, with three borders of Latin upon their gowns, and a ſhred of purchaſed honour, who ferreting all ſorts of books, pretend to deſpiſe and reject them, if they find a letter miſplaced, or do not find what they know not how to look for. Others are profeſſed writers, who, being ſwelled up, and big with books, bring forth one every week, fill the bookſellers ſtalls with them, talk boldly of every body, deſpiſe the works of others, and approve of none but their own. Some of theſe laſt, are meer apes, for if they ſee another do a work, at thirty paces diſtance from thence, they bring forth another in embryo to which they give the ſame name. All theſe ſorts of people have attacked, pinched, and barked at me, but however they have not bitten me, nor done any injury to my preſent performance, or to my hiſtory of France, being only like dead coals, which blacken, without being able to burn: for in ſpight of their envy, cavils, pedantry, railling and preſumption, my works fly through the world, have obtained a great reputation, and are tranſlated into ſeveral languages . . . . . As for the courtiers who have defamed my writings, and attempted to make them odious, they are men accuſtomed to rob others of their honour, when they want opportunities of pillaging any thing elſe (50).

[K] He has not been unjuſtly cenſured in every thing: as I ſhall ſhow by a paſſage of Sorel.] It contains a juſt cenſure of ſome of du Haillan's faults, and alſo ſome ſmall commendations ' He was even deſirous to imitate the elegance of the beſt hiſtorians, but to avoid pains, he has almoſt tranſlated word for word, all Paulus Æmilus's orations, and has alſo copied him in his narrations: it is true, he has added a great many curious obſervations, which he found elſewhere. He may be charged with giving a fabulous exordium to his hiſtory, intirely of his own invention, making Pharamond, and his faithful counſellors, deliberate, whether, having the power in his hand, he ought to reduce the French to an ariſtocratical or monarchical government, and making each of them harrangue in ſupport of his opinion. We there find the names of Charimond and Quadrek, imaginary perſons. It is a thing very ſurprizing: we have but little certainty that there was ever ſuch a man as Pharamond in the world, and though we knew that there was, yet it is an egregious boldneſs to relate things of him, which have no foundation. Dupleix cenſures du Haillian for it, and reproaches him for having taken his ſpeeches from Amadis de Gaule; but Amadis has no ſuch political diſcourſes. We muſt ſuppoſe Dupleix only meant, that du Haillan had invented this, as it were to write a kind of a romance. However, if they are not to be found in Amadis, they may be found in many other places. They are common places, which are uſually met with in books, that treat of ſo trival a ſubject, as the different forms of government. Du Haillan is accuſed on another hand of talking too freely of ſome eccleſiaſtics: but he has done this poſſibly to ſhew his zeal for our kings, and to maintain their authority. Notwithſtanding all this his writings are more judicious and methodical than thoſe who preceded him. His hiſtory inſtructs us in many particulars of the French government, which he underſtood well enough, as he has likewiſe ſhown in his book, of the ſtate and ſucceſs of the affairs of France. In fine, he is to be praiſed for having firſt attempted to put our hiſtory in a good and agreeable form, which he has effected according to the knowledge of the time in which he loved (51).

[L] He diſplays too much his labours, and the ſucceſs of his books. . . . he too palpably manifeſts his deſires of reward.] Let us begin with theſe words of his epiſtle dedicatory to his hiſtory France (52). ' From that time (53) to the year 1576, when it was firſt printed, I laboured night and day upon this hiſtory, with the ſweat and labour of my body, the waſting of my years, the great fatigue of my mind, and expence of my purſe, in procuring of books, titles, charters, memoirs, and other materials requiſite for the building ſo great a work; and I have neglected my affairs, and the means of improving them, at a time that every one in my ſight, was making his fortune, and ſtriving more than in any age, to get wealth, and obtain gifts and bounties from your majeſty, rather than to write or read books, that I might give my ſelf up intirely and wholly to the accompliſhment of this work, which at laſt after four years imployed in raiſing it, I have finiſhed; after many days ſpent in ſtudy, in ſolitude, and in great racking of my brain; after many watchings, and after great reading, tumbling, turning over, and collating many Latin, French, and Italian books, both ancient and modern, and many monuments, papers, titles, old writings, and muſty manuſcripts, rummaged and turned over; I have found it a hard task, Sire, that if, when I undertook this work, I had known or imagined the pains I was to take, and which I have taken, I ſhould have excuſed myſelf to your majeſty; and no gift, or promiſe, or deſire, or hope of honour, glory, or advantage, could have induced me to engage in it.' He afterwards ſhews at large, the imperfections of the hiſtorians (54) he was obliged to conſult, and then he adds: ' from all theſe confuſions, diverſities, prolixities, and labyrinths, Sire, I have overcome, and have written the hiſtory of France, and of the kings your anceſtors, in the beſt manner that I could. I have not been able to do it ſo well as it deſerves, or to give it it's juſt perfection; and I will not blame the dead or their works, to give the praiſe and advantage to my own. Only I will ſay, without preſumption and boaſting, that I have done a thing which had not been done before, or ſeen by any of our nation, and have given to the hiſtory France, a dreſs it never appeared in before . . . . . Some may be able to write the hiſtory of France as well, and better than myſelf, and others worſe; but if I obtain not the firſt rank amongſt them, I aſſure myſelf I ſhall not have the laſt. I have found the way of drawing the quinteſſence out of theſe groſs maſſes of ancient hiſtories, and of reducing their luxuriancy ſuperfluity, and prolixity, to things neceſſary, and not ſuperfluous; and beſides, not willing to rely upon our hiſtories and chronicles, I have extracted from foreigners, from the regiſters of courts of parliament, from the chambers of accounts, and charters of churches, and from books lent me by ſome of my friends, the neceſſary materials for my ſubject. My ſole aim was truth, which is the eye of hiſtory &c.' He repeats a great deal of this in his preface: ' I have laboured upon it, ſays he, for five years, I have ſpent many whole days, and half nights; many watchings, ſtudies, and ſolitudes, have been employed in it. I have rummaged, read, and turned over and over, many books, charters, monuments, old writings, papers, and parchments; I have had many Latin, French, and Italian books, treating of the hiſtories of France, England, Germany, Italy, Spain, Flanders, Scotland, Burgundy, Bretagne, Anjou, Berry, and Aquitain, of the holy wars in Aſia and Europe, the lives of Popes and emperors, and abundance of others, with a world of old writings and ancient monuments. From all theſe I have extracted the quinteſſence, diſtilling them in the alembic of my judgment and labour, and I ſhew you what I have extracted from them in my book.'

If you would know what he ſays of the ſucceſs of his work, read what follows (55). ' My hiſtory, which has vanquiſhed their envy, and that of all thoſe who railed at it, ſhall live as long as the French tongue ſhall continue and prevail in your kingdom. Since it's firſt edition, it has been often printed, both in your kingdom, and out of it, in ſeveral volumes and characters, and turned into Latin by Peter Boulanger (56), who inſtructs youth in the college of Loudun, a man of a good life, and great learning, and who, in his Latin writings, imitates, as much as any man know whether we ought to believe that he threatened with his iron pen, thoſe who ſhould deſpiſe his works (d), and that he judged it as ſufficient to blaſt them, as he pretended, that his golden pen was capable of eternizing the merit of his benefactors. He died at Paris the twenty third of November, 1610, in his ſeventy ſixth year, and was buried at St Euſtache (e). It muſt not be forgotten, that he had attended Francis de Noailles, biſhop of Acqs, in his embaſſies to England and Venice (f). We ſhall ſee in the remarks, ſeveral paſſages of his epiſtles dedicatory and prefaces. They will diſpleaſe thoſe that deſire only a ſuperficial knowledge of famous men, but not ſuch as would know them exactly intus & in cute. It is for theſe latter that I labour, and I am certain the pains I take to ſhew them the picture of the heart, according to the lineaments I find of it in books, where authors have painted themſelves, will be acceptable to them. Let this be ſaid once for all. We might make a great many reflexions upon this picture of du Haillan, and therefore I imagine, I ſhall not diſpleaſe the reader by making ſome [M]. This will give me an in Europe, the purity and ſweetneſs of Cicero. But ſince, Sire, I have augmented and enlarged my hiſtory anew, having in ſome places inſerted two or three leaves, in others leſs, he waits for this impreſſion that he may add to his Latin verſion, what I have added to my French compoſition. So that you, Sire, as alſo your ſubjects and ſtrangers, will quickly ſee this hiſtory in the Latin tongue.’ Add to this the beginning of his preface (57). I wiſhed my hiſtory of France might be as much agreeable to you, as I have taken much pains and labour in the compiling of it. My deſire has not been altogether vain; for it ſo pleaſed men of judgment, that ſince that time it has been frequently printed, and in divers volumes, both within and without the kingdom, and read over and over, by all the ingenious men of France, and many foreigners. . . . Now, reader, ſeeing my work has ſo well ſucceeded, and been ſo well received, both by foreigners and by our countrymen, and ſo often reprinted and deſired, I have corrected and much enlarged it, and enriched it with many curious enquiries. Dedicating his book of the ſtate and ſucceſs of the affairs of France, to Henry III in 1580, he expreſſed himſelf in this manner (58). ‘I am, Sire, the firſt of all the French, who have written the hiſtory of France, and in a polite language ſhewn the grandeur and dignity of our kings; for before there was nothing but the old rubbiſh of chronicles which ſpoke of them. My works are ſeen and read by all chriſtendom, and tranſlated into ſeveral languages, particularly my hiſtory of France, is put into Latin, by a very learned man of your kingdom, and is ready to appear and preſent itſelf to your majeſty, clothed in a Latin dreſs. I am none of thoſe venturous and ignorant writers, whoſe brains daily teem with books, who raiſe up whole foreſts of them, and who, in their obſcure ſtudies, wherein they ſee not the light of the affairs of the world, ſpeak and write confidently, right or wrong, of the preſent ſtate-affairs, of your moſt ſecret and important councils, judge of every thing, are partial for one, and prepoſſeſſed againſt another, extol thoſe who give them money, make a meer pretender of a great general, and commander of an army, and live only by the ſale of their preſumptuous writings. And therefore ſuch writers will ſee their works expire, before themſelves, and ſhamefully aſſiſt at their funeral. I have learnt, Sire (59), ...’ Let us ſee the beginning of the preface of the ſame book. Many of you (readers) who ſhall ſee this preſent work, which I have newly reviſed and much enlarged and enriched, have ſeen it before printed in ſeveral ſorts of volumes, and characters, from it's firſt edition, of the year 1570. For ſince that time, there has not a year paſſed, but it has been reprinted (60), and given ſatisfaction to all who have ſeen it, and who approve of what is good. When he dedicated the ſame book to Henry IV in 1594, he thus ſpoke of it to this prince. It has travelled, and ſeen the world, and has been well received within and without the kingdom, and ſtrangers have made it ſpeak their language.

As for his deſire of rewards, it may be clearly enough ſeen in the paſſages I have already related, but it will more plainly ſtill appear in this, that follows (61). I have compoſed this work in four winters, ſeaſons proper for writing and ſtudying, and have ſpent but few ſummers days, in it, which ſeem not ſo fit for ſuch a fatigue, as the ſhort and cold days are which I have employed in it. So that I am apprehenſive of being benummed, unleſs the ſun of your majeſty, by the rays of your liberalities and bounties, afford ſome warmth. There is not a man of letters in your kingdom, who excels in any ſcience, or has compoſed any elegant performance, whom you have not rewarded for it, and all your ancient ſervants, are raiſed to honours and preferments, and are full and rich with your gifts and benefactions. I am the firſt who have written the hiſtory of the kings your anceſtors, and poſſibly the only perſon who hath done it in a good method, and fine language, and I am one of the firſt and eldeſt of your ſervants, and yet I am the only one, and the laſt, to be provided for, but not the laſt in merit, I have laboured, and labour ordinarily for the public, more than for myſelf; nor have I only been engaged in writing books, but alſo ſometimes employed in travels to foreign countries; and by the obſervation of affairs for theſe twenty nine years paſt (62), in which I have been a courtier, I have learnt how hiſtories ought to be written, and how to ſpeak of kings, and treat and write of affairs of ſtate. Here you ſee the ſtyle of a diſcontented author, complaining that he is not enriched, nor advanced to honours, by the productions of his pen, and aſking that this ſo much deſired, ſo well deſerved, recompence of his labours may come at laſt. We find the ſame complaint, at the end of a preface he publiſhed in 1580. I have taken this pains, ſays he. (63) to ſerve the public, which I think I do ſervice, and have done ſervice, by my labours: this gives me a ſingular ſatisfaction; for I have laboured with that deſign. And is likewiſe almoſt all the recompence I have had: and I ſhall be very well ſatisfied with this laſt labour, when I find it has been acceptable to you. You may believe what you pleaſe of what I am going to recite, I will quote my author (64). ‘Henry the great . . . . made one day a repartee to the Sieur du Haillan . . . . for as du Haillian, a man . . . . vain . . . . . and given to his belly . . . . . ſpake one day to the late king too freely, complaining of the ſmall ſalary which he received from his liberality, and had the boldneſs to ſay to him, Sire, you know that I have two pens as a public hiſtorian, a title with which it has pleaſed your majeſty to honour me, one is of gold, and the other of iron: with my golden pen, I render thoſe immortal who honour me and do me good, and with my iron one I tarniſh the reputation of thoſe who do not take notice of the merits of my works.’ The king knowing by this harangue, the character of the man, who was more valiant at a meal, than he was in the field, ſaid to him, with a wonderful and royal quickneſs, Mr du Hallian, I do not believe that you have a golden pen; for if had you one, you would have ſwallowed it long ago.

[M] We might make ſo many reflexions on this picture of du Haillan, that I imagine I ſhall not diſpleaſe the reader by making ſome.] It is not eaſy to let this paſs without ſome reflexion. One who ſhould aſk whether thoſe in public poſts are as mercenary, as the ſervants of a private man, would ſeem at firſt ſight to make an abſurd queſtion; but upon examination, we ſhould find in it a juſt ſubject of a problem, and ſhould even declare for the affirmative. Conſider a little the printed or not printed relations of newswriters, and the converſations of thoſe who have for a long time been in high life. Conſult the hiſtorians who enter moſt into particulars; eſpecially, read the authors of memoirs; do this attentively, and I doubt not but you will own, that a poor foot-boy is in proportion, leſs mercenary, and more diſintereſted, than moſt of thoſe who poſſeſs great employments, either in princes princes houſholds, or in the government. Theſe are perſons who are hardly ever contented, always ready to beg new honours, and greater penſions, and to complain of the ſmallneſs of their recompences, to magnify their ſervices, to murmur if they are forgotten, whilſt others are thought on, to threaten to retire, and to manifeſt their diſcontent, by rude and audacious proceedings, &c. Theſe gentlemen imagine they have the greater right to demand magnificent rewards, becauſe they perſwade themſelves, that their maſter, a king, or a ſovereign, in a word, the public, will never come to want, though they have famiſhed leeches upon them continually ſucking (65). Tell me not of ſuch, or ſuch an one, who are ruined in their prince's ſervice, and of ſuch a great lord, whoſe lands, and even houſe, are under an execution. Theſe are not examples of their diſintereſtedneſs. It is not zeal for their country, but a mercenary temper, or their luxury and debauchery, which are the cauſes of their poverty. They imagined, that by appearing at court, or in the army with great equipages, tho' really uſeleſs to the public good, they ſhould the eaſier come to preferments: and at laſt, if they are ruined, it is not for the advantage of the ſtate, but to gratify their pomp and pride, and other particular paſſions. The Ariſtides and Fabricii, who after having enjoyed the greateſt poſts, and ſpent all their life in a wonderful frugality, had hardly any thing to leave their children, are good examples of an unmercenary ſpirit; but where are ſuch to be found?

But what is more vexatious, is to ſee that the men of learning cannot cure themſelves of this common diſtemper. The court and the army being the ſchools of ambition and luxury, and conſequently of hunger and thirſt after riches, it is no wonder they teach men to do nothing gratis, but to deſire large recompences for their ſervices. And as this paſſion is not eaſy to be ſatisfied, without boaſting of what they have done, and complaining of the want of a juſt reward, there is no occaſion to take ſo much exception at this conduct. But there will ſtill be ſufficent ground to lament, that ſtudy and the profeſſion of letters, ſhould not have taught du Haillan the prudence to avoid ſo much oſtentation of his labours, and to forbear complaints of the meanneſs of his fortune. If he were the only author guilty this way, it would not be neceſſary to take notice of it: but the miſchief of it is, that in this he copied a great number of writers, and that an hundred others have copied, and ſtill copy him. This is a great injury to the muſes, and deprives them of the glory they ſhould enjoy, of inſpiring their votaries with a true generoſity, and a noble contempt of riches and public rewards. They are like other men, you will ſay, and no leſs ſubject to ambition and avarice, the two epidemical diſeaſes of the ſoul of man. It is certain, that the deſire of living at eaſe, by means of a good revenue, is not the only reaſon of the boaſtings and complaints of du Haillan, and thoſe who are like him; pride has a great ſhare in it. They fancy, that the public will have a great eſteem, both for their perſons and their works, if it is known that they have had large penſions (66), but in this they are much miſtaken: ſome few, I confeſs, may be impoſed on by this outward appearance, and argue fallaciouſly thus: ſuch an author has got noble employs, and rides in his coach, therefore he has a great deal of merit and his works are good. But the public is ſeldom caught thus; and however, it is a charm but of ſhort continuance. Poſterity judges of books by the books themſelves: if they are good, it doth not deſpiſe them, tho' it ſhould be ſaid at the beginning of the preface that the author died with hunger: if they are bad, they are deſpiſed, tho' ſhould appear in the firſt page, that the author was an earl, or a marquis, and left a million. What is it you fear? why do you torment your ſelf? might one have asked du Haillan: you are allowed to ſay that you have not ſpared your pains or care to render your work perfect: your duty obliged you to great fatigues, and it is a civility to the public, to declare in a preface, that you have done all you could to merit their approbation. You ought to have ſtopped there, and not to have urged the greatneſs and value of your labours, as a juſt cauſe of demanding greater recompences, and complaining that you had not been ſufficiently paid. Are you afraid that future ages ſhould know that your ſtudies and reſearches have put the hiſtory of France in a very fine light, but have not enriched you? what injury can that do your memory? if it be ſaid that you was not induſtrious to heap up riches, they will ſuppoſe you wanted a quality which is none of the beſt; your glory will not by ſuffer it: ſleep at reſt, if it be ſaid that this induſtry was not above your capacity, but that you did not care to employ it, being content with your books and your ſtudies, and to conſecrate your time to the inſtruction of the public: would not this be an excellent elogy? would it not be a prejudice in favour of your works? if the contempt of riches, and your continual application to writing good books, expoſe you to the danger of dying poor, you ought to wiſh that this may be put in your epitaph (67). This would be equivalent to a title of honour or nobility in the republic of learning; this would be a glorious way to immortality (68). Never fear the judgment of poſterity upon it. If they who were careleſs of recompenſing your labours, are cenſured for their ingratitude and injuſtice, what is that to you? it is a cenſure which doth not fall upon you.

A LAUDABLE paſſage concerning Mr Des Cartes.

It muſt be here ſaid to the glory of Mr Des Cartes, that he preſerved himſelf pure and untainted from this ſhameful diſeaſe, though one of his friends had taken the moſt dangerous ways to infect him with it. Obſerve in what manner this zealous friend excited him to boaſt, and make loud demands of recompence (69). 'Know, that to obtain any thing of the public, it is not enough to mention a word or two concerning it, by the by, in the preface of a book, without ſaying expreſsly that you deſire and expect it, and explaining the reaſons, to prove not only that you deſerve it, but alſo that it is much their intereſt to give it you, and that they ought to expect great advantage from it. It is ſo uſual to ſee thoſe who imagine they have merit, make ſuch a noiſe about it, and ſo importunately aſſert their pretenſions, and promiſe ſo much above what they can do, that when any one ſpeaks modeſtly of himſelf, and deſires nothing of any body, nor makes any confident promiſes, whatever proofs he otherwiſe gives of his ability, that will not be conſidered, they will never think of him. You will ſay perhaps that you are not of a temper, either to ask any thing, or ſpeak to your own advantage; becauſe the one ſeems to be a ſign of meanneſs, and the other of pride. But I maintain that this humour ought to be corrected, and that it proceeds from error and infirmity rather than from an honeſt baſhfulneſs and modeſty . . . You may ſay likewiſe that your works ſpeak ſufficiently, and that you have no need to add promiſes and boaſtings, which being the cuſtom of cheating quacks, ſeem not becoming a man of honour who only ſeeks the truth. But what makes theſe pretenders blame-worthy, is not their boaſting great and good things of themſelves, but only falſe ones, and ſuch as cannot be proved; whereas thoſe things I would have you ſay of yourſelf, are ſo true, and ſo evidently proved by your writings, that by all the laws of decency you may affirm them, and thoſe of charity oblige you to it, becauſe it concerns others to know them. For though your writings ſpeak ſufficiently to ſuch as carefully peruſe them, and are able to underſtand them; yet this is not enough for the deſign I would put you upon, becauſe every one cannot read them, and the managers of public affairs have hardly leiſure. It is probable that ſome who have read them, may ſpeak to them about it: but whatever they may ſay, the little noiſe you are known to make, and the great modeſty you always have obſerved in ſpeaking of your ſelf hinders them from attending much to it. Nay, becauſe they are accuſtomed to hear indifferent people ſet off to them in the moſt advantageous terms imaginable, they have no reaſon to take the moſt extraordinary praiſes that ſhould be given you by thoſe who know you, for exact truth. Wheras when a man ſpeaks of himſelf and ſays extraordinary things, he is heard with greater attention, eſpecially when he is well born, and is known not to be of a temper or condition to play the mountebank. And becauſe he would make himſelf ridiculous by uſing hyperboles on this occaſion, his words are taken literally; and ſuch as will not believe them, are at leaſt excited by their curioſity, or their jealouſy, to examine into the truth of them . . . . This being moſt certain, and ſince it can moſt eaſily be proved by the writings you have already printed, you ought to ſpeak it aloud, to publiſh it ſo aſſiduouſly, and to put it ſo expreſsly in all the ‘ titles of your books, that no body for the future ‘ may be ignorant of it.’ Could Mr Des Cartes's modeſty be attacked by more ſpecious and ſtronger arguments than theſe? Here is nothing omitted, all excuſes foreſtalled, and yet it was all to no purpoſe (70). Note, that the gentleman had good reaſon to tell him, that the public is uſed to be dunned with great importunity and boaſting: becauſe the petitioners know they ſhall otherwiſe obtain nothing. Woe to them who are diſheartened by the firſt refuſal, and cannot ſpeak out in their petitions. Du Haillan knew his cue, when he acted in the manner we have ſeen above. A man muſt complain, and petition often, to be once heard in a court: if cardinal Richelieu was ſuch an one as he is repreſented in the Hiſtory of the French Academy (71), he was a phœnix.

HALI-BEIGH, firſt dragoman at the Grand Seignior's court, in the XVIIth century, was born a Chriſtian in Poland; but being taken very young by the Tartars, he was ſold to the Turks, who educated him in their religion in the Seraglio. His Poliſh name was Albert Bobowſki [A]. He acquired the knowledge of a great number of languages [B], and became ſo learned as to be able to write books [C]. He had a great correſpondence with ſome Engliſhmen, who engaged him to tranſlate ſome books into the Turkiſh language (a). He was deſirous to return to the profeſſion of Chriſtianity; but he died before he executed that noble deſign (b). See the Supplement to Moreri.

(a) See the remark [C].

(b) Leipſic Journal, 1691, pag. 226.

[A] His name was Albert Bobowſki.] This name has been latinized Bobovius; but moſt authors have been miſtaken in it. Sir Paul Ricaut calls this Polander Albert Bobonius (1). Beſpier, his tranſlator, corrects him, and puts Bohonius (2), becauſe Thomas Smith writ it ſo, pag. 39, of his epiſtle de Morib. Turc. 'Tis true, that in this paſſage it is Bozonius, but the errata, ſhews, that it ſhould be read Bohonius. Sir Paul Ricaut's firſt tranſlator (3) has put Robovius.

[B] He acquired the knowledge of a great number of languages.] Give me leave to cite here, ſomewhat at large, the author of the old and new Lacedemon: ‘ Obſerve, ſays he (4), Fornetti, Panagiotti, la Fontaine, and all the other dragomen of the Porte; how ‘ circumſpect they are when they treat with the mini‘ſters of Chriſtian princes, or with thoſe of their re‘tinue. Halybey, the famous Poliſh renegado, who, ‘ bating his apoſtacy, and morally ſpeaking, is one of ‘ the honeſteſt men in the world, does not better ex‘plain himſelf with the Franks, though he be their ‘ great friend; who yet could do it very well, as ‘ ſpeaking eighteen different languages.’

[C] He became ſo learned as to be able to write books.] At Dr Thomas Smith's requeſt, he wrote a treatiſe de Turcarum liturgia, peregrinatione Meccana, circumciſione, ægrotorum viſitatione, &c. —— Concerning the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimage to Mecca, their circumciſion, and viſiting of the ſick, &c. which was publiſhed by Dr Hyde, to whom Dr Smith gave it (5). Hali-Beigh tranſlated into Turkiſh, the Catechiſm of the Church of England, about the year 1653, at Mr Baſire's requeſt He tranſlated all the Bible into the ſame tongue, at the inſtance of Levinus Warnerus, who ſent this tranſlation to Leyden, that it might be printed there. This is not as yet done, but the manuſcript is kept in the library of Leyden. I do not mention a Turkiſh grammar and dictionary, written by the ſame dragoman. Sir Paul Ricaut confeſſes, he had many things from him, which he has related in his book concerning the Preſent State of the Ottoman Empire. If he had conſulted him upon all that he has ſaid, he would not have advanced that the Mahometan women had no hopes of entering into paradiſe. Hali-Beigh maintains the contrary, in the work which Dr Hyde has publiſhed. Rycautum refellit, docuitque mulieres Turcicas omnino ſperare ſe aliquando æque ac viros in Paradiſum receptum iri, quod iſte pag. 271 negaverat (6). Sir Paul Ricaut, amongſt other things, ſays (7), that he learnt from this dragoman, that there are ſome Turks who believe, that the ſouls of dead men enter into the bodies of beaſts, whoſe conſtitution comes neareſt to that of the bodies they have left. A Druggiſt one day told Hali-Beigh, that he prayed to God, with thoſe of the ſame profeſſion (8), that their ſouls might have the honour, after their death, to enter the bodies of camels, becauſe they are ſober, laborious, patient, and gentle creatures, and bring their drugs from the remoteſt countries of the eaſt That he doubted not, but after the revolution of 3365 years, during which his ſoul would travel all the world over, and paſs ſucceſſively from camel to camel, it would return once more into an human body, much purer and more perfect than it had at the beginning. This was the Druggiſt's creed. It is ſaid, that moſt of the Chineſe are much addicted to this opinion. We have in Dr Barrow's Poſthumous Works, an Engliſh relation of a conſpiracy that was formed in the Seraglio, againſt Kioſen, grandmother to Mahomet IV. Albert Bobovius, Muſician of the Seraglio, and eye-witneſs of this event, has written that relation (9).

HALICARNASSUS, the capital city of the kingdom of Caria, was a colony of the Argians (a) [A]. It became famous under the two Artemiſia's, and Mauſolus the huſband of the later. This prince's tomb was a very great ornament to it, being reckoned one of the ſeven wonders of the world. The fountain Salmacis was another curioſity of Halicarnaſſus. There were few towns on that coaſt, which made ſo ſtout a reſiſtance againſt Alexander as this did (b); becauſe care had been taken to fortify it well. Vitruvius (c) tells us ſome particulars about it's conſtruction, and eſpecially concerning it's ports. Meurſius, as learned as he was, applied to the two ports of Rhodes (d), what Vitruvius has only ſaid concerning thoſe of Halicarnaſſus. Alexander was obliged to burn the town, whilſt the garriſon ſtill vigorouſly defended itſelf in the fortreſſes, Herodotus and Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus were born in this city.

ſembly [A]. He publiſhed many books, ſeveral of which have been tranſlated from Engliſh into French by Theodore Jaquemot. They are filled with fine thoughts, excellent morality, and even a great deal of piety. He died in the year 1656, aged eighty two years (b). He was ſo great a lover of ſtudy, that he earneſtly wiſhed that his health would have allowed him to do it, even to exceſs [B]. His writings, when an occaſion offers, ſhow that he was very zealous againſt Popery [C]. Neither was he more favourable to thoſe who ſeparated from the ſtock without an extreme neceſſity. What he ſaid of Arminius is a proof of this [D]. He lamented the diviſions of Proteſtants, (b) Id. ibid.

[A] He was obliged, by ſickneſs, to retire from the Synod of Dort.] A prieſt, who wrote againſt him, did not fail to inſult him upon this deputation; but Joſeph Hall anſwers him as follows (1): 'Let himſelf, or any of his eaves-dropping companions . . . (to whom that place ſtood open) ſay, wherein I ſhamed thoſe that ſent me. It was my juſt grief, that the neceſſity of my health, yea of my life, called me off immaturely; but ſince either death or departure muſt be yielded to, others ſhall judge whether I went away more laden with infirmity, than (however unworthy) with approbation.'

[B] He was ſo great a lover of ſtudy, that he earneſtly wiſhed . . . that his health would have allowed him to do it even to exceſs.] This circumſtance of his life is to be found in one of his letters. 'Fear not my immoderate ſtudy, ſays he, writing to a friend (2), I have a body that controuls me enough in theſe courſes, my friends need not. There is nothing whereof I could ſooner ſurfeit, if I durſt neglect my body to ſatisfy my mind: but while I affect knowledge, my weakneſs checks me, and ſays: Better a little learning, than no health. I yield, and patiently abide myſelf, debarred of my choſen felicity.' How happy are they who with ſouls ſo fond of ſtudy, have bodies able to ſupport themſelves under this earneſt and continual application of mind! Joſeph Hall, not being of this happy number, acted as wiſe men ought on ſuch an occaſion: he curbed his inclination, whenever his body warned him, that his health required that he ſhould do ſo. They who would force nature, and continue poring on their books, even after they find that ſtudy too much heats their blood, or exhauſts their ſpirits, depart too far from the maxim, that life doth not conſiſt in living, but in enjoying health.

At noſtri bene computentur anni;
Et quantum tetricæ tulere febres,
Aut languor gravis, aut mali dolores,
A vita meliore ſeparentur:
Infantes ſumus, & ſenes videmur.
Ætatem Priamique, Neſtoriſque
Longam qui putat eſſe, Martiane,
Multum decipiturque, falliturque.
Non eſt vivere, ſed valere vita (3).

From our account of life if we cut off
What pain, diſeaſes, and the ſpleen have marr'd,
We'll find we were only infants, tho' old men we ſeem:
Priam's and Neſtor's years will ſeem but few,
For only then we live when we are happy.

And if zeal for the ſervice of the public encourage them to neglect their health, it muſt be a miſtaken zeal; for they might be more uſeful to the Republic of Letters, by ſparing than by overſtraining themſelves. A man makes greater progreſs by doing a little every day, than by applying ſo cloſe for ſome weeks in an obſtinate manner, ſo as to occaſion infirmities of a long continuance. Happy, I ſay once more, is he who has ſtrength to ſtudy fourteen or fifteen hours a day, without being ever ſick. An infinite number of men of letters are deprived of this happineſs; ſome few, pauci quos æquus amavit Jupiter, are bleſt with it:

- - - - Unus & alter
Forſitan hæc ſperant juvenes, quibus arte benigna
Et meliore luto finxit præcordia Titan (4).

A few perhaps may with ſuch labour play,
Form'd in a ſtronger mould, of more enduring clay.

[C] He was very zealous againſt Popery.] One may find many proofs of this in his miſcellaneous epiſtles (5). I ſhall only tranſcribe one paſſage out of them; and it ſhall be ſuch that it will ſhow he bore a great hatred to the Jeſuits; and obſerve, that I take it from a letter which contains Joſeph Hall's obſervations in his journey through the Spaniſh Netherlands in 1610. The relations of travellers ordinarily ſhow us what is their prevailing taſte, whether they are antiquaries, phyſicians, geographers, engineers, religious, or bigots, &c. this of Joſeph Hall breathes nothing but controverſy. And accordingly he owns that his deſign was only to relate what he had obſerved as a divine (6): but to return to our purpoſe, let us quote what we have promiſed. 'Along our way, how many churches ſaw we demoliſhed, nothing left but rude heaps to tell the paſſenger, there hath been both devotion and hoſtility. Oh the miſerable footſteps of war, beſides bloodſhed, ruin, and deſolation! Fury hath done that there, which covetouſneſs and ambition with us would do, but ſhall not: the truth within ſhall ſave the walls without. And, to ſpeak truly (whatever the vulgar exclaim) idolatry pulled down thoſe walls (7), not rage. If there had been no Hollander, to raze them, they ſhould have fallen alone, rather than hide ſo much impiety under their guilty roof. Theſe are ſpectacles, not ſo much of cruelty as juſtice; cruelty of man, juſtice of God. But (which I wondered at) churches fall, and Jeſuits colleges riſe every where. There is no city where theſe are not rearing or built. Whence cometh this? Is it for that devotion, is not ſo neceſſary as policy? Thoſe men (as we ſay of the fox) fare beſt when they are moſt curſed. None ſo much ſpited of their own; none ſo hated of all; none ſo oppoſed of by ours: and yet theſe ill weeds grow. Whoſoever lives long, will ſee them feared of their own, which now hate them, ſhall ſee theſe ſeven lean kine devour all the fat beaſts that feed on the meadows of Tyber. I propheſy as Pharaoh dreamed. The event ſhall juſtify my confidence (8).' This prophecy has not as yet had it's accompliſhment: the power of the Jeſuits is much increaſed ſince that time, in ſpite of all the efforts of their adverſaries; but theſe laſt are ſtill very formidable, and give them a great deal to do. They who read the treatiſe of Joſeph Hall, intituled, No Peace with Rome, will be convinced of his zeal againſt Popery. Jaquemot's French verſion of it, was printed at Geneva, in 1629, in 12mo. See likewiſe his Serious Diſſuaſive from Popery, to W. D. revolted, &c (9).

[D] . . . . neither was he more favourable to thoſe, who ſeparated from the ſtock. . . . . What he ſaid of Arminius is a proof of this.] The firſt epiſtle of the third Decade was written to Mr Smith and Mr Rob. Heads of the late ſeparation at Amſterdam. He repreſents to them in very ſtrong terms (10), that they could not do a greater injury to their mother, the church of England, than to fly from her, that ſay ſhe were corrupted yet ſhe was ſtill their mother, which ought to be cauſe enough for them to lament her, to pray for her, to labour for her redreſs, and not to avoid her. This unnaturalneſs is ſhameful. They alledged the command, go out of Babylon (11); but he anſwered them that the church from which they had ſeparated, was gone out of it. 'Babylon, continues he (12), feels it herſelf, and ſees that ſhe is abandoned, and complains to all the world, that we have not only forſaken, but ſpoiled her; . . . . . and except you will be willingly blind, you may ſee the heaps of her altars, the aſhes of her idols, the ruins of her monuments, the condemnation of her errors, and the revenge of her abominations. . . . . Where are the main buildings of that accurſed city? . . . . Where are thoſe rotten heaps (rotten, not through age, but by corruption) of tranſubſtantiating of bread, adoring of images, multitude of ſacraments, power of indulgences, neceſſity of confeſſions, profit of pilgrimages, conſtrained and approved ignorance, unknown devotions; where are thoſe deep vaults (if not mines) of penances, and purgatories, Proteſtants, and wrote ſomething concerning the means of putting an end to them. This was highly agreeable to that great pacificator Dury [E]. Amongſt other controverſies, purgatories, and whatſoever hath been deviſed by thoſe Popelings, whether profitable or glorious, againſt the Lord and his Christ? are they not all razed and buried in the duſt? Hath not the majeſty of her gods, like as was done to Mithra, and Serapis, been long agon offered to the public laughter of the vulgar (13).' They alledged that by conſorting of ceremonies the church of England, tarried ſtill in the ſuburbs of Babylon (14). He anſwers, amongſt other things, that by this manner of arguing, they would find Babylon every where. Would you run from Geneva, asks he (15), becauſe of her wafers (16)? . . . . ' Compare the place you have left, with that you have choſen, let not fear of ſeeming to repent over-ſoon, make you partial. Lo there a common harbour of all opinions, of all hereſies; if not a mixture. Here you drew in the clear and free air of the Goſpel, without that odious compoſition of Judaïſme, Arrianiſme, Anabaptiſme: there you live in the ſtench of theſe and more. You are unworthy of pity, if you will approve your miſery. Say, if you can, that the church of England (if ſhe were not your's) is not an heaven, to Amſterdam (17) . . . . . . Who gains by this ſequeſtration, but Rome and Hell? How do they inſult in this advantage, that our mothers own children condemn her for unclean, that we are daily weakened by our diviſions, that the rude multitude hath ſo palpable a motive to diſtruſt us? . . . . The God of heaven open your eyes, that you may ſee the injuſtice of that zeal, which hath tranſported you, ... otherwiſe your ſouls ſhall find too late, that it had been a thouſand times better to ſwallow a ceremony, than to rend a church: yea, that even whoredoms and murders ſhall abide an eaſier anſwer than ſeparation (18).'

To all this we may add the reaſons which he gives in the fifth letter of the VI Decade (19), and the praiſes he beſtows on the memory of Junius, in another letter (20). It is in a letter wherein he deplores the diviſions among the Leyden divines, and wherein he pathetically deſcribes the miſeries which the church ſuffers by theſe kind of civil wars. Here follows the exhortation which he addreſſeth to the profeſſor who gave occaſion to theſe diviſions. ' If I might challenge ought in that your acute and learned Arminius; I would thus ſollicit and conjure him; alas, that ſo wiſe a man ſhould not know the worth of peace; that ſo noble a ſon of the church ſhould not be brought to light, without ripping the womb of his mother! What mean theſe ſubtle novelties? If they make thee famous, and the church miſerable, who ſhall gain by them? Is ſingularity ſo precious, that it ſhould coſt no leſs, than the ſafety and quiet of our common mother? If it be truth thou affecteſt; what alone? Could never any eyes (till thine) be bleſſed with this object? Where hath that ſacred verity hid herſelf thus long from all her careful inquiſitors, that ſhe now firſt ſhews her head to thee, unſought? Hath the Goſpel ſhone thus long, and bright, and left ſome corners unſeen? Away with all new truths; fair and plauſible they may be, ſound they cannot: ſome may admire thee for them; none ſhall bleſs thee. But grant that ſome of theſe are no leſs true than nice points; what do theſe unſeaſonable crotchets, and quavers trouble the harmonious plain ſongs of our peace? Some quiet error may be better than ſome unruly truth. Who binds us to ſpeak all we think? So the church may be ſtill, would God thou wert wiſe alone. Did not our adverſaries quarrel enough before at our quarrels? Were they not rich enough with our ſpoils? By the dear name of our common parents, what meaneſt thou Arminius? Whether tend theſe new raiſed diſſenſions? Who ſhall thrive by them, but they which inſult upon us, and riſe by the fall of truth? Who ſhall be undone, but thy bretheren? By that moſt precious and bloody ranſom of our Saviour, and by that awful appearance we ſhall once make before the glorious tribunal of the Son of God, remember thy ſelf, and the poor diſtracted limbs of the church, let not thoſe excellent parts wherewith God has furniſhed thee, lie in the narrow way, and cauſe any weak one either to fall, or ſtumble or err. For God's ſake, either ſay nothing or the ſame. How many great wits have ſought no by-paths, and now are happy with their fellows! Let it be no diſparagement to go with many to heaven. What could he reply to ſo plain a charge (21).' We muſt not forget that he inſinuates that the adverſaries of Arminius beſtirred themſelves too much. Neither Gomarus, adds he (22), nor your other grave fraternity of reverend divines, have been ſilent in ſo main a cauſe. I fear rather too much noiſe in any of theſe tumults: there may too many contend, not intreat, multitude of ſuiters is commonly powerful; how much more in juſt motions? . . . . Wiſdom and charity could teach us to avoid the prejudice of differences. If we had but theſe two virtues, quarrels ſhould not hurt us, nor the church by us: but (alas!) ſelf-love is too ſtrong for both theſe: this alone opens the flood-gates of diſſenſion, and drowns the ſweet, but low, valley of the church. Men eſteem of opinions, becauſe their own; and will have truth ſerve, not govern. What they have undertaken, muſt be true: victory is ſought for, not ſatisfaction; victory of the author, not of the cauſe. He is a rare man that knows to yield as well as to argue (23). Theſe are excellent thoughts, and make a fine ſupplement to my articles of Arminius and Gomarus (24). Obſerve that the ſermon, which Joſeph Hall preached before the ſynod of Dort, turned chiefly on this maxim, that we ought not to affect ſubtilties in matters of religion. He maintained that the Remonſtrants by their too great deſire of ſubtiliſing, had been the cauſe of the diſorders which at that time embroiled the church (25).

The letter which he wrote to a man very unſettled in religion, will convince us of his earneſt deſire of ſeing perfect concord reign in the church. You are, ſays he to him (26), to day in the tents of the Romaniſts, to morrow in ours, the next day between both, againſt both. Our adverſaries think you ours, we theirs . . . What hinders you? is it our diviſions? I ſee you ſhake your head at this, and by your ſilent geſture bewray this the cauſe of your diſtaſte: would GOD I could either deny this with truth, or amend it with tears: but I grant it with no leſs ſorrow, than you with offence. This earth hath nothing more lamentable, than the civil jarrs of one faith (27). He goes on to anſwer the pretext, which ſome take from theſe diviſions to join with no party; and maintains that not only no communities, is exempt from diviſions, but likewiſe that every particular perſon is expoſed to them. Shew me that church which hath not complained of diſtraction; yea that family, yea that fraternity, yea that man, that always agrees with himſelf. See if the ſpouſe of CHRIST in that heavenly marriage-ſong, do not call him a young Hart in the mountains of diviſion. Tell me then whither will you go for truth? if you will own no truth but where there is no diviſion? To Rome perhaps famous for unity, famous for peace. See now how happily you have choſen, how well you have ſped. Lo then, cardinal Bellarmin himſelf, a witneſs above exception, under his own hand acknowledgeth to the world, and reckons up 237 contrarieties of doctrine among the Romiſh divines (28) ' If our church diſpleaſe you for differences, continues he (29), theirs much more, unleſs you will be either wilfully incredulous, or wilfully partial: unleſs you diſlike a miſchief the leſs for the ſecrecy (30). What will you do then? Will you be a church alone? Alas, how full of contradictions are you to your ſelf! how full of contrary purpoſes! how often do you chide with yourſelf! how often do you fight with yourſelf?

Let us obſerve, by the by, that what he here ſays of Bellarmin, was diſputed: an Engliſh prieſt pretended that it was a ſhameleſs aſſertion (31). Joſeph Hall among other things anſwered (32), that he had reckoned the 237 contrarieties, according to Pappus's enumeration, and that his Peace of Rome, makes up 103. This Peace of Rome is a book of Joſeph Hall. One might have put this queſtion to him: If you had found the enumeration of Pappus juſt, why do you in this book content your ſelf with objecting 103 contrarieties? and if you found it not juſt, why do you in your letter object 237 diſputes?

[E] This was highly agreeable to that great pacificator Dury.] He, in the year 1634, publiſhed the advices troverſies, he wrote concerning the vow of celibacy [F]; and when he was informed that Marcus Antonius de Dominis deſigned to return from England into Italy; he wrote a letter to him repreſenting the neceſſity of remaining ſeparate from the communion of the church of Rome. This letter has been inſerted at large in the anſwer of Marcus Antonius de Dominis (c). His Miſcellaneous Epiſtles are very good: they are without date; but being dedicated to prince Henry (d), eldeſt ſon to king James I, we may conclude that they were wrote before the year 1613. He obſerves, in his epiſtle dedicatory, that it was not as yet uſual in England, to publiſh diſcourſes in form of letters, advices of ſome French divines, and of three Engliſh biſhops, concerning the way to reconcile Proteſtants. Our Joſeph Hall was one of theſe three biſhops. Davenant and Morton were the other two. The Irænicorum Tractatuum Prodromus, publiſhed by Dury, in 1662, contains two pieces of Joſeph Hall. The one is intituled, Columba Noæ olivam adferens jactatiſſimæ Chriſti Arcæ, præſertim adverſus machinationes Pontificiorum. It is a ſermon which he preached before a ſynod at London. The other is intituled Pax terris, continens varia ad concordiam inter Chriſtianos hoc tempore ſuadendam Conſilia & Argumenta.

[F] Among other controverſies he wrote concerning the vow of celibacy.] The third letter of the ſecond decad, is intituled an Apologetical Diſcourſe of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons. It coſt the author only three hours, and three leaves of paper (33). It conſiſts of twenty three pages in 12mo, in the French tranſlation of Jaquemot. Twelve years after, an Engliſh prieſt anſwered it, in a piece of 380 pages (34). Joſeph Hall very quickly replied in a book which he intituled, the Honour of the married Clergy, maintained againſt the malicious challenges of C.E. Maſs-prieſt. He publiſhed it in Engliſh in 1620. The French verſion by Jaquemot, was printed at Geneva in 1665, and contains 362 pages in 12mo. The author was glad to ſhow his diligence, that his ſelf-conceited adverſary and his ſeduced abettors, might ſee how little a well ordered marriage is guilty of deadening our ſpirits, or ſlackening our hands (35). Notwithſtanding he was married he began this reply, and wrote it twice over with his own hand, in a very ſhort time; tho' he made it only the recreation of the weightier buſineſs of his calling, which then more than ordinarily urged him. (36). This gives us ground to conjecture, that the Engliſh prieſt, had made uſe of the common argument, that marriage diverts too much from ſtudy (37). Some expreſſions had eſcaped biſhop Hall, which ſeemed to import, that continence was a thing impoſſible; he was a little embaraſſed with the conſequences! which his adverſary drew from that aſſertion. Here follows one of the objections of the Engliſh prieſt (38). Mr Hall was abſent in France; fleſh is frail, temptations frequent, yet both then and before his marriage, he would take it in great ſcorn, to be ſuſpected for diſhoneſt. If Mr Hall could for ſo long time together, live a chaſte life, why no more? he anſwered that this concluſion was not good, and compares it to theſe following. A good ſwimmer may hold his breath under the water for ſome minutes, why not for an hour? why not for more? a devout Papiſt may faſt after his breakfaſt, till his dinner in the afternoon, therefore why not a week? why not a month, why not as long as Eve the maid of Meurs (39)? after this, he, amongſt other things, anſwers that St Paul* having allowed the married to ſeparate with conſent for a time, that they might give themſelves to faſting and prayer, commands them to come together again, that ſatan tempt them not for their incontinency. Which ſuppoſeth, that tho' a perſon may contain for ſome days, it doth not hence follow, that he can do ſo for his whole life. Where there is an impoſſibility, objected they to Hall, (40) or a neceſſity, there is no ſin, no counſel, as no man ſins in not making new ſtars, in not doing miracles. He anſwered (41) that this is ' a ſtale ſhift, that oft ' ſounded in the ears of Auſtin and Proſper from their ' Pelagians.' It is objected likewiſe to him (42) that the father cannot blame his child for incontinence; to contain, implies impoſſibility: to provide an huſband or a wife (43) is not a work of an hour's warning; in the mean time what ſhall they do? ' Certainly, anſwers he (44) the ' man thinks of thoſe hot regions of his religion, ' where they are ſo ſharp ſet, that they muſt have ' ſtews allowed of one ſex at leaſt; elſe what ſtrange ' violence is this that he conceives? as our Junius ' anſwered his Bellarmine in the like, Hic homo ſibi ' videtur agere de equis admiſſariis ruentibus in venerem, & de hippomane, non de hominibus ratione præditis. He ſpeaks as if he had to do with ſtallions, ' not with men, not with Chriſtians, amongſt whom ' is to be ſuppoſed a decent order, and due regard ' of ſeaſonableneſs. and expediency.' Laſtly, they object the caſe of divorce to him: the huſband and wife are ſeparated upon diſcord, or diſeaſe: what ſhall they do? to live continent with this man is impoſſible, I anſwer; if only their will ſunders them, that muſt yield to neceſſity. Diſſention may not abridge them of the neceſſary remedy of ſin: if neceſſity, that finds relief in their prayers; if they call on him who calls them to continency by this hand of his, he will hear them, and enable them to perſiſt, and why not then in the neceſſity of our vows? this is a neceſſity of our own making; and that of his; he hath bound himſelf, to keep his own promiſes, not ours (45).

Whoever will impartially examine theſe anſwers of Mr Hall, will find them but weak. He fairs in the ſame manner as a general, who having engaged himſelf too far in the enemy's country, cannot make a retreat without the loſs of his rear. A clergyman, who will own that continence is beyond the power of man, and who ſhall give this as the reaſon why he married, will give great reaſon to ſupect his conduct in the time that preceded his marriage, a time when he was ſtill younger than when he took a wife. For if to juſtify himſelf as to that time, he ſhall ſay, that he was not then in love; but that at laſt, a certain woman having touched him by certain ſympathies, which are to be found in nature, and by certain machinal proportions betwixt the objects and the faculties (46); he found himſelf deprived of the power of containing himſelf, which he before enjoyed; if I ſay he ſhould make uſe of ſuch an apology, he would expoſe himſelf to very ticklish and embaraſſing queſtions. How have you behaved, might one aſk him, ſince that fatal occaſion, in which you fell in love? you have been employed five or ſix months, perhaps a year, in courting the beloved object, and in ſettling the marriage articles with her parents, your love deprived you of continence, you muſt needs then have fallen into irregularities. But what would you have done, if a married woman had ſtruck you by theſe ſympathies, or proportions, of which you talk? would you have been able to contain? if ſo, then love and continence are not incompatible, and ſo you fall into a contradiction. If you ſhould not have been able to contain, you muſt have fallen either into real or mental adultery. Suppoſe after your marriage, your maid, who poſſibly may be younger and handſomer than your ſpouſe, ſhall be placed with regard to you in theſe machinal proportions, you preſently fall in love with her, and conſequently you are not able to contain. The ſame thing will happen, if a married woman find herſelf in theſe proportions; and ſo one cannot depend upon your virtue: one muſt be daily affraid that your conduct will give ſcandal, or at leaſt conſider you as a perſon, whoſe virtue reſts on a weak foundation. It is certain, that a man, whoſe profeſſion obliges him not only to a good life, but to paſs for chaſte, cannot handſomely own that he married becauſe he found it impoſible for him to contain. He ought to ſay, that he could have contained, and that he married only that he might have children, domeſtic ſociety, a faithful friend, &c. Let us therefore conclude, that the controverſy concerning celibacy, cannot be well handled, if we do not take care not to expoſe ourſelves too much to the cannon of the enemy. Mr Hall is much more ſucceſsful when he comes to prove the bad effects of monaſtic vows: he doth not want abundance of citations. Here follows one (47). Do not our hiſtories tell us, that in the reign of Henry III, Robert Groſthead, the famous biſhop of Lincoln, in

For the reſt, it is not only among Proteſtants that continence has been thought impoſſible: ſome Roman Catholics have been of the ſame opinion; for they laughed at the Eccleſiaſtics who abſtained from adultery and fornication, and reckoned them either eunuchs or Sodomites, and there have been pariſhes which obliged their prieſts to keep a concubine: without that precaution, they did not think the honour of their wives ſecure, and that even that did not free them altogether from danger. Nicholas de Clemangis tells us theſe things. Taceo de fornicationibus & adulteriis (Clericorum) a quibus qui alieni ſunt, probo cæteris ac ludibrio eſſe ſolent, ſpadoneſque aut Sodomitæ appellantur, denique Laici uſque adeo perſuaſum habent nullos Cælibes eſſe ut in pleriſque parochiis non aliter velint Præsbyterum tolerare, niſi Concubinam habeat, quo vel ſic ſuis ſit conſultum uxoribus, quæ nec ſic quidem uſque quaque ſunt extra periculum (48).

[G] There is a book intituled Mundus alter & idem * aſcribed to him.] It is a learned and ingenious fiction, wherein he deſcribes the vicious manners of ſeveral nations, the drunkenneſs of one, the leudneſs of others &c; the court of Rome is not ſpared here. The author compoſed this book while he ſtudied human learning; and afterwards having applied himſelf to divinity, he neglected it as a trifle. But his friend William Knight, did not conſider it as ſuch, he thought it ſo deſerving of ſeeing the light, that he publiſhed it, tho' by ſo doing he was afraid that he ſhould incur the diſpleaſure of the author, who had entruſted him with the manuſcript. This he tells us at large in the preface. I do not know in what year he publiſhed it. I have only the Utrecht edition of 1643 in 12mo, to which is joined, becauſe of the conformity of the matter, Campanella's city of the Sun, and the new Atlantis of chancellor Bacon. This work of Joſeph Hall is divided into four books, and adorned with maps, it contains 213 pages in this Utrecht edition. The reader probably will be glad to ſee the opinion of Mr Naudé concerning it. After having mentioned More's Utopia, and the City of the Sun. He ſpeaks of it as follows. ‘ Ultimum verò Angli, ‘ neſcio cujus, Mundus Alter & Idem, non ita dudum ‘ prodiit; aut veriùs Satyra adverſùs depravatos præ‘ſentis ſeculi mores; in quo dum ſingulas ſtationes ſin‘gulis vitiis adſignat, genteſque illas incolentes ac ‘ loca ipſa, contorticulatis ingenioſè, fictiſque ex cu‘juſque rei natura vocibus adpellat, non ineptè meô judiciô Poneropolim inſtituit, quæ ad hilaritatem non ‘ minùs homines excitare, quàm ad virtutem inflam‘mare poſſit (49). —— And laſt of all, the Mundus ‘ Alter & Idem, of a certain Engliſhman, was not long ‘ ſince publiſhed; or rather, a ſatire againſt the corrupt ‘ manners of the preſent age; in which, while he aſſigns ‘ ſeparate ſtations to the ſeveral vices, and diſtinguiſheth ‘ the nations inhabiting them, and the places themſelves ‘ by names ingeniouſly compounded and feigned, ſuitably ‘ to the nature of every thing, he, in my opinion, founds a ‘ Poneropolis †, which will no leſs divert the readers, ‘ than inflame their minds with the love of virtue.’

Much may be ſaid on both ſides on this ſubject. Our author is not the only perſon who has complained of the bad effects of travelling. Thomas Lanſius (50) has ſometimes declaimed on this ſubject. HALL (RICHARD), an Engliſh divine of the Romiſh communion, was, if I am not miſtaſten, one of thoſe who left England on account of the penal laws enacted there againſt the Papiſts by queen Elizabeth. He retired to the Spaniſh Netherlands, and was profeſſor of divinity at Douay, and canon of St Omer. He publiſhed, amongſt other things [A], a diſcourſe concerning the origin of the troubles of that country. He was not qualified to handle this ſubject; for on the one hand his gratitude to the king of Spain, under whoſe protection he lived, and on the other, his reſentment on the account of his exile which ſoured him againſt all Proteſtants, hindered him from judging equitably of the conduct of the provinces which revolted from Philip II. Accordingly, it is certain that he diſcovered a great deal of paſſion in this book [B]. He died in the year 1604 (a).

(a) Witte, in Diar. Biograph.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Here follows a catalogue of all his writings which have come to my knowledge, the preface to a book of Joannes Giovanus de Schiſmate ſeu Eccleſiaſticæ Unionis diviſione, printed at Louvain, in 1573, in 8vo: De tribus primariis cauſis Tumultuum Belgicorum, & contra coalitionem multarum Religionum, quam liberam Religionem vocant, at Douay, in 1581, in 8vo. Pro Defenſione Regiæ & Epiſcopalis auctoritates contra rebelles, ibid. in 1584, in 8vo. De quinque partita conſcientia libri tres, ibid. 1598, in 8vo. De Proprietate & Veſtiario Monachorum, aliiſque ad hoc vitium extirpandum neceſſariis, ibid. 1585, in 8vo.

[B] He diſcovered a great deal of paſſion in that work.] Eſpecially againſt the prince of Orange; for he employs whole chapters to prove that he is a tyrant; that he, like Abſalom, aſpired to the kingdom by tyrannical means; that he had all the ten qualities which, according to Bartolus, form the character of a tyrant, &c. He compares him to Julian the apoſtate, and omitted no ſort of invectives againſt this prince and his adherents (1), and to animate the Catholics againſt granting a liberty of conſcience, which the Proteſtants ſought for (2). A man who had ſo many perſonal reaſons to be partial to the king of Spain, and ſoured againſt Holland, ought not to pretend to write concerning the cauſes of this civil war. An hiſtorian ought to be perfectly diſintereſſed; and whenever a man conceives a reſentment againſt a nation, he ought to abſtain from writing it's hiſtory, eſpecially when, by indulging his peeviſhneſs never ſo little, he will give great ſatisfaction to another nation, for which he ought to have complaiſance and gratitude. Such a man, I ſay, ought to exclude himſelf, as judges, who are men of honour, do when they are intereſſed in any cauſe (3). Hiſtory ought not to be handled but by clean hands, we ſhould leave the writing it to thoſe who have not embrued their hands in the combat, neither in the figurative nor proper ſenſe; at leaſt they ought to ſtay till time has cleanſed their ſpots and healed their wounds. It ought to be revered like the Penates of the ancients:

HALLÉ (PETER), profeſſor of canon-law in the univerſity of Paris, was born at Bayeux in Normandy, the eighth of September, 1611. He ſtudied philoſophy, law, and divinity, in the univerſity of Caen for five years. We muſt add, that he there alſo very ſtudiouſly cultivated poetry, in which Antony Hallé his relation, and one of the great poets of his age, gave him good inſtructions. He had inſinuated himſelf into his favour, by publiſhing ſome poems; and he made ſo good uſe of this illuſtrious kinſman's leſſons, that he carried the prize at Caen and Rouen, in the poetical conteſts which are celebrated there every year (a). He got ſuch a reputation by it, that though he was very young, he had the rhetoric claſs given him in the univerſity of Caen. Some time after, being rector of the univerſity, he harangued Mr Seguier, chancellor of France [A], at the head of the four faculties. His ſpeech was highly approved, and procured him the eſteem and protection of that chancellor, ſo far as to receive from his hand the degree of doctor of the civil-law, in preſence of the great council, the eighteenth of March 1640, have firſt defended ſome theſes in that illuſtrious aſſembly (b). He followed Mr Seguier to Paris, and made himſelf ſo advantageouſly known by ſome pieces, which he publiſhed, that he was offered the place of teacher in five ſeveral colleges, and was extraordinarily admitted into the body of the univerſity (c), the fourteenth of Auguſt 1651. He choſe rather to teach in the college of Harcourt than in any other; where he had a great croud of auditors. He publiſhed from time to time ſome Latin poems which increaſed his reputation, and gave occaſion to his patron to procure him the place of poet to his majeſty, and reader in Latin and Greek in the royal college the eighteenth of December 1646. His too violent application to ſtudy having ruined his health, he was forced to reſt two years to re-eſtabliſh it; when he was recovered he reſolved to reſtore the Faculty of Law to ſome credit, which was fallen to a very low ebb, having but one profeſſor remaining in it [B]. He was made Regius profeſſor of the canon-law in 1655, and he uſed all his endeavours to raiſe and encourage the ſtudy of this ſcience, the rights whereof he ſtrenuouſly ſupported [C], notwithſtanding the oppoſitions he met with. It is to him, eſpecially, we ought to aſcribe the advantage the profeſſors of Paris have enjoyed ſince the year 1679 [D]. He compoſed ſome very good books [E], and had the ſatisfaction to have the moſt famous learned men for [A] Mr Seguier, chancellor of France.] He was gone into Normandy to pacify popular tumults, which cauſed great diſorders in many places of that province.

[B] The faculty of law . . . . was fallen very low, having but one profeſſor left.] This profeſſor was Mr Doujat. The Faculty had loſt in a little time Francis Florent, and John Dartis. In juridicam deinde ſcholam geminato Franciſci Florentis, & Joannis Dartiſii funere afflictam ac prope deſertam cum Joanne Doujatio Collega primario extra ordinem accitus (1) anno 1655. Thus ſpeaks Mr Pinſſon-des-Riolles in an inſcription which he publiſhed in honour of our Hallé.

Hence aroſe many ſuits. ' Hinc obortæ lites: vicina Juris Collegia in eos acriter inſurrexerunt, & eos tum ad Senatum, tum ad Regis conſiſtorium traduxerunt. Ut tot malis ſuccurreret Hallæus, viginti quatuor viros pietate & doctrinâ commendatiſſimos, tanquam adjutores, in facultatem, re cum ſuis Collegis priùs communicata, adſcivit: facultate vix ab externo hoſte quietâ, nonnulli ex Doctoribus honorariis, Collegarum diſcordias in ſuum commodum alentes, plurima Anteceſſorum Jura ſibi arrogare tentabant. 'The neighbouring colleges of the law vigorouſly oppoſed them, and ſummoned them, both before the parliament and the king's council. Mr Hallé, to prevent ſo many diſaſters with which they were threatened, with the conſent of his colleagues, admitted twenty four men of eminent learning and piety into the Faculty, as coadjutors: the Faculty were ſcarce at reſt from theſe attacks from abroad, when ſome of the honorary doctors, cheriſhing the diſcords of their colleagues for their own private ends, arrogated ſeveral of the privileges of the teaching profeſſors to themſelves. In theſe troubleſome times, when the Faculty ſeemed to be quite divided, he was for ſome time at a ſtand, but theſe ſtorms being blown over, and peace reſtored to the ſociety, he laid aſide all avocations, and applied himſelf with the utmoſt diligence to the reſtoring of the ſtudy of the law.'*

Ovid tells us, that when he cut down the tree, a voice was heard, and blood ſprung out.*' Ovid, cited by this grammarian, has elegantly deſcribed the complaints and misfortune of the Hamadryade whom the impious Eryſichthon deſtroyed. She lived in an old oak of a prodigious bigneſs which all the world reverenced.

GARTH.

Some grammarians divide what Servius unites. They will have the Hamadryades to be ſo called, either becauſe they were born, or becauſe they died with the oaks. Ἁμαδρυάδας νύμφας μνησίμαχος φησὶ, διὰ τὸ ἅμα ταῖς δρυσὶ γεννᾶσθαι· ἢ ἐπεὶ δοκοῦσιν ἅμα ταῖς δρυσὶ φθείρεσθαι, νύμφαι ἁμαδρυάδης λέγονται (3). This diviſion ought to be rejected, becauſe the general opinion is, that the life of theſe nymphs was preciſely of the ſame continuance with that of their trees. Hence Pindar, in a poem that is loſt, ſaid, ἰσοδένδρου τέκμαρ αἰῶνος λαχοῦσα, finem ævi æqualis arbori nacta. — Having obtained a life equal that of a tree. Callimachus has this expreſſion; ἥλικος ἀσθμαίνουσα περὶ δρυὸς, coætaneam ingemiſcens propter quercum (4), — Sighing for the tree along with which ſhe was born, ſpeaking of the Hamadryade Melia. Apollonius imitated him, when he introduced an Hamadryade intreating one not to cut down a certain tree.

Add to theſe teſtimonies the authority of Homer. We read in one of his hymns, that there were trees who were born at the ſame time with the nymphs, and that theſe died when the trees decayed.

Together with theſe nymphs, from earth's moiſt bed

And, when they yield to death's all-powerful ſway,

And nymphs and trees together die away.

Statius makes mention of a wood that had out-lived the Nymphs and Fauni: but this does not contradict the tradition concerning the Hamadryades. Beſides, who knows not that this poet's ſallies had no reſpect for any thing; therefore there is no reaſon to attend to them, as to things which can be oppoſed to the general opinion. You will ſee his words in the remark [D]. Auſonius, more remote than he from the fountain-head, has notwithſtanding conformed more to the old tradition. Non ſine Hamadryadis fato, ſays he (7), cadit arborea trabs.

Note, that Pauſanias expreſſes himſelf in a manner that ſeems to prove that the Hamadryades were younger than their trees. Speaking of a town called Tithorea, he ſays (8), Τιθορέαν δὲ, οἱ ἐπιχώριοι κληθῆναι φασὶν ἀπὸ Τιθορέας νύμφης, οἷαι τῷ ἀρχαίῳ λόγῳ τῶν ποιητῶν ἐφύοντο ἀπό τε ἄλλων δένδρων, καὶ μάλιστα ἀπὸ τῶν δρυῶν. Tithoream incolæ vocatam eſſe dicunt à Tithorea Nympha, de iis una quas priſci poëtarum ſermones, quum ex cæteris arboribus, tum vero è quercubus maxime genitas prodiderunt. — The inhabitants ſay, that it was called Tithorea, from a nymph of that name, and of that kind which the poets ſay proceed from trees, and eſpecially from oaks. This is making the trees the mothers of the Hamadryades: and therefore it is not true that they were born at the ſame time. But I do not think Pauſanias's expreſſions are to be much inſiſted on: it was not his buſineſs preciſely to deſcribe the nature of theſe old fables. Let us ſtick therefore to what the poets affirm, that theſe nymphs and trees were born at the ſame time. Obſerve that Pauſanias takes notice that they were eſpecially born of the oak. I do not ſee that this can be impugned by Pherenicus's authority; for what he ſays does not ſeem to concern the Hamadryades, properly ſo called. He ſays (9) that the fig-tree was called συκῆ, from a daughter of Oxylus; and that this Oxylus having lain with Hamadryade, his ſiſter, begot eight daughters, which were all called nymphs Hamadryades; but they had each a particular name, which was afterwards given to trees. She that was called συκῆ, Syce, and gave origin to the name of the fig-tree: It ſeems to me that Hamadryade, Oxylus's ſiſter, was not of the ſame kind with the nymphs ſpoken of in this article. Let this be ſaid without offending a famous author (10).

[B] It is ſaid they were ſometimes extremely grateful to thoſe who preſerved them from death.] One Rhæcus perceiving that an oak was ready to fall, commanded his children to prevent it, either by ſtrengthning it at the root with earth, or underpropping it. The nymph who muſt have periſhed if the oak had fallen, appeared to Rhæcus, and thanked him for ſaving her life, offering him any recompence he deſired; he anſwered he deſired to enjoy her. The nymph promiſed to grant his requeſt, and commanded him to abſtain from all other women; ſhe added that a bee ſhould be the meſſenger betwixt them: but the bee happening to come whilſt Rhæcus was playing, he ſaid ſome rude things, which provoked the Hamadryade ſo much, that he was maimed for it (11). This is the account of Charon of Lampſacus, if we believe the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius. He told another ſtory with a more happy concluſion: which is this, as I find it in Natalis Comes, who does not cite the author he had it from. Arcas, the ſon of Jupiter and Calliſto, hunting in a wood, met with an Hamadryade in great danger of periſhing; for the tree with which ſhe was born, had been very much damaged in it's roots by the ſtream of a river: ſhe prayed Arcas to ſave her life; he granted her requeſt, by turning the courſe of the river, and putting new earth about the tree. The nymph was not ungrateful, ſhe granted him what we call the laſt favour and had two children by him; her name was Proſpelea (12). We only find in Pauſanias that Arcas was married to a Dryade nymph, called Erato, by whom he had three boys (13). We might conclude from this, that tho' the Hamadryades could not ſurvive their oak, or their fir, &c. they might ſometimes leave them, and if this conſequence was doubtful, it might be confirmed by a paſſage of Homer, where we find that the ſame nymphs which had their birth and death with trees, taſted the pleaſures of love in caves with the Sileni.

[C] They who had no regard . . . to their intreaties . . . were puniſhed for it.] Apollonius relates that Periboea's father drew an heavy curſe on himſelf and his children, becauſe he had cut down a tree which a nymph had intreated him to ſpare. She had lived many ages in it, we have ſeen above her ſupplication; here follows the ſequel.

Αὐτὰρ ὅ τήν γε
Ἀφραδέως ἔτμηξεν, ἀγηνορίῃ νεότητος.
Τῷ δ' ἄρα νεκερδῆ νύμφη πόρεν οἶτον ὀπίσσω
Αὐτῷ καὶ τεκέεσσιν.

Quamobrem inutile deinde manupretium nympha
Et ipſi perſolvit & generi (15).

The thoughtleſs youth, by cutting down the tree,
Entail'd a curſe on his poſterity.

[D] There was nothing that lived ſo long as this kind of nymphs.] Auſonius tells us this in the following verſes, which are a verſion from Heſiod's Greek.

Ter binos deciesque novem ſuper exit in annos,
Juſta ſeneſcentum quos implet vita virorum.
Hos novies ſuperat vivendo garrula cornix:
Et quater egreditur cornicis ſecula cervus.
Alipedem cervum ter vincit corvus: & illum
Multiplicat novies Phœnix, reparabilis ales.
Quam vos perpetuo decies prævertitis ævo
Nymphæ Hamadryades, quarum longiſſima vita eſt.
Hi cohibent fines vivacia fata animantum.
Cætera ſecreti novit Deus arbiter ævi
Tempora (16).

The life of man, compleat and full of day,
To ninety ſix it's lengthen'd years extends:
Nine times this term the raucous crow exceeds:
The ſtag compleats four ages of the crow:
The raven thrice outlives the winged ſtag;
Whoſe life the phœnix nine times multiplies.
And you, ye long-liv'd Hamadryad nymphs,
Ten periods of the live-long phœnix ſee.
Theſe bounds of life to animals are giv'n;
All farther terms the gods alone can tell.

Heſiod's poem which contained this doctrine is loſt; but we may ſee a fragment of it, in five verſes, in a tract of Plutarch. I will cite a paſſage out of that tract.

The poets have ſometimes taken the Hamadryades for the Naïades [E]: they did not confine

We ſhall learn from it, that ſome Heathens maintained the mortality of the deities of the ſecond rank. ‘ Heſiod is the firſt who clearly diſtinguiſhed four kinds of reaſonable natures; the gods, the dæmons, which are many in number, and good beings, the demy-gods, and men. He thinks that the dæmons themſelves, after ſome revolutions of time, come to die; for ſpeaking in the perſon of a naïd, he denotes the period of their duration.

Neuf hommes vit la corneille criarde;
Le cerf autant quatre fois vif ſe garde,
Le corbeau noir ſi longuement vieillit,
Que de trois cerſs les vies il emplit,
Et le Phenix de neuf corbeaux égale
Les jours, mais vous, progenie Royale
De Jupiter, Nymphes aux chefs plaiſans,
De dix Phenix vous fourniſſez les ans.

Nine times the croaking crow outlives a man:
Four times this ſpace the ſtag continues life:
The raven black ſo lengthens out old age,
That of three ſtags he meaſures out the lives.
The phœnix' life that of nine ravens equals.
But you, ye royal progency of Jove,
Ye Hamadryad nymphs, that haunt the woods,
Ten ages of the long liv'd phœnix know.

‘ Now they that miſtake the poet's meaning in the word Genean, that is, the age of man, make this calculation of time to amount to a vaſt number of years; for it only ſignifies one year, ſo that the ſum total amounts but to nine thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty years, which is the age of dæmons. And there are many mathematicians, who make it ſhorter. Even Pindar has not made it greater, when he ſays, the life of nymphs is appointed equal to that of trees, and therefore they are called Hamadryades, becauſe they are born and die with oaks (17).’ Plutarch deſerves ſome cenſure, for not citing the verſe in which Heſiod determined the duration of human life: for it was the baſis of all the following calculations. I may ſuppoſe that Heſiod determined this duration, ſince his tranſlator begins with ſaying, the age of man contained ninety ſix years. This period being granted, it is eaſy to compute the age of ſtags, ravens, &c. and we find that the crow lived 864 years, the ſtag 3456, the raven 10368, the phœnix 93312, and the Hamadryad 933120. All this is ridiculous, and Pliny has reaſon to reject it as fabulous. ‘ De ſpatio atque longinquitate vitæ hominum, non locorum modo ſitus, verum exempla, ac ſua cuique ſors naſcendi incertum fecere. Heſiodus, qui primus aliqua de hoc prodidit, fabuloſè (ut reor) multa de hominum ævo referens, cornici novem noſtras attribuit ætates, quadruplum ejus cervis, id triplicatum corvis. Et reliqua fabuloſius in phœnice, ac Nymphis (18). — Not only the ſituation of countries, but many examples, and every man's particular fate, make the duration and length of human life very uncertain. Heſiod, who firſt wrote on this ſubject, among other (in my opinion) fabulous relations concerning the age of man, attributes to the crow nine times the age of man, to the hart four times the age of the crow, to the raven three times the age of the hart; and adds ſome things ſtill more fabulous concerning the phœnix and the nymphs.’

Upon the leaſt computation, which is making the age of man to be only one year (19), the aſſertion of Heſiod concerning the Hamadryades would be falſe: they could not live longer than trees, but there is no tree that can laſt 9720 years. What Pliny ſays of the long life of ſome trees (20), and others of the oak of Mamre (21), and an hundred ſtories of this nature, they tho' were as true as they are doubtful, make nothing againſt my aſſertion.

Note, that the poet Statius ſuppoſes, that the mortal demi-gods live not ſo long as trees. He mentions a wood, that had ſeen the re-production of it's Dryads and Fauni, which might be compared to thoſe old caſtles, that have ſerved for habitations to fathers, ſons, and grandſons, &c.

- - - - Stat ſacra ſenectæ
Numine, nec ſolos hominum tranſgreſſa veterno
Fertur avos, Nymphas etiam mutaſſe ſuperſtes, Faunorumque greges (22).

- - - - long had it ſtood,
Sacred thro' age, a venerable wood,
And ſeen it's tenant nymphs and fauns renew'd.

He ſpeaks ſomewhat differently in another place; for he ſuppoſes the tree would die, upon the deceaſe of the Hamadryad.

Quid te, quæ mediis ſervata penatibus, arbor,
Tecta per & poſtes liquidas emergis in auras?
Quo non ſub domino ſævas paſſura bipennes?
Et nunc ignaro forſan vel lubrica Naïs,
Vel non abruptos tibi demet Hamadryas annos (23).

And you, Oh tree, in houſe preſerv'd with care,
Burſting thro' roofs and poſts to liquid air;
Doom'd on the ground, by axes fell'd, to lye,
Or, ſudden, with ſome Hamadryad, die.

For the reſt, it was not hard for the Gentiles to imagine ſuch a kind of nymphs; for they had a religious veneration for trees which they believed to be very ancient, and whoſe extraordinary bigneſs demonſtrated their long life (24). It was an eaſy tranſition from hence to believe, they were the abode of ſome deity. They made a natural idol of them, I mean, they fancied, that without the help of conſecration, which brought down the god into the ſtatues dedicated to him, a nymph or deity dwelt in the center of theſe trees: the oak that Eryſichthon felled, was reverenced for it's bulk and great age, it was adorned as a conſecrated place, it was hung with the tokens of the ſucceſs of their devotions, and with the monuments of anſwered vows.

Stabat in his ingens annoſo robore quercus
Una, nemus: vittæ mediam memoreſque tabellæ,
Sertaque cingebant, voti argumenta potentis (25).

An aged oak here lifts it's boughs in air,
Hung round with wreaths, ſign of ſucceſsful pray'r.

Is it any wonder that it was taken for the ſeat of an Hamadryad?

[E] The poets have ſometimes taken the Hamadryades for the Naïades.] This Propertius does, ſpeaking of the nymphs who ſtole away Hercules's minion (26): he ſometimes calls them Hamadryades, ſometimes Dryades; yet they were fountain nymphs. Ovid, on the contrary, calls the nymphs whoſe fate depended on a tree, Naïades.

Naiada vulneribus ſuccidit in arbore factis
  Illa perit: fatum Naiados arbor erat (27).

A naid in the tree he ſlew, whoſe fate
Depended on the tree's uncertain date.

I ſhall occaſionally obſerve, that it was ſtill more common to confound the Hamadryades, and the Dryades reciprocally. There is in Hercules Oëteus, a ſcene deſcribing the effects of Orpheus's ſinging. Amongſt other things, it is ſaid, that the Dryades leaving their trees ran after him.

Et quercum fugiens ſuam
Ad vatem properat Dryas (28).

The Dryad quits her oak, and haſtens to his ſong.

There is ſome probability, that the ſame nymphs are here meant, who were born and died with a tree, and who, properly ſpeaking, were called Hamadryades, and not Dryades. It was not a conſtant tradition, that theſe nymphs could not depart from their trees: not for a few moments. And therefore Seneca might ſuppoſe they left them to hear Orpheus ſing. Note, that Servius was miſtaken in thinking Statius ſpoke of the Hamadryades, in theſe verſes of the ſixth book of the Thebaïs.

Linquunt flentes dilecta locorum
Otia, cana Pales, Silvanuſque arbiter umbræ,

The feeling wood, at their departure, groans;

It is certain, that the nymphs he ſpeaks of, were thoſe that were properly called Dryades, and therefore Servius is to blame, to apply the nec amplexæ dimittunt robora Nymphæ to the Hamadryades, whoſe character he had been giving in theſe words. Hamadryades cum arboribus & naſcuntur & pereunt, unde plerumque, cæſa arbore, ſanguis emanat (30). Barthius did not perceive this grammarian's error, though he produces a paſſage, that was very proper to make him ſenſible of it. Pulcra notatio in Commentario Antiquo, ſays he (31), Dimittunt.] *Non cum effectu intellige, dimittunt enim omnino, quamvis ſero dimittant. HANNO, a Carthaginian general, was imployed to ſail round Africa (a). He entred the ocean by the ſtraits, which we now call the ſtraits of Gibraltar, and diſcovered many countries (b). He would have continued his navigation, if proviſions had not failed him. Some authors aſſure us that he accompliſhed it [A], I mean that he ſailed to the extremity of Arabia. He wrote a relation of his voyage, which was often quoted; but little credit was given to it [B]. There is ſome part of it ſtill extant [C]. It is not agreed at what time he lived [D], and there is no proof that the Carthaginians

[A] He would have continued his navigation, if proviſions had not failed him. Some ſay he accompliſhed it.] Two paſſages, one of Pomponius Mela, the other of Pliny, ſhall be our commentary here. ' Hanno Carthaginenſis exploratum miſſus à ſuis, cum per Oceani ' oſtium exiiſſet, magnam partem ejus circumvectus, ' non ſe mare ſed commeatum defeciſſe memoratu retulerat (1). ——— Hanno, the Carthaginian, being ' ſent out to make diſcoveries, when he had taken his ' courſe by the ſtraits into the ocean, ſailed round a great ' part of it, and related that nothing hindered his further navigation, but want of proviſions.' Let us ſee Pliny's words (2): ' Et Hanno, Carthaginis potentia ' florente, circumvectus à Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, ' navigationem eam prodidit ſcripto. —— And Hanno, ' when Carthage flouriſhed, ſailed round from Cadiz to ' the remoteſt parts of Arabia, and left an account of his ' voyage in writing.' Salmaſius ſuppoſes Pliny miſtaken, and that Hanno did not continue his diſcoveries to the Red Sea, but only to the iſlands called Gorgades (3). Iſaac Voſſius doth not much differ from him, he thinks, that the iſland, called at preſent St Anne, was the boundary of this general's navigation (4).

[B] He wrote a relation of his voyage . . . . . but much credit was not given to it.] Pliny, in other reſpects indulgent enough, as every body knows, could not forbear ſaying, that this author has vented a great many fables. ' Fuere, ſays he (5), & Hannonis Carthaginenſium ducis commentarii, Punicis rebus floreutiſſimis explorare ambitum Africæ juſſi: quem ſecuti plerique è Græcis noſtriſque, & alia quædam ' fabuloſa, & urbes multas ab eo conditas ibi prodidere, quarum nec memoria ulla nec veſtigium extat. ——— There were extant likewiſe, the memoirs ' of Hanno the Carthaginian general, who when the ' glory of their ſtate was at it's height, was ordered ' to diſcover the bounds of Africa: moſt of the Grecian ' and our writers, have followed him in their accounts, ' and beſides many other fabulous ſtories tell us of ' many cities, built by him there, of which there is ' not the leaſt remembrance or marks remaining.' See alſo Athenæus (6).

[C] There is ſome part of it ſtill extant.] Sigiſmund Galenius had it printed in Greek, at Baſil, by Frobenius, in 1533. There came out a ſecond edition of it in the ſame place, in 1559, with the Latin verſion and ſome notes of Conrad Geſner: and yet Salmaſius ſays, that this work ſeems to have been unknown to the Greeks. ' Scriptum illud non videtur innotuiſſe. ' Etenim ſi veniſſet in notitiam ac manus Græcorum ' totam eam meridiani Oceani oram minime reliquiſſent intactam (7). —— This piece ſeems to have ' been unknown. For if it had been known and read ' by the Greeks, they would never have left the whole ' coaſt of the Southern ocean unexplored.' He knew not therefore of the words of Pliny, cited in the foregoing remark, and of the paſſage of the book ϖερὶ θαυμασίων ἀκουσμάτων, de auditionibus admirandis, in which Hanno is quoted. Mention is alſo made of it in Artemidorus the Epheſian's Epitomy. Here are inſtances that ſhew, that men of the greateſt reading, and vaſteſt memory, are ſometimes ignorant of things very eaſy to be known. Iſaac Voſſius has not forgiven Salmaſius this miſtake (8). Nor has Father Harduin omitted it (9). Note, that they publiſhed at Leyden, in 1674, what had been publiſhed at Baſil in 1559. I mean Hanno's Periplus, with Geſner's Latin verſion and notes, and with John Leo's Africa. But Berkelius added ſome remarks to it, taken from the ſecond part of Mr Bochart's Geographia ſacra. The ſame little piece (10) of Hanno has been publiſhed at Oxford, in 1698, by Dr Hudſon, with ſeveral other writings of the ſame nature, in the firſt tome of Geographiæ veteris Scriptores Græci Minores. Mr Dodwell's diſſertations prefixed to this volume, which treat amply of thoſe ancient Greek authors, are full of learning. That concerning Hanno is not the leaſt important. Mr Dodwell does not believe, that this Carthaginian commander wrote the Periplus that went under his name. He aſcribes it to ſome Grecian of Sicily, a great admirer of the glory of Carthage. He believes alſo, that the Periplus which goes at preſent under Hanno's name, is very different from that which the ancients had. See the margin (11).

[D] It is not agreed at what time he lived.] Pliny ſays, it was when the Carthaginian affairs were the moſt flouriſhing. This is indefinite: nevertheleſs Voſſius (12) finds there a juſt reaſon to conclude, that our Hanno was neither he that Juſtin ſpeaks of in the twentieth book, nor he that Pliny mentions in the ſixteenth chapter of the eighth book, nor he that was the leader of a faction in Carthage, in the ſecond Punic war (13), but he that was ſent againſt Agathocles, as Juſtin informs us in the twenty ſecond book. Hanno in the twentieth book of Juſtin was ſent againſt the tyrant Dionyſius: the Gauls had then taken the city of Rome (14), which they did in the 366th year from it's foundation. The ſame Hanno was killed ſome time after, with all his family, for endeavouring to make himſelf maſter of Carthage (15). I do not know but this city was in as flouriſhing a condition at that time, as when another Hanno was ſent againſt Agathocles (16). He loſt his life in a battle in the 443d year of Rome. I therefore ſee no certainty in Voſſius's thought. Note, that the paſſage of Pliny, alledged by him, is to be underſtood of a Hanno, who was condemned for having had the art of taming a lion; for they were perſuaded, that the liberty of their country could not be ſafe in the hands of a general, who could maſter the cruelty of wild ginians put him to death. He hung up, in Juno's temple, the ſkins of ſome ſavage women who were flead by his order. See the laſt remark (c).

wild beaſts. ‘ Primus hominum leonem manu tractare auſus, & oſtendere manſuefactum, Hanno è clariſſimis Pœnorum traditur : damnatuſque illo argumento, quoniam nihil non perſuaſurus vir tam artificis ingenii videbatur : & male credi libertas ei, cui in tantum ceſſiſſet etiam feritas (17). —— Hanno, a noble Carthaginian, is reported to have been the firſt, who ever had the courage to handle a lyon, and ſhow him tame. He was condemned on that account, becauſe they believed that nothing would be too hard for a man of ſo much addreſs ; and that the public liberty was not ſafe in the hands of a man to whom the moſt ſavage natures had yielded.’ Voſſius obſerves, that Plutarch has ſpoken of the ſame HANNO. Indeed, he ſays, that the Carthaginians baniſhed him, becauſe ſeeing him make a lion carry his baggage. they ſuſpected he aſpired to the ſovereignty (18). Neither Pliny nor Plutarch ſay any thing to denote the time this was done, and it is difficult to conceive, what reaſon Voſſius had to imagine they ſpeak of a Hanno different from ours. Father Hardouin is of another opinion, for he thinks that the traveller was the ſame that was condemned for taming a lyon. He cannot offer any proof of it ; and we may even conjecture that he is miſtaken ; for it is ſomewhat probable, that if this Hanno, who ſailed round Afric, was the ſame, who tamed the lion, Pliny would have touched upon this circumſtance. The ſureſt way is to take neither ſide, neither denying what Voſſius denied, nor affirming what Father Hardouin affirms. Note, that he ſuppoſes Pliny to affirm that Hanno was put to death (19), but it is better to give a more indefinite explication to the word damnatus, ſince Plutarch ſpecifies the puniſhment of baniſhment. The following objection may be made to Voſſius. Ariſtotle has cited Hanno in his book de admirandis auditionibus. Wherefore this Carthaginian general muſt have lived before Agathocles. But Voſſius anſwers (20), that Ariſtotle was not the author of this book. Solinus ſtands us in no ſtead, when he ſays, that Xenophon of Lampſacus has cited Hanno ; for beſides that, it is not known at what time this Xenophon lived, we have reaſon to believe that Solinus deceives us. Theſe are his words (21). ‘ Has (Gorgades inſulas) incoluerunt Gorgones monſtra, & ſanè uſque adhuc monſtroſa gens habitat. Diſtant à continente bidui navigatione. Prodidit denique Xenophon Lampſacenus Hannonem Pœnorum regem in eas permeaviſſe, repertaſque ibi fœminas aliti pernicitate, atque ex omnibus quæ apparuerant, duas captas tam hirto atque aſpero corpore, ut ad argumentum ſpectandæ rei duarum cutes miraculi gratia inter donaria Junonis ſuſpenderit : quæ duravere uſque in tempora excidii Carthaginenſis. —— Theſe (to wit the iſlands called Gorgades) were inhabited by the monſters called Gorgons, and are even to this day inhabited by a monſtrous people. They are diſtant from the continent, two days ſailing. Xenophon Lampſacenus relates, that Hanno, the king of Carthage, ſailed to them, and found women there as ſwift as birds, and that of the many which they ſaw, caught two which had bodies ſo rough and hairy, that, in memory of that expedition, he preſented their ſkins to be hung up in the temple of Juno, which remained there till the deſtruction of Carthage.’ It is plain, that this paſſage is a tranſcript of this following. ‘ Contra hoc quoque promontorium Gorgades inſulæ narrantur Gorgonum quondam domus bidui navigatione diſtantes à continente, ut tradit Xenophon Lampſacenus. Penetravit in eas Hanno Pœnorum imperator, prodiditque hirta fœminarum corpora, viros pernicitate evaſiſſe : duarumque Gorgonum cutes, argumenti & miraculi gratia in Junonis templo poſuit, ſpectatas uſque ad Carthaginem captam (22). —— Over againſt this promontory, the iſlands of Gorgades are placed, which were formerly inhabited by the Gorgons, and are two days ſailing from the continent, as Xenophon Lampſacenus relates. Hanno, the Carthaginian general, went into them, and reported that the women there with their bodies covered hair, out-ran his men. He placed two of the Gorgons ſkins in the temple of Juno, as a proof of this, which were ſeen till the taking of Carthage.’ The copy differs from the original, ſince Pliny does not, make Xenophon ſay, as Solinus does, that Hanno penetrated into the Gorgades &c. Salmaſius ſuppoſes, that Solinus has perplexed this to prove, that Xenophon of Lampſacus lived after Hanno. Hoc obtinere vult Solinus ut finis illi reſpondeat principiis, & toto in curſu ſibi conſtet. Hanno vetuſtior Xenophonte Lampſaceno. Quomodo igitur hic de illo prodere potuit (23) ? I confeſs, this is an inexplicable riddle to me, for I cannot conceive that Solinus had any intereſt to ſhew, that Hanno preceded this Xenophon. And I can ſtill leſs comprehend why, if Xenophon lived after this Carthaginian, it ſhould be impoſſible for him to cite him, as Salmaſius's interrogation ſuppoſes. I think it probable enough, that Solinus has reduced Pliny's two citations into one, by a ſpirit of confuſion peculiar to him ; but I would not venture to affirm, that Xenophon of Lampſacus has not ſaid all that he aſcribes to him. You will ſay, that if this were ſo, Pliny would not have cited two writers, but would have been content with Xenophon's teſtimony. I anſwer, the conſequence is not juſt : order requires, that for thoſe things which Hanno is known to have ſaid himſelf, he ſhould be quoted preferrably to thoſe who affirm that he has related them.

Iſaac Voſſius is very far from his father's opinion ; for inſtead of ſaying, that our Hanno lived in the time of Agathocles (24), he makes him elder than Homer and Heſiod. He was not content to make him the leader of the expedition made by the Phenicians a little after the ruin of Troy (25), he found afterwards that this would not give him antiquity enough : he therefore ſuppoſed in another work (26), that Hanno and Perſeus lived in the ſame time. Mr Dodwell has learnedly and ſolidly confuted this pretenſion, and all the proofs brought to ſupport it. He makes a good uſe of the paſſage of Pliny's ſecond book, wherein it is remarked, that Himilco and Hanno undertook long voyages. ‘ Et Hanno, Carthaginis potentia florente, circumvectus à Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, navigationem eam prodidit ſcripto : ſicut ad extera Europæ noſcenda miſſus eodem tempore Himilco (27). —— Hanno, while Carthage flouriſhed, ſailed round from Cadiz to the remoteſt parts of Arabia, and left an account of that voyage in writing : at the ſame time, Himilco was ſent to make diſcoveries of the remote parts of Europe.’ We find, that in the Carthaginian war with Agathocles, they had two generals, one called Hanno, and the other Himilco (28). We may moreover very probably ſuppoſe, that this flouriſhing ſtate of the Carthaginians, mentioned by Pliny, preceded their firſt war with the Romans ; for during this war, it is not likely they thought of diſcovering new countries, and it is well known they concluded this war with great loſs. Wherefore theſe two great chronological characters of Pliny, lead us to ſuppoſe, that he ſpeaks of a Hanno that flouriſhed in the time of Agathocles. You will find in Mr Dodwell (29) a fine collection of obſervations, that may convince us, that Hanno is to be placed betwixt the XCIId and CXXIXth Olympaid.

meddled with divinity, but with very indifferent ſucceſs. He wanted to find a middle way in the doctrine of the Euchariſt betwixt the Roman Catholics and the Proteſtants, to compoſe their differences, but he was laughed at by both. The book which he publiſhed on this ſubject was anſwered by Theodore Beza, who affirms that it is a piece ſo confuſed, ſo obſcure, and ſo deſtitute of method, that it is a hard matter to gueſs at it's author's meaning [B]. We ſhall give a general idea of his opinion [C].

[B] Beza . . . . affirms that . . . . Harchius's book is ſo confuſed . . . . that it is a hard matter to gueſs at his meaning.] The book which he compoſed againſt this author is intituled De Cæna Domini adverſus Jodoci Harchii Montenſis (2) dogmata, and is to be found in the third tome of his Tractationes Theologicæ, from page 148, to page 186 of the Geneva edition 1582 in folio. Hoſpinian (3) ſays, that this work of Beza was printed in the year 1580, and that Jodocus Harchius's book had been printed at Baſil in 1573, with this title: de Euchariſtiæ myſterio ad ſedandas Controverſias in Cæna Domini Libri tres. A Treatiſe concerning the Myſtery of the Euchariſt, to compoſe the Differences concerning the Lord's Supper, in three books. Beza aſſures us, that this piece of Harchius had been printed at Worms, ſeven years before he read it. He adds, that he doth not know whether the place of the impreſſion be truly marked, but that he was of opinion, that it would not be neceſſary to anſwer it, becauſe no body could approve of ſuch odd opinions; but that notwithſtanding, having ſeen the contrary of what he expected, he had ſubmitted to the opinion of his friends, who deſired that he ſhould write againſt this author. 'Licet urgentibus nonnullis ut falſiſſimo 'ſane ipſius dogmati utpote quo novæ potiùs con'troverſiæ excitarentur, quam veteres tollerentur, re'futationem opponerem, ſilentio potius ejuſmodi ſcrip'ta eſſe obruenda reſpondit. Nullum enim fore ar'bitrabar, qui tam abſurdis ſententiis aſſentiretur: quæ 'ſpes cum me fefellerit, cogor amicorum precibus, 'quam hæc vana ſint demonſtrare, id eſt pene cum 'ratione, inſanire. Adſcribam autem primo loco ipſius 'Jodoci verba ex variis ejus libri paginis optima 'fide deſcripta, ut quæ ſparſim, & prorſus per'turbatè ſcripſit, adeo denique ἀμεθόδως & obſcurè, 'ut de induſtria texiſſe potius quam aperte ſuum dog'ma ſpectandum propoſuiſſe videatur, melius appa'reant: & ne quam etiam, homini præſertim, ut au'dio, jam mortuo, injuriam in ipſius erratis annotan'dis, & refutandis, feciſſe me quiſquam ſuſpicetur (4). '—— Being preſſed by ſome people to write an an'ſwer to his erroneous doctrines, by which new con'troverſies are raiſed, rather than old ones compoſed, 'I anſwered, that ſuch books were beſt neglected. For 'I did not imagine, that ſo abſurd a doctrine, would 'find any proſelytes: but having found that I was 'miſtaken in this, I am under a neceſſity, in com'pliance with the deſire of my friends, to ſhow how 'ill founded it is. I ſhall in the firſt place, ſet down 'Jodocus's own words, faithfully extracted from the 'different parts of his book, that what he has wrote 'in a ſcattered, confuſed, immethodical and obſcure 'manner, and ſo as one would think, he rather de'ſigned on purpoſe to conceal his doctrine, than to lay 'it down clearly, may be the better underſtood: and 'that no body may ſuſpect that I do the gentleman, 'who I hear is now dead, the leaſt injury either in 'quoting or confuting his errors.' Obſerve, by the by, that Harchius was dead at the time when Beza anſwered him. The extracts which they give of his book, make it more intelligble than the reading of the book itſelf. After giving the extracts, Beza obſerves as follows: 'Et hæc quidem Harchius non 'minus obſcurè quàm perturbatè, ut qui ab una quæ'ſtione ad alteram deſiliat, & plurimis ambiguis vo'cibus ac formulis utatur, adeò ut mihi ſæpiſſime hæc 'omnia relegenda, conſideranda, perſcrutanda fuerint 'priuſquàm quid homo iſte ſibi vellet, intelligere '& in ſuos locos diſtinctè ſingula referre potuerim (5). '—— Thus far Harchius, but with as much ob'ſcurity as confuſion, for he ſtarts from one queſtion 'to another, and makes uſe of ſo many ambiguous 'words and phraſes, that I was frequently obliged to 'read him over and over, to conſider and ſearch be'fore I could gather his meaning, and put every 'thing in it's proper place.' The Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca (6), mentions two other books of Harchius on theological ſubjects, de Cauſis Hæreſis, proque ejus exilio & concordia Controverſiarum in Religione, Hæreticorum, Pontificiorum, & pœnitentium, Oratio ad Deum Patrem, at Baſil 1573 in 4to. Orthodoxorum Patrum Irenæi, Cyrilli, Hilarii, Auguſtini, & reliquorum, de Euchariſtia & Sacrificio univerſalis Eccleſiæ Fides, in 8vo. This laſt book was printed in the year 1577, as Hoſpinian ſays (7).

[C] We ſhall give a general idea of his opinion.] I take it from a letter of Andrew Rivetus to Milletierre July twenty nine 1641. 'Your diſtinctions 'of matter and myſtery of αἰσθητὸν and νοητὸν, ſen'ſible and inteligible, ruin all that you intend to eſta'bliſh, without ſhowing how we can with the mouth 'of the body, eat a myſtery in which there is no 'matter; or how after the matter of a body is gone, 'the ſubſtance remains; this I do not find explained 'in your treaſure of rich conceptions. Above thirty 'years ago, I read ſomething like this, in a book 'of a certain phyſician of the country of Juliers named 'Tſarchius (8), with whoſe heifer it ſhould ſeem 'you have plowed. He maintained that the body, 'which the church gives in the bread, is the body 'of the Eternal Word, which coming into the bread 'in a wonderful manner, changed it into the ſubſtance 'of that fleſh, which he carried up into heaven; that 'it was a fleſh of the ſame kind, with that with 'which the ſubſtance of our fleſh is nouriſhed. He 'called it, as you do, a ſpiritual and intelligible 'fleſh. He ſaid that the fleſh, which is daily created 'in the bread and wine, and taken at the altar by 'the faithful, was like, as to it's nature, to the fleſh 'which CHRIST has in heaven, quickening be'cauſe of the divinity, which mixeth itſelf with the 'bread in an inexpreſſible manner. He would have 'the Calviniſts to acknowledge, on St Auguſtin's au'thority, that the ſacraments have really in them 'the true fleſh of CHRIST, although ſpiritual, 'which, in a particular manner, is eat by the mouth 'with the bread, and is in ſome manner, digeſted in 'the heart. That it is called the fleſh of CHRIST 'in a myſtery, tho' it be neither nervous, muſculous 'nor animated. Upon the ſame foundations he want'ed likewiſe, with you, to eſtabliſh a real and pro'pitiatory ſacrifice of the body and blood of CHRIST, 'and the adoration of the ſacrament. And tho' he 'pretended by this means, to be able to reconcile all 'the contending parties; he was neither regarded by 'the Papiſts, by the Lutherans, nor by us; no body 'would acknowledge his chimæras for ſolid truths. 'and his ſpeculations vaniſhed as your's will (9).' La Milletiere having anſwered, that he was not acquainted with this author. Rivetus replied as follows. 'This Harchius, whom I mentioned to him, 'and in whoſe book I found whims like to his own, 'ought no more to be unknown to him, than 'the Diallaction (10), recommended by Grotius, 'and coupled with Milletiere's books. Theſe are two 'piece, printed together in 1576, without the name 'of the place, or of the Printer, tho' the firſt edi'tion of Harchius's book, bears the name of the city 'of Worms (11).

HARDENBERG (ALBERT), a Proteſtant divine, miniſter at Bremen, in XVIth century, followed the confeſſion of Augſburg eighteen years, and afterwards declared for Calviniſm with ſo much ſucceſs, that he introduced it into that city, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of his colleagues, and of the magiſtrates. He had inſinuated himſelf himſelf ſo far into the favour of the people [A], that he made them declare for him againſt Lutheraniſm; ſo that the magiſtrates who refuſed to reject the confeſſion of Augſburg, were degraded and baniſhed. They all died in exile (a). The author who informs me of theſe particulars, refers his readers to a book which Dithmar Kenchelius, burgomaſter of Bremen, compoſed during his baniſhment, intituled, Brevis, dilucida, ac vera Narratio, de initiis & progreſſu Controverſiæ, Bremæ à Doctore Alberto Hardenbergio motæ, oppoſita recenti Scripto ejuſdem Hardenbergii de Ubiquitate & Cœna Domini. Or, A ſhort, plain, and true Account of the Riſe and Progreſs of the Controverſy ſet on foot at Bremen, by Doctor Albert Hardenberg, in anſwer to a late book of the ſaid Hardenberg, concerning the Ubiquity and Supper of our Lord. Hardenberg did not long enjoy his triumph: he was expelled from Bremen, as a ſeditious Sacramentarian, by the Lutheran party, which regained the aſcendant (b). He wrote the Life of Weſſelus, which has been printed.

[A] He had ſo far inſinuated himſelf into the favour of the people.] This is the true method of bringing about a change: a preacher, ſupported by the people, is able to introduce all ſorts of revolutions. HARPALYCE, the moſt beautiful young woman of Argos. Clymenus her father grew ſo much in love with her, that having found that all endeavours to conquer his paſſion, only ſerved to increaſe it, he reſolved on the means to ſatisfy it. He therefore corrupted his daughter's nurſe, and, by her means, enjoyed ſecretly the beloved object. Some time after came the ſon-in-law, to whom he had promiſed his daughter. Immediately all things were ſumptuouſly prepared for the wedding: the marriage was conſummated: the huſband departed with his bride to return home. Then Clymenus repented he had given conſent to the match. His love diſtracted him to ſuch a degree, that before they came to the end of their journey, he made away with his ſon-in-law, and brought back his daughter to Argos, where he behaved himſelf publickly as her huſband. She at laſt reflected on the indignities ſhe had ſuffered from her father; and to revenge herſelf, ſhe killed her young brother [A], and gave him to her father to eat; after which, begging of the gods to be taken out of the world, ſhe was changed into a bird [B]. Clymenus was ſo overwhelmed with theſe accidents, that he killed himſelf (a). We ſhall ſee other Harpalices in the article HARPALICUS.

[A] She killed her young brother.] Hyginus (1) ſays ſhe killed her own ſon which ſhe had by Clymenus, and he adds that ſhe made her father eat him, who, when he knew it, killed her. In the 206th chapter of this author the word filiam ought to be corrected filium, agreeably to what he ſays in the 238th, and 239, and 246th chapters. Beſides this difference, I find another betwixt him and Parthenius. The latter ſays that Harpalyce's father was the ſon of Teleus, and that he lived at Argos: the former makes him ſon of Schæneus, and king of Arcadia (2). But as in the 238th chapter he makes him the ſon of Oeneus, we may be certain that inſtead of Schæneus, it ought every where to read Oeneus; for we learn from Apollodorus (3), and Antoninus Liberalis (4), that Oeneus had a ſon named Clymenus.

[B] She was changed into a bird.] There are two great defects in the fabulous inventions of the ancient Greeks; one is, that they have not ſufficiently diverſified the capital incidents; the other is, that they have not been able to obſerve any kind of uniformity in the circumſtances. You will ſcarce find two authors who, in treating of the ſame fact, agree about the qualities and names of perſons, and about the times and places. If they meant by that means to diſplay the fertility of their genius, they were miſtaken; the barrenneſs of the principal is difficultly repaired by diverſified acceſſories. Parthenius's Euphorion ſeems at firſt ſight to give us ſomething new: but obſerve it well, it is only Tereus removed to another ſcene with ſome changes of the actors.

HARPALICUS, king of the Amymnians (a) in Thrace, had a daughter named Harpalice, who was brought up with cows and mares milk [A], and whom he had accuſtomed betimes to handle arms. By this means he made her a good warriour, and found his account in it; for had not his daughter come to his reſcue when he was aſſaulted and wounded by Neoptolemus, the ſon of Achilles [B], he had unavoidably voidably loſt his life; but Harpalice charged the enemy ſo ſeaſonably, that ſhe put him to flight. Her father, whom ſhe had ſo happily delivered from that foreign war (b), loſt his life ſome time after in a civil one: His ſubjects depoſed him, and at laſt killed him (c). Harpalice retired into the woods, and fell to robbing. She flew like lightning; ſo that when ſhe was purſued by horſemen to recover from her the cattle ſhe had carried off, they could not overtake her. They did not ſeize her but by laying nets as they do for ſtaggs. They killed her, but it coſt them dear who did it: for there immediately aroſe a diſpute in the neighbourhood, concerning the property of the cattle ſhe had ſtoln. They came to blows, and left many on both ſides dead upon the place. Since that time a cuſtom was eſtabliſhed of aſſembling at the tomb of the damſel, and of expiating her death with turnaments. There was an HARPALICE who was deſperately in love with Iphiclus (d), and who died of grief on finding herſelf ſlighted by him. From her it was that a certain ſong was called Harpalice.

HARPALUS, a Grecian aſtronomer, corrected the cycle of Cleoſtratus by another cycle, which had need to be corrected [A]. It was Meton who corrected the new cycle of Harpalus, in the fourth year of the LXXXVIth Olympiad (a). Cleoſtratus diſcovered the ſigns of the Zodiac, after Anaximander had found out, in the LVIIIth Olympiad, the obliquity of that circle (b). Judge by this of the age in which Harpalus lived. What Moreri ſays is not true, that Diodorus Siculus makes mention of Harpalus. There is a great confuſion in Voſſius upon all this [B].

(b) Plinius, lib. ii, cap. viii, pag. m. 148.

[A] He corrected the cycle of Cleoſtratus by another cycle which had need to be corrected.] Cleoſtratus's cycle was called Octaëteris; it contained eight years, at the end whereof he pretended the ſun and moon returned to the ſame point. Harpalus finding that to be a miſtake invented a cycle of nine years.

Nam quæ ſolem biberna novem putat æthera volvi
Ut lunæ ſpatium redeat, vetus Harpalus, ipſam
Ocius in ſedem momentaque priſca reducit.
Illius ad numeros prolixa decennia rurſum
Adjeciſſe Meton Cecropia dicitur arte.
Inſeditque animis: tenuit rem Græcai ſolers
Protinus, & longos inventum miſit in annos (1).

Meton finding that the cycle of nine years had ſucceeded no better than the reſt, invented the cycle of nineteen years. This cycle was followed, as Feſtus Avienus obſerves in the verſes above mentioned: It is ſtill in vogue and called the Golden Number.

[B] There is a great confuſion in Voſſius upon all this.] I. After he had ſaid (2) in his theſis, that Meton publiſhed the Enneadecateris in the firſt year of LXXXVIIth olympiad, or in the year before, he ſays, in his commentary upon his theſis, that Diodorus Siculus ſpeaks of this under the third year of the LXXXVIth olympiad. Is not this to produce a famous evidence againſt his own calculation? Is this very prudently done? This is the part of an honeſt man, you will ſay. I will own it is, provided Diodorus made uſe of that chronology: but it is certain that he places the cycle of nineteen years in the laſt year of the LXXXVIth olympiad. II. He quotes Pliny, book 2. Chap 12. concerning Cleoſtratus, whereas he ſhould have quoted the eighth chapter. III. He ſays that the Octaëteris of Cleoſtratus comprehended 2090, years and 22. It is plain that the Printer has confounded the numbers; but the word annorum is doubtleſs a miſtake of the author: change then theſe words, introduxit octaëterida quæ erat annorum, CIↃ CIↃ XC XXII. into theſe, introduxit octaëterida quæ erat dierum CIↃ CIↃ CMXXII; for this cycle contained 2922. Days. IV. He quotes the twelfth book of Diodorus Siculus concerning the Octaëteris. I have not found that word in it. V. This phraſe, in hac octaëteride deprehenſum eſt vitium ab Harpalo commiſſum, is ill expreſſed, as ſignifying quite contrary to what it ought to do. There is no reader but would believe Harpalus was deceived in making that cycle: and yet the meaning of Voſſius is to let us know that Harpalus diſcovered the fault which the author of the cycle had committed. VI. He ſhould not have ſaid, that inſtead of the Octaëteris of Cleoſtratus, the Octaëteris of Harpalus was made uſe of: For Avienus's verſes, which Voſſius immediately quotes, ſhew plainly that the invention of Harpalus was a cycle of nine years.

HARPALUS, a Macedonian lord, and one of Alexander's captains, ruined himſelf by his prodigious expences (a). He took the part of Alexander, during the differences that aroſe betwixt that prince and his father Philip, and was diſgraced on that account (b): But as ſoon as Philip died, Alexander recalled Harpalus, and ſhewed an extraordinary friendſhip to him; I believe that he gave him the government of Cilicia [A]. As for that of Babylon, it is moſt certain that he gave it him, together with the office of high-treaſurer (c). Harpalus, imagining the king his maſter would never

[A] I believe that Alexander gave him the government of Cilicia.] I ground my conjecture upon what Athenæus ſays (1), that Harpalus having loſt his miſtreſs, ſent for another from Athens, and lodged her in the royal palace of Tarſus. There ſhe was adored by every body, and was called queen. And all thoſe who crowned Harpalus had orders to crown her alſo? This ſuppoſes that Harpalus lived, at Tarſus with all ſort of authority. Now Tarſus was the chief city in Cilicia (2). I do not regard the paſſage of Athenæus (3), where it is ſaid that Harpalus erected a brazen ſtatue to his miſtreſs Glycera in Tarſus a town of Syria [ἐν Ταϱσῷ] τῆς Συϱίας. I doubt not but this paſſage is corrupted: for beſides that there was not in Syria any royal or conſiderable town that was named Tarſus, we find in the 586th page of Athenæus, that the ſtatue of Glycera was erected in Roſſus, ἐν Ρωσσῷ. We ſee in the Margin of the 595th page oppoſite to the place of the text, where it is printed [ἐν Ταρσῷ] that other manuſcripts have it ἐν Ῥωσσῷ. Athenæus quotes the ſame author, viz. Theopompus in both theſe paſſages; which ſhews that the tranſcribers have confounded the name of the town where that ſtatue was.

never return from his expedition to the Indies, committed infinite extortions, in order to ſupport the exceſſive expences of his bed and table. He plunged himſelf into all ſorts of pleaſures, and denied nothing to his miſtreſſes [B]. Many other governors fancying as he did, that Alexander would never be in a capacity of calling them to an account for their extortions, had been guilty of innumerable acts of injuſtice. The firſt thing Alexander did, upon his return from the Indies, was to puniſh very ſeverely ſome of theſe governors. This gave grounds to Harpalus to apprehend the ſame treatment; ſo that to prevent it he fled into Greece with immenſe ſums, which he took from the royal treaſure with which he was entruſted. He levied alſo ſix thouſand men, which he landed at Tænarum in the Lacedemonian territories; from whence he went to Athens, to try to engage them in a war againſt Alexander (d). He gained ſome orators by his money (e); knowing that there is not a more powerful inſtrument than the tongue of this ſort of men to diſturb the public tranquillity, and to excite the populace to take up arms. But as he knew on the one hand what power they have over the people, he was not ignorant on the other, how great a power a good ſum of money had over them. Wherefore finding himſelf well provided with gold and ſilver, he hoped to bring over the city of Athens to his intereſt. But he was deceived; Phocion was not to be corrupted [C]; beſides, the letters of Antipater, governor of Macedonia, and thoſe of Olympias, the mother of Alexander, kept the Athenians in reſpect

[B] He denied nothing to his miſtreſſes.] If any thing could ruin the conjecture I have advanced in the preceding remark, it would be the deſcription that Diodorus Siculus has left us, of the luxury Harpalus wallowed in during Alexander's abode in the Indies. It appears from thence, that Harpalus gave himſelf up to the pleaſures of women, and even to impurities of a more odious nature; that he ordered great quantities of fiſh to be brought from the Red Sea; that his ordinary expences were exceſſive, and beſides that he ſent for a famous courteſan from Athens named Pythionice; that he made her preſents of an immenſe value; that when ſhe died he built her a noble ſepulchre; and ſent for another celebrated courteſan named Glycera, from the ſame country, with whom he lived in ſo prodigal a voluptuouſneſs as cannot be deſcribed. All this happened, according to Diodorus Siculus, whilſt Harpalus was governour of Babylon, and high-treaſurer, and whilſt Alexander was employed in his Indian expedition. You will ſay I was then in the wrong to mention his government of Cilicia. It would be a ſtrong objection, if there was not room to believe that Diodorus Siculus, after the manner of thoſe who compoſe a general hiſtory, has too much huddled together particular events, and too much neglected the diſtinction of times. The authors, whom Athenæus quotes, are more credible than Diodorus; for they have treated particularly of the debaucheries of Harpalus. It is preſumed therefore they have better deſcribed the circumſtances of them than Diodorus could do, who has only ſpoken of Harpalus in general, and who paſſed over the particular incidents with the greateſt haſte imaginable. That is the method of a general hiſtory. But what ſay Athenæus's authors? Why, that after the death of Pythionice, whom Harpalus paſſionately loved, he ſent for Glycera, and brought her to the royal palace at Tarſus, causing the people to adore her, and call her queen. Ἣν καὶ ἐλθȣ̃σαν οἰκεῖν ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις τοῖς ἐν Ταρσῷ καὶ προσκυνεῖσθαι ὑπὸ τȣ̃ πλήθȣς βασίλισσαν προσαγορευομένην. Ac illo profectam in regia quæ Tarſis fuit collocaſſe, ut adorarent omnes ac reginam ſalutarent, juſſiſſe (4). If he had been governour of Babylon when he ſent for Glycera, he had conducted her to the palace of Babylon, and it muſt have been at Babylon that he had ordered the honours of adoration to be paid, and the title of queen to be given to her. He did this at Tarſus, therefore he was governour of Cilicia, when Pythionice died, and when Glycera ſupplied her place: Therefore Diodorus is miſtaken in the circumſtances of time, ſince he ſuppoſes that Harpalus's amours with Pythionice, and afterwards with Glycera, were poſterior in time to Harpalus's being made governour of Babylon, and Alexander's expedition to the Indies. Let not the ſepulchre which Harpalus ordered to be built for Pythionice in Babylon (5) be objected to me; for that does not prove ſhe died after his being preferred to the government of Babylon. I know not whether we ought to reckon amongſt the inſtances of this governour's luxury, the care he took to have all ſorts of plants brought from Greece for the ornament of the gardens, and walks of Babylon (6), for if we may believe Theophraſtus (7), he did this by Alexander's order. If Scaliger had concluded from thence that Harpalus was ſupervisor of the royal gardens and orchards at Babylon, he could be blamed but for one thing; but he ſays that Plutarch aſcribes that employment to Harpalus (8), he has therefore made two ſlips. I. He did not remember that Harpalus was governour of the province of Babylon, and that therefore the ſuperviſing of the gardens was not his principal office, but a ſmall dependance upon his great employ. II. It is falſe that Plutarch ſays what he imputes to him.

[C] Phocion was not to be corrupted.] He it was whom Harpalus aimed principally to gain. He gave to the other orators, whom he ſaw come over to him, but very moderate gratuities; but he offered Phocion 700 talents, and would have made him the abſolute manager of his affairs. Τῶν εἰωθότων ἀπὸ τȣ̃ βήματος χρηματίζεσθαι δρόμος ἦν καὶ ἅμιλλα φθειρομένων πρὸς αὐτὸν, τȣ́τοις μὲν ἀπὸ πολλῶν μικρὰ δελεάζων, προήκατο καὶ διέῤῥιψε, τῷ δὲ Φωκίωνι προσέπεμψε διδȣ̀ς ἑπτακόσια τάλαντα. Concionalium hirudinum fuit certatim concurſatio operas ſuas ei venditantium: modicam his ille ex multis obtulit & objecit eſcam, Phocioni vero per internuncios ſeptingenta talenta obtulit (9). Phocion repulſed him, and let him know that he would make him repent of his intriguing, if he went on to corrupt the inhabitants. Hereupon Harpalus acted with more reſerve. He found that all thoſe mercenary tongues he had gained, oppoſed him openly, in order to remove all ſuſpicions, and that Phocion who had received nothing of him, was the leaſt his adverſary. This put him upon making new attempts to gain him; but he found him impenetrable on every ſide. Charicles, Phocion's ſon-in-law, did not imitate his integrity, but rendered himſelf ſo ſuſpected that his father-in-law refuſed to aſſiſt him when he ſaw him under proſecution for correſponding with Harpalus (10). As for Demoſthenes, he uſed Harpalus in a moſt diſingenuous manner; for when he had taken large ſums to ſpeak for him, and came to the bar, he appeared in the aſſembly with his throat muffled up, and complained he had a ſore throat which deprived him of the uſe of ſpeech (11). Which occaſioned the jeſt upon him, wherein they alluded to the quincy. Οἱ δὲ εὐφυεῖς χλευάζοντες ȣ̓χ ὑπὸ συνάγκης ἔφραζον ἀλλ' ἀπ' ἀργυράγχες εἰλῆφθαι νύκτωρ τὸν δημαγωγόν. Ibi homines faceti cavelantes non angina dixerunt, ſed argentangina oratorem nocte correptum (12). But he did not come off only with being rallied; for his engagements with Harpalus were the cauſe of his baniſhment (13). Note that Pauſanias believes him innocent (14). Harpalus, and his concubine Glycera, ordered great quantities of corn to be diſtributed in Athens. Which was one of the things for which he was ridiculed in a comedy that was acted on the banks of Hydaſpes, which ſome will have Alexander himſelf to be the author of (15). It is obſervable, that after the death of Harpalus, a daughter he had by Pythionice was taken home by Phocion, and educated with all poſſible care both by himſelf and his ſon-in-law Charicles (16).

reſpect (f), This obliged Harpalus to ſeek another refuge [D]. He returned to Tænarum, where he had left his troops, and paſſed over from thence to Crete. But he was not there long before one of his friends treacherouſly killed him (g) [E]. The Supplement to Moreri is faulty in this particular, as I ſhall make appear (h). Alexander was ſo firmly perſuaded that Harpalus was an honeſt man, that he cauſed thoſe who brought the firſt news of his flight, to be put in chains as falſe accuſers (i). The news he received, that this perfidious man was expelled from Athens and killed, made him lay aſide his thoughts of returning into Europe to humble the Athenians [F]. He had employed Harpalus to ſend him books [G], when he ſaw there were none to be met with in the provinces that were remote from the country of the Greeks. The Sepulchre that Harpalus erected to one of his miſtreſſes, was very ſumptuous [H]. I do [D] This obliged Harpalus to ſeek another refuge.] He received orders to depart from Athens, as we learn from Plutarch (17) and Quintus Curtius (18). I believe the cauſe was pleaded with great ſolemnity: For Pollux quotes an oration of Hyperides ὑπὲρ Ἁρπάλȣ I will not take notice of Dinarchus's oration, intituled ὑπὲρ τȣ̃ μὴ ἐκδȣ̃ναι Ἅρπαλον Ἀλεξάνδρῳ; becauſe it is thought ſuppoſititious. It is however certain that that orator actually pleaded in that cauſe: there were five of his orations περὶ Ἁρπαλείων (19). That tryal had great conſequences; for after it was reſolved upon in Athens, that Harpalus ſhould depart, they informed againſt thoſe who had ſuffered themſelves to be bribed by him. If he had not found ſuch as would be corrupted by his preſents he had been delivered up to Alexander (20). One of that prince's friends (21) earneſtly ſollicited the Athenians, that Harpalus might be given up to him, and not having obtained it, he ſhewed them ſome time after to whom it was Harpalus had given money and how much. He found that in the papers of Harpalus's ſteward (22).

Let us here make ſome critical obſervations upon the article of Philoxenus in Moreri's dictionary. The author of that article (23) aſſures us, that Philoxenus, a Macedonian captain, took Harpalus in Candia, who had robbed Alexander's exchequer, that he diſcovered all thoſe to whom Harpalus had intruſted this treaſure in Athens: that he ſent a liſt of them to the magiſtrates, to recover the money out of their hands, and to cauſe them to be puniſhed; but that he would not name Demoſthenes, though he had ſome difference with that famous orator, preferring, on that occaſion, the eſteem he had for his eloquence to his own reſentment. Pauſanias is quoted for this. I find five faults in it. I. It is falſe that Philoxenus took Harpalus either in Crete or in any other place. He only took his ſteward who had eſcaped to the iſle of Rhodes (24). The author I criticiſe, does not mention it. Let that omiſſion be his ſecond fault. III. Harpalus did not truſt his treaſure in Athens, he only diſtributed certain ſums to gain ſome people to his intereſt. IV. The liſt which Philoxenus ſent to the magiſtrates did not contain the names of the pretended truſtees of this treaſure, but the names of thoſe whom Harpalus had bribed. V. Pauſanias (25) does not ſay that Philoxenus had a deſire to recover that money. VI. And ſo far is he from ſaying that this Macedonian ſuppreſſed his reſentment in reſpect to Demoſthenes's eloquence, that he manifeſtly ſuppoſes that orator would have appeared in Philoxenus's catalogue, if his name had been found in the papers of Harpalus's ſteward. Pauſanias argues thus: if Demoſthenes had received any bribe from Harpalus, this had been diſcovered, by the papers of his ſteward: and if it had been diſcovered, Philoxenus would have named him in the catalogue he ſent to the Athenians: for he had particular quarrels with Demoſthenes, and he knew that Alexander was to the laſt degree enraged againſt that famous orator. But he makes no mention of Demoſthenes in imparting to the Athenians the names of thoſe whom Harpalus had corrupted, and the particular ſums they had received. We muſt therefore conclude that Demoſthenes was guiltleſs. Who will truſt after this to ſuch dictionary-makers? Who wont rather deplore the fate of innumerable readers, who have honeſtly believed that Pauſanias gives us here an example of a very ſignal generoſity, a man ſo full of admiration for Demoſthenes, his enemy, that he ſtifles his reſentment in his behalf, when he has the moſt favourable opportunity of revenge. So great is the force of eloquence! Will the young declamers cry out, who ſhall ſeek their materials in this new Polyanthea (26).

[E] One of his friends treacherouſly killed him.] He was called Thimbron, as Diodorus Siculus ſays, and he was of Lacedemon, as Arrian inform us. He ſeized upon all the effects of Harpalus. Others ſay it was a traveller that committed this murder (27); others attribute it to Harpalus's domeſtic (28), others to a Macedonian, named Pauſanias (29). Theſe diſagreements put one out of patience, and diſgrace the hiſtorians.

[F] The news which he received that he was expelled from Athens, made Alexander lay aſide his deſign of returning . . . to chaſtiſe the Athenians.] This we are taught by Quintus Curtius. ‘His cognitis, ſays he, ‘Rex Harpalo Athenienſibuſque juxta infeſtus, claſſem ‘parari jubet; Athenas protinus petiturus. Quod ‘conſilium dum agitat, clam literæ ei redduntur, ‘Harpalum intraſſe quidem Athenas, pecunia conciliaſſe ſibi principum animos, mox conſilio plebis ‘habito, juſſum urbe excedere, ad Græcos milites perveniſſe, à quibus interceptum & trucidatum à quo‘dam viatore per inſidias. His Lætus in Europam ‘trajiciendi conſilium omiſit (30). —— Upon hearing ‘theſe things, the king being equally enraged againſt ‘Harpalus and the Athenians, commanded that a fleet ‘ſhould be made ready; intending to go to Athens without delay. While this was in agitation he received ‘ſecret advice that Harpalus had indeed entered Athens, ‘and had by preſents drawn over the principal inhabitants to his party, but that an aſſembly of the people ‘being held, he was ordered to leave the city, that he ‘had gone to the Grecian ſoldiers, by whom he was ‘ſtopped, and that he was at laſt ſlain by a certain traveller who had lain in wait for him. Being overjoyed at ‘this, he laid aſide his deſign of paſſing over into Europe.’ A man muſt be ſtupid, not to perceive that there is a pretty large gap betwixt the firſt and ſecond chapters of the tenth book of Quintus Curtius. For is there any hiſtorian ſo void of common ſenſe, as to ſpeak of Harpalus in the manner Quintus Curtius does in the foregoing paſſage, unleſs he had before explained, who this perſon was, and what enterprize he had formed? There is no need of ſaying more upon this. If any one is not ſenſible of it, he is not capable of comprehending the reaſons I ſhould alledge to prove it.

[G] Alexander employed Harpalus to ſend him books.] Plutarch acquaints us with this fact. Read what follows, and you will find they did not think they ſhould diſpleaſe that prince by ſending him poetry. Τῶν δὲ ἄλλων βιβλίων ȣ̓κ εὐπορῶν ἐν τοῖς ἄνω τόποις, Ἅρπαλον ἐκέλευσε πέμψαι. κἀκεῖνος ἔπεμψεν αὐτῷ τάς τε Φιλίϛȣ βίβλȣς, καὶ τῶν Εὐριπίδȣ καὶ Σοφοκλέȣς καὶ Αἰσχύλȣ τραγῳδιῶν συχνάς, καὶ Τελέϛȣ καὶ Φιλοξένȣ διθυράμβȣς. Aliorum librorum quum in ſuperioribus provinciis non eſſet ei facultas, mandavit Harpalo ut mitteret. Ille miſit ei Philiſti libros, Euripidiſque & Sophoclis, & Æſchyli tragœdiarum magnam vim, Teleſtis quoque Philoxenique dithyrambos (31). —— Alexander not finding any other books in the upper provinces, ſent orders to Harpalus to ſend him ſome. Accordingly he ſent him Philiſtus's writings, and a great many of the tragedies of Euripides, Sophocles, and Æſchylus, together with the dithyrambics of Teleſtes and Philoxenus.

[H] The ſepulchre which Harpalus erected to one of his miſtreſſes was very ſumptuous.] He had been at incredible expences for Pythionice, whilſt ſhe lived, and he was not at leſs to bury her. The funeral was ſolemnized with the moſt magnificent ſymphony in the world. Whatever was fine in muſic, either vocal or inſtrumental, was brought together (32). He erected to her memory two ſtately monuments, one at Babylon, the other near Athens. The expence was above 200 talents. He conſecrated a temple and a grove to her, do not think that a certain complaint againſt providence, which Cicero has preſerved to us, relates to our Harpalus [I]. If I am in the right, the moral reflexions of Father Leſcalopier are but ill applied. There is a fault in Euſebius, which I ſhall take notice of [K].

her, under the name of Venus Pythionice. Ταύτης ἐτόλμησεν ὁ φίλος εἶναι σοῦ φάσκων ἱερὸν καὶ τέμενος ἱδρύσασθαι, καὶ προσαγορεῦσαι τὸν ναὸν καὶ τὸν βωμὸν Πυθιονίκης Ἀφροδίτης. Auſus hic eſt qui de amicitia tua gloriaretur, illi & lucum & templum conſecrare, ædemque illam & aram Pythionices Veneris nuncupare (33). The tomb that he cauſed to be built in Attica, in the way to Eleuſis, exceeded all that were near it. One would have taken it for that of one of the greateſt men that Athens had produced. What ſurprize then muſt it be to ſtrangers to underſtand, it was erected to a ſtrumpet? What judgment would they paſs upon the Athenians? This is Dicæarchus's reflexion (34). An author, who was well verſed in theſe matters, aſſures us, that Pythionice's tomb, in the way to Eleuſis, was the fineſt of all the ancient monuments that were to be ſeen in Greece. Ὡς καὶ μνῆμα ἀποθανούσης ποιῆσαι πάντων ὁπόσα Ἕλλησίν ἐστιν ἀρχαῖα, θέας μάλιστα ἄξιον. Ut mortuæ monimentum poſuerit omnium quæ in Græcia veterum operum quod ſpectetur digniſſimum (35). It is even true, that Harpalus's intentions were not faithfully executed. The whole ſum that he appointed for it, was not laid out upon that monument. Charocles, Phocion's ſon-in-law, undertook the direction of that work, at the requeſt of Harpalus, and did not lay out upon it the thirty talents depoſited in his hand. He diſgraced himſelf two ways: I. in taking upon him the direction of a monument deſigned for a whore; II. in appropriating to himſelf part of the money depoſited with him. Μνημεῖον ἀπὸ χρημάτων πολλῶν ἐπιτελέσαι θελήσας προσέταξε τῷ Χαρικλεῖ τὴν ἐπιμέλειαν. οὖσαν δὲ τὴν ὑπουργίαν ταύτην, ἀγεννῆ προσκατῄσχυνεν ὁ τάφος συντελεσθείς. διαμένει γὰρ ἔτι νῦν ἐν Ἑρμείῳ, ᾗ βαδίζομεν ἐξ ἄστεος εἰς Ἐλευσῖνα, μηδὲν ἔχων τῶν τριάκοντα ταλάντων ἄξιον, ὅσα τῷ Ἁρπάλῳ λογισθῆναι φασὶν εἰς τὸ ἔργον ὑπὸ τοῦ Χαρικλέους. Quum Harpalus monumentum ſumptuoſum locare vellet faciendum, ejus rei demandavit Chaɾicli curam. Hoc miniſterium per ſe turpe fœdavit inſuper ſepulcrum abſolutum. Extat enim & hac ætate in Hermio, qua Athenis Eleuſina itur, neque in eo triginta talenta, quantam ſummam expenſam tuliſſe in id opus Harpalo autumant Chariclem, comparent (36). Pauſanias confeſſes, that he knows nothing, either of the country or family of Pythionice, but only that ſhe exerciſed the trade of a courtezan at Athens and Corinth. Athenæus knew a little more of her. He ſays, ſhe had been a ſervant of Bacchis the famous artiſt on the flute, and that afterwards ſhe liſted her ſelf under a bawd of Thrace, who lived at Ægina, and that ſhe followed her to Athens, whither ſhe removed her brothel houſe, ſo that Pythionice was a triple ſlave, and a triple proſtitute; ὥστε γίνεσθαι μὴ μόνον τρίδουλον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τρίπορνον αὐτήν. Ut non ſolum ter mancipium, ſed etiam ter ſcortum fuerit (37).

[I] I do not believe that a certain complaint againſt providence relates to our Harpalus.] The words of Cicero are theſe (38): 'Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere ſolebat, Harpalum, qui temporibus illis prædo felix habebatur contra Deos teſtimonium dicere, quòd in illa fortuna tam diu viveret. —— Diogenes the Cynic, uſed to ſay, that Harpalus, a famous pirate in thoſe days, did bear witneſs againſt the gods, becauſe he lived ſo long bleſt with ſo much good fortune.' I am of Menage's opinion. The Harpalus of Cicero, the Scirpalus of Diogenes Laërtius (39), and the Scirtalus of Suidas (40), ſeem to me to be one and the ſame man. But the Scirpalus of Diogenes Laërtius, and the Scirtalus of Suidas, was a famous pirate, who took Diogenes the Cynic, and ſold him. I therefore believe that the Harpalus of Cicero was a pirate, and not a captain of Alexander the Great. The character Cicero has given of Harpalus, by no means agrees with Alexander's captain. The Harpalus of Cicero was a famous pirate, as well known for the good luck that accompanied his piracies, as for his piracies themſelves: his long proſperity was well known, as appears from the conſequence Diogenes drew from it; ſince a man would render himſelf ridiculous that ſhould argue in that manner, in a town where the ſucceſſes of a pirate had not been taken notice of above four or five years. Add to this, that there is nothing tempts a man more to make murmuring reflexions upon providence, for the proſperity of the wicked, than the ſeeing ones ſelf miſerable by reaſon of their proſperity (41). If therefore there was any robber that could draw from Diogenes's mouth the complaint which Cicero mentions, it was doubtleſs he that made Diogenes his ſlave. But ſince he became a ſlave to a pirate, and not to the governour of Babylon, we muſt conclude, that the witneſs who he thought might be produced againſt the exiſtence of the gods, was the pirate who had taken him captive.

It is to little purpoſe therefore, that Father Leſcalopier (42) repreſents to his readers, that Harpalus, the governour of Babylon, continued not long unpuniſhed, after he had carried off the treaſures of the king his maſter. It is in vain he ſhews, that this robber fell from one miſfortune into another, and that he was miſerably killed about a year after. He does but reaſon againſt himſelf. The farther he advances towards his deſign, the farther he deviates from his ſubject. The queſtion is concerning a robber, who had been a long time fortunate; this is the objection; and here you alledge to us a robber that was puniſhed almoſt upon the ſpot. This is not to anſwer; it is rather to labour unwarily to make of an inconſiderable difficulty, a ſtumbling block for the ſimple, who will be ſcandalized to ſee a libertine anſwered by overturning the whole ſtate of the queſtion. And now is not this concluſion of this Jeſuit very edifying? 'Omitte Harpalum, ſume Diogenem: ne querere quod regiæ pecuniæ prædo unum annum vivat in ſua fortuna: querere quod prædo divinæ providentiæ in ſua impietate longam vitam vivat: ſed neque id certe conquerendum eſt, nam longa vita miſerrimi canis omnibus infeſti, omnibus exoſi, longum ſupplicium fuit, longioris tamen ſupplicii breve præludium (43). —— Inſtead of Harpalus chooſe Diogenes for an example: do not complain, that a perſon who robbed a royal treaſury is allowed to enjoy it one year: complain rather that one who robs GOD of his providence is ſuffered to live for a great number of years in his impiety: but neither is this any ground of complaint, for the long life of this miſerable dog who hated all men, and was hated by all, was a long puniſhment, though indeed only the ſhort prelude, to a much longer puniſhment.'

[K] There is a fault in Euſebius, which I will take notice of.] He ſays under the third year of the CXIIIth Olympiad, that Harpalus fled into Aſia. Harpalus fugit in Aſiam. Scaliger approves of that chronology. But he corrects Aſiam, by Atticam, and it is certain, that if Euſebius did not ſay Atticam, he ought to have done it. Bongarſius (44) had corrected it, fugit ex Aſia.

HARRAVAD (Isaac Ben) a noted Rabbi, toward the end of the XIIth Century. He has written ſomething, but we know not truly what it is. There are two wonderful qualities aſcribed to him: one is, that he could diſcover by peoples faces, whether their ſoul was tranſmigrated from another body, or began to exiſt at the moment of it's union with their own; the other, that though he was blind, he diſtinguiſhed certainly by the ſmell, whether a man were alive or not (a). The criticiſm of Father Bartolocci is ſomewhat dull on this occaſion [A].

[A] The criticiſm of Father Bartolocci is ſomewhat dull on this occaſion.] Having quoted theſe words of Rabbi Reckanati, '& licet fuiſſet cæcus, ſenſibiliter percipiebat ex aëre an iſte fuiſſet vivus an vero mortuus. —— And though he was blind, he could ſenſibly diſtinguiſh by the air, whether a man was dead or alive.'

'alive,' he adds (1), 'cognoſcere cadaver ex olfactu 'mira res apud Judæos: quia cum Judæi male olentes 'inter ſe continuo verſentur, illorum olfaciendi ſenſus 'videtur depravatus, ut inter cadaveris & latrinarum 'malum odorem diſtinguere neſciant, niſi prodigium 'fiat. —— To know a carcaſe by the ſmell, is a won- 'derful thing among the Jews: becauſe it would ſeem 'that the ſtinking Jews, by conſtantly herding among one 'another, deprave their ſenſe of ſmelling to ſuch a de- 'gree, that they cannot, without a miracle, diſtinguiſh 'betwixt the ſtink of a carcaſe, and of a jakes.' This is a ſilly piece of raillery; and if one would lay aſide the ſpirit of cavilling, he might ſee that the ſmell of that Rabbi had ſomething very particular in it, provided he had that nicety of ſenſe that is pretended. For it muſt not be ſuppoſed, the meaning of it is, that he could diſcern that a man who had been dead ſome days, was not alive. All blind men can eaſily do this. But the meaning is, that the change he perceived in the air as ſoon as a man expired, gave him certainly to underſtand that the man was dead. Will it not be acknowledged, that this change is imperceptible? Father Bartolocci has cenſured another thing. He asks how that blind Rabbi could know the age of the ſoul, by looking on the face? This reflexion cannot be ſolid, unleſs the ſame authors, who have mentioned that faculty of our Rabbi, have expreſsly declared, that he was then blind, and that he made uſe of the inſpection of the face. Now there is no appearance of any ſuch declaration in them. 'Pius 'iſta Ben Harravad cognoſcebat ex vultu, utrum anima 'creata in ipſo actu infuſionis informaretur homo, an 'vero aliunde ex tranſmigratione animam haberet ad- 'venticiam (2). —— The pious Ben Harravad knew by 'the face, whether the ſoul of a man was created in 'the very act of infuſion; or if it was given by way of 'tranſmigration.' Theſe words of Rabbi Rekanati (3), ſhew indeed, that the other Rabbi knew by the face, whether peoples ſouls were new, or not; but they do not determine whether he knew this, by looking on the face, or touching it. Now either of theſe ways is equally wonderful, and the latter even ſeems to be more difficult than the former. It will be objected to me in favour of Bartolocci, that Rekanati, making mention of the other faculty, obſerves, that Rabbi Harravad was blind; but I ſhall ſtill ask, whether he ſays, that this marvellous phyſiognomiſt was blind at that time, when he could diſcern whether ſouls were in the place of their nativity? for if he only meant, that Harravad had that faculty before he grew blind, what will become of the railleries, exclamations, and invectives of Bartolocci? He had reaſon enough to laugh at thoſe tales, but it ought to have been upon other motives. Exactneſs is neceſſary, who ever it be, that is to be confuted.

HARTUNGUS (John) born a Miltemberg (a), in the year 1505, ſtudied firſt in his own country, and afterwards in the univerſity of Heidelberg. He afterwards took arms, which he bore in Hungary againſt the Turks; but ſome time after he returned again to the gentle ſervice of the Muſes, and became profeſſor of the Greek tongue in the univerſity of Heidelberg. He acquitted himſelf gloriouſly of that profeſſion fifteen years together; nor would he have reſigned it, had not the Proteſtant religion been eſtabliſhed in the Palatinate, in the year 1546. That change obliged him to ſeek another employment; and he found one at Friburg in Briſgaw, with which he was ſo well contented, that he kept it as long as he lived. He held an honourable rank amongſt the profeſſors at Friburg, and had many ſcholars. He read lectures upon Homer, and ſome other poets; and he compoſed ſome pretty good books [A]. He died in the ſame town, the 16th of June, 1579, after having taught the Belles Lettres there thirty three years. The epitaph he made for himſelf, teſtifies, that in the inſtruction of youth, he both ſuffered and learned a great deal (b) [B].

He tranſlated Apollonius's poem upon the Argonaut, into Latin. That verſion is not in eſteem. This is the judgment of a good critic upon it (2). 'Miratus ſum hominem & 'eruditum, & in Græca præſertim lingua cum laude 'verſatum ita tranſtuliſſe [Apollonium] ut non paulò 'facilius ſit Apollonium ſua, hoc eſt Græca, lingua 'aſſequi, quam ea qua eum Hartungus loquentem 'fecit, latina. —— I have wondered that a man ſo 'learned, and eſpecially ſo verſed in the Greek language, 'ſhould have tranſlated Apollonius in ſuch a manner, 'that it is much eaſier to underſtand Apollonius's 'Greek, than Hartungus's Latin.' He afterwards ſhews ſome errors of this verſion, and lets us know, that he could point out abundance more (3).

[B] The epitaph he made upon himſelf, declares, that . . . he had ſuffered . . . and learned much.] It deſerves to be ſet down here,

Πολλὰ παθὼν, καὶ πολλὰ μαθὼν ἐν παιδοδιδάσκειν
Ἔνθα δὲ νῦν κεῖμαι σὺν Θεῷ ἡσύχιος.

In teaching youth I learn'd and ſuffer'd much,
And now, in duſt, I quietly reſt with GOD.

The Latin verſion of it, which is found in Melchior Adam (4), is very bad: it no way anſwers the author's intention, which was to ſhew, that his profeſſorſhip had been a heavy burden. I will not inſert here the other epitaph which Hartungus made upon himſelf in Greek; it may be ſeen in Melchior Adam. I am ſure that Lorenzo Craſſo would have placed him in his liſt of Greek poets, if he had known as much as has been here ſaid of him. The forgetfulneſs of that Italian puts me in mind, that Mr Baillet has not given Hartungus a place among the critics.

HEBEDJESU, Patriarch of the Neſtorians re-united to the Church of Rome, under Pius IV in 1562. I have already ſpoken of him under another name (a), which has been given him by divers authors; but what I have farther to ſay concerning him, I thought worthy to be told in this place. Since the printing of the Article ABDISSI, I have obſerved in a very curious work (b), that after the death of Simon Julacha [A], a Monk of the order of St Pachomus, who had been created Patriarch

[A] Simon Julacha.] It ſhould be written Sulacha, as Aubertus Miræus writes it (1). We need not wonder that the critics can collect out of manuſcripts an infinity of variæ Lectiones, when printed books are not exempt from them. The Sieur de Moni gives the name Caremit, to a town of Meſopotamia, which Aubertus Miræus calls Charemet. The latter calls him Donba Simon, whom the other names Denba Simon. The one uſes the word Zeinalbach, the other chooſeth rather to ſay, Zeinalbech. They have both drawn from the ſame fountain, viz. from Peter Strozza's book de Chaldæorum Dogmatibus; why therefore do not they agree? Is it eaſier to write Sulacha, than Julacha, Donba, than Denba? Mr Arnaud, from the ſame original, ſays (2), that Simon Sulacha eſtabliſhed his ſee at Caramit. Mr Claude (3) makes uſe of the word Sulak. Father Paul, at the beginning of his fifth book (4), ſays, one Simon Sultakam. Mr Amelot makes triarch of the Neſtorians, by Julius III, “ Abdjeſu, or, according to the Chaldaic pronunciation, Hebedjeſu was made Patriarch in his room. Abraham Ecchellenſis, who has printed a little Syriac treatiſe of Abdjeſu [B], gives him the title of Metropolitan of Soba, in the preface he prefixed to that work. He obſerves, that this Hebedjeſu had compoſed ſeveral books in defence of the religion of the Neſtorians; but that coming to Rome in Julius the third's pontificate, he abjured Neſtorianiſm. It is he that is ſpoken of in the life of Pius IV, in whoſe time he made a ſecond voyage to Rome [C], to obtain the confirmation of his Patriarchate; and he aſſiſted at the Council of Trent [D]. As he was a man of parts, he had the dexterity to bring over a great number of Neſtorians to the church of Rome. But his ſucceſſors could not retain them in it, having neither his capacity, nor his addreſs. Ahathalla, who was alſo a Monk of St Pachomus, ſucceeded Hebedjeſu, and living but a little while, had Denha Simon for his ſucceſſor, who was before archbiſhop of Gelu. But he was obliged to leave Caremit [E], and to retire into the province of Zeinalbech, in the extremity of Perſia, having been forced to ſubmit to the power of the Patriarch of Babylon. His ſucceſſor, whoſe name alſo was Simon, reſided at the ſame place, which much diminiſhed the authority of this ſecond Patriarch”. This is what I have found in this book (c). I was of opinion, when I drew up the article of ABDISSI, that we might rely on the narrative of Father Paul. But I ought not to paſs over in ſilence, what I have ſince obſerved in Father Pallavicini, viz. that it is not true, that this Patriarch wrote letters to the Council. The following notes will give an account of what has been criticiſed in Father Paul's Narrative [F].

makes no correction here. Theſe are trifles I confeſs: but from ſuch trifles as theſe, do often ariſe very conſiderable and important diſputes. Hæ nugæ ſeria ducunt in mala. It would go better with the Republic of Letters, if every one would think himſelf obliged to avoid even the leaſt faults.

[B] Abraham Ecchellenſis printed a little Syriac treatiſe of Abdjeſu.] I believe it is the ſame treatiſe Mr Arnaud ſpeaks of, when he cites (5) the notes of Abraham Ecchellenſis, a Maronite, upon a catalogue of Chaldean books, made by Abdjeſu, or Hebedjeſu, a Neſtorian biſhop, who came over to the church of Rome. Some pages after (6) he touches upon ſome circumſtances, which deſerve a place here, as giving us a more particular account what ſort of man our Hebedjeſu was. He had formerly been one of the moſt violent Neſtorians, ſays Mr Arnaud, and written ſeveral books whilſt he himſelf was in that error, which he reckons up at the end of the catalogue of the Chaldean books which he wrote, and which has been tranſlated by Ecchellenſis. It appears by that catalogue, that the book intituled Margaritarum, was compoſed by him whilſt he was yet a Neſtorian. The Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary obſerves (7), that the catalogue of the Syrian writers (it is doubtleſs that whereof Hebedjeſu is the author) was publiſhed at Rome, in Syriac in the year 1653, with a Latin verſion and notes, by Abraham Ecchellenſis. That this catalogue makes mention of ſeveral works compoſed in Syriac by Hebedjeſu; that there are two poems compoſed in Syriac, and written with his own hand, preſerved in the Vatican, where he gives the reaſons of his re-union, &c. Aubertus Miræus relates (8) that the picture of that Patriarch was placed in the palace of the Vatican, amongſt the cardinals and prelates, that accompanied Alexander III, when he received the ſubmiſſions of the emperor Frederic at Venice.

[C] He made a ſecond voyage to Rome.] I am ſurprized, that neither Father Paul, nor his cenſurer, cardinal Pallavicino, or any one of the many authors I have conſulted concerning Hebedjeſu, have mentioned a voyage which he made to Rome in Julius the third's time. It had not been a ſuperfluous, nor an uſeleſs, circumſtance; and I am perſuaded, they would not have omitted it, had they known it.

[D] He aſſiſted at the council of Trent.] I have elſewhere refuted this falſhood. It ſuffices to add here, that there is no writer, though never ſo inconſiderable, who ſometimes does not cauſe the greateſt authors to ſtumble. Peter Strozza, ſecretary to Paul V, was very likely miſled by ſome wretched chronicler; and it is no doubt upon the credit of that ſecretary, that the Sieur de Moni, and before him Mr Arnaud (9), have publiſhed, that Hebedjeſu aſſiſted at that council.

[E] Denha Simon was obliged . . . . to leave Caremit.] This happened at the time that Leonard Abel, biſhop of Sidon, went to the Levant with the character of Apoſtolic Nuncio (10). He was a native of Malta, and underſtood perfectly the Arabian tongue, which is as it were natural in that iſland. He died at Rome, in the year 1605, or 1606. He compoſed a book concerning the ſtate of the Oriental Chriſtians, whence Aubertus Miræus, from whom I copy this whole remark, confeſſes he has taken many things, in his Notitia Epiſcopatuum. He adds, that this work of Leonard Abel, is in manuſcript in the library of the deceaſed cardinal Aſcanio Colonna, protector of the churches of the eaſt, and that this library was wonderfully increaſed, by the addition of the books of cardinal William Sirlet.

[F] The following notes will give an account of what has been criticiſed in Father Paul's Narrative.] That author relates, that the letters of cardinal Amulius were read, who, in quality of protector of the Oriental Chriſtians, ſent the news to the council of the arrival of Abdiſſi . . . . . He related, that the people under this prelate's juriſdiction, had been inſtructed in the faith by St Thomas and St Thaddæus, &c. (11). The hiſtorian adds, that afterwards the Patriarch's confeſſion of faith was read, and laſtly, the letters he addreſſed to the council, to excuſe himſelf for not being able to come there, &c (12). Cardinal Pallavicino (13) tells the ſtory more at large, and with greater exactneſs, not confounding what Amulius ſaid by the Pope's order, with the conſequences which he drew himſelf from the narratives of the Neſtorian prelate. It does not appear, that Father Paul has made that diſtinction, but his principal fault lies in affirming, that a letter wrote by Abdiſſi to the council was read. Pallavicino maintains, that that letter never had a being but in the imagination of Father Paul (14).

HEGESILOCHUS was one of thoſe who committed infinite violences in the iſle of Rhodes, when it's Democratical government was chang'd into an Ariſtocratical, by the authority of Mauſolus, King of Caria (a). Athenæus has preſerved us a ſpecimen of the lewdneſs of theſe new maſters (b). They debauched the wives of the moſt eminent citizens, and abuſed many boys. In ſhort, they carried their licentiouſneſs ſo far, as to ſtake the honour of women at the game of hazard [A]. They made it on his Hoggidiani; for I do not believe, that our age has ſeen in any country of Europe, diſorders equal to thoſe of theſe Rhodians. I have heard indeed, that the footmen of a great miniſter of ſtate, who has not been many years dead, uſed to play at cards or dice for captains commiſſions; but beſides that this is very uncertain, it may be reduced to a ſmall matter, viz. that each of theſe footmen obtained for his new-year's gift the promiſe that ſuch a number of companies ſhould be given at his recommendation: after which they played this fund among themſelves, and when any one loſt a company, it was no longer in his power, but the winner's, to recommend any body. In all this diſorder it was ſtill eaſy to hinder the commiſſions from being given to people unfit for ſervice. So that this is nothing comparable to the debauchery of theſe petty tyrants at Rhodes, who ſtaked down at play, maiden-heads and cuckoldoms, and gave no reſpite to the loſer, till he had delivered them their prey. They were not content to venture the honour of the fineſt women, which is inſeparable, as the world will have it, from that of their huſbands: they alſo ventured their own: for the loſer was under a neceſſity of turning procurer. Here was reaſon, with a witneſs, to cry out, O tempora? O mores?

[A] He was one of thoſe Rhodians who carried their licentiouſneſs ſo far, as to ſtake the honour of women, at the game of hazard.] The abbot Lancelloti of Perugia, had here a fair opportunity to carry on it a rule, that the loſer ſhould be obliged to bring the lady that was played ſor, to him that had won her, and ſhould uſe all ſorts of methods to convey her into his arms. No trick or evaſion was allowed; perſuaſions and violences were to ſucceed one another, to proceed or to follow, according to the exigence of the caſe, till the wager that was played for was actually paid. He who moſt frequently, and moſt impudently, put in practice this new game at hazard, was Hegiſilochus (c). His drunkenneſs and other debaucheries rendered him ſo incapable of buſineſs, that he loſt his dignity, and was look'd upon, even by his friends, as an infamous wretch. This Hegeſilochus ought not to be confounded with one of that name, who came ambaſſador from the Rhodians to Rome [B], after he had exerciſed the principal dignity of their ſtate [C]. This man lived in the time of Perſeus king of Macedonia, the other in the time of Philip, Father of Alexander the Great.

[B] Another Hegeſilochus was ambaſſador at Rome from Rhodes.] This we learn from Polybius (1). Geſilochus was the word in the manuſcripts; but Fulvius Urſinus (2) having obſerved in Livy (3) that this Rhodian was called Hegeſilus, corrected theſe two authors by one another, and reſtored Hegeſilochus to both.

[C] He had exerciſed the chief dignity of their ſtate.] It was called πρυτανεία (4), and the exerciſing of it was expreſſed by the verb πρυτανεύειν. The Latins called thoſe who exerciſed that dignity, Prytanes. 'Quadraginta navibus autore Hegeſilocho comparatis, 'ſays Livy (5), qui cum in ſummo magiſtratu eſſet '(Prytanin ipſi vocant). —— Having got together 'forty ſhips, by the advice of Hegeſilochus, who being 'chief magiſtrate (or Prytanis) as they call him.'

HEIDANUS (Abraham) divinity profeſſor at Leyden, was born at Frankendal, in the Palatinate, the 10th of Auguſt, 1597. He began his ſtudies at Amſterdam, whither Gaſpar Heidanus, his father, was called to the office of the miniſtry in the year 1608. An Engliſhman, called Matthew Slade, who was then rector of the college of Amſterdam, took particular care of Abraham Heidanus, whom he ſaw to be a youth of promiſing parts. Daniel Colonius applied himſelf with no leſs zeal to further the progreſs of this his diſciple, when he was committed to his inſtruction at Leyden, in the Walloon college. Colonius not being one of thoſe fiery ſpirits who were for carrying all things to the laſt extremities, when the Arminian diſputes began to riſe, made himſelf to be ſuſpected, as inclining that way [A]; ſo that there were many perſons who expreſſed their diſlike at Gaſpar Heidanus's ſuffering his ſon to ſtudy under ſuch a tutor. But the raſhneſs of this ſort of detraction produced a contrary effect to what theſe zealots aimed at: the miniſter of Amſterdam continued his ſon with Colonius, his old friend, whoſe orthodoxy he was aſſured of: he continued him with him, I ſay, that he might give his friend an authentic proof of their agreement in opinion. This ſcholar made good progreſs under Colonius, not doing as the generality did, who only ſtuffed their heads with the diſpute about the five articles of the Remonſtrants

[A] Colonius being none of thoſe fiery ſpirits . . . . made himſelf ſuſpected of Arminianiſm.] This is one of the moſt vexatious inconveniences that attend diſputes about religion. They who either through their natural temper, or an exact knowledge of the true intereſts of the church, are for healing and uniting things, and talk not of cutting off corrupted members, become ſuſpected of heterodoxy. They of a hot choleric, and furious ſpirit, the zealots, who have always at their tongues end Principiis obſta, and the maxim, that evil muſt be ſtifled in it's cradle, cry down the moderate men, and make them odious to the people; and this cauſes many who cannot kindle into paſſion, to abandon however the ſhew of moderation: they chooſe rather to offer a little violence to their natures and conſciences, than to paſs for baſe prevaricators. The hot men know well enough, that their calumnies will have this effect, and therefore they ſpread them as much as poſſible, both in converſation and in the pulpit, without any ſcruple. This is what happened at the beginning of the Arminian diſputes, if we will believe Wittichius. 'Vigebat illo tempore ob diſcrepantes de prædeſtinatione ſententias non tantum inter diſſentientes magna 'contentio quæ animos à ſe invicem alienabat, & diſjungebat, ſed etiam inter ὁμοψήφους, & idem de 'controverſia illa ſentientes obſcura quædam diffidentia, qua locus dabatur ſuſpicionibus quibus alii 'alios tanquam bonæ cauſæ minus addictos differebant. Qui enim ferventioris erant ingenii, & omnia 'ſumma tentanda in initiis putabant, ut in herba 'opprimeretur malum, quoſcunque videbant moderatius & lentius agere, ac de reconciliatione animorum potius laborare ſi vulnus forte poſſet conſolidari, ac ſchiſma, quod ad opera carnis pertinet, 'evitari, eos tanquam prævaricatores bonæ cauſa apud plebem criminabantur (1). —— The different 'opinions about predeſtination, at that time, produced not 'only great contentions, among men from one another, 'which totally alienated the minds of thoſe who thought 'differently on that ſubject, but even produced amongſt 'thoſe who agreed in opinion concerning that controverſy, a ſort of diffidence which made way for ſuſpicions, every one accuſing another of want of zeal, 'in the good cauſe. For they who were of warmer 'tempers, and thought that the utmoſt ſerverities 'ought to be uſed to check the evil in the bud, accuſed thoſe to the people, as prevaricators in the 'cauſe of GOD, whom they obſerved to be of more 'moderate ſentiments, and who laboured to heal the 'wounds and prevent ſchiſm, which is one of the 'works of the fleſh.' This ſeems to be a true picture. Theſe diſputes cauſe a violent war without, and ſow the wicked ſeeds of ſuſpicious within, which

Remonſtrants (a). He learned that and the reſt. He was made proponent at the ſynod of the Walloon churches, in the year 1618, and he preached in ſeveral French churches, with the applauſe of his auditors. He preached alſo in ſome Dutch churches with the like ſucceſs. He travelled two years, and ſaw part of Germany, Swiſſerland, France, and England. A little after his return he was promoted to the miniſtry, and he exerciſed his function at Naerden, to the year 1627, when he accepted of a call from the conſiſtory of Leyden. He was contracted to a daughter of one of the principal merchants in Amſterdam, when he took poſſeſſion of his new church, and a little after he celebrated his marriage. He was a good preacher, which, together with other good qualities, both of temper and parts, procured him a fair reputation. He was fifty years old, when the province of Guelderland, having reſolved to eſtabliſh an univerſity at Harderwic, offered him the divinity profeſſorſhip, upon very advantageous conditions. The church of Leyden, to keep him with them, allowed him either the ſame advantages, or, in general, what ſhould make him ample amends for his refuſal. The curators of the univerſity found a ſtill better expedient to prevent his going to Guelderland; they gave him the profeſſorſhip of divinity, which became vacant by the death of Conſtantine l'Empereur. He was ſo well ſatisfied with Leyden, that he would not hearken to the offers which the Elector Palatin made him, in the moſt preſſing manner. And yet that refuſal did not hinder that prince from giving him many honourable marks of his eſteem [B] when he paſs'd through Heidelberg, in the year 1656, in the journey he made to Straſburg with his family. The profeſſor Smidius, who invited him to a publick diſputation, and deſired him to impugn, did not come off honourably from the diſpute [C]. But Heidanus's victory on that occaſion, was not ſo plain as that in the Jeſuits college at Cologne [D]. This learned man died at Leyden very piouſly, the 15th of October 1678, having exceeded his eighty firſt year, which of all the climacteric years is look'd upon as the moſt dangerous, and with good reaſon. He left four children, two ſons and two daughters, thirteen grand-children, and three great grand-children. He had a great ſhare in Mr Des Cartes's friendſhip, and by that means he finiſhed the work he had begun, under Jachæus, philoſophy profeſſor at Leyden, one of the moſt ſubtle peripatetics then living. This Jachæus brought the queſtion which are wonderfully fruitful. They produce, amongſt other things, as I ſaid juſt now, a great change in thoſe whom reaſon inſpires with a ſpirit of moderation. They are decried as ſecret traitors (2), and there are ſome among them, who will not continue reaſonable at that rate, and who believe their honeſty would coſt them too dear, if they muſt loſe their reputation for it; and therefore they turn perſecutors, to refute the calumny:

Tanto major famæ ſitis eſt, quam virtutis (3),

This was the conduct of a great many Catholics in France, who had diſapproved the rigour that was exerciſed againſt the Proteſtants under Francis I, and Henry II.

[B] The elector Palatine gave him many honourable marks of eſteem.] They who ſhall think it ſtrange that I give the particulars, will cenſure Mr Wittichius, rather than me. For there muſt be a greater allowance to mention theſe things in a dictionary of two volumes in Folio, when one meets with them in a funeral oration, than to diſplay them in a funeral oration, when they are only taken from a memoir in manuſcript. Let it be how it will, Mr Wittichius ſays, that Abraham Heidanus was invited to dinner every day by a new meſſenger, and he does not forget the preſents he received. ‘Dum Heidelbergam ‘appulit, nihil omiſit Sereniſſimus Elector quod non ‘ferventiſſimum erga ipſum ſpiraret affectum. Ad menſam quotidie, novis ſemper miſſis nunciis, invitabat ‘in colloquiis benevole complectebatur, donabat medio cervo & aliquot leporibus, nunciato hanc omnem ‘eſſe prædam quam illo die cepiſſet; quæcumque in ‘diverſorio cum familia conſumpſerat liberaliſſimè ſolvit, ‘& cum Bacheracum rediiſſet, ad ſuos Leidenſes reverſurus, magno dolio optimi & generoſiſſimi vini ‘Bacheracenſis voluit donatum. — When be arrived at ‘Heidelberg; the elector omitted nothing that could ‘expreſs his great affection towards him. He invited ‘him daily to his table, and always by a new meſſenger; and converſed with him in the moſt affable ‘manner. He preſented him with a ſide of veniſon, ‘and ſome hares, telling him, that this was all the ‘game be had killed that day. He defrayed all his ‘and his families expences, while there, in the moſt ‘liberal manner; and when be returned to Bacherac ‘in his way to Leyden, he was pleaſed to make him ‘a preſent of a hogſhead of excellent Bacherac wine’.

[C] The profeſſor Smidius who invited him to diſpute . . . . . did not come off honourably.] After Heidanus had excuſed himſelf ſeveral times from entring the liſts, he at laſt gave way to his repeated civilities, and attacked him upon the point of univerſal grace, which the Lutherans teach: great was the attention of the auditors, and the ſucceſs very glorious to the opponent. Smidius ipſum palam non ſemel, ſed quia declinabat noſter, iteratis vicibus ad opponendum invitavit, quod, cum non videretur ſibi ſalvo honore ſuo poſſe detrectare, ea ſoliditate, ea efficacia Gratiam quam Lutherani urgent, Univerſalem ita oppugnavit, ut omnium oculos in ſe converterit, & apud omnes præſentes magnam admirationem ſuæ conſummatæ eruditionis excitaverit, diſputationis vero præſes multorum judicio parum honorificè ex illa diſputatione diſceſſerit (4).

[D] Heidanus's victory . . . . . was not ſo plain as that in the Jeſuit's college at Cologne.] If this laſt victory was eaſier to be obſerved than the foregoing, it was in other reſpects not ſo honourable; for it conſiſted in a jeſt, to which the Jeſuit, who had ſhewn him whatever was to be ſeen in the college of Cologne, and perhaps was a lay-brother, could not anſwer a word. Heidanus asked the Jeſuit, whether JESUS CHRIST had done and ſuffered all that was neceſſary for our Salvation? Yes, ſaid the Jeſuit: Then replied he, you are not his companions (§α). The Jeſuit, confounded with ſhame and aſtoniſhment, had nothing to ſay for himſelf. Malincrot, dean of Munſter, who heard this converſation, and had got acquainted with Heidanus (5), congratulated him upon that victory, obtained, ſaid he, over my enemies. Wittichius, who alſo heard this diſcourſe, relates it in this manner: Accidit ut poſtquam Collegium luſtraveramus Jeſuitarum, & jam in area eramus conſtituti ut patribus valere diceremus, converſus Heidanus ad Jeſuitam qui nos ducebat, ex ipſo rogaverit annon Jeſus omnia illa quæ ad ſalutem eſſent neceſſaria egiſſet & paſſus fuiſſet? Ac Jeſuita nihil ſiniſtri metuens, reſpondiſſet, Omnino: Heidanus regeſſerit: Ergo vos non eſtis Socii Jeſu; atque ſic illo in ruborem dato & attonito ut ne verbum quidem reſpondere poſſet, diſceſſit noſter & nos cum ipſo, atque patribus valere dixit. Quod Malincrotium tanto affecit gaudio, ut hoc nomine gratias ſolennes illi egerit, quod ſic ſuos hoſtes (ita vocabat Jeſuita) ad incitas ex improviſo redegiſſet. I muſt confeſs, that hitherto I have ſought in vain wherein the jeſt lies. I cannot gueſs to what he alluded, queſtion concerning ſubſtantial forms into great repute in the univerſity [E]. The young Heidanus, excited by the noiſe it made, examined the objections to the bottom, and compared them with the anſwers of Jachæus. He found, that philoſophizing upon theſe principles, was but loſing time, and he was in hopes, that ſome time or other a more certain road would appear (b). He thought he had found it in the converſation and writings of Deſcartes. But if this was more proper to lead him to the truth, it was not ſo commodious with reſpect to his fortune. For it expoſed him to a thouſand croſſes and perſecutions [F], over which his panegyriſt Wittichius, who ſupplies me with this article, thought it fit to draw a curtain. [(§ a) Strictly ſpeaking, to call ones ſelf companion to a perſon, ſignifies, that we pretend to be ſo in all reſpects. Now the Jeſuit confeſſed, that they of his ſociety were not companions of JESUS in the work of redemption. Therefore the Jeſuits, without reaſon, ſtile themſelves companions of JESUS. This was Heidanus's argument, to which the Jeſuit having made no reply, Malincrotius conſidered it as a victory for his friend Heidanus. REM. CRIT.]

[E] Jachæus brought the queſtion concerning ſubſtantial forms into great repute.] There is no queſtion in Phyſics, that is a clearer proof of the power of prejudices than this. They muſt needs darken the mind with reſpect to the moſt evident notions, ſince there are ſo many people, who cannot ſee the impoſſibility of extracting a ſubſtance from the boſom of matter, unleſs it was there before, or unleſs it be produced by a true creation. The peripatetics tell you very coldly, or rather they paſſionately maintain, that forms do not exiſt in their ſubject, and that nevertheleſs they are drawn out of it by an action which muſt not be called creation but eduction (6). This opinion would be the moſt monſtrous thing in the world, if it were not a more amazing prodigy to ſee ſuch a number of learned and ingenious men, eſpouſe ſtill at this day, the doctrine of ſubſtantial forms. Wittichius could not better prepare his auditors to obſerve in Heidanus a diſciple of Deſcartes, than by telling them what Heidanus, as yet but a ſcholar, judged of the principles of the ſchool, from the inexplicable confuſion in which Jachæus involved himſelf. ‘Fervebat in Academia quæſtio de formis ſubſtantialibus, earumque ex potentia materiæ productione, quæ mirificè non tantum Auditores, ſed & ipſum defenſorem earum acerrimum Jachæum vexabat & torquebat. Quam cum univerſa diſtinctionum ſuarum panopliâ expedire non poſſet, & ad liquidum oſtendere quænam illæ formæ ſubſtantiales eſſent, à materia realiter diſtinctæ & tamen materiales, quænam illa potentia materiæ, an pars ejus quædam converſa in formam, an vero ejus cùm producitur tantum ſuſtentaculum, an autem ut ex aſſere figura ſcamni educitur, ita eodem modo præexiſteret in materia forma; cumque aliæ plurimæ ſupereſſent difficultates, nec ullum ſuppeditaretur filum ex hoc labyrintho emergendi, factum eſt ut auditores & perſpicaciores diſcipuli, inter quos Heidanus primas obtinebat de tota hac philoſophandi ratione quam intelligendo aſſequi ſe non poſſe videbant, plane deſperarent (7). —— The queſtion concerning ſubſtantial forms, and their production out of the power of matter, was then much debated in that univerſity, and wonderfully perplexed the ſcholars, and even Jachæus himſelf, a warm defender of them. And he not being able to extricate himſelf with all his diſtinctions, nor clearly ſhow what theſe ſubſtantial forms are, which are really diſtinct from matter, and yet are material, nor what this power of matter is, whether a part of it converted into form, or only a prop to it when it is produced, or whether as the figure of a bench is taken out of a plank, ſo form, in the ſame manner, preexiſts in matter. There being likewiſe many other difficulties, and no thread left to get out of this labyrinth, many of his moſt ſagacious hearers, and ſcholars, among the chief of which was Heidanus, gave over all hopes of this whole ſyſtem of philoſophy, which they found ſo unintelligible.’

[F] Des Cartes's method expoſed him to a thouſand croſſes and perſecutions.] I do not know the particulars: but I remember a paſſage of his Conſiderations, where he relates that he had made himſelf many enemies, and had been expoſed to horrible ſlanders, for having always been averſe to too rigid maxims. He had not declared war againſt Proteſtant canons: he had not thundered in the pulpit againſt periwigs: he was not of opinion, that the Remonſtrants ought to be rigorouſly examined, who returned to the boſom of their ancient mother. Hereupon they repreſented him as an enemy to the new model of reformation, that was to be introduced; all his other opinions were ſcanned and ſifted; he was accuſed of being addicted to Des Cartes's opinions, and of contemning the Lord's day. But it is better to hear Heidanus himſelf. Ætatem illam meam ancipitem duxi, modo tempeſtates, hinc expertus halcyonia, intra & extra nos paſſus adverſarios, hinc hoſtes, inde fratres, nec nunquam mordacis linguæ exceptus flagellis. Fuit, cum ſciſſam in partes chariſſimam hanc noſtram Eccleſiam metu prævidimus: tum nobis ſed eam ſapientiam ſimul largitus eſt Deus, ut quidvis pati potius, quam idipſum permittere, maluerimus: Hinc jam Moderatores, per contemptum (ac ſi probroſum hoc nomen foret) audivimus; jam ut Carteſii plus ſatis addicti Philoſophiæ; hinc Sabbathi contemptores; inde novæ quam urgebant quidam Reformationis hoſtes traducti ſumus: quod fœneratoribus trapeziticis pluſculum illis concedere viſi, nec Canonicis bellum indicere, neque de ſuggeſtis in comas detonare, neque Eccleſiæ diſciplinam ſtrictiùs exercere, nec Remonſtrantes ad nos tranſeuntes rigidiùs examinare, & quæ ſunt id genus alia (8). Matters were carried ſo high, that he was depoſed from his place of profeſſor of divinity, upon the following account. The curators of the univerſity of Leyden publiſhed a decree the ſixteenth of January, 1676, forbidding the the profeſſors to treat in any wiſe of certain propoſitions (9), which had for ſome time been a ſubject of diſpute, and of Des Cartes's metaphyſics. Heidanus acted againſt that decree, almoſt in the ſame manner as the Janſeniſts did againſt the mandate of the archbiſhop of Paris, who forbad the reading of the New Teſtament of Mons. He animadverted upon it; and pretended to find nullities or irregularities in it: he maintained, that the twenty propoſitions which had been condemned, had not been diſcuſſed in the univerſity of Leyden, as the curators affirmed. He complained, that theſe gentlemen had ſuffered themſelves to be impoſed on by unfaithful extracts, and he made odious compariſons betwixt the Jeſuits, and thoſe who had furniſhed theſe extracts, the Jeſuits, I ſay, who had cauſed to be condemned at Rome for Janſenius's propoſitions, what was not to be found in his writings. He made another compariſon: for he alledged Giles Hunnius, a Lutheran, who, from artificial extracts out of the woks of John Calvin, pretended to convict him of Judaiſm. Laſtly, he illuſtrated the condemned propoſitions, and tryed to ſhew, that in the ſenſe of the authors they were taken from, they were orthodox. That work of Heidanus was printed in Dutch and afterwards in Latin (10). This offended the curators to that degree, that they degraded him. Heidanus's friends pretend, that nothing could have happened to him more ſeaſonably, ſince his great age would not ſuffer him to acquire a new reputation by his lectures, nor even to ſupport that which he had already gained; and beſides that, his degradation rendered him more dear and venerable to his own party (11), and might caſt an odium on the adverſe ſide.

[G] Heidanus was of a good family.] His great grand-father, Gerhard vander Heyden, was of Mechlen (12): ſo was his grand-father, Gaſpar vander Heyden, who was expelled his father's houſe on the account of his having embraced the reformed religion. He was miniſter at Antwerp, from whence he retired to Franckfort by reaſon of the perſecution. Here he found many refugees, whom the rigid Lutherans would not tolerate; which obliged them to petition Frederic II Elector Palatine, for a place of retreat. Peter Dathenus was at the head of them. granted them the monaſtery of Frankendal, the monks being ordered to depart: theſe refugees performed their religious exerciſes in Flemiſh, and by degrees enlarged that monaſtery into a town. Dathenus being called to Heidelberg, our Gaſpar vander Heyden ſucceeded him as paſtor of that church. He was deſired to be preſent at the national ſynod of Embden, in the year 1571, and was even choſen preſident of that aſſembly. There the canons of diſcipline were made. A little after, returning to the Palatinate, the elector appointed him to attend his ſon, whom he ſent with ſome troops to the aſſiſtance of the Proteſtants, in the Low-Countries. Theſe troops were beaten. Vander Heyden retired into Holland, and preſided in the national ſynod aſſembled at Dort, 1574. He ſerved for ſome time the church of Middleburg; afterwards thinking himſelf ſafe by virtue of the pacification of Ghent, he returned to take the charge of his firſt flock at Antwerp. When that town was taken by the Spaniards, he returned to the Palatinate, and was made ſuperintendant of the churches about Bacharac. He was diſpoſed to quit that employ, in compliance with the deſires of the church of Frankendal, who deſired him for their miniſter again; when he died, leaving an only ſon of the ſame name, Gaſpar, who was born in the year 1566. The latter was firſt miniſter at Wolmerſheim, afterwards at Frankendal, and then at Amſterdam, where he died in the year 1626. HELEN, daughter of Tyndarus, king of Lacedemon, was the fineſt woman of her age [A]; but otherwiſe, without honour and virtue, and of a life full of unhappy adventures. There are ſome authors, who have been ſo particular in deſcribing the perfections of her body [B], that they can by no means be excuſed, though they ſhould ſay, in expreſs terms, they only did it by way of amuſement. She was ſought in marriage by a great number of princes, and as her father did not know what courſe to take

[A] She was the fineſt woman of her age.] There are ſome authors (1) who have deſcribed the particulars of Helen's beauty. He who has done it moſt at large, is Conſtantine Manaſſes: he has included in eleven Greek verſes, a good number of epithets, repreſenting the corporeal perfections of this woman. He does not forget to tell us, that her beauty owed nothing to art, and that her complexion, without the help of waſhes, had a noble luſtre (2). They have aſcribed to her, legs finely made, a little mouth (3), a long, and very white neck (4), large eyes, and fine breaſts (5). Brantome furniſhes me with a paſſage upon this laſt part. Helen, ſays he (6), deſiring once to preſent to the temple of Diana a handſome cup, by reaſon of a vow, employed a goldſmith to make it for her, cauſing him to take the pattern from one of her handſome breaſts, and to make it of white gold. In which it was hard to tell which was moſt to be admired, the cup, or the reſemblance of the breaſt, which appeared ſo pretty, and ſo like, that the artifical one could not but create a deſire for the natural. Pliny ſays this with great admiration, and is very particular, where he ſays that there is white gold, which is very ſtrange, and that this cup was made of it . . . He that would make golden cups by the great dugs of ſome women, had need furniſh the goldſmith with a great deal of gold, and would not eſcape afterwards the laughter of the world, when it ſhould be ſaid, behold theſe cups are modelled after the breaſts of ſuch and ſuch ladies. Theſe, inſtead of being like cups, would reſemble your round wooden pails the hogs are ſerved with, and the nipple would reſemble a rotten cherry. Brantome is miſtaken in two things; for Helen did not conſecrate that cup to the temple of Diana; nor is it true that Pliny ſays, it was made of white gold. Minervæ templum habet Lindos inſulæ Rhodiorum in quo Helena ſacravit calicem ex electro. Adjicit hiſtoria mammæ ſuæ menſurâ. Theſe are Pliny's words in the fourth chapter of the thirty third book.

But to return to Helen, I ſay that the deſcriptions which have been made of her beauty, do not give an idea of it comparable to what we form in reading ſome lines of the Iliad, which have nothing of a deſcription in them. Homer contents himſelf with making the counſellors of Priamus ſays, upon ſeeing Helen coming whilſt they were deliberating about ſtate-affairs with their prince, that neither the Grecians nor the Trojans could be blamed, for enduring ſuch pains for the ſake of ſo divine a beauty.

They cry'd no wonder ſuch celeſtial charms,
For nine long years, have ſet the world in arms;
What winning graces! what celeſtial mein,
She moves a goddeſs, and ſhe walks a queen.

Pope.

[B] There are ſome authors who have been very particular in deſcribing the charms of her body.] A Spaniſh fryar obſerves, that the beauty of this woman was a miracle of nature; and that for a multitude of ages, it has been a common proverb, when any one intends to praiſe a beauty in the higheſt manner, to ſay, ſhe is an Helen. He adds, that John Nevizan ſaid, that of the thirty accompliſhments which muſt be united to the making a woman perfectly handſome (α §), not one was wanting in her. Nacio eſta tan aventajada, y enrequecida de hermoſura, que fue un portento, un prodigio, y milagro de naturaleza. quedando deſde aquel tiempo à eſte, y aun para muchos ſiglos, en proverbio, ſu belleza, y gallardia: de tal ſuerte, que quando queremos ponderar, y encarecer la hermoſura de una muger, dezimos que es una Helena: y en tal lugar la pone, el Nivernienſe (8), Natal Comite, Bartolome Caſaneo, Juan Nemizano (9); el qual pone las treynta coſas, que ſe requieren para que una muger ſea perfectiſſima en ſu hermoſura: y dize que las tenia todas ſin faltar ninguna, la hermoſa Helena (10). I believe he never ſaw the work of John Nevizan, and he ſpeaks of it only upon the credit of Chaſſanæus, who not only quotes it, but alſo repeats the Latin verſes, wherein are contained the thirty things, which, as is ſaid, conſtitute a perfect beauty, and which were all found in the body of Helen. I ſuppreſs the reſt of that ſmall Latin poem (12) though Chaſſanæus, who was the firſt preſident in in the parliament of Aix, has not ſcrupled to inſert it intire in his book. To which he adds, ‘ Non aliter hic inſiſto circa talia, cum ſatis, & ultra quam decens ſit, ponatur in dicta ſylva nuptiali. —— I ſhall not inſiſt further on theſe things, enough, and more than is decent, being to be found in the ſaid Sylva Nuptialis.’ I can aſſert with reaſon, that they who thus cite John Nevizan, are not exact, ſince he himſelf is but the copier of ſome other writers, whom he names. The fountain from which he traces it, is a French writer, whoſe book has this title, De la Loüange & Beauté des Dames. The eighteen verſes he gives us, and which Chaſſanæus gives us after him, were a tranſlation out of French made by Francis Corniger. He ſays it was not yet printed, but that there was an Italian verſion of it in a work of Vincent Calmeta, which is publiſhed. ‘ Et triginta requiſita, ſays he (13), enumerantur per Gallicum in libr. de la loüange & beauté des dames circa fin. quas Latinas fecit Franciſc. Lege ergo verſus Corniger*i*.

‘ —— And the thirty requiſites are named by a French author, in a book De la loüange & beauté des Dames near the end; theſe were tranſlated into Latin by Francis Corniger, which I now quote becauſe it is not printed. Vincentius Calmeta has given us the ſame in an Italian poem, which begins Dolce Flaminia, and in the eclogue which follows it, which begins perdare Riſpoſta, Corniger's verſes are as follows:

Triginta hæc habeat &c.

If you conſult a book intituled, Les neuf Matinées du Seigneur de Cholieres, you will find (14) a ſonnet beginning thus:

Celle qui veut paroir des belles la plus belle,
Ces dix fois trois beautez, trois longs, trois courts, tros blancs,
Trois rouges, & trois noirs, trois petis & trois grands,
Trois eſtroits & trois gros, trois menus ſoient en elle.

That is,

She, who would excel other fair ones, muſt have theſe thirty beauties: viz. three long, three ſhort, three white, three red, three black, three ſmall, three large, three ſtrait, three big, three ſlender.

And which ends with levres, doigts & cheveaux menus tell' fut Helene. The concluſion is no leſs impertinent than all the preceding verſes. For to know that Helen was thus formed, it had not been enough to have ſeen her performing her exerciſes at Lacedæmon (15), it muſt have been either Paris, or Menelaus, or ſome of her former husbands or gallants.

[C] Tyndarus . . . . diſpoſed of her to Menelaus.] Some ſay (16) that Tyndarus did not chooſe his ſon-in-law himſelf, but left it to Helen to make choice of an husband out of all her lovers, and that ſhe preferred Menelaus before the reſt. Apollodorus (17) pretends, that Tyndarus reſigned his kingdom to his ſon-in-law; but others ſay (18), he only named him for his ſucceſſor. What a fortune then was Helen, who, with ſo incomparable a beauty, brought alſo a crown to her husband!

[D] Theſeus had ſtole her . . . . they believed that ſhe diſengaged herſelf from that affair without the loſs of her virginity.] Plutarch ſays ſhe was not yet marriageable when Theſeus ſtole her from the temple of Diana, where ſhe was dancing (19). He committed her to his mother's care (20), and put them both under the tuition of one of his good friends in Aphidna: and ſo went in purſuit of another rape (21), with his friend Pirithous. Caſtor and Pollux, Helen's brothers, loſt no time, but entered Attica with ſword in hand, to demand their ſiſter. The Athenians proteſted to them, they knew not where ſhe was. That anſwer did not ſatisfy them, and they were ready to commit hoſtilities, when one Academus acquainting them, that ſhe was at Aphidna (22), they aſſaulted that town, and took it by ſtorm. The gates of Athens were opened to them: they entered the town without committing any diſorders; only deſiring to be initiated into their myſteries. They carried Helen back to Lacedæmon; it is ſaid alſo, that they brought Theſeus's mother along with her, and that that good woman accompanied Helen (23) even to Troy (24).

Hellanicus makes Theſeus to be 50 (25) and Helen ſeven years of (26) age, at the time of her being ſtolen, and yet does not ſcruple to ſay that he deflowered her. Duris, the Samian (27), affirms that Helen was with child of Iphigenia, when ſhe was recovered from the hands of the raviſher. Pauſanias ſays the ſame thing, and adds that ſhe lay-in at Argos, at her ſiſter Clytemneſtra's, wife to Agamemnon, and that ſhe committed her daughter's education to her (28). He ſays that Euphorion, Alexander Pleuronius, and Steſichorus, had wrote in their poems, that Iphigenia was the daughter of Theſeus and Helen. The Argians were ſo far of this opinion, as to believe that Helen cauſed the temple of Lucina, which is in their city, to be built after her lying-in (29). A great many were impoſed upon on that occaſion. Agamemnon thought Iphigenia was his daughter, liar with her as to get her with child, of which ſhe lay-in at her ſiſter's (b). The thing was kept ſecret, becauſe her ſiſter made the child (c) paſs for her own (d). The common fate of young women when they are carried away, is to change their condition, whether they own it or deny it. The handſomer they are, the more credible it is they have ſubmitted to this law. Our romance-writers have not obſerved this [E], or at leaſt daughter, for his wiſe told him ſo. Caſtor and Pollux were perſuaded that their ſiſter returned a maid: for when they queſtioned her on that nice point, ſhe affirmed that no man had touched her. Θησέως καὶ Ἑλένης τῆς Διὸς ἐγένετο θυγάτηρ Ἰφιγένεια, καὶ αὐτὴν ἐξέτρεφεν ἡ τῆς Ἑλένης ἀδελφὴ Κλυταιμνήστρα πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἀγαμέμνονα εἶπεν αὐτὴ τεκεῖν. Ἑλένη γὰρ πυνθανομένη τῶν ἀδελφῶν, ἔφη κόρη παρὰ Θησέως ἀπελθεῖν. Theſei & Helenæ, Jove natæ filia fuit Iphigenia, eamque ſoror Helenæ Clytemneſtra educavit, Agamemnoni dicens ſe eam peperiſſe: nam Helenæ fratribus auſcultans virginem ſe à Theſeo diſceſſiſſe ajebat (30). What ſhall we think then of Menelaus, who married her ſome time after? he honeſtly believed he had bedded a pure virgin, and yet he had married a mother.

When I ſaid Helen was queſtioned by her brothers, I followed the learned Mr Meziriac (31), who underſtood in that ſenſe the Greek paſſage which I have quoted: but others, perhaps, with more reaſon, ſay, that Caſtor and Pollux adviſed their ſiſter to give out that ſhe had preſerved her virginty. It was a very wiſe advice, and which might have been well ſpared to Helen as young as ſhe was: ſhe would have boaſted of that advantage, without any one's ſuggeſtion. She declares, in Ovid, that Theſeus obtained only ſome kiſſes of her by force; and that ſhe came off clear, abating only her fear.

Non tamen è facto fructum tulit ille petitum,
  Excepto redii paſſa timore nihil:
Oſcula luctanti tantummodo pauca protervus
  Abſtulit: ulterius nil habet ille mei (32).

No fruit his paſſion reap'd, tho' bolder grown,
And all I ſuffer'd was in fear alone.
'Tis true, he raviſh'd a reluctant kiſs;
From Helen he can boaſt no greater bliſs.

She confeſſes however that Theſeus was very young (33). Ovid has obſerved a decorum in making her ſpeak in that manner; nor has he obſerved it leſs, in introducing another woman, who believed Helen told a lye:

Illam de patria Theſeus, (niſi nomine fallor)
  Neſcio quis Theſeus, abſtulit ante ſuâ.
A juvene & cupido credatur reddita virgo.
  Unde hoc compererim tam bene, quæris? amo.
Vim licet appelles, & culpam nomine veles,
  Quæ toties rapta eſt, præbuit ipſa rapi (34)

One Theſeus (if I hit the name) before
Had born this fair one from her native ſhore.
Theſeus was young: and can you think the dame
Return'd a virgin from ſo fierce a flame?
Call it a rape; yet Helen ſure was kind;
Repeated rapes betray a willing mind.

The following remark will ſerve for a ſupplement to this.

Reflexion upon the rapes of fair damſels in romances.

[E] Our romance-writers have not obſerved this.] It is certain that Mr or Madam de Scuderi, and the other writers of romances, their contemporaries, have violently ſhocked probability, whilſt they have feigned their heroins were carried off, and yet will not permit us to believe, that they granted any favours to their lovers either by conſent or force. I confeſs they would be infinitely more inexcuſable, if they did not ſuppoſe as they do, that they were ſtolen, without any manner of conſent of theirs. There are countries where there is no puniſhment inflicted on ſuch as ſteal away young women who conſent to it: which is the cauſe that theſe ſorts of thefts are very frequent: and there is no body that believes the raviſhers are very dilatory in point of enjoyment: the firſt lodging they come to is the utmoſt, and moſt people are even inclined to ſuſpect, that enjoyment has preceded the eſcape. However it be, this ſort of rape is generally followed with matrimony; becauſe, if the parents did not conſent to the marriage, they would find themſelves burthened with a daughter diſhonoured in all mens opinion, and who is not like to find any other huſband unleſs ſome one can be content with another man's leavings. Let us confeſs then that romance-writers ſecure themſelves from the greateſt part of the ridicule, by the care they take to ſuppoſe that the damſel oppoſes as much as poſſible her being carried off: but yet they cannot come off clear; they overturn common notions, and form a ſyſtem diametrically oppoſite to the judgment of the public, and to good ſenſe. What motives have their heroes when they carry off a miſtreſs? Do they want to declare to her that they die for love of her, and that her cruelties throw them into deſpair? They have declared that over and over, and they have not recourſe to this violent method, till they know that ſhe is determined to make another man happy, and to be for ever indifferent to them. Do they hope their ſighs, ſo vainly waſted before they had provoked her, will move her under the lively reſentment ſhe is in againſt her raviſher? This is not probable: what they propoſe to themſelves muſt then be to take advantage of the condition, which ſubmits her to their diſcretion, and to bring her under ſuch terms as ſhall make it her intereſt to be the firſt to talk of marriage: this is no doubt one of the views of thoſe who carry off a young woman againſt her will. They perſuade themſelves that after ſhe has been ſome months in their power, her reputation at leaſt will ſuffer very much, and cannot be reſtored but by the nuptial benediction. And it is ſeen, that if others marry ſuch girls, they are ſuſpected to have taken up with the leavings of the raviſher. They are rallied upon it, and regarded as men of no delicate taſte: a new charge this againſt the romance-writers, whoſe heroes are paſſionately deſirous of marrying thoſe miſtreſſes, whom their rivals have carried off more than once. You will find criticiſms upon all this in Parnaſſus Reformed. Cyrus complains there, that they had not given him a heroin of an unblamable character. 'You will doubtleſs, ſays he (35), judge by 'this diſcourſe, that I am not ſatisfied with Mandana, 'and truly what would you have me to think of 'her, after ſhe has been ſo often run away with? 'Should I believe that ſhe eſcaped untouched from 'the hands of four men who carried her off? Or 'will thoſe that are the leaſt clear ſighted in 'theſe myſteries, doubt that you have given me 'another's leavings? Methinks you ſhould have put 'her modeſty to other ſort of proofs, theſe are too 'rude for things ſo frail, and Mandana was not a 'fort that could withſtand ſo many aſſaults? It may 'be ſhe might come off well from the firſt attack: 'I am willing to believe her ſo fortified with virtue, 'as not to ſurrender at the very firſt, and her honour 'might be ſafe, without, a miracle, in that ticklish incident? But relapſes are mortal in theſe matters: a 'ſecond carrying off ruins all: and a heroin who 'has no more than the remains of a ſhaken conſtancy, or perhaps leſs, makes but uſeleſs efforts to 'defend her ſelf.' Apollo lent an ear to that complaint, and pronounced this decree. 'We declare that 'we acknowledge none for heroes that are cuckolds, 'nor for heroins, thoſe who have been carried off 'more than once (36).' Sarraſin's ballad upon the carrying off of Mademoiſelle de Bouteville by Monſieur de Coligny (37), is another decree of condemnation: Here is the opinion of that fine wit.

Ce gentil joli jeu d'amours
Chacun le pratique à ſa guiſe,
Qui par Rondeaux & beaux diſcours, leaſt they have preferred the ſcene of adventures, to probability. Every Body knows that Helen was ſtole away by Paris, the ſon of Priamus, and that all Greece reſented the injury Melenaus had received. Hence roſe the Trojan war, which has been ſo celebrated by the poets. Paris loſing his life in the laſt year of that war, his Brother Deïphobus ſupplied his place with Helen. The Grecians barbarouſly murdered him the night that Troy was taken: in which they were favoured by Helen as much as they could wiſh [F]. Menelaus behaved himſelf like a good-natured man; he reconciled himſelf to his wife without much difficulty, and took her very lovingly home again [G]. After his Death ſhe was forced to fly, and to retire into the iſle of Rhodes, where

To carry captive female hearts;
The ſoft ſing-ſong, the converſe ſweet,

She thought that this barbarous ſacrifice was neceſſary to appeaſe the fury of Menelaus: ſhe would have made a better judgment, if ſhe had conſidered more the good nature of that Grecian prince, and reflected leſs on the guilt of her own crimes.

Or your own beauty, or my love, diſtruſt.

Dryden.

'Nay, ſhe makes a petition to him for one of her baſtards †, Arma rogo genitrix nato, which is generouſly granted her, and Vulcan makes honourable mention of Æneas ⸸: Arma acri facienda viro, with an humanity truly more than human: and ſuch an exceſs of goodneſs, I am willing ſhould be left to the gods ‡, Nec divis homines componier æquum eſt (43).' Theſe words of Montagne are too ingenious to diſpleaſe the judicious in this place. But not to diſſemble, I muſt needs own, there have been ſome ſo officious, as to do Menelaus the honour, to arm him with reſentment againſt the infidelity of Helen. In the Troades of Euripides, he threatens to kill her; and ſhe is forced to make uſe of all ſorts of excuſes to obtain pardon. She ſays, amongſt other things, that after the death of Paris ſhe often endeavoured to make her eſcape from Troy to the Grecian camp, and that the centinels ſurprized her endeavouring to come down the walls by a rope. She adds, that Deïphobus married her by force. Pauſanias makes mention of a ſtatue of Menelaus, purſuing Helen with his ſword in hand, to kill her, when Troy was taken (44). But others ſuppoſe he threw away his ſword when he ſaw her boſom, and ſuffered that treacherous bitch to kiſs him, and returned her careſſes.

Ἑλὼν δὲ Τροίαν, εἶμι γὰρ κἀνταῦθά σοι,
Οὐκ ἔκτανες γυναῖκα χειρίαν λάβων·
Ἀλλ᾽ ὡς ἐσεῖδες μαστὸν, ἐκβαλὼν ξίφος
Φίλημ᾽ ἐδέξω, προδότιν αἰκάλλων κύνα.

Capta autem Troja (nam & huc tua cauſa veniam)
Non interfeciſti uxorem redactam in tuam poteſtatem:
Sed poſtquam vidiſti ubera abjecto gladio
Oſculum accepiſti adulans canem proditricem (45).

When Troy was ſack'd, and Helen in your power,
Her life you ſpar'd, and ſeeing her fair boſom,
The avenging ſword dropp'd from your coward hand,
Baſely you then receiv'd her falſe careſſes,
And hugg'd the treacherous monſter to your breaſt.

[H] Where ſhe came to a miſerable end.] Nicoſtratus and Megapenthus, baſtards of Menelaus, had expelled her from Lacedæmon. She retired to Polyxo, her relation, the widow of Tlepolemus, king of Rhodes, and regent of the kingdom during her ſon's minority. Polyxo, remembering that her huſband died at the ſiege of Troy, and ſo looking upon Helen as the cauſe of her widowhood, reſolved to be revenged of her: and, to that end, when Helen was bathing, ſent women dreſſed in the habit of furies, who hanged her on a tree. The Rhodians, deſirous to immortalize that accident, built a temple, which they called the temple of Helena Dendritis. This I have from Pauſanias (46). The author of the old and new Athens, has reaſon to ſay (47), that a thouſand people talk of the fair Helen, who know nothing of her being hanged. What is ſaid in Moreri's Dictionary, that one of her companions murdered her, is not true. You will find in Photius that ſhe ſtrangled herſelf, and that near the oak on which ſhe hung, there grew an herb, which they called Heleneion, which made people quarrelſome who eat of it (48). Pliny attributes very different qualities to this herb; it beautified women, and exhilarated thoſe who mixed it in their wine (49). He obſerves (50), that it was ſaid to ſpring from the tears of Helen. You will find in the ſame Photius (51), that Thetis put Helen to death, during the return of the Greeks; and, according to others, that ſhe went with Menelaus into Taurica Cherſoneſus in queſt of Oreſtes, and that there they were both ſacrificed by Iphigenia. I have read in Vigenere (52), that Herodotus relates that Nicoſtratus and Megapenthus expelled Helen, and that ſhe retired to Rhodes to Polypo, the widow of king Tlepolemus, and that Polypo's maids hating Helen, becauſe ſhe had been the cauſe of their late lord's death, one day as ſhe went ont to recreate herſelf in an orchard without their miſtreſs, they hung her up and ſtrangled her on one of the trees. I find no ſuch thing in Herodotus.

The Spaniſh monk whom I have above-cited, is groſsly miſtaken concerning the cauſes of the death of Helen. He ſays (53) that having retired to Rhodes, to Polyxena, wife of Ptetolemo, king of that iſle, her conduct was very irregular, as it had always been from her earlieſt youth; that ſhe fell in love with the king, and gave herſelf wholly up to his pleaſures. Polyxena, enraged with jealouſy, cauſed her to be hanged on a tree. Pauſanias, adds he, affirms, that by reaſon of her having committed adultery with Ptetolemo, during the Trojan war, Polyxena put her to death. Judge by this, if that Spaniſh author is faithful, or ſkillful in his citations.

[I] The ſcandalous diſorders of her life.] Several authors (54) have blamed her for her lewdneſs, but eſpecially Lycophron in his Caſſandra, where he calls her πεντάλεκτρον, that is to ſay, a woman of five huſbands (55) . . . . Euripides, in his Andromache, makes Hermione, Helen's daughter, to be thus reproached for the vice of her mother.

Μὴ τὴν τεκοῦσαν τῇ φιλανδρίᾳ γύναι
Ζήτει παρελθεῖν·

Strive not in love's ſoft buſineſs to excell
A mother's ſkill, who knew the trade ſo well.

. . . . Ptolemæus Hephæſtion in Photius, tells a very particular ſtory, which confirms Helen's incontinence. The fact is, that a certain Arcadian, called Peritanus, meeting Helen with Paris Alexander, in the country of Arcadia, had to do with her. But Paris, to chaſtiſe the adulterer, cut off his parts of generation. And hence they that are thus caſtrated, are, in Arcadia, called Peritanes. Lycophron has uſed her more ſeverely, than to call her a wife of five huſbands; they pretend that he called her dove, becauſe of her laſciviouſneſs, and bitch becauſe of her impudence, or her promiſcuous uſe of men (56). I do not ſee that thoſe who would excuſe Helen, alledge any other reaſon than this (57), that ſhe was inticed by the gods to follow Paris (58). There is no crime whatever, but may be juſtified by the ſame apology. But I confeſs, that taking the method of Homer's ſcholiaſt, one might make a good apology. What he ſays is this (59). 'Alexander, ſon of Priamus, travelled out of Aſia to Lacedæmon, where he formed the deſign of ſtealing Helen, who had lodged him in her palace: but ſhe, who had been vertuouſly educated, and loved her huſband tenderly, would never conſent to it, ſaying ſhe liked a lawful marriage better than a ſhameful adultery, and that ſhe choſe rather to ſtay with Menelaus. So Paris not being like to ſucceed, it is ſaid, that Venus bethought herſelf of a ſtratagem, which was to metamorphoſe Alexander into the ſhape of Menelaus, and that ſhe cheated Helen by that means: for believing him to be the true Menelaus, ſhe made no ſcruple to follow him, and to go even to his ſhips, where Paris having made her go aboard, preſently hoiſed his ſails to the wind. Euſtathius alſo, upon the ſame book of Homer, touches upon this ſtory, and obſerves, that Penelope governed her ſelf much more prudently: for though ſhe thought ſhe knew Ulyſſes again, yet ſhe would not venture to gratify him with any thing, and eſpecially to lie with him, till he had told her many particulars, and given her many ſigns, to aſſure her, that he was really her huſband, and that ſhe could not be miſtaken (60).'

[K] Did not prevent paying her divine honours . . . and attributing miracles to her.] I have already ſpoke of the temple conſecrated to her by the Rhodians. Pauſanias makes mention of that which was built to her in the country of Lacedæmon (61). As to her miracles, joy her, till they landed in an iſland [L]. Nevertheleſs, it is ſaid, that he built in that iſland a monument of his firſt enjoyment. It is added that Menelaus did not ruin that monument [M], but contented himſelf with ſignifying, that he had ſatisfaction given racles, it ſuffices to obſerve, that ſhe ſtruck Steſichorus blind, who had ventured to ſlander her in his poems (62); and that ſhe reſtored his ſight upon his ſinging his Palinode (63). She beſtowed extraordinary beauty upon an ugly girl, who was every day brought to her temple (64). See the article ACHILLEA, where we have ſaid, ſhe was the wife of Achilles in the other world; and that ſhe knew how to make her ſelf conſiderable there. See alſo Iſocrates, in his panegyric on Helen; you will there find, that ſhe not only obtained immortality, but alſo a divine power, which ſhe employed in placing her brothers and husband in the number of the gods: ſo that if Caſtor and Pollux were capable of ſuccouring thoſe who during tempeſts made their prayers to them, it was becauſe their ſiſter had communicated that power to them, to prove to the world the metamorphoſis ſhe had wrought upon them. They were in their graves, when ſhe made them gods. What is moſt laudable in this is, that having conferred the ſame gift on Menelaus, ſhe deſired to live with him eternally. Τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς ἤδη κατεχομένους ὑπὸ τῆς πεπρωμένης, εἰς θεοὺς ἀνήγαγε· βουλομένη δὲ πιστὴν ποιῆσαι τὴν μεταβολὴν, οὕτως αὐτοῖς τὰς τιμὰς ἐναργεῖς ἔδωκεν, ὥσθ' ὁρωμένους ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν τῇ θαλάττῃ κινδυνευόντων σώζειν, οἵ τινες ἂν εὐσεβῶς αὐτοὺς ἐπικαλέσωνται· μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα Μενελάῳ τοσαύτην χάριν ἀπέδωκεν . . . ὥστε . . . . οὐ μόνον . . . ἀλλὰ καὶ θεὸν ἀντὶ θνητοῦ ποιήσασα σύνοικον αὐτῇ καὶ πάρεδρον εἰς ἅπαντα τὸν αἰῶνα κατεστήσατο. Fratres, qui fato jam conceſſerant, inter Deos retulit. Cui mutationi cum autoritatem & fidem afferre vellet, honores ita manifeſtos eis dedit, ut in mari conſpecti, periclitantes ſervent, quicumque ipſos piè invocarint. Deinde Menelao tantam gratiam retulit, ut . . . . . non tantum. . . . ſed mortalem ejus ſortem divinitate mutarit, eumque contubernalem ſibi & aſſeſſorem in omne ævum conſtituerit (65). Iſocrates alledges, as a proof of this, the practice of the Lacedemonians, who offered ſacrifices to Menelaus and Helen, not as to heroes, but as to gods. The ſame author obſerves, it was at Therapnæ that theſe divine honours were paid them. But Pauſanias does not ſay, that Helen had a temple in that city; he only ſays, that that of Menelaus was there, and that it was believed that Menelaus and Helen were buried in it (66).

I wiſh that Theodoret had built upon the authority of Iſocrates, and not upon that of Euripides, to inſult the Pagans with their numbring ſo famous an adultereſs as Helen among the gods. For though Euripides has feigned that ſhe did not die, but was exalted to the heavens, by the favour of the gods, and immortalized, it does not follow from thence, that this was the opinion of the Pagans. The epiſodes of a tragedy were ſo much at the poet's diſpoſal, that unleſs they were known to be true on other grounds, they were looked upon as the particular fictions of the tragedian. Theſe are Theodoret's words: Καὶ τὴν Ἑλένην δὲ, μετὰ τὴν πολυθρύλλητον καὶ παμπόλλην μοιχείαν, τοῦ Μενέλεω χωρίσαντες, εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, ᾗ φησιν Εὐριπίδης, ἀνήγαγον (67).

[L] It is not probable that Paris delayed enjoying her till they came . . . into an iſland.] Homer, who gives him ſo much patience, did not do him much honour, according to the principles of gallantry (68). See to what end he mentions that circumſtance of place. Paris, being vanquiſhed by Menelaus, was miſerably reproached by Helen. He prays her not to inſult him, but to go to bed with him, pretending he never felt ſo much of the fire of love, not even when he enjoyed her firſt in the iſle of Cranaë. Hereupon he roſe from his ſeat to go to bed, and was followed by the fair Helen without any reluctance.

Οὐ γάρ πώ ποτέ μ' ὧδε ἔρως φρένας ἀμφεκάλυψεν,
Οὐδ' ὅτε σε πρότερον Λακεδαίμονος ἐξ ἐρατεινῆς
Ἔπλεον ἀρπάξας ἐν ποντοπόροισι νέεσσι,
Νήσῳ δ' ἐν Κραναῇ ἐμίγην φιλότητι καὶ εὐνῇ.
Ὥς σέο νῦν ἔραμαι, καί με γλυκὺς ἵμερος αἱρεῖ.
Ἦ ῥα, καὶ ἄρχε λέχος δὲ κιὼν, ἅμα δ' εἵπετ' ἄκοιτις.

Non enim unquam me ſic amor mentem complexus eſt,
Ne tunc quidem quando te pridem Lacedæmone ex amabili
Navigabam raptâ in tranſeuntibus pontum navibus,
Inſulâ vero in Cranaë miſtus ſum amore & concubitu:
Sicut te nunc amo, & me dulce deſiderium capit.
Dixit, & præibat in lectum aſcendens, ſimul autem ſequebatur uxor (69).

Not thus I lov'd thee when from Sparta's ſhore,
My forc'd, my willing, heavenly prize I bore,
When firſt entranc'd in Cranaë's iſle I lay,
Mix'd with thy ſoul and all diſſolv'd away.
Thus having ſpoke, the enamour'd Phrygian boy
Ruſh'd to the bed impatient for the joy;
Him Helen follow'd ſlow with baſhful charms,
And claſp'd the blooming hero in her arms.

POPE.

Jaſon has a patience aſcribed to him, more wonderful ſtill than this of Paris would be; which makes it hard to diſcover, wherein your writers of romances employ their judgment. Ought they not above all things to ſtick to probability? And do not they tranſgreſs it, when they ſuppoſe, on one hand, Medea ſo much in love with Jaſon, as to be carried by her paſſion into the greateſt crimes, and, on the other, ſpending many months with him, without conſummating the marriage? Obſerve too, that it had not been conſummated ſo ſoon, but for the advice which was given to Jaſon. Quem cum interrogaret Arete, quidnam eſſet judicaturus, reſpondit Alcinous, Si virgo fuerit Medea, parenti redditurum: ſin autem mulier, conjugi. Hoc cum audivit Arete à conjuge, mittit nuntium ad Jaſonem; & is Medeam noctu in antro devirginavit (70).

[M] That Menelaus did not ruin that monument.] Here is a paſſage which would bring Homer off, if it were true. It is pretended, 'that on the ſhore of the 'main land, which is over-againſt the Iſle of Cranaë, 'there was a temple of Venus, which Paris cauſed to 'be built, after that agreeable conqueſt . . . to teſtify 'the tranſports of his joy and gratitude. He gave this 'Venus the name Migonitis, and called the territory 'Migonion, from a word ſignifying the amorous 'myſtery that had been acted there. Menelaus, the 'unfortunate husband of that princeſs, 18 years after ſhe 'had been carried away from him, went to viſit this 'temple, the ground whereof had been witneſs to his 'miſfortune, and the infidelity of his wife. He did not 'deſtroy it, but only placed on each ſide of the ſtatue of 'Venus, the images of two other goddeſſes, viz. Thetis 'and Praxidice, meaning the goddeſs of Puniſhment, 'to ſignify that he would not ſuffer the affront to paſs 'unrevenged. But he had not the good fortune to ſee 'himſelf revenged of Helen; for ſhe ſurvived him (71).' The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, having cited this paſſage, adds this reflexion (72): 'Theſe laſt words would furniſh an occaſion of 'criticizing, to any one that would ſeek it. For it is 'certain, that eighteen years after Helen was ſtolen, 'Menelaus had revenged himſelf, as amply as he could 'wiſh, by the ruin of the kingdom of Priamus, the 'father of the raviſher. It is therefore very likely, that 'that image of the goddeſs Praxidice, had no reference 'to a future revenge, but to a revenge already taken, 'and it is not likely, that it had relation to any 'deſign of puniſhing Helen. For if Menelaus had not 'been ſincerely reconciled to his wife, he would not 'have delayed ſo long to puniſh her. The hiſtory of 'that age aſſures us, that that artful woman made 'her peace with her husband, the very night the 'Greeks became maſters of the town, which is very 'probable

‘ probable, conſidering the character good Menelaus ‘ has in the Iliad.’ Be it how it will, I will not maintain on one hand, that there was no temple of Venus Migonitis, near the iſle of Cranaë; nor acknowledge on the other, that Paris cauſed it to be built for the reaſon that is given. I keep to probability, which ſtrongly inclines one to believe, that Paris enjoyed Helen before he left Lacedæmon. What ſhould hinder him? Manelaus was in the iſle of Crete (73); his preſence could not have hindered Helen from favouring her handſome gueſt, who made love to her; his abſence was ſtill leſs capable of doing it. See how Paris uſed him, and ridiculed his abſence:

Sed tibi & hoc ſuadet rebus, non voce, maritus,
Neve ſui furtis hoſpitis obſtet abeſt.
Non habuit tempus, quo Creſſia regna videret,
Aptius, ô mira calliditate virum! &c. (74)

That husbands for their wives ſhou'd pimp, is meet:
Your's choſe the propereſt time to viſit Crete.
Kindly the good man favours your eſcape,
And, by his abſence, ev'n perſuades a rape.

He was not baſhful with the ladies: Helen confeſſes he was not ſo reſerved as Theſeus, who did no more than kiſs her:

Quæ tua nequitia eſt, non his contenta fuiſſet
Dî melius? ſimilis non fuit ille tui,
Reddidit intactam (75).

Your boldneſs greater liberties had claim'd;
Theſeus, more modeſt, gave me back unſtain'd.

Paris preſſed her ſo warmly one day, that ſhe ran away from him, and loſt one of her ſhoes in her flight, the place in which ſhe loſt it was Sparta, and was called Sandalion, from that ſhoe (76).

[N] Some authors ſay that Paris did not long preſerve his prize.] It is pretended that he ſailed towards Ægypt, and landed at the mouth of the Nile, called Canopus, where there was a temple of Hercules, which was a ſanctuary to fugitive ſlaves. Some of Paris's ſlaves having fled thither, acquainted the prieſts with the action of their maſter; whereupon king Proteus ordered him to be ſeized, reproached him ſeverely, and afterwards commanded him immediately to depart. But he kept Helen, with all the other things of which they had robbed Menelaus (77). It is added, that Paris had not enjoyed that woman, before his arrival in Egypt (78); a tale that I have already refuted. I do not know very well, how Proteus uſed her, and whether, whilſt he waited till he ſhould reſtore her to her rightful lord, he did not obtain the laſt favours from her (79). I only know, that Herodotus thinks it very probable, that ſhe was never brought to Troy; for he could not perſuade himſelf that Priamus could be ſo ſtupid, as to chooſe rather to keep that woman, than avoid the fatal conſequences of a refuſal (80). He thinks then, that the Trojans anſwered the Grecian embaſſadors ſincerely, that Helen was not at Troy, and that they ought to ſearch after her in Egypt, where ſhe was kept by king Proteus (81). The Grecians taking this anſwer for a ſharp raillery, prepared to beſiege the town, which when they had taken, without finding Helen in it, they were perſuaded ſhe was with king Proteus; whereupon Menelaus ſet ſail for Egypt, and recovered his wife from thence (82). There is ſuch a prodigious medley of variations in mythological authors, that I do not wonder to find Servius ſaying (83), I. That Theſeus, after he had ſtoln Helen, gave her to Proteus king of Egypt, and that Menelaus recovered her out of Proteus's hands, after the war of Troy: ſo that that war was not kindled upon the account of the rape of Helen by Paris, but of the affront which the Trojans offered Hercules, in ſhutting their gates againſt him, when he was in queſt of Hylas. II. That Helen was taken out of the hands of Proteus, to whom Theſeus had given her, and put into the power of Menelaus, from whom Paris ſtole her.

I forgot to obſerve, that Proteus did not ſend Paris away, without leaving him ſome ſort of conſolation; for he reſtored him the picture of Helen (84). One of Lycophron's commentators applies to this very injudiciouſly, what Helen ſays in Euripides, that Juno, to puniſh Paris for not giving her the victory in the conteſt of beauty, gave him only a living image of Helen, inſtead of her real perſon, which image was formed in the air.

Ἥρα δὲ μεμφθεῖσ', οὕνεκ' οὐ νικᾷ θεάς,
Ἐξηνέμωσε τἄμ' Ἀλεξάνδρου λέχη.
Δίδωσι δ' οὐκ ἔμ', ἀλλ' ὁμοιώσασ' ἐμοὶ
Εἴδωλον ἔμπνουν, οὐρανοῦ ξυνθεῖσ' ὕπο.
Πριάμου τυράννου παιδί. καὶ δοκεῖ μ' ἔχειν
Κενὴν δόκησιν οὐκ ἔχων.

Sed Juno moleſte ferens, quod non viciſſet Deas,
Irritum fecit meum conjugium Alexandro:
Dedit enim non me: ſed aſſimilatam mihi
Imaginem vivam, ſub cœlo compactam,
Filio regis Priami: putavit autem ſe habere me,
Falſa opinione deceptus, cum non haberet (85).

Juno enrag'd at loſs of beauty's prize,
Robb'd Priam's ſon of me, his promis'd bride,
And in my ſtead gave him an airy phantom,
Bearing my ſemblance. And this the cheated boy
Preſs'd to his breaſt, thinking he me enjoy'd, Vain thought!

It is manifeſt, that the difference betwixt theſe two things lies not in this, as Canterus would have it, that Proteus is the actor in one, and Juno in the other. One may likewiſe obſerve, that Juno forgot her ſpirit of revenge on this occaſion: Paris was as happy with a living image of Helen, as he would have been with the original. I remember I have read, that the poet Steſichorus ſaid, that the Trojans, not knowing the true Helen, quarrelled among themſelves about her image. Ὥσπερ τὸ τῆς Ἑλένης εἴδωλον ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν Τροίᾳ Στησίχορος φησὶ γενέσθαι περιμάχητον ἀγνοίᾳ τοῦ ἀληθοῦς. Quemadmodum Steſichorus Trojanos, inquit, veræ ignaros Helenæ de imagine ipſius invicem decertaſſe (86). This is, in the notion of ſome Libertines, an image of the diſputes about religion.

[O] Many fables have been vented about the birth of Helen.] It has not been thought enough to ſay that ſhe was born of an egg; they have added, that this egg fell from the orb of the moon, and that the women of that region lay eggs, from whence are bred men fifteen times bigger than thoſe who inhabit the earth. This we learn from Athenæus (87), who ſays, upon the teſtimony of Herodorus of Heraclea, that Neocles of Crotona had publiſhed it in one of his writings. Obſerve here ſome falſe quotations about that chimera. Cœlius Rhodiginus (88) inſtead of Herodorus, ſays Herodotus. This error has been copied by Salmuth (89). Who could forbear laughing to read this paſſage in a Spaniſh phyſician? ‘ Nonne admirabilius adhuc in tota naturæ majeſtate rariſſimum, quod ‘ mulieres quaſdam produxerit, quæ non more aliarum ‘ fœtus, ſed ova edant ac incubent, ex quibus homines naſcantur, qui ad giganteam proceritatem ex‘ creſcant? from which it is pretended ſhe was hatched. The inventions which are attributed to her moſt faithful maid, reflect diſhonour upon her [P]. If the authors who have written of ‘ men in the moon bring forth in this manner, is related by Raviſius Textor from Lycoſthenes, and by Heracleotes from Herodotus, and likewiſe Rhodiginus; altho' Adrianus Junius looks upon this as fabulous, as cited by Pancirollus, yet he gives us a print of it.’ Does he not begin his citations well, who ſets out with Lycoſthenes, who lived in the XVIth century; Is it not a ſtrange blunder, to put Raviſius Textor after Lycoſthenes, who lived after and abridged the other? What a leap is there at once to Herodotus? What confuſion in taking Herodorus for Herodotus? What a fiction, to give us one Heracleotes, who has cited Herodotus? is not this to make two authors, where the writer quoted gives but one? for Cœlius Rhodiginus has ſaid expreſsly, Herodotus Heracleotes. And what ſort of reaſoning is this? Tho' Hadrian Junius looks upon this as a meer fable, Lycoſthenes, Raviſius Textor, Herodotus, Heracleotes, Rhodiginus, have nevertheleſs mentioned it. How was the authority of Junius like to hinder them, who lived after them all except Lycoſthenes. But to return to Helen.

Some ancient poets have ſaid ſhe was the daughter of Jupiter and Nemeſis, and that Nemeſis to avoid the warm addreſſes of Jupiter, fled by ſea and land, and diſguiſed her ſelf in all ſhapes: but at laſt by a reſiſtleſs force Jupiter begot upon her Caſtor and Pollux, and afterwards Helen;

Τὴν ποτε καλλίκομος Νέμεσις φιλότητι μιγεῖσα
Ζηνὶ θεῶν βασιλῆι. τέκεν κρατερῆς ὑπ' ἀνάγκης.

Auricoma hanc Nemeſis peperit compreſſa tonante
Ab Jove vi (91).

Her the fair Nemeſis with golden locks
Brought forth to mighty Jove.

We read in Pauſanias (92) that, according to the vulgar opinion, Helen was the daughter of Jupiter and Nemeſis; and as for Leda, that ſhe was only her nurſe. Phidias, agreeable to this tradition, repreſented Leda in ſuch a manner on the baſis of the ſtatue of Nemeſis, that ſhe ſeemed to lead Helen to that goddeſs. Some ſay (93), that Nemeſis, being impregnated by Jupiter, laid an egg, and that Leda finding this egg ſat on it, and hatched Caſtor, Pollux, and Helen. Others ſay (94), that Jupiter not being able to gain Nemeſis, made Venus take the ſhape of an eagle, and metamorphoſed himſelf into a ſwan, which flew before the eagle. He reſted himſelf in the lap of Nemeſis, and was kindly received; the lady embraced him and fell aſleep: the pretended ſwan taking the advantage of that ſleep enjoyed her; and becauſe he did it in the ſhape of a bird, order required that Nemeſis ſhould lay an egg. Mercury took this egg, and carried it to Lacedæmon, and laid it in Leda's boſom. Hence came the fair Helen, and this was the reaſon why Leda adopted her for her daughter. Nemeſis autem ut quæ avium generi eſſet juncta menſibus actis ovum procreavit, quod Mercurius auferens detulit Spartam, & Ledæ ſedenti in gremium projecit, ex quo naſcitur Helena, cæteras corporis ſpecie præſtans, quam Leda ſuam filiam nominavit (95). Auſonius (96) has obſerved the diſtinction which they made betwixt Nemeſis and Leda.

Iſtos tergemino (97) naſci quos cernis ab ovo
Patribus ambiguis & matribus aſſere natos.
Hos genuit Nemeſis: ſed Leda puerpera fovit:
Tyndareus pater his, & Jupiter. Hic putat, hic ſcit.

Thoſe whom you ſee born from the threefold egg,
Say are deſcended from uncertain parents.
Theſe born by Nemeſis, but by Leda hatched.
Their fancied father, Tyndareus, their real, Jove.

Here are a good many authors for this opinion; and yet there are as many, who ſay Leda was the true mother of Helen. The ſame Hyginus, whom I have quoted, having ſaid that there was alſo a tradition that Jupiter lay with Leda in the ſhape of a ſwan, adds, that ſhe will decide nothing in the matter, De quo in medio relinquimus (98), becauſe he ſaw arguments of equal weight on both ſides. Theon of Alexandria obſerves, that Jupiter, transformed into a ſwan, lay with Nemeſis according to ſome, and with Leda according to others; and that Helen, Caſtor, and Pollux were produced from the egg which Leda brought forth (99). Pauſanias, who, as we have ſeen, relates the tradition concerning Nemeſis, relates in another place (100), the tradition concerning Leda, and he moreover obſerves that there was a memorial of it in a temple of Lacedæmon (101); for there was to be ſeen an egg hanging from the roof by a ribbon, which paſſed for that of Leda. Iſocrates ſpeaks more poſitively. He mentions two metamorphoſes of Jupiter into a ſwan, one on the account of Nemeſis, the other of Leda. Κύκνος γενόμενος εἰς τοὺς Νεμέσεως κόλπους κατέφυγε. τούτῳ δὲ πάλιν ὁμοιωθεὶς Λήδαν ἐνύμφευσεν. Oloris figura in ſinum Nemeſeos confugit, atque iterum ejuſdem avis ſpeciem cum haberet Ledam ſibi deſpondit (102). Which being ſo, there is no doubt but he ſuppoſed Helen proceeded from that ſecond metamorphoſis. Euripides in his tragedy of Oreſtes expreſsly affirms that Leda was the mother of Helen, and he gives Helen the epithets ὀρνιθόγονος and κυκνόπτερος, which expreſs Jupiter's metamorphoſis into a ſwan. I do not make uſe of Plutarch's authority, becauſe by the egg of Tyndareus, he may have meant that which Mercury had caſt into Leda's lap: and indeed he obſerves that this egg fell from heaven (103). So that Hadrian Junius ſhould not have alledged Plutarch in favour of the ſecond opinion. Ovid has been juſtly alledged, ſince he introduces Leda lying under the wings of a ſwan, Ovidius quoque Ledam recubantem facit ſub olorinis alis (104). Lucian (105), and the ſcholiaſt upon Homight have been quoted (106). The latter ſays thing which many others take no notice of, viz. that the egg which Leda brought forth, and put into a cheſt, produced there Caſtor, Pollux, and Helen, without being hatched.

To reconcile theſe two opinions, Junius ſuppoſes that Nemeſis and Leda are one and the ſame perſon, and for that he quotes Lactantius (107), and the ſcholiaſt on Euripides, and Germanicus. The words of the laſt are very clear. ‘ Cygnum dicunt inter aſtra ‘ conſtitutum eo quod Jupiter in Cygnum transfiguratus evolaverit in Rhamnuntem Atticæ regionis, ibique compreſſerit Nemeſin quæ & Leda dicitur, ut refert Crates tragœdiarum ſcriptor, quæ enixa eſt ovum, unde nata eſt Helena (108). —— They ſay, that the ſwan was placed among the ſtars, becauſe Jupiter being changed into ſwan, flew into Rhamnuris, in the territory of Attica, and there lay with Nemeſis, who is likewiſe called Leda, (as Crates, a writer of tragedies, reports) who brough forth the egg from which Helen was born.’

I will not end this remark, without obſerving, that Jupiter, who acknowledged many boys for his ſons, which were the fruits of his commerce with women, owned no daughter, but Helen. I ſpeak of daughters which proceeded from his amours with women: Iſocrates obſerves this (109). I omit thoſe who pretend Helen was the daughter of Venus, or of the Sun and of Leda (110).

[P] The inventions that are attributed to her faithful maid, reflect diſhonour upon her.] It is pretended ſhe invented I know not what poſtures, and that ſhe even wrote upon that ſubject. I ſhall explain myſelf more clearly in Latin, in the words of Leonicus Thomæus. ‘ Aſtyanaſſa quædam nomine, ſays he (111), ‘ inter Helenæ miniſtras & famulas fuiſſe commemoratur, quæ dominam à Theſeo primum, poſtea à Paride raptam ſemper proſequuta eſt: hanc in Venerea palæſtra primam complures reperiſſe figurarum modos omnis perhibet antiquitas. Voluminibus quinetiam quibuſdam editis de variis concubitus generibus perſcripſiſſe narratur, quam poſtmodum Philenis & Elephantis pervulgatiſſimæ mulieres ſunt inſequutæ, quæ hujuſmodi de rebus non minus accurate, quàm turpiter conſcripta commentaria reliquere. —— ‘ Aſtyanaſſa, a ſervant maid of Helen, who followed her, when ſhe was carried away by Theſeus, and after wards by Paris, is ſaid by all the ancients to have been the firſt inventor of various poſtures in the field of Venus. She is likewiſe reported to have publiſhed ſome books on this ſubject. In which ſcience ſhe was followed by the wellknown Philenis, and Elephantis, who have left writings treating of theſe matters with no leſs accuracy than immodeſty.' If that be true it will caſt an indelible ſtain on Helen's memory; for it is probable if that ſervant gave leſſons to her miſtreſs, her miſtreſs intruſted her with their effect; and that ſo both Helen and Aſtyanaſſa joined their endeavours, to perfect thoſe horrid inventions. I have read in Photius (112) that Aſtyanaſſa ſtole an embroidered girdle, which Juno had obtained of Venus to give to Helen; but that Venus took it away from that maid.

[Q] If the authors . . . . had been good chronologers, her beauty muſt have laſted prodigiouſly.] It is pretended that Helen and Caſtor were hatched from the ſame egg: We may well ſuppoſe then that Helen was a woman grown, when the Argonauts went to Colchos; for her two brothers, Caſtor and Pollux, ſignalized themſelves in that famous expedition. Let us allow her twenty years at leaſt, which cannot be too much. We will not take advantage of Euſebius's error; I will ſpeak of that hereafter. Let us make uſe of the chronology that is moſt exact. About thirty years are reckoned betwixt that expedition and that of Troy. Helen then was fifty years old, more or leſs, when Paris carried her off. The ſiege of Troy laſted ten years, and it was in the laſt year of the ſiege that Agamemnon and Achilles quarrelled. Now the admiration Priamus's counſellors (113) expreſſed for the divine beauty of Helen, muſt be referred to a time poſterior to that quarrel. Thus Helen, at ſixty years of age, by the extraordinary luſtre of her beauty, obliged a whole ſenate to confeſs that ſhe deſerved that two powerful nations ſhould ruin one another in a ten years war for her ſake. Is not this very wonderful? Paris having been killed ſome time after, there aroſe a warm diſpute between his brothers, who ſhould marry his widow. Priamus appointed a combat, and promiſed her to him who ſhould obtain the victory. Deïphobus had the beſt of it, and carried Helen. Ἀλεξάνδρου τοξευθέντος ὑπὸ Φιλοκτήτου, Πρίαμος τὸν Ἑλένης γάμον ἔπαθλον ἔθηκε τῷ ἀριστεύσαντι κατὰ τὴν μάχην. Δηίφοβος δὲ γενναῖος ἀγωνισάμενος ἔγημεν αὐτὴν ἡ ἱστορία παρὰ Λυκόφρονι (114). One of his brothers (115) was ſo enraged with his loſs, that he departed from Troy, and contributed all he could to the ruin of his country. Does not this prove that Helen at ſixty years of age was ſtill a prodigy of beauty. Lucian proves, that at the ſiege of Troy ſhe was an old woman, almoſt as old as Hecuba. Εἶδον γὰρ λευκὴν μέν τινα καὶ ἐπιμήκη τὸν τράχηλον ὡς εἰκάζειν κύκνου θυγατέρα εἶναι· τἄλλα δὲ πάνυ πρεσβῦτιν ἡλικιῶτιν σχεδὸν τῆς Ἑκάβης. Siquidem vidi quandam candida & procera cervice ut cygno prognatam illam hinc conjicerent. Cæterum anum Hecubæ propemodum æquævam (116). —— For I ſaw a woman with a neck ſo long, and ſo white, that one from thence might gueſs that ſhe was begot by a ſwan. But ſhe was very near as old as Hecuba. She muſt have been much older than Hecuba, if that was true which has been ſaid (117), that Hercules was the laſt child of Jupiter. Our admiration of ſo aged a beauty would ceaſe, if we could believe the ſtory that is told, that Helen, by a notable privilege, was exempted from the hard fate of growing old (118); but every body does not give credit to it. 'It is ſaid of Helen, that in her latter days, as often as ſhe looked in her glaſs, ſhe with aſtoniſhment ſought for herſelf there, and complained of time which had been her third raviſher, and had ſtolen Helen from Helen herſelf.' I have read this in the book of a Jeſuit who has a very affected ſtile (119). Another modern tells the ſame ſtory, almoſt in the ſame manner (120). 'She of whom you ſpeak, deſerves to be looked on with ſuch an eye as your's. You will quickly ſee in her a change quite contrary to that (121) which has given you ſo much aſtoniſhment. It is that which a few years will make you obſerve; that which made Helen weep when he ſaw herſelf in her glaſs, and obliged her to call time her third or fourth raviſher, for the number of them is not very certain. A ſtrange ſort of rape, to ſee Helen raviſhed from herſelf, to ſee Helen, whom the three parts of the world, which then made all, acknowledged for the fineſt woman of her age, ſeeking for her face in a glaſs, which preſented nothing now to her but what was frightful.' That thought agrees with two verſes of Ovid.

Flet quoque ut in ſpeculo rugas conſpexit aniles
Tyndaris, & ſecum cur ſit bis rapta, requirit (122).

I muſt obſerve that if we follow Euſebius's chronology, we ſhall find that Helen had lived above an hundred years, when Paris ſtole her; for, according to his calculation, the expedition of the Argonauts was eighty nine years before the taking of Troy. He had obſerved the miſreckoning of the Greek authors, and therefore he made this objection to them: 'Si inter Argonautas fuerunt Caſtor & Pollux, quomodo poteſt eorum ſoror Helena credi, quæ poſt multos annos virgo rapitur à Theſeo (123). —— If Caſtor and Pollux were in the number of the Argonauts, how can Helen be believed to be their ſiſter, who many years after was carried away a virgin by Theſeus. Obſerve here Scaliger's remark upon this Latin. 'In Græcis, ſays he (124), ἡ μήπω μετὰ πολλὰ ἔτη παρθένος ἁρπάζεται, quæ non multis poſt annis virgo capitur. Sive culpa librariorum, ſive quod veroſimilius, Hieronymi properantia accidit, ut negatio in latina interpretatione expreſſa non ſit, omnino ridicula ſententia efficitur. Nam quo remotior fuerit raptus Helenæ eo credibilior erit. Contra quo propior his temporibus eo remotior à Trojæ excidio, ideoque minus credibile Helenæ tempus in hujus ſæculi tractum incidiſſe. —— The Greek ſays, Who not many years after was carried away a virgin. But whether by a miſtake of the tranſcribers, or, which is more probable, by Jerom's hurry, the negative particle is not expreſſed in the Latin verſion, and by that means the whole ſentence is made ridiculous. For the farther back the rape of Helen is placed, the more credible it will be. And, on the contrary, the nearer it is placed to theſe times the farther it will be from the ſacking of Troy, and therefore it will be leſs credible that the age of Helen fell into this period of time.' This criticiſm appears to me very falſe, and the more I examine it the more I am ſurprized at it. I do not deny but the negative particle, the omiſſion whereof Scaliger thinks a fault in St Jerome, may make a good ſenſe; but I cannot comprehend that the ſenſe would be ridiculous if that particle were ſuppreſſed; and on the contrary Euſebius's objection ſeems more intelligible to all ſorts of readers, without that negative particle than with it. Euſebius's deſign is to prove that thoſe who have ſaid, that Caſtor and Pollux, Helen's brothers, were in the voyage of the Argonauts, and that Theſeus ſtole Helen yet very young, have but ill concerted the times. If Caſtor and Pollux, ſays he, were in the number of the Argonauts, how can we believe they were the brothers of Helen, who was ſtole away young by Theſeus many years after? The moſt ſtupid readers perceive the force of the objection, without any need of reaſoning, without having recourſe to any thing but to the very words of Euſebius: but if we ſuppoſe with Scaliger, that Euſebius expreſſed it in this manner. If Caſtor and Pollux were in the number of the Argonauts, how can we believe they were the brothers of Helen, who was ſtole away young by Theſeus a few years after? Every one ſees, that to be ſenſible of this objection, we muſt take our eyes off from the words that contain it, and have recourſe to the arguments and calculations that are found in the following pages; for if one only conſiders Euſebius's expreſſions, one would imagine that he reaſoned ill, and brought a proof directly contrary to what he pretended to aſſert.

FAULTS of Scaliger.

Here are ſome other words of Scaliger which to me ſeem unexact. 'Ab hoc tempore (125), ſays he (126), ad excidium Ilii, anni ſunt LXXIX, ut Helenam admodum anum fuiſſe oportuerit, ſi Argonautica hoc tempore contigerunt. Nam adultis Caſtoribus, Helenam quoque maturam viro fuiſſe neceſſe eſt. Quod ſi Argonautica hic collocentur, tempore excidii Iliaci Helena fuerit major annorum CXX. Hoc eſt quod objicit Euſebius & merito. —— From this time the poſſeſſion of an old woman. This would make them very ridiculous, as they were indeed; though we allow her all the beauty that the poets aſcribe to her. See in Herodotus, what value ought to be ſet on a woman who ſuffers her ſelf to be run away with [R]. Opinions are different concerning Helen's children: ſome ſay ſhe had only daughters (f), others aſſure us, that Menelaus had four boys by her (g) A ſon too has been mentioned that ſhe had by Achilles, (h). She had by Menelaus, the beautiful Hermione; and by Paris, a daughter named Helen, whom Hecuba put to death. The father would have had her named Alexandra; but, as the mother oppoſed it (i), they caſt lots who ſhould give the name. Helen won, and gave her daughter her own name (k). There has been much talk of Helen's necklace [S], and of her Crater, and

' time to the ſacking Troy there are ſeventy nine years; ' ſo that Helen muſt have been very old, if the expedition of the Argonauts happened at that time. For ' when Caſtor and his brother were grown men, Helen ' muſt likewiſe have been marriageable. But if the expedition of the Argonauts be placed here, Helen muſt ' have been above 120 years old. This is what Euſebius objects, and with reaſon.' That is, if there was ſeventy nine years betwixt the voyage of the Argonauts and the taking of Troy, Helen muſt needs be above 120 years old when Troy was taken. What conſequence is here? Is this worthy of the great Scaliger? Muſt a maid be above forty years old to be ſaid to be marriageable, matura viro? This is the expreſſion of the author whom I confute.

He has ſucceeded much better in his animadverſions upon Euſebius's calculations; for it is not true, that the expedition of the Argonauts, and that of Troy, were at ſuch a diſtance from one another, as Euſebius imagines. But it is certain that Euſebius followed very famous writers; and conſequently I may affirm that if the ancient authors, who ſpeak of Helen, had been good chronologers, her beauty muſt have laſted a prodigious while; for it would be above a century! Let us conſider a little the calculations, which Clemens Alexandrinus borrows from Apollodorus, and ſome other celebrated hiſtorians. In one place (127) he ſays that there were thirty eight years betwixt the beginning of Hercules's reign in Argos, after the expedition of the Argonauts, and his deification; and that Caſtor and Pollux were deified fifty three years after Hercules, about the time that Troy was taken. Which is to reckon ninety one years betwixt the voyage of the Argonauts, and the taking of Troy, and to make Helen an hundred years old, or thereabouts, at the time that Paris carried her off as an accompliſhed beauty. In an other place (128) the ſame father makes a computation, which puts ſixty eight years betwixt Paris's ſtealing Helen, and the expedition of the Argonauts.

[R] See in Herodotus what value ought to be ſet on a woman who ſuffers herſelf to be run away with.] Herodotus tracing up to their firſt original, the long continued wars betwixt Europe and Aſia, owns the Aſiatics were the aggreſſors, as having ſtole away Io the daughter of Inachus king of Argos (129). The Europeans (130) who ſtole away the king of Tyre's daughter, only did it by way of repriſal But they did not ſtop there, they engaged in a ſecond rape, viz. that of Medea, daughter to the king of Colchos. That prince demanded ſatisfaction for the injury. They anſwered they would give him none, becauſe they had never received any for the rape of Io. The rape of Helen was undertaken by way of repriſal, and when the Greeks redemanded her, it was anſwered that they would deal by them as they had dealt by the Aſiatics, when they demanded back Medea. They were not ſatisfied with that anſwer, but raiſing a great army they went to deſtroy the kingdom of Priamus. See now what pleas the Perſians had to juſtify their wars. They pretended that the expedition againſt Troy gave them a right to hold the Europeans for enemies, and to treat them as ſuch. They diſapproved of the violence of thoſe who carry off a woman, but they looked upon thoſe as fools, who buſied themſelves about recovering her; and conſidered them as wiſe who deſpiſed her; ſince no women are carried off but ſuch as are willing. As for us, ſaid they, we never minded the women that were ſtole from Aſia: it was the Greeks who firſt made war for the ſake of a woman of Lacedæmon. Τὸ μὲν νυν ἁρπάζειν γυναῖκας, ἀνδρῶν ἀδίκων ἔργον νομίζειν εἶναι, τὸ δὲ ἁρπασθεισέων σπουδὴν ποιήσασθαι τιμωρέειν, ἀνοήτων, τὸ δὲ μηδεμίην ὤρην ἔχειν ἁρπασθεισέων, σωφρόνων. δῆλα γὰρ δὴ ὅτι εἰ μὴ αὐταὶ ἐβουλέατο, οὐκ ἂν ἡρπάζοντο. σφέας μὲν δὴ τοὺς ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίης λέγουσι Πέρσαι ἁρπαζομένων τῶν γυναικῶν λόγον οὐδένα ποιήσασθαι. Se quidem ſentire injuriorum virorum factum eſſe rapere feminas: amentium vero, raptis ulciſcendis operam dare: prudentium autem, pro nulla habere raptarum pulchritudinem: quippe quæ, niſi voluiſſent, haud dubie raptæ non fuiſſent. Eoque ſuarum feminarum ex Aſia raptarum Perſæ negant ullam ſe habuiſſe rationem (131). We muſt not omit Iſocrates's obſervation here. The war of Troy, ſays he, was very advantageous to Greece: many things were invented during the continuance of it; and Europe began to have the ſuperiority over Aſia. Before that war, the Barbarians made conqueſts upon the Grecians. It was Helen that gave occaſion to a new turn of affairs; for after that war, the Greeks took towns and provinces from the Barbarians (132).

We muſt not forget that paſſage of Euripides, where Peleus ſpeaks ſuch home-truths to Menelaus. He blames him eſpecially for two great faults: the firſt was for having behaved to his wife as if ſhe had been virtuous; the ſecond was for having raiſed an army to recover her. You left her, ſays he, entirely at her own diſpoſal; you left your houſe without ordering your doors to be locked, and your ſervants to look after her, as if ſhe, who was the wickedeſt of women, had been very chaſte.

> Linquens domum non clauſam, & ſine ſervis,
> Quaſi haberes caſtam mulierem in ædibus,
> Quæ omnium eſt peſſima (133).

She ran away with a young ſtranger; and you, forſooth, for the love of her, muſt call all Greece to arms: you ſhould, on the contrary, after you had found out her infidelity, have left her where ſhe was, and rather have paid a tribute, than that ſhe ſhould ever have ſet foot in your houſe again.

> Ἣν χρῆν σ' ἀποπτύσαντα, μὴ κινεῖν δόρυ,

> Cum inveniſſes malam, ſed ſinere ibi manere,
> Mercedemque dare præterea, ne unquam in ædes eam

Menelaus anſwers in a ſoft manner, that the adventures of his wife had been involuntary, and the work of fate (135), and that from thence great advantages to the Greeks had proceeded (136), who firſt began to learn the art of war, at the ſiege of Troy. This confirms Iſocrates's obſervation.

[S] There has been much talk of Helen's necklace.] Menelaus preparing for the expedition of Troy, went to Delphos with Ulyſſes to conſult the oracle, and offered Helen's necklace there. Τότε δὴ Μενέλαος μὲν τῇ Προνοίᾳ (137) Ἀθηνᾷ τὸν τῆς Ἑλένης ὅρμον ἀνέθηκεν ἐν Δελφοῖς. Tunc ſane Menelaus Providæ Minervæ monile Helenæ Delphis dedicavit (138). The oracle ordered him to do it, and promiſed by that means the puniſhment of the raviſher. Athenæus (139) has preſerved the oracle's anſwer: it contains only three verſes, which ſhew, that this necklace was made of maſſy gold, and that Venus had given it to Helen. When the Phoceans pillaged the temple of Delphos in the CVIth Olympiad, this necklace lace was a part of their booty; but it produced a ſtrange effect; the lady who wore it became an infamous proſtitute (140); ſhe quitted her houſe to run all the world over, with a young Epirote whom ſhe was in love with (141). It was either a very active contagion, or a manner of puniſhment very unworthy of the goddeſs to whom Menelaus had devoted it. It ſhould rather have been by a natural than a moral evil, that this woman's boldneſs, who durſt appropriate to her ſelf the ſpoils of ſo ſacred a place, ought to have been puniſhed. See the remark [C] of the article EGIALEA.

Note that there are ſome who will have it, that the lady who got this necklace, was a leud woman before. It is ſaid that the wives of thoſe who plundered the temple diſputed who ſhould have the necklace of Helen, and that of Eriphyle, and that they at laſt decided it by lot. That of Eriphyle fell to a grave, ſevere woman, who afterwards killed her huſband; the other fell to a very handſome, but very leud, woman (142).

[T] And of her Crater, and the Nepenthes, ſhe made Telemachus, the ſon of Ulyſſes, drink.] The Crater was a work of Vulcan, and a nuptial preſent; for when Pelops married, Vulcan made him a preſent of it. Menelaus deriving his pedigree from Pelops, ſucceeded to that part of the inheritance, and loſt it, when Paris carried away Helen, with the jewels and movables of his hoſt. But it is pretended, that Helen threw this fine preſent into the ſea, near the iſle of Cos; which being found in the net of ſome fiſhermen, there aroſe a diſpute concerning it, the concluſion whereof was, that it ſhould be conſecrated to Apollo. According to the author from whom I have this, it was a tripos (143); nevertheleſs, the interpreters (144) pretend, that Lycophron, Diogenes Laërtius, Apuleius, and Philoſtratus, have underſtood the ſame thing. Now Lycophron has called it (145), ταμάσιον κρατῆρα: and theſe are the words of Apuleius (146), 'Nunquam apud eum (Homerum) marino aliquo & piſculento medicavit nec Proteus faciem, nec Ulyſſes ſcrobem, nec Æolus follem, nec Helena CRATEREM, nec Circe poculum, nec Venus cingulum. —— We never find in Homer, that Proteus made uſe of any thing from the ſea, or of fiſhes, to enchant his face, nor Ulyſſes to enchant the furrow, nor Æolus the bellows, nor Helen the crater, nor Circe the cup, nor Venus the girdle.' As to Philoſtratus, he ſays as follows in the epiſtle dedicatory of the Life of the Sophiſts. Τόδε φρόντισμα τοῦτο ἄριστε ὑπάτων, καὶ τὰ ἄφθη σοι κουφιεῖ τῆς γνώμης, ὥσπερ ὁ κρατὴρ τῆς Ἑλένης τοῖς Αἰγυπτίοις φαρμάκοις. It does not ſeem to me, that either he, or Apuleius, ſpeak of a particular veſſel which belonged to Helen, as a piece of exquiſite work. It is plain, that they allude to what Homer relates, in the fourth book of the Odyſſey, touching the Nepenthe, viz. that Helen, to exhilarate Telemachus, the ſon of Ulyſſes, and her other gueſts, and to hinder them from attending to their misfortunes, mingled in their wine a little Nepenthe, which was I know not what, that had an extraordinary virtue.

Ενθ' αὖθ' ἄλλ' ἐνοησ' Ἑλένη Διὸς ἐκγεγαυῖα.
Αὐτίκ' ἄρ' εἰς οἶνον βάλε φάρμακον, ἔνθεν ἔπινον,
Νηπενθές τ' ἄχολον τε, κακῶν ἐπίληθον ἁπάντων.
Ὃς τὸ καταβρόξειεν ἐπὴν κρητῆρι μιγείη.

Ibi tum alia excogitavit Helena è Jove nata.
Protinus ſane in vinum miſit pharmacum unde bibebant.
Abſque dolore & ira, malorum oblivionem inducens omnium
Qui illud deglutierit poſtquam crateri mixtum erit (147).

Helen had brought that wonderful remedy from Egypt, which ſhe had learned of Polydamna, the wife of Theon. Homer ſays nothing at all about the veſſel, which contained the mixt wine; and therefore Apuleius and Philoſtratus conſider there only the virtue of the Nepenthe, and conſequently ſpeak not of that fine veſſel mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, I mean the nuptial preſent, which Pelops received from Vulcan, &c. Call to mind here, what I have ſaid in the firſt remark, in mentioning the cup which Helen offered to Minerva: and if you would know the reaſon why I have made uſe of the barbarous word Crater, I muſt tell you, it is becauſe the words, glaſs, cup, bowl, goblet, do not expreſs what was meant by the word Crater in Homer's time. 'The Crater was a great veſſel, which was not uſed to drink in, but only to mingle wine with water, ... and from this veſſel they took out the wine thus mingled with cups, or they firſt poured it into pots and pints, and then into drinking cups (148).' Note, that the veſſel mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, was thrown into the ſea before the Trojan war, but that ſpoken of by the others, was in Menelaus's poſſeſſion after that war.

AN inſtance of the effects of a digreſſing ſpirit.

I ought not to forget, that ſome learned men have made Homer's Nepenthe the ſubject of their ſtudies and meditations; they have made many conjectures and have built ſeveral hypotheſes. See Peter Petit's diſſertation, intituled Homeri Nepenthes, and printed at Utrecht in the year 1689, in 8vo. There is both wit and learning in it. The author ſpeaks of a civilian of Naples, who has treated of the ſame matter, and has given himſelf up to all the excuſes of the ſpirit of digreſſion. I inſert this picture of that author, becauſe it very naturally repreſents the character of an affectation of diſplaying all that one has read; and becauſe likewiſe one may obſerve in it many frothy imaginations, concerning the Nepenthe. 'Non morabor hic ſtudioſos variis quæſtionibus, ut Petrus la Sena, an Nepenthes ex eorum numero eſſet medicamentorum quæ chimica arte parantur, an ſimplex quid & ſolius naturæ proprietate efficax. Ut ſcilicet habeat occaſionem, quæ de artis ejus origine & antiquitate legerat, effundendi: qua in diſputatione plures onerat paginas, abutiturque patientia lectorum. Nec minus inanis & ſuperfluæ operæ arguendus; cum tam ſollicite de gemmarum viribus diſſerit, ceu non ſatis ex Homeri deſcriptione conſtaret Nepenthes plantis eſſe annumerandum quod ipſe poſtea fatetur. Cum etiam profeſſus non eſſe hominis frugi, tempus terere inveſtigando, an forte hæc Helenæ potio (verba ejus refero) μαγικῶς, hujuſmodi curationis efficaciam retinuerit, multa nihilo ſecius ſubjungit de Magia Ægyptiorum, veterumque Medicorum incantationibus, locaque Homeri profert ex Odyſſea, quæ ad magiam pertinere exiſtimantur, eorum ſcilicet teſtimnoio, qui, ut Plinius lib. 30 cap. 50 refert, Protea & Sirenum cantus apud Homerum non aliter intelligi voluerunt. Tum multa interponit de cratere Helenæ captata occaſione ſermonis ex quodam Cœlii Rhodigini loco. Et quid magis ἀπροσδιόνυσον, quam de Clematide Ægyptia dicere, quo ſcommate Zenonem Cittiæum ſolitum peti, quod procero gracilique & fuſco corpore eſſet, tradit Laërtius? His igitur (inquam) quæ nihil ad rem attinent, prætermiſſis, aio Nepenthes fuiſſe unum e terra naſcentibus quoddam ſcilicet herbæ aut virgulti genus (149). —— I will not here detain my readers, as Peter la Sena doth, with various queſtions, as whether the Nepenthes was drug prepared by Chymiſtry, or a ſimple medicine; and all this, that he may have an occaſion of giving out of his common places, all that he had read concerning the origin & antiquity of that art. With this he fills ſeveral pages, and abuſeth the patience of his readers. His laborious diſſertation concerning the virtues of gems, is no leſs vain and ſuperfluous, as if it was not obvious from Homer's deſcription, that the Nepenthes was a plant as he himſelf afterwards owns. He owns that it is not worth while to ſpend time in enquiring, whether this potion of Helen's owed it's virtue to magic, and yet he is very copious concerning the magic of the Egyptians, and the inantations of the ancient phyſicians, and quotes paſſages out of Homer's Odyſſey, which are thought to relate to magic, by thoſe I mean, who, as Pliny tells us, think that what he ſays of Proteus and the ſyrens ſongs, is to be ſo underſtood. He next ſubjoins a great deal concerning Helen's crater, ſaid alſo that when ſhe was going to be ſacrificed, ſhe was ſaved by a miracle [U]: And they have endeavoured to excuſe her adulteries, by ſaying ſhe was forced to them by the Gods [X]. The Heathens have made uſe of ſuch like ſuppoſitions on ſo many occaſions, that it will not be unſeaſonable to enquire what could have induced them to reaſon in that manner. I will beſtow a remark upon this head [Y].

Some

‘taking occaſion from a paſſage of Cœlius Rhodiginus. And is there any thing more abſurd than his bringing in the jeſt put upon Zeno, becauſe he was of a tall ſlender make? neglecting therefore theſe queſtions, which are nothing to the purpoſe, I ſay that the Nepenthes was a kind of herb or ſhrub.’ The chevalier de Meré imagines, that the Nepenthes was nothing elſe but the charms of Helen's converſation. See how he expreſſes himſelf in a treatiſe, where he addreſſes his diſcourſe to a lady. ‘Though Homer doth not enlarge upon the eloquence of Helen, he who ſpeaks ſo much of that of Ulyſſes and of Neſtor, he omits not however, by a myſtery of poetry, to make us ſenſible, that it was a pleaſure to hear her ſpeak; and here is in a few words, what gives me reaſon to think ſo. Ulyſſes wandered a long time after the ſacking of Troy, without being able to return into his iſle of Ithaca; his ſon Telemachus was in pain about him, and, to know whether he was alive or dead, he made a viſit to Neſtor, who could not inform him what was become of him. From thence he continued his voyage, and came to Menelaus, where he had a ſight of Helen, and ſupped with her. He was very melancholy, and that princeſs having pity on him made uſe of a charm to make him forget all his ſorrows. That charm, ſaith Homer, was a liquor which ſhe mingled with the wine, before ſhe ſat down to table, which potion was of ſuch a virtue, that after one had taſted it, it was impoſſible to ſhed a tear all the day after. She had another excellent ſecret, which was given her by the goddeſs of the Graces. You know, Madam, that there is no lady who can imitate the ſound of your words; but if ſhe had obſerved you, ſhe had made herſelf ſo perfect miſtreſs of your voice and manners, that ſhe would have been miſtaken for you (150).

[U] She was ſaved by a miracle.] The miracle was this: a great plague depopulated the town of Lacedæmon: the gods let them know that health ſhould be reſtored, provided they ſacrificed every year a maid of quality. The lot fell once upon the fair Helen; but as ſhe was led to the altar, an eagle ſtooped and took way the knife, and put it on an heifer; and for this reaſon Helen's life was ſpared (151).

[X] They have endeavoured to excuſe her adulteries, by ſaying ſhe was forced to them by the gods.] I have touched upon this point already (152), but there is ſomething wanting. If ſome ſay, that Venus contrived this rape, to teſtify her gratitude to the judge, who had determined the cauſe in the diſpute of beauty in her favour; others aſſure us, that ſhe did it to revenge herſelf for an affront. Menelaus had promiſed her a hecatomb, in caſe he ſhould obtain Helen; but having gained what he deſired, he took no care of his vow. Venus took this heinouſly, and, to puniſh him, contrived the carrying away of his wife (153). Others date the original of this higher; they pretend (154) that Tyndarus forget Venus in a ſacrifice that he offered to all the gods; and that in puniſhment of this contempt, Venus made all the daughters of that prince bigamiſts, trigamiſts, and elopers from their husbands. The beſt of all was, that the ſame goddeſs, who had puſhed Tyndarus's daughter into theſe diſorders, reproached him for their adulteries. It is ſaid, that theſe reproaches touched him ſo ſenſibly, that, to be revenged on her, he put her feet in irons. Pauſanias cannot believe, that Tyndarus was ſo ridiculous as to imagine he could revenge himſelf on Venus, by a making a ſtatue, which he ſhould call by her name, and tying it by the legs. But in this the hiſtorian was unacquainted with his own religion. He did not know, that, on many occaſions, the heathens diſcharged their fury upon the temples and ſtatues of the gods, whom they believed the authors of their ill ſucceſs (155). And, in effect, is it not affronting a prince to abuſe his pictures and ſtatues? conſider the indignation of Theodoſius againſt the city of Antioch; nothing moved him more ſenſibly, than the outrages that were done to the ſtatue of the empreſs during the ſedition. See his hiſtory writ by Mr Flechier (156). For the reſt, I muſt declare that when I ſpoke of the reproaches made by Venus to Tyndarus, I have only reported the opinion of ſome moderns, who have been miſled by the tranſlation of Pauſanias. It is certain, that the Greek text does not import, that this goddeſs had reproached Tyndarus in that manner: they who underſtand the Greek tongue, will ſee that I am not miſtaken. Τὸν γὰρ δὴ ἕτερον λόγον, ὡς τὴν Θεὸν πέδαις ἐτιμωρεῖτο ὁ Τυνδάρεως γενέσθαι ταῖς θυγατράσιν ἐξ Ἀφροδίτης ἡγούμενος τὰ ὀνείδη, τοῦτον δὲ οὐδὲ τὴν ἀρχὴν προσίεμαι. ἦ γὰρ δὴ παντάπασιν εὔηθες, κέδρου ποιησάμενον ζώδιον καὶ ὄνομα Ἀφροδίτην θέμενον, ἐλπίζειν ἀμυνέσθαι τὴν Θεόν. That is, according to Amaſæus's tranſlation; Nam Deam ulciſci voluiſſe compedibus (ſunt enim qui hoc etiam memoriæ prodiderint) exprobrantem (157) illi filiarum adulteria, ut credam, adduci non poſſum. Quam enim ridiculum, ſi putaſſet ab effigie, quam è cedro feciſſet Veneris nomine, injectis compedibus pœnas expeti poſſe (158).

[Y] I will beſtow a remark upon this.] Menelaus anſwering the ſevere reproaches of Peleus, declared, that the will of Helen had not been the cauſe of thoſe adventures which ſhe had undergone, but that it was done by the will of the gods.

> Ἑλένη δ᾽ ἐμόχθησ᾽ οὐχ ἑκοῦσ᾽ ἀλλ᾽ ἐκ Θεῶν.
> Helena vero venit in ærumnas non volens, ſed divinitùs (159).

This language was common enough among the Pagans. They imputed to fortune, that is to ſay, to GOD, not only their ill ſucceſs, but alſo their faults. This excuſe, or this miſerable comfort, ſeemed to be always at hand, and they preſently had recourſe to it. Plutarch teaches us this, in rehearſing ſome verſes, which contain what a father ſaid to his ſon, and the ſon's anſwer.

> Πολλ᾽ ὦ τέκνον σφάλλουσιν ἀνθρώπους Θεοί.
> Τὸ ῥᾷστον εἶπας, αἰτιάσασθαι Θεούς.
>
> Multis homines in rebus decipiunt Dii,
> Mea proles, atque dura conciliant mala.
> FIL. Dixti id, nihil quo facilius dictu eſt, Deos > Incuſans (160).
>
> The gods, ſon, chouſe poor mortals oftentimes.
> Anſ. 'Tis eaſy, Sir, on gods to lay our crimes.

You will imagine perhaps, that the great eaſe men found in making complaints againſt the gods, inclined them to make uſe of that ſubterfuge, without conſideration and reflexion, and that it was one of thoſe firſt motions that ariſe in our minds, before we have time to prepare ourſelves to judge of things; but it is certain, that in many inſtances they ſpoke in this manner, after mature conſideration. They who examine not to the bottom, what paſſes in their own breaſts, eaſily perſwade themſelves that they are free, and that if their will inclines them to evil, it is their own fault, as being by a choice of which they are maſters. They who paſs another judgment, are perſons who have carefully ſtudied the ſprings and circumſtances of their actions, and have well conſidered the progreſs of the motion of their ſouls. Theſe perſons for the moſt part doubt of their free-will; and proceed even to perſuade themſelves, that their reaſon and their underſtandings are ſlaves, incapable of reſiſting the force which drags them where they had no mind to go. Now it is this ſort of perſons eſpecially who charged the gods as the cauſes of their evil actions. They remembered, that they had well conſidered, that they were going on in a way pernicious to their fortune, and ſcandalous to their reputation, and that they had made many endeavours to deſtroy the paſſion that made them continue in it; but they remembered ſtill better, that all theſe endeavours had been uſeleſs, and that reaſon, though called to their aſſiſtance a thouſand times, and vows and prayers, had been very weak helps. They concluded then, that it muſt be an occult cauſe, ſome ſuperior force, that drove and dragged them; in a word, that the gods were the cauſe both of the paſſion which they felt, and of the pernicious and criminal conſequences of thoſe paſſions. Here then is the unfolding of the myſtery: there is, ſaid they, ſomething divine in it, juſt as in ſome bodily diſtempers which nonplus the ſkill and experience of the ableſt phyſicians. We know what we ought to do, what would be moſt uſeful, advantageous, and honourable, for us, and nevertheleſs we take a contrary courſe. This is the doing of the gods. The poet Perſius addreſſes himſelf to Jupiter, to beg the favour that he would be pleaſed to make tyrants acknowledge the power of virtue, and feel the ſevereſt regret for not having purſued it.

Some ſay, that when ſhe cut off her hair, being in mourning [Z], this did not at all abate

Magne pater divum ſævos punire tryannos
Haud alia ratione velis, cum dira libido

Plutarch recites a poetical ſentence, which ſhews that the heathens reaſoned in this manner: they who know good, do it not; therefore the gods are the cauſe of it. I put his Greek words in the margin (162). Medea argued in this manner, when ſhe found ſhe could not reſiſt the love ſhe entertained for Jaſon, when ſhe could not, I ſay, reſiſt it, though ſhe clearly ſaw the ſhameful and criminal conſequences of her conduct, and that her own reaſon condemned them.

GARTH.

Abundance of people of both ſexes, whom hiſtory has made no mention of, have found themſelves in the ſame condition. Love has made them commit a thouſand faults, whereof they have ſeen the ſhame and danger ſo clearly, as to have endeavoured to prevent them, by calling reaſon to their aſſiſtance, and making many wiſhes againſt their paſſion. It was natural for them to conclude, that they were not the cauſe of their evil conduct, inaſmuch as they had a reaſonable underſtanding, and a ſoul that was free, and miſtreſs of it's will. This firſt concluſion led them to another, which was, that ſome cauſe, that was external and ſuperior to all their forces, ſwayed them. This ſecond concluſion made them draw this third, that ſome god was an external and neceſſitating cauſe. This was the original of the pretended divinity of Venus and Cupid; and becauſe we find by experience that jealouſy, envy, avarice, drunkenneſs, the deſire of revenge, and many other paſſions, make men commit a thouſand things which reaſon condemns, and which are even contrary to the true intereſt of ſelf-love, and which one would not wiſh for, it has been believed that the gods inſtigated us to theſe things. The heathens did not accuſe them therefore becauſe they made no reflexions, but rather becauſe they made a great many obſervations upon what paſſed in the ſoul. If the Pagans had had the the juſt idea of GOD that we have, which repreſents him to us as a being perfectly holy, they would have ſecured themſelves from that raſh judgment; but attributing to the gods the ſame faults that men are ſubject to, nothing hindered them from believing the gods urged men on to evil, and rendered the light of reaſon ineffectual, ſometimes by a flattering view of pleaſure, which neceſſitated the will; at other times by importunate pain, which had the ſame effect. Paris was agreable to Helen, and Jaſon to Medea; they could not think of their union with theſe objects, without feeling before-hand an incredible ſatisfaction; nor could they conſider themſelves as ſeparated from them, without feeling a great torment. Theſe impreſſions depended not on their liberty, and were no more under it's command, than the agreeable or diſagreeable ſenſations we feel upon taſting honey or gall. All that theſe two women could do, was to oppoſe reaſon and duty to theſe two fortaſtes; feeble weapons, if Paris and Jaſon continued to raiſe the ſame ideas and the ſame impreſſions; ſince in that caſe they would captivate their will ſooner, or later, and extort a conſent from it, whatever deſire it had to be unſubdued, and to paſs from love to indifference. Uſeleſs are the vows, weak the velleities, in the preſence of thoſe foretaſtes I have ſpoke, and whoſe cauſe proceeds not from ourſelves. Whence proceeds it then? the Pagans might well look for it on all hands, they could not not find it upon the earth, and for that reaſon they attributed it to the gods. This they might do two ways, either by ſuppoſing a Cupid who wounded the heart, or by ſuppoſing that the author of human bodies had adjuſted the parts of them with ſuch an artifice, that, for example, that of Jaſon ſhould excite in the heart and head of Medea, thoſe motions of the ſpirits on which love mechanically and inevitably depends. According to this laſt principle, if Helen or Medea fell in love, he muſt be blamed who has faſhioned and arranged the parts of their bodies; juſt as if a chimney ſhould ſmoke when the wind blows, this muſt not be imputed to the wind, but to the Maſon who made the chimney.

How much moſt paſſions and their effects are involuntary.

This was an abyſs the Pagans could not get out of, and they muſt needs fall into it, as often as they pretended to give a reaſon of the contrariety that is found betwixt what we do and what we know; and conſequently they fell into it very often: for humane life is hardly any thing elſe but a continual combat betwixt the paſſions and the conſcience, in which the latter has generally the worſt of it. And what is the moſt ſtrange and odd in this battle, is, that the victory very frequently declares for the ſide, which ſhocks all at once the ideas we have of virtue, and the knowledge which we have of our temporal intereſts. I am willing to believe there are many ſo brutiſhly ſtupid, as not to ſee that their life would be more happy, if they did not not cheriſh in their breaſts the paſſions which they cheriſh there; but I cannot believe but that the greateſt part of the jealous and envious, are fully perſuaded that it would be an incomparable temporal advantage to be exempt from jealouſy and envy, and worthy to be purchaſed at any rate. A woman jealous of her husband or gallant, a husband jealous of his wife or miſtreſs, are perſons who have the moſt lively ſenſe of their miſery, and paſſionately wiſh to be delivered from this tormentor. They do all that is poſſible to drive away this fury which perſecutes them; they employ all the reaſons their mind can ſuggeſt to them to deceive or undeceive themſelves; but in ſpite of all theſe efforts jealouſy ſtands it's ground, and they find, to their great regret, that they are more ingenious at inventing what can nouriſh it, than what can weaken it. The ſame almoſt may be ſaid of the envious; they know very well that ſelf-love would find it's account incomparably better, in being content with their own condition, and looking on the proſperity of others with pleaſure, than in afflicting themſelves becauſe your neighbour is advanced and enriched above them; yet nevertheleſs in ſpite of their knowledge they torment themſelves and pine away, when they ſee the good fortune of others (167), and inſtead of rejoycing at it, as they ought to do for their own advantage, they are reduced to ſeek ſome remedy in baſe and perfidious actions. By reproaches and treacherous blows, they oppoſe their neighbour's ſucceſs, and thereby endeavour to mitigate the malignant fever that preys upon them. What could a Heathen philoſopher ſay to this? ought not he to acknowledge a ſuperiour cauſe in it, and rank all this ſort of people in the number of phanatics, the poſſeſt, the enthuſiaſt, and, in general, of all thoſe whom they believed to be acted by a divine furor (168)? Note, that Ovid ſuppoſes that the jealouſy which Aglaura, the daughter of Cecrops king of Athens, conceived againſt her ſiſter, was inſpired into her by a divinity (169). The true ſyſtem of the Chriſtians is the only one that can reſolve theſe difficulties; it teaches us, that ſince the firſt man fell from the ſtate of innocence, all his poſterity have been ſubjected to ſuch corruption, that without a ſupernatural grace they are neceſſarily ſlaves of iniquity, inclined to do evil, unprofitable to all good (170). Reaſon, philoſophy, the ideas of virtue, the knowledge of the true intereſt of ſelf-love, all this is unable to reſiſt the paſſions. The empire which was given to the ſuperiour faculty of the ſoul, over the inferiour, was taken from man, from the time of Adam's ſin. Thus it is that divines explain the change which this ſin introduced; but as the greateſt part of metaphors muſt not be preſſed beyond a certain point, we muſt not abuſe this; for it would not be reaſonable to ſay, that in the ſtate of innocence, the inferiour faculty was in the ſame condition it is at preſent, but that no diſorder could ariſe from it, becauſe the ſuperiour could always ſeaſonably interpoſe to withſtand it. This would be to ſuppoſe that the body of man, as it came from the hands of his creator, was actually inclined towards ſenſualities and blameable paſſions, this would be to injure the perfections of the ſupreme being.

[Z] She cut off her hair being in mourning.] What I have to ſay upon this point was communicated to me by a profeſſor at Geneva (171); I will tranſcribe his words. 'The ſubject of the firſt letter of John 'Michael Brutus's collection, is diverting. Victorius, 'who writes to John della Caſa, pretends that Helen, 'to expreſs her ſorrow for the death of her ſiſter 'Clytemneſtra, cut off her hair to the root, without 'prejudice to her beauty; and Monſignor della Caſa 'is of opinion, that ſhe only cut off the ends, as 'is ſometimes done to hinder them from branching; 'and he produces on this ſubject ſome verſes of an 'ingenious poem of that archbiſhop, addreſſed to count 'Geleazzo de Florimont, wherein the prelate makes 'an ingenuous confeſſion, that he has not quitted the 'world but very ſuperficially, and that ſo he has imitated Helen, who ſacrificed to her grief for her ſiſter 'only the extremities of her locks: the poetry of it 'is noble.

Ut captâ rediens Helena cum conjuge Troiâ
Lento homine, atque animi lenis, nimiumque remiſſi,
Incidit in cædem ipſam, & funus prope ſororis,
Quam præceps miſeri virtus jugularat Oreſtis,
Succiſam de more comam miſſura ſepulto
Germanæ cineri, fertur dempſiſſe capillo
Vix tandem è ſummo paulum, ne ſorte placeret
Tonſa minus metuens Spartanis improba mœchis.
Haud aliter Galatæ malis erroribus actus
Nuper ego, & Phrygios nautos Paridemque ſecutus
Aufugi longè, atque idem rediit tamen ut mens
Ad ſeſe, peregrè nimium remorata protervæ
Ornamenta fugæ ſenſim lenteque repono, &c.

When Menelaus, Troy in aſhes loſt,
Return'd, with Helen, to his native coaſt,
Where the ſad news of poor Electra ſlain
By mad Oreſtes, gave him added pain;
Forc'd by a law, which tyrant cuſtom made,
Her hair to offer to her ſiſter's ſhade,
Fair Helen clipt th' extremes alone, 'tis ſaid.
To ſpare the honours of her head ſhe choſe,
Leſt, ſhorn too cloſe, ſhe leſs ſhou'd pleaſe the beaus.
So I, whom lately wandring error drew
To follow Paris, and the Phrygian crew,
Reaſon return'd, and judgment now ſet right,
Put off the trappings of too raſh a flight.

The faſhions of head-dreſſes may be ſo diverſified, that ſome may be found where the charms of a face may not perhaps ſuffer any diminution by the loſs of hair; but in general it is certain this loſs is reckoned a very dreadful accident to beauty. See the note [G] in the article ANACREON.

[AA] A French author pretends ſhe had a great deal of wit, and eloquence, and owed her conqueſts to theſe as much as to her beauty.] That French author is the chevalier de Meré: he proves, by two great examples, that women ought not to put too much confidence in their beauty, nor men in their genteel carriage, and that it is addreſs, and the turn of wit, which does almoſt all in all, provided the perſon has nothing diſguſtful in him (172). The firſt example is Cleopatra: ſhe had no great ſhare of beauty, ſaith he (173), 'and as the 'world ſpoke of her, ſhe was not ſo handſome as to 'ſurprize at the firſt ſight: but when ſhe came to be 'conſidered, ſhe was charming to a miracle, and it 'was by the delicacy of her manners, that ſhe kept 'Cæſar inchanted three or four years. . . . For a 'certain proof that it was her wit that made that 'princeſs ſo admired, we may obſerve that Antony, 'who had as nice a taſte as Cæſar, did not ſee her 'till an age, in which few women retain their beauty; 'yet he became ſo deſperately in love with her, that 'he choſe rather to renounce the empire of the world, 'than to loſe her out of his ſight.' See here his ſecond example.

Si ſon eſprit n'euſt eu des charmes
Ce peuple n'euſt jamais voulu,
Contre le droit des gens d'un pouvoir abſolu,
Pour la garder prendre les armes.
La Grece auſſi l'euſt oubliée
Entre les bras de ſon amant,
Mais elle ſe ſouvint de ſon eſprit charmant,
Et la guerre fut publiée.

The force of wit and beauty cou'd deſtroy
(In Helen met) the lofty walls of Troy.
Trojans and Greeks (renown'd in ancient ſong)
For vulgar wit had never fought ſo long.
But the remembrance of her wond'rous charms
Kindled revenge, and ſet all Greece in arms.

‘ There is great probability, Madam, that her beauty was not alone, ſince all the gods intereſſed themſelves to give it to thoſe whom they favoured; and if ſhe had no more than a good face and a fine ſhape, they muſt have made them but an indifferent preſent. I imagine that what they more eſteemed in her, was the art of pleaſing which ſhe poſſeſſed, and of making herſelf beloved by her converſation (174).’ Add to this the words of the ſame author, which I have related in mentioning the Nepenthes (175).

I do not examine whether he be in the right as to the particular inſtance of the beautiful Helen; but his maxim in general ſeems to be true (176). Beauty without the charms of wit and language, is of no great force; and if it makes any conqueſts, it is after the manner of thoſe brave generals, who quickly ſubdue a province, but know not how to keep it: The empire of the fair is at leaſt as much maintained by the charms of wit, as by thoſe of the face. Theſe are two ſorts of graces that ſtand in need of one another, and mutually perform good offices to each other. Some inſipid and ridiculous diſcourſes would be extreamly diſtaſtful, if the beauty of the perſon did not lend them I know not what charms to adorn them: and ſome beauties of the body would make no impreſſion, if they did not borrow charms from the graces of the mind. Theſe are aſſiſtances that are reciprocally given. But as the wit is moſt times the principal inſtrument in preſerving the conqueſt, and very frequently in making it, it may be aſſerted to be that which contributes moſt to the eſtabliſhing the dominion of beauty. The poet that aſſures us, there is no leſs leſs force required to preſerve than to obtain a conqueſt,

Non minor eſt virtus, quam quærere, parta tueri:
Caſus ineſt illis; hic erit artis opus (177),

Not leſs the boaſt to keep, than to acquire:
Chance may beſtow; to keep, will art require.

is one of the greateſt legiſlators in the empire of love; and he applies that ſentence to the caſe we are now treating of. Nay, he goes farther, he will have the acquiſition to be leſs difficult than the preſervation.

Nunc mihi, ſi quando, Puer & Cytherêa, favete:
Nunc Erato: nam tu nomen amoris habes.
Magna paro; quas poſſit Amor remanere per artes
Dicere, tam vaſto pervagus orbe puer (178).

Thy aid, bright goddeſs of the Cyprian ſhore,
And, Erato, thy favour I implore.
Vaſt my deſign, to fix love's fleeting joy,
And ſhew what arts confine the wanton boy.

This is likewiſe the opinion of many hiſtorians, concerning the progreſs of arms (179).

HELIODORUS, a native of Emeſa in Phœnicia (a), is more known by the romance which he compoſed in his youth [A], than by the biſhopric of Trica (b) to which he was afterwards preferred. There are few who believe that he was depoſed by a ſynod, becauſe he would not conſent to the ſuppreſſion of that romance [B]. Nicephorus

[A] The romance which he compoſed in his youth.] The title of it is Αἰθιοπικὰ, and it contains the amours of Theagenes and Chariclea. We find an extract of it in Photius (1). Mr Huet is of opinion that Heliodorus has been, with reſpect to writers of romances, what Homer was with reſpect to poets; that is, that his work has ſerved as an original and plan for a great number of ſucceeding romances. Eum ſibi ſequentium temporum fabulatores Romanenſes tanquam exemplum propoſuerunt ad imitandum, & tam verè omnes dici poſſunt ex hoc fonte, quàm Poetæ ex Homerico ſuas, ut ut dicam, aquas hauſiſſe (2). The firſt edition of this book is, as I take it, that of Baſil 1534. Opſopæus, who dedicated it to the ſenate of Nuremberg, aſſures us, that a ſoldier ſaved the manuſcripts, when the library of Buda was pillaged (3). Staniſlaus Warſzewiczki, a Poliſh knight, is the author of the Latin tranſlation, which was printed at Baſil, with the Greek, in the year 1551. Amiot began his French verſions with this work. [Melin of St Gelais, biſhop of Angouleme (§ α), has turned a good part of it into French verſe (4). John Bourdelot's notes upon this romance are very learned; they were printed at Paris in the year 1619, with the Greek of Heliodorus, and the tranſlation of the Poliſh knight.

[(§ α) If Sorel has ſaid what Mr Bayle ſeems to make him ſay, to wit, that the poet Melin de St Gelais was biſhop of Angoulême, he muſt neither have conſulted the Elogies of Sammarthanus, nor the Gallia Chriſtiani. It was Octavian de S. Gelais, natural father of Melin, who was biſhop of that city. He lived under Charles VIII and Louis XII, and ſeveral pieces of poetry of this biſhop, are to be found in a collection in 4to. in Gothic characters, intitled Vergier d'Honneur.

It is ſurpriſing that Mr Bayle ſuffered ſuch a miſtake to eſcape him: it has probably been occaſioned one of thoſe [illegible] inattentions, to which the greateſt genius's are ſubject. In copying Sorel (a), from whom he has taken this, he has not obſerved this author's miſtake; otherwiſe he would have, as uſual, acquainted us with it. Sorel likewiſe probably fell into this, led by inadvertency; but ſtill it is a great fault, ſince, beſides Mr Bayle, this has made the author of the Eſſais de Literature (b), and even the famous Mr Fabricius (c), fall into the ſame error. Inſtead of Melin de St Gelais, he ought to have ſaid Octavain de St Gelais, his father, who was indeed biſhop of Angoulême (d), and who was the perſon they meant. However neither du Verdier (e), nor la Croix du Maine (f), nor any other author that I know, has made mention of this tranſlation in verſe, of a part of the amours of Theagenes and Chariclea; and Sorel is perhaps the only perſon who has ſpoke of it.

By the by, I ſhall obſerve that in the Incunabula Typographiæ of Beughem, pag. 176, they have changed this Octavian de St Gelais into Octavicus de St Gervais. This is to disfigure names ſtrangely. Rem. Crit.]

[B] There are few who believe that he was depoſed by a ſynod, becauſe he would not conſent to the ſuppreſſion of that romance.] Nicephorus relates, that a ſynod having given Heliodorus his choice, either to burn his romance or renounce his biſhopric, the author choſe rather to ceaſe from being a biſhop than to throw his work into the fire (5). This ſeems fabulous; a thing ſo remarkable, would have been related by many hiſtorians; and we ſhould not have had it preſerved only by Nicephorus, a man of great credulity and little judgment. ‘ Quæ omnia eò me facilè reducunt, ut diffidam iis maximè quæ addit Nicephorus, ſcriptor credulus, ſapientiæ & fidei non ſatis ſpectatæ, Synodum ſcilicet Provincialem cognito periculo, in quod lectio fabulæ hujus, cui autoris ſui dignitas tantum ponderis & autoritatis dabat, juvenes ſuapte naturâ ad id propenſos & quaſi nutantes impelleret, eam ipſi conditionem obtuliſſe, ut aut opus ſuum cephorus is the only author who ſays ſo. Socrates (c) ſays, that Heliodorus introduced the cuſtom of depoſing eccleſiaſtics, who lay with their wives after their ordination. This is a favourable prejudice for the chaſtity of that prelate. His romance even ſhews him to be a lover of this virtue. For the hero of the piece is of ſuch a modeſty as has given occaſion to ſevere railleries [C]. The tranſlator of Photius does not well expreſs

'flammis aboleret, aut ſuâ dignitate cederet; eumque, quod ultimum erat, prætuliſſe (6). —— All theſe things make me doubt, eſpecially what Nicephorus adds, (a credulous author, and of no great judgment or credit) to wit, that a provincial ſynod, being aware of the danger into which the reading of that romance might lead the youth, who are too prone by nature to be hurried away by that paſſion: and conſidering that the dignity of it's author would make it ſtill more dangerous, offered him theſe terms, that he ſhould either burn his book, or reſign his biſhopric, and that he choſe the laſt.' Would Socrates have been ſilent of it in the paſſage where he ſays that Heliodorus compoſed ſome books of love in his youth? Οὗ λέγεται πονήματα ἐρωτικὰ βιβλία, ἃ νέος ὢν ἔταξε καὶ αἰθιοπικὰ προσηγόρευσε: Cujus nomine circumferuntur amatorii libri quos ille dum juvenis eſſet compoſuit, & Æthiopicos inſcripſit (7). —— Under whoſe name we have ſome books of love adventures, which he compoſed in his youth, and intituled Ethiopics. Valeſius, not content to reject as a fable what Nicephorus tells, will not ſo much as believe that this romance was compoſed by Heliodorus the biſhop. See his notes upon this paſſage of Socrates. Let us hear what Mr Sorel ſays. I cannot believe that Heliodorus was a biſhop, and ſo fooliſh as to chooſe rather to loſe his biſhopric than to burn his book, according to the option that was given him. Theſe are little ſtories forged at pleaſure; for if his book was ſo ſcandalous, that it could not be ſuffered to be publiſhed, they would not have failed to have forbidden it, tho' he had quitted his dignity, ſo that he would have loſt his aim (8). This author had better have given his judgment without any reaſon; for the reaſon he offers is good for nothing. The condemnation of a book by a ſynod, does not hinder it from being read, known, and commended according to it's merit; and conſequently Heliodorus would not have been defeated of his end, tho' the biſhops, who gave him his choice, had condemned his romance. Father Vavaſſeur has argued in a more ſolid manner, in ſaying that it was no longer in Heliodorus's power to ſuppreſs his book; from whence we ought to conclude that the biſhops did not give him that option which is pretended. What advantage could accrue to morality from it? 'Neutrum, quantum opinio mea eſt, vere dicitur. Neque lata Epiſcopo conditio tam præpoſtera, tamque gravis: neque ab illo accepta, aut repudiata quoquo modo: quod ipſe, qui narrat, abunde narratione ſua refellit. An vero fuit in poteſtate Heliodori, ut aboleret igni, ac perderet opus ſuum, aut omnino ſuppreſſum teneret, quod jam exiſſet in vulgus, & manibus omnium evolveretur, quodque juventus periculo aliquo, damnoque morum, ut vult Nicephorus, legendo contriviſſet (9). —— Neither of theſe, in my opinion is true, either that ſo prepoſterous and hard conditions were impoſed on the biſhop, or that he accepted of, or refuſed, them in any ſort: the relater of the ſtory methinks abundantly confutes it. For was it any longer in the power of Heliodorus to deſtroy or altogether to ſuppreſs his work which had been publiſhed, and was in every body's hands, and which, as Nicephorus pretends, had been ſo well received by the youth as to endanger their morals.' He adds, that Petavius did not think this ſtory of Nicephorus worthy of any credit.

[C] The hero of the piece is of ſuch a modeſty as has given occaſion to ſevere railleries.] Obſerve a little this paſſage of Parnaſſus Reformed, where Theagenes ſpeaks. 'If things had been faithfully reported as they were tranſacted, I ſhould have no reaſon to complain, I ſhould not find fault with my romancer: but he repreſents me as an inſenſible creature, and attributes to me that ſtupid baſhfulneſs, which is offended with the moſt innocent liberties; making me give my miſtreſs a box on the ear, rather than permit her to kiſs me. It is my part (Chariclea interrupts him) to complain of the box on the ear you ſpeak of. If it be ſcandalous for you to have given it, it is much more ſo for me to have received it, and the reparation you may pretend to expect from Heliodorus, belongs to me alone.' Now obſerve Heliodorus's anſwer. The box on the ear which diſturbs you, is an argument of your modeſty, ſays he to Theagenes; it is the effect of a virtue which is much to your advantage, and thereby I have preſerved that decorum which the dignity of my character obliged me to. It is true, replyed Theagenes, that for a biſhop (10), you have repreſented your own character well enough in that place, but you would have repreſented it better, if you had burnt your romance, or if you had never thought of writing it. Lovers have nothing to do with epiſcopal virtues, and biſhops do not well agree with the liberties of lovers. A veſtal chaſtity ill becomes heroes, whoſe love ought to be diſengaged from all thoſe ſcrupulous formalities which check it's noble tranſports and charming raptures. It is obſervable that the author is ſuppoſed to have nothing to anſwer to Chariclea's complaint. And indeed what could be ſaid to an accuſation ſo well grounded? the heroine of a romance, who would kiſs her lover, and receives a box on the ear from him in return from the favour. Doth not ſhe make a very ridiculous figure in ſuch a piece?

Thus I finiſhed this remark, in the firſt edition of this Dictionary. I ſuppoſed that Mr Gueret having ſhewn a great deal of wit and good taſte, in his Parnaſſus Reformed, had not founded his ralleries upon a falſhood of his own invention: for nothing could have been more contrary to the laws of criticiſm and ſatire (11). Believing therefore he could not be guilty of ſuch a fault, I did not queſtion but the fact was ſo as he relates it; and for that reaſon I was not at the pains of examining the original. But Mr du Rondel had no ſooner read the remark [C] of this article, but he wrote to me, that the matter was not at all as Mr Gueret has repreſented it; he ſhewed me the circumſtances of the action, and made it appear that Theagenes deſerved not the leaſt cenſure. I have juſt now read the place where Heliodorus recites that adventure, and am convinced with my own eyes that Mr du Rondel is in the right, and that the author of Parnaſſus Reformed, impoſed on the public, and took the liberty to make railleies which ought rather to be called impoſtures. Theagenes and Chariclea, ſeparted from each other by the ſtrokes of capricious, fortune, which are ſo frequent in romances, happened to come near Memphis at the ſame time. They had made no aſſignation, nor taken ſo much as the ſame road; it happened that Chariclea arrived near the town, when Theagenes was walking round the walls, on an occaſion which furniſhed the inhabitants with a ſhew. She knew him at a great diſtance; for, as Heliodorus obſerves, lovers eyes are very ſubtile (12). She felt ſuch emotions on the ſight of that object, that, as if a waſp had ſtung her, ſhe ran with tranſport towards Theagenes, and threw her arms about his neck without ſpeaking a word. She was in a ſorry dreſs and her face all beſmeared, ſo that he took her for a proſtitute and puſhed her from him: but not being able to get rid of her, he gave her a box on the ear. expreſs the elogy that is given to the chaſt amours of Theagenes and Chariclea; for according to the tranſlation, we ſhould believe that Heliodorus had compoſed a romance on the amours of a huſband and wife [D], which would be very abſurd. An author has pretended, that Heliodorus was not a Chriſtian; but he goes upon very weak grounds [E]. Mr. Huet (d) does not doubt that the author of this romance, was biſhop of Trica, in the reign of Theodoſius; but he thinks it cannot be proved, that Heliodorus, the biſhop, to whom St. Jerome wrote letters, was biſhop of Trica. He thinks alſo, that they who ſhould affirm it, could not be ſolidly confuted. If the depoſing of Heliodorus was true, it would be a great inſtance of the fondneſs of authors for their works. A modern writer knew ſome men who would have done what is attributed to the biſhop of Trica [F].

rejiciebat: & ad extremum, cùm non deſiſteret, tanquam ſibi moleſtæ & ſpectaculum illud Calaſiris impedienti, etiam alapam inflixit (13). But as ſoon as he found that it was his dear Chariclea, he paſſionately embraced her (14). It is eaſy to conclude from this narration that the reformer of Parnaſſus has quite changed the nature of the action, which makes all his railleries inſipid and abſurd. Chariclea, I confeſs, received a box on the ear; but it cannot with juſtice be affirmed that Theagenes gave Chariclea a box on the ear, he believed that he ſtruck one of thoſe creatures which go by the name of gypſies. Apply to this what the civilians and caſuiſts obſerve concerning the ignorance that excuſes.

[D] According to the tranſlation we ſhould believe that Heliodorus had compoſed a romance on the amours of a huſband and wife.] Theſe are the tranſlator's words. 'Dramatis hujus argumentum auctori præbuere Theagenes & Chariclea caſtè inter ſe ac pudice amantes, cum ultro citroque jactati errarunt, & capti etiam idemtidem, fidem tamen conjugalem conſtanter ſervarunt. —— The ſubject of this piece, is the chaſte and modeſt loves of Theagenes and Chariclea; who, tho' toſt about by adverſe fortune, and ſometimes taken captives, yet ſtill preſerved their conjugal faith with inviolable conſtancy.' Here is a tamen (yet), which is wrong, and is an addition of the tranſlator. Photius has not reaſoned ſo ill as to ſay, that tho' adverſe fortune had made Theagenes and Chariclea wanderers and captives, yet they had notwithſtanding, continued conſtant lovers. Every body knows, that the wandering, and ſometimes captive, life theſe two lovers led, is rather a reaſon why the hero did not change his miſtreſs, nor the heroine her lover, than a reaſon why they ſhould alter the object of their loves. Inconſtancy is leſs ſurprizing in the ſoftneſs of a life, altogether calm and ſerene, and unmixt with adverſity. But the tranſlator's principal fault is his ſaying, they exactly obſerved the conjugal faith. How could that be, ſince they were not married? they do not marry, according to cuſtom, till the end of the book. It is the concluſion of Heliodorus's romance. Here is the true verſion of Photius's words. Ἔστιν αὐτῷ ἡ τοῦ δράματος ὑπόθεσις Χαρίκλεια καὶ Θεαγένης, σώφρονες ἀλλήλων ἐρασταί, καὶ πλάνη τούτων, καὶ αἰχμαλωσία παντοδαπὴ, καὶ φυλακὴ τῆς σωφροσύνης. Sunt ipſi argumentum dramatis Theagenes & Chariclea pudice inter ſe amantes, & eorum errores, ac captivitas omnimoda, & cuſtodia caſtitatis (15). Opſopæus a long time ago committed the fault that I am cenſuring. 'Conjugalis amoris ac fidei & conſtantiæ pulcherrimum exemplar in Theagene & Chariclea adumbravit (16). —— He drew a beautiful picture of conjugal love, faith, and conſtancy, in the hiſtory of Theagenes and Chariclea.'

[E] Some body has pretended that Heliodorus was not a Chriſtian, but he goes upon very weak grounds.] The firſt is, that Amiot ſays, that Philoſtratus makes mention of a Sophiſt, called Heliodorus; and that ſome have believed that it is of our author he ſpeaks there. The ſecond is, that this author, by ſaying at the end of his book, that he is a Phœnician, a native of the city of Emeſſa, and of the race of the Sun, muſt deſtroy the opinion of his being a Chriſtian. For there is no doubt but a Chriſtian, and a biſhop too, muſt be mad if he ſhould ſay he was a deſcendant of that luminary (17). I need not ſay, that the firſt reaſon proves nothing. The ſecond is of more force; but not enough to found a good proof upon. It is certain, that many Chriſtians of the IVth century, made mention of the antiquity of their families (18). Why then ſhould we not believe, that Heliodorus has mentioned his? he did not believe that he owed his original to the Sun; but he might think he ought to characterize it by it; It was a title his family had been of a long time diſtinguiſhed by; and which did honour to it; and though the principle was falſe, yet advantageous conſequences to his family might be drawn from it, with reſpect to it's antiquity. This might be a reaſon for a Chriſtian thus to deſcribe the nobility of his extraction. Add to this, that Heliodorus was not a biſhop when he compoſed his romance. He was in the firſt vigour of youth; and as he did not name himſelf, he might the more freely point out his race according to the ancient tradition of his family.

[F] A modern writer knew ſome men who would have done what is attributed to the biſhop of Trica.] This modern writer is Father Vavaſſeur. He doth not at all believe what Nicephorus relates, it appears to be ridiculous to him; whether we conſider the perſons propoſing ſuch an alternative, or the choice that was made (19). Nevertheleſs, he aſſures us, that he knows people ſo fond of their works, that they had rather looſe the beſt benifices in the kingdom, than give up the praiſes they think they have merited by their romances. Cujus tamen factum ne magnopere vituperetur, aut ne reprehendatur ex toto, nonnulli obſtant, quos ego ſcio, ſi iſto loco eſſent, fieretque poteſtas eligendi; hoc idem & amplius facturos; taleſque partus ingenii, qualia Heliodori Æthiopica ſunt, non Thraciæ modo, ſed opimis Galliæ ſacerdotiis omnibus antepoſituros, & loco graduque, & quavis dignitate ceſſuros potius, quam laboris, & induſtriæ, & bonæ exiſtimationis fructum hunc qualemcumque amitterent (20).

HELOISA, concubine, and afterwards wife of Peter Abelard, a nun; and afterwards prioreſs of Argenteuil; and laſtly, abbeſs of the Paraclet, has occaſioned too much diſcourſe of her, not to deſerve an article of ſome length in this work. She had an uncle, by her mother's ſide, named Fulbert [A], who was a canon of Paris, and who loved

[A] She had an uncle by her mother's ſide, named Fulbert.] This is all I have found of certainty concerning Heloiſa's genealogy; and therefore I have not ſaid that ſhe was legitimately deſcended from the ancient houſe of Montmorenci. I have read this indeed, in the apologetical preface of Francis d'Amboiſe (1): but as he cites no author for it, and Andrew du Chêne (2) makes no mention of it, I ſuſpect the credit of it; and the more, becauſe Heloiſa owns in her letters, that her family had been much honoured by her marriage with Abelard, and that he had married much beneath himſelf (3). Papyrius Maſſo (4) aſſerts, that Heloiſa was the natural daughter of one John, a canon of Paris. Andrew du Chêne is in the right not to lay much weight on this, ſince he does not ſay whence he had this curious circumſtance; but he has no reaſon to oppoſe againſt that annaliſt, the calender of the Paraclet, where are theſe words. VII Cal. Januar. obiit Hubertus (5) Canonicus Dominæ Heloiſæ avunculus. —— The twenty ſixth of December died canon Hubert, uncle to Heloiſa. For what is eaſier than to reconcile Papyrius Maſſo with this calender? cannot the ſame woman be the baſtard of one canon, and the neice of another? but once more: he who ſays loved her tenderly. He took an extraordinary care to have her well educated; and as ſhe had a great deal of wit, ſhe in a little time grew ſo learned, that her reputation was ſpread all over the kingdom [B]. And beſides, ſhe was pretty handſome [C]. There was, at that time, a famous doctor in Paris, who read public lectures with wonderful reputation. His name was Peter Abelard, the moſt ſubtile logician of his age, and he who firſt brought the ſcholaſtic philoſophy and divinity in vogue. He enjoyed all the glory that a man of his profeſſion could deſire: he had an infinite number of ſcholars, was look'd upon as a very able maſter, and got a great deal of money; but he did not make love; and this he thought was a conſiderable flaw in his good fortune. That nothing therefore might be wanting to his happineſs, he reſolved to become a lover, and choſe Heloiſa for his miſtreſs. We have told, in another place (a), the reaſons that led him to this choice, and how he got into the canon's family, under the notion of a domeſtic tutor. Poor honeſt Fulbert hoped, that, under ſuch a maſter, Heloiſa would make a wonderful proficiency in the ſciences; but he found ſhe learnt only the art of making love. She had an incomparable diſpoſition for it. She was taught to make ſo great progreſs in a little time, that her maſter ſoon paſt from the firſt to the laſt favour; and that without any thoughts of demanding a promiſe of marriage.

ſays that Heloiſa was the natural daughter of one canon John, without quoting any author for it, will not merit credit. If any canon were to be ſuſpected in this matter, it would rather be canon Fulbert than any other. For that tender affection for Heloiſa which Abelard aſcribes to him, is ſo uncommon among uncles (6), and ſo naturally reſembles the affection of the beſt fathers, that there might be ſome grounds to imagine, that Fulbert acted as a great many others do, who cannot be fathers according to the canons: they conceal that relation, under that of uncle, and educate their children under the title of nephews. This is what may be ſuſpected. But this ought not to regulate the ſtyle, nor hinder us from giving people the titles, under which the public has known them. Fulbert in a book, muſt be only an uncle. Note, that according to Papyrius Maſſo, the canon who took care to have Heloiſa educated, and cauſed Peter Abelard to be caſtrated, was called John. That hiſtorian therefore does not pretend that ſhe was the niece of one canon, and the natural daughter of another. He pretends, that the canon whom all the other authors name Fulbert, and whom they take to be the uncle of Heloiſa, was her father, and that his name was John (7).

[B] She grew ſo learned, that her reputation was ſpread.] Let us hear Abelard. 'Qui (Fulbertus) eam 'quanto amplius diligebat, tanto diligentius in omnem 'quam poterat ſcientiam literarum promoveri ſtuduerat. Quæ cum per faciem non eſſet infima, per 'abundantiam literarum erat ſuprema. Nam quo 'bonum hoc, literatoriæ ſcilicet ſcientiæ, in mulieribus 'eſt rarius, eò amplius puellam commendabat, & in 'toto regno nominatiſſimam fecerat (8). —— As 'Fulbert loved her exceedingly, he took the utmoſt 'pains to have her inſtructed in all manner of learning. And as ſhe was not the laſt of her ſex in 'beauty, ſo in letters ſhe was the firſt. For the rarer 'letters are among women, ſo much the more was ſhe 'diſtinguiſhed by them, and celebrated all over the 'kingdom on that account.' In that age a young woman with a very moderate ſhare of erudition, might have paſſed for a miracle. This ought to be well obſerved by thoſe who would not carry their ideas of our Heloiſa beyond due bounds; and yet it muſt be granted that ſhe deſerves an honourable place, among the learned women. She not only underſtood the Latin tongue, but alſo the Greek and Hebrew; Abelard teſtifies this alſo, in the letter he wrote to the nuns of the Paraclet. Magiſterium habetis in matre, quod ad omnia vobis ſufficere tam ad exemplum ſcilicet virtutem, quam ad doctrinam literarum poteſt, quæ non ſolum Latinæ, verum etiam tam Hebraicæ quam Græcæ non expers literaturæ, ſola hoc tempore illam trium linguarum adepta peritiam videtur, quæ ab omnibus in beato Hieronymo tanquam ſingularis gratia prædicatur (9). Francis d'Amboiſe tells us (10), how ſhe ſubtilly ſatisfied St Bernard, who asked the reaſon why in the monaſtery of the Paraclet, when they repeated the lord's prayer, they did not ſay, Panem noſtrum quotidianum, but panem noſtrum ſuperſubſtantialem. She gave him a reaſon for it, taken from the originals, and told him we muſt follow the Greek verſion of the goſpel, which St Matthew wrote in Hebrew. I know not whether ſuch an anſwer would have pleaſed St Bernard, but I doubt not that it was able to puzzle him, and make him give over the diſpute; and I wiſh with all my heart the ſtory were true; it would be an inſtance how a woman would heartily perplex a great author in a controverſial point, by alledging the Greek text. I was ſorry therefore, I confeſs, when, conſulting the letter (11) quoted by Francis d'Amboiſe I found that Heloiſa had no hand in it, and that the whole remark is Abelard's, who wrote thereupon to St Bernard, after having known from Heloiſa the exceptions that were made to panem ſuperſubſtantialem. Let this be ſaid without prejudice to the learning of that abbeſs. But if any one ſhould imagine that ſhe did not become learned till after ſhe was a recluſe, I would refer him to a letter of Peter the Venerable, abbot of Clugni, which declares, that before that time ſhe had accquigreat knowledge; 'Necdum, ſays he to her (12), metas 'adoleſcentiæ exceſſeram, necdum in juveniles annos 'evaſeram, quando nomen non quidem adhuc religionis 'tuæ, ſed honeſtorum, tamen & laudabilium ſtudiorum mihi fama innotuit. Audiebam tunc temporis mulierem, licet necdum ſæculi nexibus expeditam, literatoriæ ſcientiæ & ſtudio ſæcularis ſapientiæ ſummam operam dare, quo efferendo ſtudio 'tuo & mulieres omnes eviciſti, & pene viros univerſos ſuperaſti. —— When I was only a boy, and had 'not arrived to manhood, the fame, not indeed as yet, of 'your piety, but of your polite and laudable ſtudies, reached my ears. I was told that a woman tho' not then 'retired from worldly avocations, gave the cloſeſt application to letters and the ſtudy of human learning, and by that means, you not only excelled all 'your own ſex, but almoſt out-did all ours.' The monk of Auxerre ſays, ſhe was well acquainted with Latin and Hebrew, and the Calender of the Paraclet thus ſpeaks of her: Heloïſe mere & premiere Abbeſſe deceans, de doctrine & religione tres reſplendiſſante (13) —— Heloiſa, the mother and firſt abbeſs of this monaſtery, illuſtrious for her learning, and for her devotion.

[C] She was pretty handſome.] I obſerve a great many authors aſcribe to her a raviſhing beauty; but are they more credible than Abelard himſelf, who having more reaſon to enlarge than diminiſh things, contents himſelf to ſay, that ſhe was not the laſt of her ſex in beauty, but that ſhe was the firſt in erudition. Cum per faciem non eſſet infima, per abundantiam literarum erat ſuprema —— As ſhe was not laſt of her ſex in beauty, ſo in letters ſhe was the firſt. Would a man ſpeak thus of an accompliſhed beauty? would a lover, concerned to juſtify his choice, and the violence of his paſſion, employ ſuch a figure of rhetoric? ſome (14) obſerve that Heloiſa was eighteen years old when Abelard debauched her? I have not met with that circumſtance in any ancient author. It is true. the word adoleſcentula, which which Abelard makes uſe of (15), may very well ſuit the age of eighteen; and ſo may that of juvencula, which ſhe confeſſeth (16), but nothing can be concluded from ſuch a proof. It is a meer chimera to ſay, that Abelard in his Romance of the Roſe, drew the picture of Heloiſa, under the name of Beauty (17). That romance did not ſee the light till after their death.

marriage. Abelard ſo gave himſelf up to his pleaſures with her [D], that he grew negligent of his lectures. He confeſſes himſelf, that he kept no meaſures, but plunged into thoſe pleaſures, without diſtinction of times and places; without diſtinction of holy-days, or worky-days, or of holy and profane places; that he made no further progreſs in Philoſophy; and that all the productions of his genius dwindled into ſonnets and love-verſes [F]. His ſcholars quickly found out the matter, upon enquiring into the reaſons of the abatement of his lectures. The ſcandal was quickly propagated all over the town, and at laſt it reached the ears of her uncle [G], but found him

[D] Abelard gave himſelf up to his pleaſures.] We muſt hear himſelf ſpeak, that we may loſe nothing of the force of his expreſſions. ‘ Nullus à cupidis intermiſſus eſt gradus amoris, & ſi quid inſolitum amor ‘ excogitare potuit, eſt additum. Et quo minus illa ‘ fueramus experti gaudia ardentius illis inſiſtebamus, ‘ & minus in faſtidium vertebantur (18). —— So fond ‘ we were, that no degree of love was left untried, and ‘ if ought new love could invent, it was added. And ‘ the leſs we were accuſtomed to theſe joys the more ‘ greedily we devoured them, and the leſs were cloyed.’ He compares himſelf to thoſe who have ſuffered a long famine, and come afterwards to a plentiful table. A man who has lived chaſtly, is more apt to fall into exceſs with his wife, than a debauchee.

[E] Without diſtinction of times and places.] We muſt again hear him ſpeak, in a letter he wrote to Heloiſa, a long time after their monaſtic engagements. He puts her a little in mind of their paſt conduct, and how he careſſed her in a corner of the refectory of the nuns of Argenteuil, finding no other convenient place, and having no reſpect to the Holy Virgin, to whom that place was conſecrated. ‘ Noſti poſt noſtri ‘ confœderationem conjugii cum Argenteoli cum Sanctimonialibus in clauſtro converſabaris, me die quadam privatim ad te viſitandum veniſſe, & quid ibi ‘ tecum meæ libidinis egerit intemperantia in quadam ‘ etiam parte ipſius refectorii, cum quò alias divertere‘ mus non haberemus. Noſti, inquam, id impuden‘ tiſſime tunc actum eſſe, in tam reverendo loco & ‘ ſummæ Virgini conſecrato . . . . Quid priſtinas forni‘ cationes & impudentiſſimas referam pollutiones quæ ‘ conjugium præceſſerunt (19)? —— You remember ‘ when after our marriage you lived in the nunnery at ‘ Argenteuil, that I one day came ſecretly to ſee you, ‘ and what my unbridled paſſion made me do, even in ‘ the refectory, having no other place to which we could ‘ retire. You know, I ſay, what was acted there in ‘ that ſacred place, dedicated to the Bleſſed Virgin. ‘ Why ſhould I call to mind the follies and pollutions ‘ which preceded our marriage?’ A little after he tells her, that ſhe knows very well, that neither the moſt ſolemn feaſts, nor even the Paſſion-Day, diſcouraged them from wallowing in that filthy courſe; and that whenever ſhe began to be ſcrupulous, he made uſe of threatenings and whipping to bring her to conſent (20). Behold a man perfectly free from the ſuperſtitions of thoſe who obſerved days and feaſts, new-moons, and ſabbaths (21).

[F] All the productions of his genius, dwindled into ſonnets and love-verſes.] This we learn from himſelf. ‘ Ita negligentem & tepidum lectio tunc habebat ut ‘ jam nihil ex ingenio, ſed ex uſu cuncta proferrem, ‘ nec jam niſi recitator priſtinorum eſſem inventorum, ‘ & ſi qua invenire liceret, carmina eſſent amatoria, ‘ non philoſophiæ ſecreta (22). —— I then was ſo ‘ careleſs and negligent in my lectures, that all I ſaid ‘ was rather by rote than from any ſtudy. I only recited ‘ my former inventions, and if I then invented any thing ‘ it was rather love ſongs, than ſecrets in Philoſophy.’ He adds, that theſe verſes were ſtill ſung in many provinces, and eſpecially amongſt perſons that made love: Quorum etiam carminum pleraque adhuc in multis, ſicut & ipſa noſti, frequentantur & decantantur regionibus, ab his maxime quos vita ſimilis oblectat. Heloiſa tells us more of it. She ſays, that her Abelard had two qualifications which other philoſophers wanted, by which he could ſoon gain all womens hearts; viz. that he wrote finely, and ſung well; his love verſes were ſo pretty, and his ſongs ſo agreeable, both as to the words and airs, that every body was charmed with them, and full of the author's praiſes. Women were not ſatisfied with being charmed with Abelard's ſongs and verſes; they were as much taken with his perſon, and loved him paſſionately; and as the greateſt part of his verſes were filled with nothing but his love for Heliosa; the name of that miſtreſs, flew preſently into the provinces, and made an infinite number of women envy her good fortune. I enervate much the force of Heloiſa's expreſſions, and I believe they ought not to be literally taken. As ſhe loved Abelard even to diſtraction, ſhe fancied no woman could look upon him, but muſt fall into the ſame paſſion; which made her ſay, that there was neither wife nor maid, who in Abelard's abſence did not wiſh for him, and in his preſence was not inflamed with love; and that even queens and great ladies envied the pleaſures ſhe reaped by the enjoyment of ſuch a man. See here the Latin, which ſpeaks ſtill more ſignificantly (23). ‘ Quæ conjugata, ‘ quæ virgo non concupiſcebat abſentem, & non exar‘ debat in præſentem? Quæ Regina vel præpotens ‘ femina gaudiis meis non invidebat vel thalamis? ‘ Duo autem, fateor, tibi ſpecialiter inerant quibus ‘ feminarum quarumlibet animos ſtatim allicere poteras, ‘ dictandi videlicet & cantandi gratia, quæ cæteros ‘ minimè Philoſophos aſſecutos eſſe novimus. Quibus ‘ quidem quaſi ludo quodam laborem exercitii recreans ‘ philoſophici, pleraque amatorio metro vel rithmo ‘ compoſita reliquiſti carmina, quæ præ nimia ſuavitate ‘ tam dictaminis quam cantus ſæpius frequentata tuum ‘ in ore omnium nomen inceſſanter tenebant, ut etiam ‘ illiteratos melodiæ dulcedo tui non ſineret immemo‘ res eſſe. Atque hinc maxime in amorem tui feminæ ‘ ſuſpirabant. Et cum horum pars maxima carminum ‘ noſtros decantaret amores, multis me regionibus ‘ brevi tempore nunciavit (24), & multarum in me ‘ feminarum accendit invidiam. —— What wife, what ‘ maid, did not languiſh for you when abſent, and was ‘ not inflamed with love when you was near? What ‘ queen, what lady, did not envy my joys? Two qualities ‘ you had, rare to be found among the learned, by which ‘ you could not fail to gain all womens hearts, Poetry I ‘ mean, and Muſic. With theſe you unbended your ‘ mind after it's philoſophic labours, and wrote many ‘ love verſes, which becauſe of the ſweetneſs both of the ‘ words and muſic, were in every mouth, and carried ‘ your fame to every corner, and made even the illiterate ſound your praiſe. By this it was that you chiefly gained the womens love. And as the greateſt part ‘ of your ſongs celebrated our loves, they ſpread my ‘ name to many nations, and kindled there the envy of ‘ the women againſt me.’ If the Romance of the Roſe had been Abelard's performance, and if he had characteriſed his Heloiſa under the name of Beauty, no doubt ſhe would not have concealed it; and here was the proper place to ſpeak of it. So that though we did know that this romance was written an hundred years after Abelard, we might learn from Heloiſa's ſilence, that there is no reaſon for aſcribing it to him in the little book I have quoted more than once (25). Much leſs has any one had reaſon to make Heloiſa ſay this in the tranſlation of her letter. But to return to our ſubject: a man would not believe, were it not for experience, that verſes, letters, and ſonnets, had the power of advancing ſo much the affairs of a lover (26); but here is a witneſs of it that is worth a thouſand. The wits of this age complain, that their wares have not the ſame effect as in the time of our anceſtors. The times are changed, I confeſs, but not entirely. See the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (27). As for what Heloiſa declares concerning the weakneſs of thoſe of her own ſex with reſpect to Abelard, it is confirmed by a certain prior named Foulques; whoſe article muſt be conſulted.

[G] The ſcandal . . . . at laſt . . . . reached the ears of her uncle.] That word at laſt ſeems at firſt ſomewhat ſtrange; but they who know the world, are not ignorant that on ſuch occaſions, they who are moſt concerned in a piece of news, are the laſt who hear it. Abelard cites upon this ſubject, a notable paſſage from a letter of St Jerome to Sabinian (28). Solemus mala domus noſtræ ſcire noviſſimi, ac liberorum ac conjugum him at firſt incredulous, ſo much had he truſted to the diſcretion of Abelard and of Heloiſa; but at laſt, by repeated aſſaults, his incredulity was over powered. The pretended tutor left the canon's houſe, from whence he likewiſe removed Heloiſa, when he found that ſhe was with child; and having diſguiſed her in the habit of a Nun (b), ſent her into Bretagne, to one of his ſiſters, where ſhe was brought to bed of a boy. She had conceived ſo ſtrong and unbounded a paſſion for him, that it ſtifled all ſentiments of honour in her ſoul vitia vicinis canentibus ignorare. The diſorders of our wives and children, are the theme of all the neighbourhood, when we as yet know nothing of theſe diſorders; but we come to know them at laſt, it being impoſſible a ſingle perſon ſhould be ignorant of what is known by all the world beſides. Sed quod noviſſimè ſcitur, utique ſtiri (29) quandoque contingit, & quod omnes deprehendunt non eſt facile unum latere. St Jerom, in another place, has confirmed this maxim, by two great examples; the firſt is that of Sylla, the ſecond of Pompey. The gallantries of Metella, the wife of Sylla, were the town-talk of Athens before her huſband heard any thing of her leudneſs. The railleries of the Athenians, againſt whom he then made war, gave him the firſt news of it. The adulteries of Mucia, Pompey's wife, were ſo public, that every one ſuppoſed he was acquainted with them. And yet he knew nothing of the matter, till told of it by a ſoldier who ſerved in his army. L. Syllæ (felicis ſi non habuiſſet uxorem) Metella conjux palam erat impudica, & (quia noviſſimi mala noſtra diſcimus) id Athenis cantabatur & Sylla ignorabat, ſecretaque domus ſuæ primum hoſtium convicio didicit. Cn. Pompeio Muciam uxorem impudicam quam Pontici Spadones & Mithridaticæ ambiebant catervæ, cum eum putarent cæteri ſcientem pati, indicavit in expeditione commilito, & victorem totius orbis triſti nuncio conſternavit (30). The emperor Claudius might be brought for a third example, who knew nothing of the infamy of Meſſalina (31), when all the world knew ſhe proſtituted herſelf in the ſtews, and had carried with her many ladies thither, and to crown her imprudence, had married another man. Our age has furniſhed us with one inſtance of this kind, in the mareſchal de la ——. It is affirmed (though I can ſcarce believe it) that he knew nothing of his wife's commerce with the count de ——, when the ſon whom that count had by her, had been already naturalized in full parliament. Even moderate fortunes are not exempt from this irregularity. How many people do we ſee who know all the news of the town, except what diſhonours their own family? They reſemble him whom Martial ridicules ſo pleaſantly (32), and are little better for the ancient proverb, Ædibus in noſtris quæ prava aut recta gerantur (33). Men of letters, I mean thoſe who dwell too much in their cloſets, and have their head always pregnant with ſome compoſition, ſometimes find themſelves in the condition we are talking of. As familiar as they are with the domeſtic misfortunes of Sylla and Pompey, who died many ages ago, they little think the ſame trick is plaid them not far from their own ſtudy. This is the way of the world.

A writer of the XVIth century, brings a famous example to prove the maxim he had laid down, that they who have the greateſt intereſt in knowing their family misfortunes, are the laſt that know them; whereas they are the firſt who learn the news of what ſhould but little concern them. Solet uſu venire, (ſays he) (34), ut domeſtica mala ultimi ſint qui norint, quorum maxime intereſt ea non ignorare, iidem principes norint aliena, & quorum nullus ad eos pertineat ſenſus. After having given ſome reaſons of this odd phenomenon, he ſays, that it was not long ſince a great king puniſhed with death the diſhonourers of his nuptial bed, and that the execution was ſo ſudden, that there did not intervene one hour betwixt their accuſation and their death; an argument, that that prince had not heard of that diſorder before, though the news of it had ſpread far and wide into foreign countries. Accidit hoc quidem, me puero, in magna atque illuſtri Europæ regia, quo minus diu obſcura res eſſe poſſet, ut in regina, læſi pudoris fama prius apud exteras gentes longe lateque evagata emanaret, quàm is, cujus in eo erat læſa majeſtas, maculam regio nomini impoſitam, eorum ſanguine quorum erat ſcelere violata, elueret. Satis quidem potuit indicio eſſe, poſtremum omnium reſciſſe, ita ſumptum de reis ſupplicium, ut inter id, & delatum ſontium nomen, ne horæ quidem momentum intercedere ſit paſſus (35).

[H] She brought a thouſand arguments to put him out of conceit with the conjugal tie.] Theſe arguments were reduced to two heads; the danger and the diſhonour to which marriage would expoſe Abelard. I know my uncle's temper, (ſaid ſhe to him) nothing will appeaſe his rage againſt you; and then what glory will it be to me to be your wife, ſince I ſhall ruin your reputation by it? What curſes have not I reaſon to fear, if I ſhall rob the world of ſo bright a luminary as you are? What injury ſhall I not do the church? What ſorrow ſhall I not give the philoſophers? What a ſhame and injury will it be to you, whom nature has formed for the public good, to give yourſelf up entirely to a woman? Conſider theſe words of St Paul, Art thou looſed from a wife, ſeek not a wife. And if the counſel of this great apoſtle, and the exhortations of the holy fathers, cannot diſſuade you from that heavy burden; conſider at leaſt what the philoſophers have ſaid of it. Hear Theophraſtus who has proved by ſo many reaſons, that a wiſe man ought not to marry. Hear what Cicero, when he had divorced his wife Terentia, anſwered to Hirtius, who propoſed a match to him with his ſiſter; that he could not accept that offer, becauſe he could not divide his thoughts betwixt philoſophy and a wife. Beſides, what conformity is there betwixt ſervant-maids and ſcholars, ink-horns and cradles, books and diſtaffs, pens and ſpindles? How will you be able to bear in the midſt of theological and philoſophical meditations, the cries of children, the ſongs of nurſes, and the diſturbance of houſe-keeping? I ſay nothing of the ſtink and nauſeouſneſs that attends little children (36). The rich can ſcreen themſelves from all theſe incoveniencies, by the ſeveral apartments in their houſes. The daily cares and expences cannot diſquiet them; but it is not ſo with philoſophers; and whoever would heap up wealth, and engage in worldly affairs, makes himſelf incapable of the functions of a divine, and of a philoſopher. Obſerve the conduct of the ancient ſages, both amongſt the Jews and Heathens; if Pagans and laymen have preferred celibacy to marriage, what a diſgrace would it be for a clergyman and a canon to prefer ſenſual pleaſures before divine offices? But if you are but in little concern for the prerogative of your prieſthood, maintain at leaſt the character and dignity of a philoſopher. The concluſion of her ſermon was, that there would be more honour for himſelf, and more delight for her in the quality of a galant, than of a huſband; that ſhe deſired to be united to him, not by the neceſſity of a conjugal bond, but by the ſole affection of her heart, and that their pleaſures would be infinitely more ſenſible, if they ſaw each other only from time to time. We ſhall ſpeak of this laſt reaſon in the remark [U]. In the mean time, obſerve Paſquier's opinion on Heloiſa's diſcourſe. I will not (ſays he) (37) repreſent to you all the reaſons whereby ſhe tried to gain him; but I can aſſure you I never read in any orator, ſo many elegant expreſſions and perſuaſive ſentences to gain a point, as ſhe made uſe of there. I muſt acquaint my reader, that I have extreamly abridged this lady's remonſtrance, and that I was ſurprized, not to find one reaſon borrowed from her lover's being in orders (38). Does not this ſeem to prove, that it was not as yet believed that the law of celibacy was obligatory to eccleſiaſtical perſons?

ſoul [I] ; it ſtruck it's roots ſo deep, and made ſuch a havock in her ſoul, that ſhe never was cured of it [K]. In vain poor Abelard loſt his virility [L], in vain ſhe took the veil. There remained ſtill a grain of that folly [M]. And it is not from the Portugueſe letters that we firſt learned that it only belongs to Nuns to ſpeak of love. The letters of Heloiſa had been long before a proof of this truth. Be it how it will, this amorous creature in vain employed all her wit and eloquence to diſſuade Abelard from the marriage. They were married in ſecret; but ſhe always denied with oaths that ſhe was his wife (c). This conduct made her uncle uſe her harſhly, who, to cover the diſhonour of his family, publiſhed the marriage in all places, though he had promiſed to Abelard not to mention it. The ill treatment to which Heloiſa was expoſed in the houſe of canon Fulbert, made her huſband reſolve to remove her from thence, and to put her into the nunnery of Argenteuil, where ſhe had been educated. This ſecond carrying of her away put her relations out of all manner of patience, and inſpired

(c) Avunculus ipſius atque domeſtici ejus ignominiæ ſuæ ſolatium quærentes, initum matrimonium divulgare & fidem mihi ſuper hoc datam violare cœperunt. Illa autem è contra anathematizare & jurare, qui falſiſſimum eſſet. Idem, Hiſt. Calamitatum, pag. 17.

[I] Her love ſtifled all ſentiments of honour in her ſoul.] It often happens that the paſſion of love ſtifles or ſurmounts the ſentiments of conſcience; but it is rarely obſerved to ſuppreſs the ſenſe of honour: and excepting a ſmall number of perſons of mean birth, who for the moſt part have not had even common education, all the young women who yield, put one or other of theſe four ſtrings to their bow. They either hope they ſhall not conceive, or by ſome medicine to procure abortion, or to lye-in privately, or to oblige their galant to marry them: and this ſhews that if love be ſometimes the ſtrongeſt tyrant in the world, it is a tyrant who leaves honour in poſſeſſion of it's rights. See the famous ſonnet on an abortion, where we have ſo fine a deſcription of the power of honour, and the power of love, by turns conquered and victorious. Our Heloiſa was ſo deſperately in love, that ſhe no longer regarded either her honour or reputation. For in the firſt place ſhe was overjoyed when ſhe found herſelf with child (39); and in the ſecond place ſhe did all that was poſſible to prevent her marriage with the father of it. Two things, which are not only rarer than the moſt frightful monſters, when they are joined together, but ſuch as the firſt only is never found but in ſuch caſes, where love has little to do, and where the deſign is only to make ſure of a good match, which they deſpair of obtaining without the noiſe of a great belly. How many young women are there that rather chooſe to have an huſband given them by a decree of court againſt his inclination, than to live with a ſtained reputation. They are well ſatisfied that he will take his revenge with uſury, and that this decree will coſt them dear; but that ſignifies nothing, provided the title of huſband repairs the breach made in their honour. Our Heloiſa had none of theſe niceties. See the following remark, and eſpecially the remark [U].

(30) Non multo autem poſt puella ſe concepiſſe comperit, & cum ſumma exultatione mihi ſuper hoc illico ſcripſit, conſulens quid de hoc ipſe faciendum deliberarem. Abelard. pag. 13.

[K] She never was cured of it.] Is this to be cured, to ſay many years after ſhe had renounced the world, and engaged in a monaſtic life, That ſhe had rather be the whore of Peter Abelard, than the lawful wife of the emperor of the whole world. Now this is what our Heloiſa, ſaid when ſhe was abbeſs of Paraclet, and what ſhe was pleaſed to call God to witneſs to. Deum teſtem invoco, ſi me Auguſtus univerſo præſidens mundo matrimonii honore dignaretur, totumque mihi orbem confirmaret in perpetuo præſidendum, charius mihi & dignius mihi videretur TUA DICI MERETRIX quam illius Imperatrix (40). How can it be ſaid that her paſſion had left her in the abbey of Paraclet, when ſhe wrote an ingenuous confeſſion there of the bad ſtate of her ſoul, which ſhews that the fire of love preyed on her to the very marrow. I dare not expreſs in French all that ſhe accuſes herſelf of: ſhe confeſſes that the pleaſures ſhe taſted in the embraces of Abelard had been ſo delicious to her, that ſhe thought of them night and day, ſleeping and waking, and even during the celebration of the maſs. She continually regretted the loſs of them, and for want of a better way repeated them in imagination. They who underſtand Latin may ſee with what force of eloquence ſhe could repreſent her thoughts. In tantum verò illæ, quas pariter exercuimus amantium voluptates, dulces mihi fuerunt, ut nec diſplicere mihi, nec vix à memoria labi poſſint. Quocunque loco me vertam ſemper ſe oculis meis cum ſuis ingerunt deſideriis. Nec etiam dormienti ſuis illuſionibus parcunt. Inter ipſa miſſarum ſolemnia ubi purior eſſe debet oratio, obſcœna earum voluptatum fantaſmata ita ſibi penitus miſerrimam captivant animam, ut turpitudinibus illis magis quàm orationi vacem. Quæ cum ingemiſcere debeam de commiſſis, ſuſpiro potius de amiſſis. Nec ſolum quæ egimus, ſed loca pariter & tempora in quibus hæc egimus ita tecum noſtro infixa ſunt animo, ut in ipſis omnia tecum agam, nec dormiens etiam ab his quieſcam. Nonnunquam & ipſo motu corporis animi mei cogitationes deprehenduntur, nec à verbis temperant improviſis (41). This obliged her to cry out with St Paul (42). O wretched man that I am, who ſhall deliver me from the body of this death? Would to God, continues ſhe, I could truly add, the Grace of GOD, through JESUS CHRIST our Lord. That grace, ſays ſhe, to her Abelard, has prevented you, my dear, in delivering you from all the incentives of ſenſuality, by that one ſtroke of a knife which made you an eunuch . . . . But my youth and experience of paſt pleaſures kindle theſe fires in my ſoul; and the weaker my nature is, the more I am overpowered by thoſe violent attacks. Hæc te gratia, chariſſime, prævenit, & ab his tibi ſtimulis una corporis plaga medendo multas in anima ſanavit . . . . . hos autem in me ſtimulos carnis, hæc incentiva libidinis ipſe juvenilis fervor ætatis & jucundiſſimarum experientia voluptatum plurimum accendunt, & tanto amplius ſua me impugnatione opprimunt, quanto infirmior eſt natura quam oppugnant. (43). Laſtly, ſhe recommends herſelf to his prayers with ſo much the more ſollicitude, and that was the only remedy which her incontinence could find in him. Time, obſecro, ſemper de me potius quam confidas, ut tua ſemper ſollicitudine adjuver. Nunc vero præcipuè timendum eſt (44), ubi nullum incontinentiæ meæ ſupereſt in te remedium. Thoſe who cenſured Abelard's frequent viſits to the Paraclet (45), were doubtleſs guilty of a raſh judgment, ſince they knew not the internal diſpoſitions of Heloiſa: but had they known them, they had been obliged to have gotten theſe viſits forbid; having reaſon to fear that it was impoſſible, humanly ſpeaking, that this woman ſhould not commit acts of impurity with that man. The holy fathers never truſted to mutilations. They compared an eunuch to an ox that has loſt his horns, and yet does not leave off giving blows with his head. See a fine paſſage of St Baſil on this ſubject, in our remarks upon the article COMBABUS (46). But as appearances are ſometimes fallacious, I ſhould not approve of thoſe, who, knowing what Heloiſa had in her heart, ſhould imagine ſhe tranſgreſſed the rules when ſhe met again with her huſband, and that ſhe had ſometimes occaſion to write to him, Si libidinoſa eſſem, quererer decepta, nunc etiam languori tuo gratias ago: in umbra voluptatis diutius laſi (47).

inſpired them with an exquiſite piece of revenge, which they executed by corrupting Peter Abelard's ſervant. That villain introduced, by night, into his maſter's chamber, the perſons who were to commit the fact. They ſurprized him in his ſleep, and cut off thoſe parts which are not to be named (d). That action made a great noiſe [N]; people went the next morning, as in a proceſſion, to Abelard's chamber. His ſcholars made ſtill greater lamentations than the reſt. The women diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their doleful complaints [O]. Some very curious letters of conſolation were wrote to him [P]. That action was ſeverely puniſhed by the magiſtrates [Q]. But all that did not hinder Abelard, overwhelmed with ſhame and grief, from ſequeſtring himſelf from the world, in the monaſtery of St Denys; after having taken care that Heloiſa ſhould become a nun at Argenteuil. We have ſaid, in another place, what happened to him after he became a monk, and how he was condemned to burn, with his own hands, a book he had written, &c. The loſs of that work afflicted him ſtill more than the loſs of his virility had done [R]: And yet the loſs of a book may be made up by another, which cannot be ſaid in the other caſe [S]. As for Heloiſa, ſhe was made prioreſs of the nuns at Argenteuil; but, as they behaved very ill in that monaſtery [T], the abbot of St Denys, who claimed a juriſdiction over it, expelled the nuns; and then Heloiſa ſtood in great need of her huſband. He had built an oratory near Troies, to which he had given the name of Paraclet (e), and afterwards he had accepted an abbey in Bretagne. Underſtanding that his Heloiſa was quite deſtitute, after her expulſion from Argenteuil, he gave her that oratory, with all it's dependencies, which

Qui n'êtes homme qu'abſtractif,
Grace à vôtre copulatif,
Qu'a rendu fort imperfectif
Le cruel tranchant d'un canif.

But as there is no rule ſo general but has an exception to it, the love of Heloiſa was proof againſt this violent remedy. She had that in common with queen Stratonice whom I have mentioned before (49).

[M] There remained ſtill a grain of that folly in her.] This appears by the paſſages I have cited in the remark [K]. They not only prove that the love of concupiſcence prevailed in Heloiſa, but alſo that ſhe was ſomewhat beſides her ſelf: for a perſon in her perfect ſenſes, would never have talked at that rate. It is probable that ſtudy began firſt to diſorder her, and that love made a great addition to the breach. There appear in her writings many marks of a diſordered imagination; ſomething ſo extravagant, and ſo many inconſiſtencies, that ſhe is a proof of Seneca's maxim, Nullum magnum ingenium ſine mixtura dementiæ (50). — Great wits to madneſs nearly are allied.

[N] That action made a great noiſe.] See what Abelard ſays of it (51); Mane autem facto tota ad me civitas congregata quanta ſtuperet admiratione, quanta ſe affligeret lamentatione, quanto me clamore vexarent, quanto planctu perturbarent, difficile imo impoſſibile eſt exprimi. Maximè verò Clerici, ac præcipuè Scholares noſtri, intolerabilius me lamentis & ejulatibus cruciabant. See the article to which I refer in the following remark.

[O] The women diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their doleful complaints.] Abelard does not ſpeak of this: but we learn it from one of his friends who wrote a letter of conſolation to him. See the article FOULQUES (52).

[P] Some very curious letters of conſolation were wrote to him.] Foulques, prior of Deuil, wrote him one which has been inſerted in the edition of Abelard's works. We ſpeak of it in the article of that prior, and we refer thither many things belonging to Heloiſa and her husband, which would make their articles too long, if they were not ſeparated, in order to be placed elſewhere. They who ſay they had rather find it altogether in the ſame place, have not well conſidered of the matter.

[Q] That action was ſeverely puniſhed.] See the article FOULQUES (53) to which I refer for the two foregoing remarks.

[R] The loſs of that work afflicted him yet more than the loſs of his virility.] Authors have been ſufficiently bantered upon their exceſſive fondneſs for their own works; and, amongſt other inſtances, biſhop Heliodorus, has been quoted, who choſe rather to renounce his biſhopric than to condemn his romance of Theagenes (54). What Sarraſin makes Voiture ſay has alſo been alledged (55). But I do not know that Abelard has been cited upon this occaſion: though there is ſomething more ſtrong in his example; for Job was reſtored to his proſperous ſtate; he begat ſons and daughters, and it is certain that Voiture would rather have been a Job for ſome time, than an Abelard to his grave; and that he would gladly have thrown away all his books and all his muſes, if there had been a neceſſity for it, to preſerve the fund of his love-intrigues. Where are the prelates who would refuſe to ſign the reſignation of their biſhoprics, ſhould they be threatned with raſor in hand with . . . . in caſe of their refuſal. Doubtleſs Heliodorus would have conſented to the condemnation of his romance, if they had reduced him to this ſad alternative. But now here is a man who declares he reckons the loſs of his natural parts, as an inconſiderable thing, in compariſon of the loſs of a work which he was obliged to caſt into the fire. But to judge impartially in this caſe, we muſt not attribute Abelard's whole grief, to the paternal affection which his character of an author inſpired him with for his book. There was another thing here that afflicted him more than this; which was, that by obliging him to burn his own book, they branded him with the mark of hereſy, a puniſhment which anſwers to that of the hot iron. His murmurs againſt the providence of GOD are another teſtimony of his concern. See his words, which I ought to produce, that I may not be ſuſpected of aggravating things, to divert my reader. 'Deus, qui judicas æquitatem quanto 'tunc animi felle, quanta mentis amaritudine teipſum infamis arguebam, te furibundus accuſabam, 'ſæpius repetens illam beati Antonii (56) conqueſtionem, Jeſu bone, ubi eras? Quanto autem dolore 'æſtuarem, quanta erubeſcentia confunderer, quanta 'deſperatione perturbarer ſentire tunc potui, proferre 'non poſſum. Conferebam cum his quæ in corpore 'paſſus olim fueram, quanta nunc ſuſtinerem, & omnium me æſtimabam miſerrimum. Parvam illam 'ducebam proditionem in Comparatione hujus injuriæ, '& longè amplius famæ quam corporis detrimentum 'plangebam (57). —— O righteous GOD! with what 'rage and bitterneſs of ſoul did I, wretch that I am, 'complain and deſperately accuſe thee, often repeating 'that complaint of St Anthony. Good JESUS, where 'was thou? The ſorrow with which I then was toſt, 'the ſhame which confounded me, and my horrible deſpair, I then could feel, but cannot now deſcribe: I 'compared with this, what I before had ſuffered in 'my body, and what I now endured, and concluded, 'that I was the moſt miſerable of men. I judged the 'former treachery but ſmall compared to this, and lamented more this injury done to my fame, than that 'done to my body.' which donation was confirmed by Pope Innocent II. Thus ſhe was the firſt abbeſs of Paraclet. She obtained ſuch favour with all ranks of men, that ſhe was quickly loaded with riches. The biſhops loved her as their daughter, the abbots as their ſiſter, and the laity as their mother (f). However, ſhe was very ill ſatisfied with the providence of God (g), and murmured much more than Job. She kept up a correſpondence by letters with Abelard [U], and deſired him to give her rules for her nuns, and the ſolution of ſeveral difficulties. He complied with her deſire in both. I do not find, that the hope ſhe had of ſeeing him dignified with the mitre was the reaſon of her reluctance to marry him [X]. When he died, being a monk of Clugni, ſhe requeſted his corps of the abbot, and having obtained it, ſhe interred it in the Paraclet, and deſired that ſhe might be buried in the ſame tomb (h). 1127. 'Nuntios noſtros & chartas antiquas fundationis & donationis, & confirmationum privilegia bonæ memoriæ Papæ Honorio Romam delegavimus, poſtulantes ut juſtitiam noſtram canonico inveſtigaret & reſtitueret ſcrutinio. Qui, ut erat vir conſilii & juſtitiæ tutor, tam pro noſtra juſtitia, quàm pro enormitate Monacharum ibidem malè viventium, eundem nobis locum cum appendiciis ſuis, ut reformaretur ibi religionis ordo, reſtituit. —— I ſent meſſengers to Rome with the ancient charters of erection, donation, and confirmation of privileges, to be laid before Pope Honorius of bleſſed memory, and begged that he would be pleaſed to enquire into the juſtice of my pretenſions, and reſtore me to my rights. Accordingly he being a wiſe and juſt man reſtored that place to me with all it's privileges, not only upon account of my juſt claim, but becauſe of the irregular lives of the nuns who then poſſeſſed it, that a religious order might be again eſtabliſhed there.' He ſays the ſame thing in the life of Lewis the Burley (58). They who are inclined to judge ill of their neighbour, will not read this paſſage without violent ſuſpicions of Heloiſa's conduct. She confeſſes her ſelf ſubject to the raging heats of luſt (59): and it is often ſeen, that the abbeſs of a convent carries herſelf ill, when leudneſs is prevalent in the ſociety (60). From theſe two principles, they who are fond of ſcandal, may eaſily draw this conſequence, that the prioreſs of Argenteuil, was no better than her nuns. But for my part having never read that ſhe was by name comprehended in the ſcandal her monaſtery gave, I ſhall be cautious of fixing the leaſt blemiſh on her. We ſhould imitate our lord, and make uſe of his maxim (61), Has any body condemned, or accuſed, thee? Neither do I condemn, or accuſe, thee. And it is very true that inferiours imitate the bad and not the good life of their ſuperiours. The court of France under Lewis XIII, was not chaſter than under Henry IV.

[S] Which cannot be ſaid in the other caſe.] See again the article FOULQUES, remark [F].

[T] They behaved ill in that monaſtery.] Sugger, abbot of St Denys, took advantage of the diſorderly life of the nuns of Argenteuil, to re-inſtate himſelf in the poſſeſſion of that monaſtery. He ſent his titles to Rome, and received a favourable anſwer. See what he ſays of it in the hiſtory of his life under the year 1127.

[U] She kept up a correſpondence by letters with Abelard.] That correſpondence began but late, and it was a fortuitous adventure that occaſioned it. Abelard had written to a friend a long relation of his misfortunes, which fell into the hands of Heloiſa, then abbeſs of Paraclet. Having read it, ſhe immediately wrote to Abelard the reflexions ſhe had made upon it, and paſſionately deſired him to write to her, that ſhe might be no longer deprived of the conſolation his letters might afford her in his abſence. She repreſented to him the diſintereſtedneſs of her affection, and how ſhe had neither ſought the honour of marriage, nor the advantages of a dowry, nor her own pleaſure, but the ſole ſatisfaction of Abelard. She tells him that though the name of wife has ſomething in it more great and ſacred, ſhe had always found that of his miſtreſs, concubine, or whore, more agreeable. Etſi uxoris nomen ſanctius ac validius videtur, dulcius mihi ſemper extitit amicæ vocabulum, aut, ſi non indigneris, concubinæ vel ſcorti (62). She adds, that he had related a part only of the reaſons ſhe had repreſented to diſſuade him from marriage; but that he had almoſt ſuppreſſed all thoſe which were drawn from the preference ſhe gave to love, before the conjugal tye, and to liberty before neceſſity (63). I know not how this lady meant; but there is here one of the moſt myſterious refinements of love. It has been for ſeveral ages believed that marriage deſtroys the principal poignancy of this ſort of ſalt, and that when one does a thing by engagement, duty, and neceſſity, as a task and drudgery, he no longer finds the natural charms in it: ſo that, according to theſe nice judges, a man takes a wife ad honores, and not ad delicias. 'Marriage has on it's ſide profit, juſtice, honour, and conſtancy; a flat but more univerſal pleaſure. Love is founded only upon pleaſure, which then is more touching, ſprightly, and poignant: a pleaſure excited by difficulty, there muſt be a reliſh and ſmartneſs in it. It is no longer love, if it be deſtitute of darts and flames. The bounty of the ladies is too profuſe in marriage, it blunts the edge of affection and deſire (64).' Patere me, ſaid a Roman emperor (65) to his wife, per alias exercere cupiditates meas, nam uxor nomen eſt dignitatis, non voluptatis (66). — Suffer me, to ſatisfy my deſires with others, for ſpouſe is a name of dignity, not of pleaſure. One might therefore give an unlucky interpretation to Heloiſa's deſign of never being the wife, but ſtill the dear miſtreſs of Peter Abelard. One might ſuſpect ſhe was afraid leſt marriage ſhould prove the grave of love, and hinder her from taſting ſo deliciouſly, as before, the careſſes of her friend. The author, who has paraphraſed ſome pieces of our Heloiſa's letters (67), at bottom aſcribes this view and taſte to her, though his words are nicely couched. He makes her ſay (68), That ſhe found nothing but what was dull and inſipid in thoſe public engagements which tye thoſe knots, that only death can looſe, and which make a ſad neceſſity of life and love; that (69) it is not to love, to court wealth and honours, in the taſteleſs embraces of an inſenſible husband; that ſhe never would believe one could this way taſte the ſenſible pleaſures of an agreeable union, or feel the ſecret and charming commotions of two hearts, which have a long time ſought one another in order to be united; and that ſhe is fully (70) ſatisfied, that if there be any ſuch thing as happineſs in this world, it is only to be found in the union of two perſons, who love with liberty, whom a ſecret inclination has joined, and a reciprocal merit has rendered ſatisfied. We ſhall ſee preſently that another cauſe has been ſuppoſed of Heloiſa's deſign not to marry Abelard.

[X] I do not find, that the hope of ſeeing him dignified with the mitre, was the reaſon of her reluctance to marry him.] The Sieur d'Amboiſe (71) makes mention of an ancient French poet, who after having exhorted men not to ſubmit their necks to the yoak of marriage, confirms his opinion by that of our Heloiſa, who, ſays he, moſt importunatly begged and intreated of her lover, that he would not marry her. She was much better ſatisfied to be loved by a man, whom ſhe ſhould one day ſee elevated to a good biſhopric. Satis eſſe dictitans ſi illa intimo pectoris amorem mutuum ſervans, illum videret mitra & infulis Pontificalibus quibus dignus erat ornatum. — Saying, it was enough, for her while ſhe cheriſhed their mutual love in her breaſt, to ſee him adorned with the mitre and pontifical robes which he ſo well deſerved. The Sieur d'Amboiſe obſerves, I, that this poet gives another turn to it, viz. that Heloiſa intimated, that the embraces of married people are not attended with ſo delicious a pleaſure, as thoſe that are illegitimate (72). II. That we ought not to believe that Heloiſa preferred a licentious concubinage, before the condition of a wife; but that her love and reſpect for her galant, enclined her rather to turn recluſe, than by her marriage to hinder Abelard from receiving the rewards that were due to his wit and learning, as ſuppoſe a cardinal's cap (73). I have found no footſtep of this in Heloiſa's letters, and for that reaſon, I have made it the ſixth fault of Mr Moreri, in the article of ABELARD. That which gives birth to theſe ſorts of falſhoods, is the liberty an author takes to lend people thoſe thoughts, which he thinks agreeable to their intereſts. There is ſometimes more advantage for a woman there, viz. that Abelard ſtretched out his arms, to receive her, and cloſely embraced her [Y]; and yet he had been above twenty years dead: but that's no great matter; they pretend that they have inſtances of things of this kind [Z]. She died the ſeventeenth of May 1163. The letters ſhe wrote to her huſband, are to be met with in the edition of Abelard's works. But what Mr Moreri advances, is not true, viz. that Andrew du Cheſne has made remarks on theſe letters, and on Abelard's anſwers. He has only commented on the letter wherein Abelard gives the hiſtory of his misfortunes to a friend. John de Meun tranſlated into French the letters which Heloiſa and Abelard wrote to one another (i). A little book (k) was lately publiſhed, intituled, The Hiſtory of Heloiſa and Abelard, with the paſſionate Letter ſhe wrote to him, tranſlated from the Latin. This pretended tranſlation, is nothing elſe but a collection of ſome paſſages taken at pleaſure from this woman's letters, to which the author has given what form he thought fit, by ſuppreſſing what he did not like, and adding what he thought more to his purpoſe.

The Count de Buſſi Rabutin tranſlated into French ſome letters of Abelard and Heloiſa. This tranſlation was publiſhed after his death, in the ſecond volume of his letters. I never ſaw, (ſays he) (l) finer Latin, eſpecially than that of Heloiſa, nor more love and wit than ſhe was miſtreſs of. If he had been as good a judge of the Latin ſtyle as he was of the French, he would not have given this elogy to the latinity of Heloiſa.

woman to ſuffer a young galant to riſe to the dignities of the church, than to ſtop his way to them by marrying him. But muſt we therefore ſuppoſe that Heloiſa had ſuch views? Here is a well known ſtory. A man who had a prebend, quitted it to marry: the day after the wedding, he ſaid to his wife, See, my dear, how I love you, I have even quitted my prebend for your ſake. You are a fool, ſays ſhe, for your pains: you ought to have kept your prebend; and you might have had me notwithſtanding (74).

[Y] They tell us that Abelard ſtretched out his arms and cloſely embraced her.] A manuſcript chronicle of Tours (75) relates this pretty miracle. 'Hæc, '(Heloiſa) ſicut dicitur, in ægritudine ultima poſita 'præcepit ut mortua intra mariti tumulum poneretur, '& ſic eadem defuncta ad tumulum apertum deportata, maritus ejus qui multis diebus ante eam defunctus fuerat, elevatis brachiis illam recepit, & ita 'eam amplexatus brachia ſua ſtrinxit. —— Heloiſa, as 'we are told, when a dying, ordered that ſhe ſhould 'be buried in her huſband's grave, and accordingly after her death, being put in the grave, her huſband, 'who, had died long before her, received her with 'opened arms, and folding his arms together embraced 'her.' But how comes it then that they are not in the ſame tomb? Francis d'Amboiſe, who tells us, that he has ſeen at the Paraclet, the tombs of the founder and foundreſs by one another, contigua fundatoris fundatricis ſepulchra, ſhould have ſolved this ſmall difficulty.

[Z] That they have inſtances of things of this kind.] See what Gregorius Turonenſis relates (76) concerning two married perſons, who always remained virgins, and whom the inhabitants of the country (77) called the two lovers. The wife died firſt: the huſband, in burying her, made uſe of this thankſgiving: I thank thee, my Lord and my God, that I have returned thee this treaſure in the ſame purity that thou was pleaſed to commit it to me. The woman with a ſmile ſaid to him: Why do you talk of a thing which no body asks you about. The huſband died a little after, and was buried over againſt his ſpouſe; but on the morrow their corps were found both in the ſame grave. That blunt interrogatory might give occaſion to ſome of the profane to think, that the virgin wife was not willing the ſhould know her huſband had been ſo cold. She confined herſelf to the merit of her continence, without being willing to be expoſed to the opinions, that might be formed to the prejudice of her charms. It is not thus that depoſitum ought to be preſerved; it is not reſtoring it well, to render it juſt as we received it. It is not for this that God inſtituted marriage; non hos quæſitum munus in uſus. One may therefore be ſorry, that the public ſhould think one has not ſufficiently pleaſed the depoſitary. But the hiſtorian will remedy this inconvenience, if you conſult the thirty ſecond chapter, concerning the glory of confeſſors, where the diſcourſe of the deceaſed wife is a little better turned. Ten chapters after, he relates, that a ſenator of Dijon, called Hilary (78), having been buried a whole year, lift up his hand to put it round his wife's neck, when ſhe was laid in the ſame tomb.

HELVICUS (Christopher) profeſſor of Divinity, of Greek, and of the Oriental languages in the univerſity of Gieſſen, was born the 26th of December, 1581, at Sprendlingen (a), where his father was miniſter [A]. He was not one of thoſe tardy wits, which do not ſhew themſelves till the latter ſeaſon. He was able, before the age of twenty, to teach Greek and Hebrew, and even philoſophy; and he had compoſed many Greek verſes at the age of fifteen or ſixteen. He ſtudied at Marpurg, and was made maſter of arts there in 1599. He might have obtained it ſooner if he would; for he was admitted bachelor at fourteen (b). He made himſelf ſuch a maſter of the Hebrew, that he could ſpeak it as his mother-tongue. He made himſelf thoroughly acquainted with a vaſt number of Greek authors. He ſtudied alſo phyſic for ſome time, though he had dedicated himſelf to the miniſtry. In fine, he gave ſo many teſtimonies of his capacity, that he was choſen, in the year 1605, teacher of Greek and Hebrew in the college the Landgrave had then erected at Gieſſen (c). The

[A] His father was miniſter.] He was called Chriſtopher as his ſon; he had been in his younger days, two years together, director of the college of Geraw. After which be ſtudied divinity at Tubingen, and was made miniſter of the church of Griſheim; but prince George, landgrave of Heſſe, preferred him a little after to Sprendlingen; Helvicus ſerved this church till his death, and went through many troubles. Multa propter ſinceram confeſſionem perpeſſus, tandem ibidem vitam hanc terreſtrem cum cœleſti commutavit. He was ſon to QUIRINUS HELVICUS, who ſignalized himſelf in the defence of Darmſtadt, during the war of Smalcalde. One may ſee in Sleidan, and Thuanus, the opinion which the count de Buren had of him. Seeing no proſpect of relief, he went upon the ramparts to capitulate, but he received a ſhot which pierced his right-arm, after which the place was taken by ſtorm. They deſigned to hang him, and perhaps they would have done it, if the ranſome that was promiſed for him had not hindered them. He had attended the landgrave Philip in almoſt all his expeditions (1).

[B] He

The year following, the emperor honoured that college with the title of an univerſity, and the privileges belonging thereto. Helvicus having for five years acquitted himſelf in the duties of his profeſſion with great reputation, was advanced to be profeſſor of divinity in the year 1610. He married the ſame year. I know not whether he deferred his marriage till he ſaw himſelf rais'd to a preferment that might help him to a better match, or whether he had other reaſons that engaged him to continue in a ſingle life till that time; for the author whom I ſhall cite, ſays nothing of it; but he obſerves, that marriage did not make Helvicus leſs diligent in the diſcharge of the duties of his function (d). He was offered a church in Moravia, in the year 1611, and a profeſſorſhip at Hamburgh, with a conſiderable ſalary. However, he refuſed both theſe invitations. He took the degree of doctor in divinity, in the year 1613: the Landgrave deſired it; as alſo, that he ſhould go and ſee the libraries of the Jews at Francfort, who had been driven lately from thence, by popular commotions. Helvicus, who was much addicted to the reading of the Rabbies, purchaſed many of their books there. He died in the flower of his age, Sept. 10, 1617, having many deſigns of books in his head [B]; and had the reputation of a man who had the greateſt dexterity, and beſt method of teaching languages (e) [C]. He was not only a good Grammarian, but a good Chronologer. His chronological tables have been much eſteemed [D], though they are not entirely

[B] He died having many deſigns of books in his head.] He had publiſhed ſeveral grammars, a Latin, a Greek, a Hebrew, a Chaldee, and a Syriac. (2). But they were only abridgments. His Hebrew and Latin Lexicons, were only a ſort of eſſay for the uſe of youth. He had a great deſire to perfect all theſe Grammars, and to make Lexicons for the uſe of the learned, and he begged of God that he might live ſo long as to finiſh theſe undertakings. He moreover prayed for life ſufficient to reduce the eccleſiaſtical hiſtories into order, and to animadvert on Piſcator's tranſlation of the Old and New Teſtament, and on that author's commentaries on the Scripture. He thought alſo, it was requiſite to publiſh a new edition of Luther's bible, with a good apology, and neceſſary explications. The edition of that bible, which Paul Toſſanus had procured not long before, with marginal notes, containing the opinions of Calvin, put Helvicus upon that project, and gave him a vehement deſire to execute it (3). 'Cum ante biennium Paulus Toſſanus Heidelbergenſis Doctor, verſionem Biblicam B. Lutheri Germanicam in lucem edidiſſet, non ſolum variis notationibus marginalibus (quæ quales hinc inde ſint viri cordati judicabunt) conſperſam, ſed etiam erroribus Calvinianorum contra ipſius Lutheri mentem & voluntatem proterva temeritate & impudentia contaminatam, judicabat operæ pretium eſſe, ſi opus illud Biblicum Lutheri cum ſolida ubi opus eſſet apologia, neceſſariis explicationibus, & macularum quas Pontificii & Calviniani illi aſperſerunt abſterſione in lucem prodiret. Ubi animadverti in ipſo ſinglare hoc ipſum præſtandi deſiderium, ſi Domino ita viſum eſſet (4). —— Paul Toſſanus, a doctor at Heidelberg, having two years before publiſhed Luther's German tranſlation of the Bible, not only with many marginal notes (with what ſucceſs let the learned judge), but likewiſe corrupted it moſt impudently, and contrary to the doctrine and intention of Luther, with many Calviniſtical errors, Helvicus thought it would be a ſervice to the public, to publiſh that work of Luther's, with a ſolid apology where there is occaſion for it, with neceſſary explications, and purged from all theſe foul interpolations, by which the Papiſts and Calviniſts had polluted it. I obſerved, that he vehemently deſired to have executed this deſign if it had pleaſed GOD.'

[C] . . . . who had the greateſt dexterity, and beſt method of teaching a language.] He ſought a road eaſier than the common way uſed in the ſchools to lead youth to learning. He was not at all diſcouraged, by the obſtacles that were raiſed againſt his new method. Being perſuaded, that it would ſave a great deal of time and pains to the ſcholars; and, prompted by the affection which all have for their own inventions, he earneſtly endeavoured to introduce his method into the ſchools. He put the buſineſs in a good way; they endeavoured to ridicule him, they wrangled with him, and calumniated him, which obliged him to defend himſelf, and repel thoſe rude aſſaults (5). I believe, that his death happening before his inventions took effect, gave opportunity to the partiſans of the old method, to maintain themſelves, or to recover their ground. However, it was inſcribed in his epitaph, that he had invented a new art of teaching, novæ Didacticæ author & informator feliciſſimus. The thing deſerved it, titulo res digna ſepulchri, and merited to be copied more exactly than has been done by the Sieur Freher, who, inſtead of Didacticæ, has put it Dialecticæ. One would think, that Helvicus had ſome idea of a project, which, they ſay, a very learned man is employed about, which is to reduce languages to common principles, which may ſerve to learn them very eaſily all together; one might believe this, I ſay, if we depended on this title of one of his books: Libri didactici Grammaticæ univerſalis Latinæ, Græcæ, Hebraicæ, Chaldaicæ (6): but it is plain by his funeral oration, that there is a comma wanting after univerſalis. See, above, quotation (2).

[D] His chronogical tables have been much eſteemed.] I ſpeak of the work which is intituled, Theatrum Hiſtoricum, ſive Chronologiæ Syſtema novum. He publiſhed it in the year 1609. Seth Calviſius, who was a great maſter of hiſtory and chronology, much approved of that work, and found it a new and very uſeful invention, ſince things are there ſeen altogether, and at one view: Utpote in quibus exemplo antehac non viſo omnia uno intuitu lectorum oculis ſubjiciantur. Wynckelman obſerves, that this approbation is found in the letter that Seth Calviſius wrote to Helvicus, September the ſeventh 1609. He adds, the work is at preſent reprinting, corrected, and enlarged by the author. Jam ſecundum emendatius & ex ipſius αὐτογράφῳ auctius editur. We muſt ſay then, that the firſt edition of this work was in the year 1609, and the ſecond in the year 1618, John Steuber, profeſſor at Gieſſen, had the care of the latter, and dedicated it to a Daniſh lord (7), a patron of learned men, and who had honoured Helvicus with his friendſhip. Twenty years after a new edition of this book was publiſhed by the care of John Balthaſar Schuppius, ſon-in-law to the author, and profeſſor of Eloquence at Marpurg. He advertiſes in his preface, that he will ſay nothing of the Engliſh edition. Since that time this Chronological Theatre has been often reprinted. Voſſius hath not been exact in the account he gives of the date of the firſt edition, and hath given that for the ſecond edition, which was not ſo. 'Anno CIƆIƆCXII ſaith he (8), Chriſtophorus Helvicus edidit ſyſtema Chronologicum, æqualibus denariorum quinquagenariorum, & centenariorum, intervallis. Id poſtea continuavit & recenſuit Joannes Balthaſar Scoppius . . . . . It was afterwards continued and reviſed by John Balthaſar Scoppius.* . . . . . He publiſhed it in 1638.' It cannot be objected to me, in favour of Voſſius, that it is very true, that Helvicus publiſhed a book of chronology in the year 1612, which was augmented by Schuppius, in 1638, for that is not the book which Voſſius ſpeaks of; the title of it is Chronologia Univerſalis ab origine mundi per quatuor ſumma imperia, quas Monarchias appellant, ad annum uſque MDCXII, deducta, cum præcipuis ſynchroniſmis virorum illuſtrium eventorum & politiarum cæterarum (9). entirely free from errors [E]. We may conjecture by the books we have of his [F], that if he had attained the age of ſixty, his works would have made many volumes in folio. As for the reſt, he was a man of an unblameable life; he ſtudied to have peace with all mankind, and never had any difference, either with his colleagues, or with other people (f): Rara avis in terris. He was much eſteemed by ſeveral princes of Germany, and received Letters from them, full of civilities. Anne Dorothy, ducheſs of Saxony, did him the honour to write frequently to him. He was lamented in an extraordinary manner; all the poets of Germany, of the Ausburg confeſſion, made funeral elegies, lamenting his untimely death. A collection of theſe poems has been printed, with the funeral oration, and ſome other pieces, under the title of Cippus memorialis, by the care of Wynckelman, colleague of the deceaſed. The ſon of this Wynckelman had the Cippus reprinted in the year 1650.

This character doth not agree with the Theatrum Hiſtoricum. On the other hand, the title and character by which Voſſius repreſents the book he ſpeaks of, agree perfectly with the with the Theatrum Hiſtoricum, ſive Chronologiæ ſyſtema novum, where we ſee only diviſions of tens, fifties, and hundreds, which do not exceed one another. In fine, John Juſtus Wynckelman, the ſon of him who pronounced the funeral oration, remarks very expreſsly (10), that Schuppius publiſhed two works of his father-in-law Helvicus, with Continuations until the year 1639; one is, Theatrum Hiſtoricum, in folio; the other Chronologia Univerſalis, in quarto. I forbear obſerving, that Helvicus did not at all publiſh his chronology himſelf, which he had continued to the year 1612. It was publiſhed by his colleague, Steuber, in the year 1618.

[F] By the books we have of him.] I have already taken notice of ſome of them, and here follow more. He publiſhed chronogical diſſertations on the four monarchies, on the ſeventy weeks of Daniel, on Cyrus, and the other kings of Perſia, &c. He ſo ſolidly confuted the opinions of Angelocrator, that nothing could be replied (12). And yet Angelocrater pretended to inſpiration, declaring in the front of his book, that he had compoſed it, Deo illuminante (13). This much diminiſhes the glory of thoſe who confuted him, it being an eaſy thing to find a thouſand chimæra's in the writings of thoſe pretended inſpired men. Though they ſhould not be actually Fanatics, and had only in view, the raiſing of the paſſions, they would, by their boaſt of ſuch a thing againſt their conſcience, betray ſuch a diſordered mind, as muſt needs expoſe them to the laſhes of the meaneſt critic. Helvicus wrote ſome treatiſes, de Dialectis Græcis, de ratione carmina Græca conſcribendi, de Paraphraſi Bibliorum Chaldaica, a Latin art of poetry, deſiderium Evæ, cum aliorum dictorum Biblicorum à depravationibus Judæorum, Calvinianorum & Photinianorum erroribus annexa vindicatione: Synopſis hiſtoriæ univerſalis. He had put to the preſs the Hebrew art of poetry, and had already written the epiſtle dedicatory to it; but he ſuppreſſed it for ſome reaſons (14). See the Sieur Witte, in his Diarium Biographicum; but eſpecially ſee the Theatre of Paul Freherus (15), and the Templum Honoris of Spizelius. You will there find a long, and, I think, a pretty exact catalogue of Helvicus's works. Moſt of them are in Latin, the reſt in High-Dutch. Correct Freherus in the epitaph XXXVI (16), and IX and make it XXXV, and IIX. It is ſtrange, that they who have corrected this great book, ſhould not ſee, that a man who was was born the twenty ſixth of December, 1581 (17), and died the tenth of September, 1617 (18), did not live thirty ſix years, nine months and a half. There are XXXV years and IIX months in the epitaph recited by Wynckelman (19), he has likewiſe been guilty of a miſtake by ſaying, in the funeral oration, that Helvicus died in the thirty ſeventh year of his age, anno ætatis ſuæ trigeſimo ſeptimo. He writ this all at length, and not in figures. He writes in the ſame manner the day of his birth, and the day of his death; the firſt is, according to him, the twenty ſixth of December 1581, and the other is the tenth of September 1617. How then doth he make out the thirty ſeven years? the eaſier it is to avoid theſe faults, the more a man is obliged to avoid them.

HEMELAR (JOHN)

HEMELAR (JOHN) a canon of Antwerp, born at the Hague (a), was a very learned man. He applied himſelf much more to the ſtudy of polite learning, and the ſcience of medals [A], than to theological diſputes. He was both a poet and an orator. At Rome he made a panegyric upon Clement VIII, with ſo great ſucceſs, that the choice was given him of being either keeper of the Vatican library, or of of having a very good benefice (b). He contented himſelf to be a canon of the cathedral of Antwerp (c). He had a great ſhare in the eſteem and friendſhip of Juſtus Lipſius, his profeſſor; which appears by the letters that Lipſius wrote to him (d), and the teſtimony he gave him in the year 1600 (e). Hemelar was then preparing himſelf for his voyage to Italy. He lived ſix years at Rome with cardinal Ceſi (f). He was a friend of Grotius, and publiſhed ſome verſes, congratulating him on his eſcape out of priſon (g). He was brother to the mother of James Golius, that learned profeſſor at Leyden, who acquired ſo great a reputation by his profound knowledge of the Oriental tongues. He would doubtleſs have deſired to bring over this nephew to the Roman communion, as he had done Peter Golius, the brother of James; but he would not have been able to accompliſh this deſign. James Golius was a good Proteſtant, who all his life entertained a grudge againſt his uncle, for having perſuaded his brother to change his religion (h). Moreri, who in the article of Golius, informs us, that he ſpeaks elſewhere of our John Hemelar, gives us but a falſe information. I ſhall not imitate him with regard to the promiſe I have made in the ſame article, of ſaying ſomething concerning PETER GOLIUS [B].

‘ pected the higheſt fame he conceals his name.’ The words preceeding theſe in Gronovius's oration, are too fine to be omitted. ‘ Mater (Golii) omni ſexus laude prædita . . . . . vel unica Johannis Hemelarii fratris imagine ſat nobilis eſt, viri & in veterum literarum tractatione cum primis exercitati, & poëtæ diſerti, & probitate ac tranquillitate vitæ fugaque honorum & negotiorum T. aliquem Pomponium Atticum referentis. Panegyricum dixit votis tertiorum quinquennalium Clementis VIII tam illuſtri gratia exceptum, ut Vaticanæ bibliothecæ præfecturam, aut optimum ſacerdotium (Canonicatum vocant) optare juſſus ſit: ſacerdotio Antwerpiæ contentus fuit. ——— His (Golius's) mother endowed with all the virtues of her ſex . . . illuſtrious enough by all her reſemblance to her brother John Hemelar, a man throughly acquainted with ancient learning, an excellent poet, and, for probity, tranquillity of life, and neglect of honours and employments, reſembling a Pomponius Atticus. He delivered a panegyric on Clement the VIII, which gained him ſuch applauſe, that, being deſired to chuſe either the office of keeper of the Vatican library, or a rich benefice (a canonry as it is called), he contented himſelf with a living at Antwerp.’ Mr Colomiés (3) aſſures us, that Hemelar's book upon medals is very ſcarce, and yet there were three editions of it (4). The other works of this canon of Antwerp, are, Gratulatio in inaugurationem D. Chriſtiani Michaëlii, D. Michaëlis apud Antverpienſes Præmonſtratenſis Cænobii Abbatis. Poëmata multa ſparſim edita. Oratio in funere Joannis Malderi V. Antverpienſis Epiſcopi habita.

[B] I ſhall ſay ſomething concerning PETER GOLIUS.] He had the ſame inclination as his brother for voyages to the Levant, and for the Oriental tongues. He turned a barefooted Carmelite, and took the name of Celeſtin of Saint Liduïna. He ſojourned many years upon mount Libanus, and was profeſſor of the oriental tongues at Rome. He tranſlated Thomas à Kempis, into Arabic, and undertook, at the age of ſeventy four, a voyage to the coaſts of Malabar, to endeavour the converſion of the infidels. The diverſity of religion and profeſſion, did not hinder the two brothers from loving one another very affectionately. Peter wrote to James that he was beholden to him for the civil treatment which he received in Aſia. ‘ Frater Aſcetes è familia diſcalceatorum cum per veſtigia fratris in Oriente decurreret, ſcripſit ad noſtrum diu jam reducem omnia ſibi evenire præter expectationem: paraſſe ſe ad vincula carceres verbera, cruces, invenire amplexus, gratulationes, ſtudia, gratias potentium ob nomen Golium: eam memoriam id deſiderium ſui reliquerat: ita gratiam abſenti referebant. (5) — When his brother, the Carmelite was travelling in the eaſt, in the ſame places where James had before been, he wrote to him that every thing had happened to him beyond his expectation, and that he had prepared himſelf for bonds, impriſonments, buffetting, and croſſes, and inſtead of theſe he had found embraces, welcomes, civilities, and caraſſes, from the great, on account of his name Golius: ſo acceptable, ſo beloved, had he rendered himſelf when there, and ſo did they ſhow their affection to him when abſent.’ Thus the name of Golius was in ſuch eſteem there, ſince James's travels, that a great deal of honour was paid to it in the perſon of Peter. For the reſt, we muſt not imagine that Hemelar had need of much wit or induſtry to bring over his nephew to the Roman communion; for he perſuaded him to it when he was but a child. Peter Golius was bred in his houſe from eight years of age. I will tranſcribe the words of Gronovius, upon which I ground this opinion. They will ſhew that this child had a very forward wit. ‘ Unum in eo (Hemelario) non ſine gemitu ſolebat accuſare noſter, quod fratrem Petrum revocaſſet ad religiones parentibus ejuratas virum alioquin egregium, & fraterno ſecum animo, nec minus gnarum rerum & linguarum Orientis, diuque in partibus iiſdem verſatum & Arabicæ linguæ Romæ Profeſſorem: qui quam præcoqui fuerit indole, teſtis eſt oratio, quam Chriſtiano Michaëlio Abbati Præmonſtratenſi ab Hemelario ſcriptam gratulandi cauſa, puer octo annorum conſtanter, & quaſi feciſſet, memoriter pronuntiavit. —— Our Golius uſed to accuſe Hemelar of one thing, not without ſighs, that he had ſeduced his brother Peter to the Roman communion, who was, in other reſpects, a very extraordinary perſon, and he always retained a brotherly affection to him, who was no leſs skilled in the affairs and languages of the eaſt, where he had long ſojourned, and was profeſſor of the Arabic tongue at Rome: a proof of the forwardneſs of his wit, we have in a gratulatory oration compoſed by Hemelar, to Chriſtian Michaelius, abbot of the Premonſtants, which he, when a boy of eight years of age, pronounced with as much eaſe as if it had been his own performance.’

HEMMINGIUS (NICOLAS) profeſſor of Divinity at Copenhagen, was born in the year 1513, in the iſle of Laland (a). His firſt education could not be very advantageous to him, being under the direction of a Blackſmith, his father's brother. However he made ſome progreſs in learning, and afterwards went to Wittemberg, where for five years he was one of Melanchthon's moſt conſtant auditors. As he was obliged to get his living either by inſtructing ſcholars, or writing for them, we muſt the more admire the learning he acquired. He returned from thence to Denmark, and by Melanchthon's recommendation, was taken into a gentleman's houſe to inſtruct his daughters. He was afterwards made miniſter of the church of the Holy Ghoſt at Copenhagen, and afterwards profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue. He took his doctor of divinity's degree in the year 1557, and immediately after was made profeſſor in the ſame faculty at Copenhagen. He diſcharged the duties of it excellently well till the year 1579, when he was declared emeritus, and veſted with a canonry in the church of Roſchild. He peaceably enjoyed that preferment to his death; that is, to the twenty third of May 1600. He was blind the laſt years of his life (b), which is the leſs ſurprizing, when we conſider that he was very ſtudious, and lived eighty ſeven years. It ought to be obſerved, that he not only was not a very rigid Lutheran [A]; but that there is ſome probability, that if it had not been prevented, he would have ſhewn himſelf a good Calviniſt. His inclination for the opinions of Geneva was perceived: he was obliged to explain himſelf, and even to make a recantation [B]. He gave a confeſſion of the Lutheran faith, and yet not long ſince there has been a divine who has endeavoured to ſhew that it agrees with that of the Calviniſts [C]. Hemmingius publiſhed

[A] He was not a very rigid Lutheran.] This one proof will be ſufficient for me. The articles of union, which the divines of Saxony, and their adherents, endeavoured to eſtabliſh over all the Lutheran world, were rejected with great indignation in Denmark. King Frederic II forbad all his ſubjects to ſign them, and threatened all with baniſhment who ſhould diſobey that order, or bring copies of that book into his dominions (1). See the remark [E]. Now Hemmingius was the principal promoter of this affair (2), as Hoſpinian obſerves, who in this fact has not been contradicted by Hutterus.

[B] He was obliged . . . . . to make a recantation.] Hoſpinian (3) relates that Hemmingius, in his Syntagma Inſtitutionum Chriſtianarum, publiſhed in the year 1574, explained himſelf upon the Real Preſence like a Calviniſt. Mr Maſius does not diſown this; but he adds, that Hemmingius, being admoniſhed of his error, ſolemnly retracted it (4). ‘ Non diſſimulandum eſſe ‘ (ſays Maſius) Calvini ſententiæ de S. Cæna aliquandiu ‘ indulſiſſe, (Hemmingium) ſed monitum à cæteris ‘ Theologis ad meliorem mentem reverſum depoſito ‘ errore palinodiam ceciniſſe. Quam in rem ejus con‘ feſſionem, ipſius manu ſcriptam (5) ſibique à Viro Il‘ luſtri D. Engberg Conſiliario Regis & Judice Provin‘ ciali Seelandiæ dono datam, ſubjungit.’ The author from whom I borrow theſe words, ſhews us, by ſome paſſages of the Syntagma, that Hemmingius impugned the ubiquity, and beſtowed elogies on Calvin for accuſing, and on the magiſtrates of Geneva for puniſhing, Servetus. ‘ Cum his hæreſiarchis damnamus etiam ‘ impium nebulonem Michaelem Servetum, qui ra‘ biosè contemtis ſanctorum Patrum Conciliis, Arii ‘ & aliorum fanaticorum hominum damnatas hæreſes ‘ revocare conatus eſt, quem juſtò accuſatum à D. Jo‘ hanne Calvino, meritò Genevates affecere ſupplicio ‘ (6). —— Together with theſe hereſiarchs, we likewiſe ‘ condemn that impious villain Michael Servetus, who ‘ deſperately contemning the councils of the holy fathers, ‘ endeavoured to revive the condemned hereſies of Arius, ‘ and other fanatics, whom Mr John Calvin juſtly ac‘ cuſed, and whom the magiſtrates of Geneva juſtly put ‘ to death.’

[C] A divine has endeavoured to ſhew that Hemmingius's confeſſion agrees with that of the Calviniſts.] Mr Maſius, profeſſor of divinity at Copenhagen, has communicated to the public the confeſſion that was required of Hemmingius. It imports that he firmly believed that JESUS CHRIST wholly, GOD and man, is ſubſtantially preſent in the Lord's Supper, whereever it is celebrated according to his inſtitution; and that he conveys and delivers to all communicants, worthy and unworthy, his true body and true blood, which he has ſhed for us, for the remiſſion of ſins; and that his body and blood are truly and really taken with the bread and wine by the communicants, inſomuch that it is a true meat, and a true drink, with which man is nouriſhed, refreſhed, and quickened to eternal life. Se ſtatuere & firmiter credere totum Chriſtum Deum & hominem ſubſtantialiter adeſſe præſentem in Cæna ſua ubicunque celebratur juxta ipſius ordinationem, ipſumque adferre & exhibere omnibus communicantibus dignis & indignis ſuum verum corpus & verum ſanguinem quem effudit pro nobis in remiſſionem peccatorum, & hoc corpus & hunc ſanguinem vere & realiter cum pane & vino à communicantibus ſumi, ita ut verus ſit cibus & potus quo homo paſcitur, reficitur & vivificatur ad vitam æternam (7). For the reſt, Hemmingius acknowledged that his confeſſion was conſonant to that of Augsburg, to the little Catechiſm of Luther, and to the ſyſtem of the doctrine of the Saxon churches, and he declared that he diſowned whatever in his Syntagma has offended the churches, and is agreeable to Calvin's opinion about the Holy Supper, or that is not conſiſtent with his preſent confeſſion. Cum jam aliter in Syntagmate ſuo ſcripſerit juxta ſententiam Calvini de re ſacramentaria quo Eccleſiæ offenſæ ſint, & quod cum hac ſua præſenti confeſſione pugnet, id quicquid ſit in univerſum revocare, & hoc ſuo ſcripto revocatum velle (8). He begs pardon of the king, and of all thoſe whom his Syntagma had offended (9). It is plain, that his confeſſion is wholly Lutheran, and we ought to believe that the doctors who obliged him to retract, preſcribed him the expreſſions that they thought moſt capable of taking away equivocations, and denoting preciſely and formally his orthodoxy, and the abjuration of his error. And yet it is incredible what efforts the divine, whom I cite, hath made in order to ſhew that Hemmingius did not make a recantation. The Parentheſes, and the Nota Bene's with which he intermixes the words of the confeſſion, in order to evade the conſequences and pretenſions of Mr Maſius, ſeem to him ſo ſolid, that he is not afraid to affirm that Hemmingius retracted but very little, and that good Calviniſts might honeſtly ſign that confeſſion, explained and underſtood in it's true ſenſe. Videt itaque rurſum vir clariſſimus, quantillum id ſit quod hac confeſſione ſua Hemmingius revocavit, cui & nos dummodo dextre intelligantur & recte explicentur poſſumus adſtipulari; & quam procul ille adhuc abſuerit tum cum collegis à fide γνησίως Lutherana (10). From whence we may conclude, how difficult it is to draw up any Formulary, that ſhall cut off all occaſion of diſpute. Men believe they have prevented all ſorts of equivocations, but in the end they find that an adverſary finds a thouſand evaſions, and would perſuade us, that we had quite other thoughts than what we know very well we had. In certain caſes this is to undertake what Pericles undertook, and in which he ſucceeded. Being thrown upon the ground in wreſtling, he perſuaded the ſpectators that he did not really fall (11). Some readers may poſſibly here call to mind an unlucky obſervation which they may have read in the Hiſtory of the Variations (12). ‘ The Lutherans aſſure us in their book of Con‘ cord, that Luther was led to that expreſſion (13) by ‘ the ſubtilties of the Sacramentarians, who found a way ‘ to accommodate to their moral preſence, the ſtrongeſt ‘ and moſt preciſe expreſſions of Luther, for the real ‘ and ſubſtantial preſence; from which we, by the by, ‘ ſee once more, that we ought not to wonder if the ‘ defenders of the figurative ſenſe, find a way of draw‘ ing the holy fathers to their ſide, ſince Luther him‘ ſelf, alive and ſpeaking, who knew their ſubtilties, ‘ and undertook to confute them, was hard put to it ‘ to find words which they did not pervert to their ‘ own ſenſe by their interpretations: being tired with ‘ their ſubtilties, he reſolved to find an expreſſion ‘ which they could no longer elude, and therefore ‘ compoſed the article of Smalcalde in the form that ‘ we have ſeen it.’ The biſhop of Meaux might have found a famous inſtance of all this in his own church. The bull of Innocent X, againſt the opinions of Janſenius, did not hinder the Janſeniſts from proceeding in their diſputes. They intrenched themſelves in abundance of ſubtilties and infinite diſtinctions. To drive them from that hold, Alexander VII was made to ſpeak in a more preciſe manner, and they inſerted in his Bull whatever was thought proper to ruin the diſtinctions and ſubterfuges of the Port Royal. That ſignified nothing. The Janſeniſts continued to maintain, that the doctrine of Janſenius was not yet condemned. Mr Arnauld diſplayed a hundred obſervations borrowed from the ſubtleſt logic (14). The reading of ſuch a paper muſt have greatly aſtoniſhed the Pope: He would have ſeen the vanity of his precautions, and perceived that they proved to him, that he did not mean what he knew very well he had meant. As far as I ſee (he might have ſaid) you know my thoughts better than myſelf. What a pretty thing is the Connotatum of cardinal Laurea (15)? And when we conſider the infinite diſtinctions that are neceſſary in order to diſcover exactly what is ordained by the bulls, and what is not (16), we eaſily perceive that the infallibility of St Peter's chair is of no uſe, unleſs we ſuppoſe that every

[D] His ſhort theological treatiſes were ſo highly eſteemed by Simon Goulart, that he cauſed them to be reprinted at Geneva in the year 1586.] See the epiſtle dedicatory of the edition which he procured. For the reſt, he acquaints the reader, that he has cleared ſome things which Hemmingius had not ſufficiently explained, and which offended many people.

[E] Here follows a ſupplement to what we have ſaid (17) concerning the vigour with which the king of Denmark rejected the book of the Concord.] An Engliſhman (18), who wrote the preface to this poſthumous Work of Hemmingius, acquaints us (19), that queen Elizabeth left no means uneſſayed to induce the king of Denmark to act in this manner. He relates ſeveral particulars of the indignation of this prince, and, among others, that he threw into the fire, the book of Concord, which was ſent him covered with ſilk, and adorned with jewels: ‘ Imo quod memorabile imprimis eſt è pientiſſimo Danorum Rege Frederico 2. ab aula Electorali Saxoniâ, ut ut miſſus, holoſerico obductus, auro, gemmiſque pretioſis affabre ornatus magno, & pio Zelo Vulcano traditus eſt, annexâ graviſſimâ pœnâ & inſpectione ejus rei univerſi Regni Epiſcopis demandata ſub confiſcatione, in regnum ne importaretur, ibidemve diſtraheretur, ne-ve ſub exilio certiſſimo ab ullo poſſideretur, eo quod in illo nova, & in iſtis regionibus antè inaudita, ac (prout habet ipſum diploma Regium in librum Concordiæ vibratum, à doctis viris mihi non ſemel in Dania explicatum) inuſitata comprehenderentur dogmata: recepta verò ibi ex adverſo ſunt cum Lutheri, Philippi quoque ſcripta, inter hæc cum primis CORPUS DOCTRINAE, tribunitiæque illæ, ac declamatoriæ conciones S. Cathedris pulſæ (20). —— Nay which above all deſerves to be obſerved, it was with a holy zeal thrown into the flames, by that pious prince, Frederic II, king of Denmark, though it was ſent to him from the electoral court of Saxony, covered with ſilk, and richly adorned with gold and jewels, the importing or vending of it in his kingdom, was likewiſe forbid under a high penalty, and the inſpection was committed to all the biſhops of the kingdom, under the penalty of confiſcation, and that none ſhould preſume to keep it in their poſſeſſion, under the pain of baniſhment; it containing many new, ſtrange, and unheard-of doctrines, in theſe parts: (theſe are the words of the Royal Edict, publiſhed againſt the book of Concord, as I have heard it more than once explained by learned men in Denmark.) On the other hand, the books of Luther and Melanchthon are here received, and above all his CORPUS DOCTRINÆ, and theſe ſeditious and declamatory harangues were baniſhed from the pulpits.’ He obſerves that Hutterus highly condemned this conduct of the king of Denmark. ‘ Heroicum iſtud Regis Frederici factum vocat (Hutterus in libro quem appellat CONCORDIA CONCORS) durum nimis & Rhadamantheum plane, Regemque & quidem Chriſtianum haud decens, ſed cum enormi, tantoque Rege indignâ prorſus animi impotentiâ, & nimiâ affectuum vehementiâ conjunctum, quod tanti Regis dignitatem, prudentiam, & exiſtimationes haud leviter, omnibus, qui ſaltem aliquid judicare poſſunt, ſuſpectas reddit. —Hutterus, in his book he entitles CONCORDIA CONCORS, calls this heroic action of king Frederic, harſh, and altogether Rhadamanthean, unbecoming a prince, and a Chriſtian, attended with great folly and heat of paſſion, altogether unworthy of ſo great a king. And that it gives no ſmall ground, to people of ſenſe; at leaſt to call in queſtion his dignity, prudence, and reputation.’ But that it has been highly celebrated by Chriſtopher Knobius, in his funeral oration on that prince. I ſhall quote the paſſage which will ſhow us the warm zeal of that prince, who frequently ſaid, that this controverſy among the Lutherans, had done more miſchief, than the Turks could have done, by ſacking theſe provinces where it firſt aroſe. ‘ Chriſtophorus Knobius Aulicus illius (Regis) Concionator in Concione funebri in exequiis Regiis habita anno 1588. 5 Junii ſic de illo loquitur: Sollicitus erat ne ſui quoque Doctores in abyſſum hujus periculoſæ, & nocentiſſimæ diſputationis abriperentur, ideoque noluit iſti negocio immiſceri: etiam querebatur, damnum quod Chriſtiana Eccleſia ex hâc diſputatione ſentiebat, non poſſe tali Concordiæ Bergenſis formula ſanari: & ſciunt complures honeſtiſſimi viri, quanto cum affectu id factum doleret, quinimo illum ſæpius dixiſſe, ſi Turca illas regiones, in quibus hæc certamina nata ſunt, & adoleverunt, depopulatus fuiſſet, non tantum damni potuiſſe inferri, quantum hæc diſputatio intulit, nec finem poſſe videri hujus certaminis (21). —— Chriſtopher Knobius, chaplain to that prince, in an oration pronounced at his obſequies in the year 1588, June 5, ſpeaks of him in this manner. Being afraid leſt his clergy ſhould be hurried into the abyſs of this dangerous and hurtful controverſy, he would not at all meddle in it; and he complained that the hurt which the Chriſtian church had ſuſtained by it, could not be healed by this form of Concord of Berg. Many men of great note know what ſorrow he felt on that account, and that he has frequently ſaid, that if the Turk had ſacked theſe provinces wherein theſe diſputes began, and were cheriſhed, he could not have done ſo much hurt as this diſpute had done, and that no end of that controverſy could be foreſeen.’ Queen Elizabeth made uſe of the ſame compariſon in her letter to the elector of Saxony. Your country, ſays ſhe (22), has ſuſtained more prejudice by this pretended Concord, than if the Turks, had entered it with fire and ſword. The author (23) who mentions this particular, obſerves that the miniſters in Holland, prevailed with this queen, to perſuade the king of Denmark to reject the book of Concord. We ſee, in the preface to Hemmingius's book, that the ſucceſſor of this king continued to reject that book, for which the author of the preface beſtows great praiſes on him. ‘ Robinſonus pag. 10. ejuſdem ad Lectorem præfationis ſic concludit. Deus qui nunquam deeſt Eccleſiæ ſuæ, irrequietorum talium hominum conatus ut olim per pios Magiſtratus, in Daniâ præſertim, mirè impedivit: ita etiam nunc per optimi patris optimum filium, re & nomine verum Chriſtianum, paternis veſtigiis ſeverè inſiſtentem, pietate, & juſtitiâ regna ſua firmantem, Pontificiorum, Ubiquitariorum, & aliorum ſchiſmaticorum ac turbulentorum hominum ſtudia maturè, & prudenter in ipsâ herbâ reprimentem, benignè retardavit (24). —— Robinſon in the tenth page of the ſaid preface to the reader concludes thus. GOD, who never forſakes his church, put a wonderful ſtop to the attempts of theſe turbulent ſpirits, as in former times, by pious rulers, eſpecially in Denmark. So likewiſe in our days has he graciouſly curbed them by the excellent ſon of an excellent father, a Chriſtian, both in name and thing, and who worthily goes on in his father's foot-ſteps, eſtabliſhing his kingdom in piety and juſtice, and prudently checking in the bud the deſigns of Papiſts, Ubiquitarians, and other ſchiſmatics, and ſeditious perſons.’

I frankly own that I do not take thoſe things from the fountain-head, I have no other original but the notes of Lewis Gerard de Reneſſe on a letter which he reprinted at Breda in 1651 (25), and which had been firſt publiſhed in 1579, in Latin, Dutch, and German. It is intituled, ‘ Apologetica Reformatarum in Belgio Eccleſiarum Epiſtola, ad, & contra Auctores Libri Bergenſis, dicti, Concordiæ. —— An Apology for the Reformed Churches in Holland, by way of Epiſtle to and againſt the authors of a book from Berg called Of Concord.’ Mr Reneſſe was ignorant of of the author of it; but I know it has been aſcribed to Peter de Villiers (26), a French miniſter, and chaplain to the prince of Orange. ‘ Anno 1579, Petrus Villerius Gallus concionator aulicus Principis Auriaci, Polypragmonicus, ſub miniſtrorum Belgicorum nomine Epiſtolam criminatoriam contra Autores libri Concordiæ publicavit (27). —— In the year 1579, Peter Villiers, a Frenchman, and chaplain to the prince of Orangr, a pragmatical man, publiſhed a ſlandering epiſtle under the names of the miniſters of Holland, againſt the authors of the book of Concord.’

HENAULT (N). A French poet in the XVIIth Century, ‘ Author of the ſonnet upon Mrs de Guerchi [A], and teacher to Madam des Houlieres, was pretty famous in Paris whilſt he lived, and is ſo ſtill, though he has been dead theſe fourteen years (a). It is true, his merit not being in print [B], to uſe Mr Menage's phraſe, his reputation could not ſpread itſelf like that of ſome others, who at Paris never enjoyed ſo great a one as himſelf. He was a man of wit and learning, loving pleaſure with refinement, and a debauchee with art and delicacy; but he had the worſt turn of mind imaginable. He pretended to be an Atheiſt, and made oſtentation of his ſentiments with a fury and affectation that were abominable. He compoſed three different ſyſtems concerning the mortality of the ſoul [C], and made a ‘ voyage

[A] Author of the ſonnet upon Mrs de Guerchi.] Before I publiſhed, in the remark [G] of the article SPINOZA, the extract of the letter where theſe words are contained, I had already obſerved (1) that the ſonnet of the Abortive was thought to be Mr Henault's, and that he had compoſed it upon Mrs de Guerchi. But as ſoon as my dictionary appeared at London, a learned Engliſh gentleman there, did me the honour to write to me, I. that he knew from the firſt hand, that this ſonnet was ſeen two or three years before the death of Mrs de Guerchi; II. that ſome perſons who pretended to know it very well, aſſured him, that it was made by Subligni, author of the Falſe Clelia. I communicated this to the ingenious gentleman, who had written to me the letter, whereof I had inſerted an extract in the article of SPINOZA. He anſwered me, that Mr Lucas ‘ had aſſured him that the ſonnet on the Abortive was compoſed twenty years before the accident of Mrs de Guerchi, but that all connoiſſeurs in theſe matters, whom he had conſulted, ſaid, it was written upon a miſcarriage of that handſome woman, but not that which coſt her her life. Twenty of my friends, adds he, who have lived with Henault, have aſſured me, that the ſonnet was poſitively his, and that he owned it. Subligni * was ſtill in the college when that piece was firſt publiſhed: his widow and his daughter have confirmed it to me, that he was not the author of it.’ Let us then lay down for certain, that it is a piece of our Henault; for we ſhall ſee, below, that it was put into the collection of that poet's works: but let us very much doubt that it was made on Mrs Guerchi. It is looked upon as a maſter-piece, though it be againſt the rules (2) and has even one barbariſm in it (3).

[B] His merit not being in print.] This is found to be falſe. ‘ Mr d'Henault himſelf in his life-time, cauſed a little collection of his works to be printed at Paris by Barbin in 1670, in 12mo. Oeuvres diverſes .... par le Sieur D. H. It is dedicated to Monſieur Doort without any other title, it contains proſe and verſe, and letters in proſe and verſe to Sapho, who very probably is Madam des Houlieres. The ſonnet on the Abortive is there ... We muſt not forget the firſt piece in the book intituled, Conſolation to Olympia. It will furniſh me with two critical obſervations: one is, that the compilers of St Evremont's works, being perhaps deceived by ſome body, or by a pretended conformity of ſtile, have placed this whole letter, which is very long, among his works, and a great many people who pretend to be nice judges, have taken it for a genuine piece of his. This is an example, which you may add to thoſe which you have collected concerning the errors, into which this likeneſs of ſtile daily leads the critics. The ſecond obſervation falls directly upon a new cenſor ... who has pretended to paſs a judgment upon the works of St Evremont ‡ ... This man has fallen headlong into the ſnare that was laid by the compiler. He attacks that letter of Conſolation to Olympia in the ſtile, on the thoughts and ſentiments, and he beſtows a fourth part of his book on this notable criticiſm.’ This is what I have found in a collection of remarks, which a young advocate of the parliament of Paris did me the favour to ſend me in the year 1698, and which convinced me, that he has an infinite deal of wit, and an exact knowledge of many curious matters of fact, and ſuch as are very proper for this dictionary (4).

[C] He had made three different ſyſtems concerning the mortality of the ſoul.] Let us give one paſſage more out of that collection of remarks juſt now mentioned. ‘ Henault ſaith, in his epiſtle dedicatory, You know that I am a man wholly by my ſelf, that I do not place my happineſs in the opinion of others, that my maxims or my errors are very different from thoſe of all the world beſides. By this he begins to diſcover what he was. Many of his verſes are imitations of the Chorus's of Seneca, and amongſt others of the ſecond act of the Troas, where the mortality of the ſoul is eſtabliſhed: that ſubject hit his taſte.’

Comme ſe perd en un moment
Cette portion d'air dans les corps enfermée;
Que le plus actif element
Developpe & pouſſe en fumée;
Comme au ſoufle des aquilons
On voit bien-tôt evannoüie
Une groſſe nuée ou de grêle ou de pluie,
Qui d'un deluge afreux menace les valons;
Ainſi s'épand cette ame vaine
Qui meut tous les reſſorts de la machine humaine.
Tout meurt en nous quand nous mourons:
La mort ne laiſſe rien, & n'eſt rien elle-même,
Du peu de tems que nous durons
Ce n'eſt que le moment extrême, &c.

‘ I am ſurprized that this was printed with the king's privilege. This man had a tender heart; he ſaid to his miſtreſs:

Sappho fit des vers comme vous,
Faites l'amour comme elle.

‘ He would have her to renounce glory.

Pour moi je ne ſuis point la dupe de la gloire,
Je vous quitte ma place au Temple de memoire,
Et je ne conçoi point que la loi du trepas
Doive épargner mon nom & ne m'épargner pas.
Je me mets au deſſus de cette erreur commune,
On meurt, & reſſource & ſans reſerve aucune.
S'il eſt apres ma mort quelque reſte de moi,
Ce reſte un peu plus tard ſuivra la même loi,
Fera place à ſon tour à de nouvelles choſes,
Et ſe replongera dans le ſein de ſes cauſes.

‘ This is no tranſlation, but an original, and thus it is, that this man ſcattered in his works the ſeeds of his errors. In the two pieces that have been inſerted in the Furetieriana, you will find alſo the ſame opinions which he endeavours to inſinuate every where. To his impieties he added groſs impurities. Some are to be found in a piece intituled le Bail d'un cœur à Cloris, the leaſing of a heart to Chloris, which is in that collection, and aſſuredly that Chloris might well be one of la Fontaine's Jeannetons †. Theſe verſes are bolder than all ‘ his

At his death matters changed extreamly: he was converted, and would 'have carried things to exceſs: his confeſſor was obliged to hinder him from receiv'ing the Viaticum in the midſt of his chamber with a halter about his neck. D' He'nault was of no conſiderable family, his father was a Baker, and he himſelf was at 'firſt receiver of the taxes in Forez, where he did not manage his affairs well. 'He taught Madam des Houlieres all that he knew or fancied he knew. It is pre'tended that this appears in the works of that lady [D]." This is an extract of a letter which an ingenious gentleman honoured me with the twenty ſeventh of April, 1696. He writ to me another the nineteenth of July, 1697, in which he informed me, that d' Henault had drawn up the plea of Mr Clodoré, governor of Martinico, againſt Mr de la Barre, governor of the iſles of America, and a manifeſto of Mr de Gadagne, about the affair of Gigeri. You will find in the Fureteriana, an elegy (b) and an eclogue (c) of this author. The elegy is uſher'd in with this commendation, Monſieur d'Henault was eſteemed by every body . . . . He was every way a gentleman, and amorous. He compoſed a ſonnet which gave occaſion to Mr Colbert to do a handſome thing [E]. He was married, and left one daughter, who is a penſionary in a convent at Paris. Our remarks are filled with ſeveral particulars which have been communicated to us, to which I refer the reader.

[D] It is pretended that this appears in the works of that lady.] The reader may have ſeen in the firſt edition of this dictionary, pag 1088, of the ſecond tome, that he, to whom the words of this text belong, immediately adds, I have ſeen ſome people take notice, among other verſes in the Idylle, on a river ‡

Courez, ruiſſeau, courez, fuyez & reportez
Vos ondes dans le ſein des mers dont vous ſortez;
Tandis que pour remplir la dure deſtinée
Où nous ſommes aſſujettis,
Nous irons reporter la vie infortunée
Dans le ſein du neant d'où nous ſommes ſortis.

Run, river, run, and haſten to the ſea;
There loſe yourſelf in it's immenſity.
So we, the ſtruggle or'e with care and ſtriſe,
In non-exiſtence loſe a wretched life.

It is certain that a perſon, who ſhould ſpeak after this manner, dogmatically would deny the immortality of the ſoul. But for the honour of Madam des Houlieres, let us ſay that ſhe only followed poetical ideas which are not to be drawn into conſequence. Thus in imitation of the ancient poets, ſhe ſays in another place (5), that after our death our ſoul wanders on the infernal ſhores. This could not have been her belief, if Mr de Henault had taught her his impieties. Let us not judge her by poetical phraſes. Not but that abundance of licentiouſneſs may be concealed under the privilges of verſification. The advocate I have mentioned, has a note upon this paſſage. You have quoted, ſays he to me in his letter, ſome verſes of Madam des Houlieres which are ſuſpected of Libertiniſm: but they have made you omit one ‡ which is not the leaſt emphatical, and which is in the edition of her poems. To ſpeak the truth; there are many moral, and even Chriſtian and ſacred, pieces in her works, which correct this one. Some people however were at pains to repreſent her as a Libertine; for ſhe complains of it in her epiſtle to Father la Chaiſe on the hypocrites She was a very great wit, the honour of her ſex, and the ſhame of ours.

Note, that under pretence that ſhe ſays we are produced out of nothing, it could not be pretended, that ſhe believed the creation; for Mr d'Henault ſhews plainly enough (6) that by the word nothing, he meant not the privation of exiſtence, but the meer privation of life. In this ſenſe he did not admit of the creation.

[E] He compoſed a ſonnet which gave occaſion to Mr Colbert to do a handſome thing.] The collection of remarks before cited, furniſhes me with another good commentary. 'To return to Mr d' Henault, it 'is of him Mr Boileau ſpeaks in two places of his 'ninth ſatire: Je le declare donc, Haynault * eſt un 'Virgil. I declare it then, Haynault is a Virgil. 'But Mr Boileau told me himſelf that he thought him 'a pretty good poet, and that his beſt piece, not for 'it's matter, but for the compoſition, was a ſonnet 'againſt Mr Colbert, which began with this verſe, Miniſtre avare & laſche, eſclave Malheureux, —— O 'griping baſe miniſter, O miſerable ſlave. Mr Colbert 'on this occaſion did a noble thing; he was told of 'this ſonnet, which made a noiſe at that time. He 'asked whether there was nothing in it againſt the 'king, he was told there was not; whereupon he 'anſwered, that he minded it not, and would not 'reſent it againſt the author. Is not this ſomething 'nobler than the ſonnet?

HENICHIUS (JOHN) profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Rinthel in the country of Heſſe, was the ſon of a miniſter of Winhuſen, and was born in the month of January 1616. He went through the Claſſics at Zell and Lunenburg, and then was ſent to Helmſtadt in the year 1634; where, after he had ſtudied four years, he was admitted doctor of philoſophy. Having afterwards read ſome lectures, and moderated in ſome public diſputations, he gained, in a very particular manner, the friendſhip of Dr Calixtus and Dr Horneius, two celebrated divines. He went to Heldeſheim towards the end of the year 1639, and he lived there about three years with a gentleman of merit (a). He took a journey after that towards the Rhine, and then ſtaid ſome time with James Lampadius at Hanover. He was made profeſſor of Metaphyſics, and of the Hebrew tongue in the univerſity of Rinthel, in the year 1643, and at the end of a year and a half he was called to Bardewic to be ſuper-intendant there. He exerciſed the functions of that office five years together, with ſo much diligence, that Auguſtus, duke of Brunſwic, would have given him the inſpection of the whole dioceſe of Wolfenbuttle; but he did not accept of it. He even quitted his employment, becauſe the fatigues he had gone through had brought on him a tedious ſickneſs. He returned to Rinthel in the year 1651, to be profeſſor of Divinity there. He was ſolemnly inveſted with the honour of a doctor's degree in the ſame faculty, and had a place ſoon aſſigned him in the eccleſiaſtical Conſiſtory, and was made inſpector of the churches of the county of

I have ſomething to obſerve upon the book de Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ, which is in that liſt. It is a very good ſupplement to that of Grotius on the ſame ſame ſubject: for Henichius explains, illuſtrates, and proves more at large the arguments that Grotius had made uſe of. He informs us of this in the title, where he ſays, quo ea quæ vir illuſtris Hugo Grotius de hac materia commentatus eſt, aliquanto uberius exponuntur. By the way let us obſerve, that Grotius has been accuſed of plagiariſm, and let us place here an addition, which was at the end of the firſt volume of this dictionary in the firſt edition, and which the Printer has not placed where it ought to be in the ſecond. It contains theſe words: ‘ to me there ſeems ‘ nothing more falſe, than what was ſaid to Mr Wheeler and Mr Spon, That Grotius had ſtole his principal argument for the truth of the Chriſtian religion, ‘ from an Arabic author, and particularly from the ‘ works of an excellent man, whom the Latins held ‘ for an arch-heretic but whom the Cophti look upon ‘ as a ſaint, who has written an excellent book againſt ‘ the Turks and Jews for the truth of the Chriſtian ‘ religion (2). Note as to the three volumes of our Henichius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that they reach but to the end of the Vth century; and though the title promiſes the civil as well as the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, the author dwells principally on the latter. The firſt volume contains the three firſt centuries; the ſecond contains the fourth, and the third, the fifth. Boſius who had ſaid, in his Schediaſma de comparanda notitia ſcriptorum Eccleſiaſticorum, that Henichius's work comprehended the ſix firſt centuries, was too rudely cenſured for it. He acknowledged his error, and corrected it with his own hand in the copy of his book. Such faults as theſe may be pointed out, but it ſhould be done without bitterneſs and inſulting, remembring that it is very eaſy to commit them. Aberrationem agnovit, ac manu ſua in exemplari privato correxit: ut adeo acrem illam Clariſſimi Sluteri cenſuram * non videatur meruiſſe. Et quam facilis in his talibus ſit lapſus, unuſquiſque intelligit (3). The author who ſays this, obſerves, that Henichius, after giving the ſubſtance of what is ſaid by the ancient authors, afterwards ſets down the paſſages at full length. He has reaſon to ſay that this ought to recommend his work. Cæterum Henichianum opus vel eo etiam nomine meretur commendari, quod integra auctorum veterum teſtimonia adſcribat, quorum ſummam prius attulerat (4).

[B] He paſſionately deſired an union betwixt the Lutherans and Calviniſts.] He is praiſed for it in his funeral Programma (5): ‘ Pacis & concordiæ perpetuus ſtudioſus, nihilque magis in votis habebat, quàm ‘ ut ſchiſma inter Evangelicos funditùs tolleretur, & ‘ togata prælia in ſuggeſtibus & Cathedris cum ſalutiferâ, DEO & hominibus gratâ pace, fauſto omine, ‘ commutarentur: qua de cauſa immortalem nominis ‘ gloriam apud omnes bonos, adeptus eſt. —— He was ‘ a conſtant lover of peace and concord, and deſired nothing more earneſtly, than that the ſchiſms among ‘ Proteſtants ſhould be entirely healed, and that inſtead of theſe contentions among divines, both in their ‘ chairs and pulpits, we might be bleſſed with peace ‘ grateful to God and man: and on this account his ‘ name will ſtill be remembered with honour among ‘ all good men.’ The author of the Programma ſays a little after (6), ‘ Equidem invidia & malignitas, ‘ ut ſunt virtutis fata, non unum in eum jaculata fuit ‘ fulmen: ſed & illa, quæ viventi gravis fuit, mortui ‘ famæ, credo, favebit, ſuamque vel imperitiam vel ‘ livorem tandem profitebitur. —— Indeed the envious ‘ and malicious, as the common fate of virtue, did not ‘ ſpare him, but theſe which afflicted him while living ‘ will, I do not doubt, add to his fame now he his dead, ‘ and at length own their ignorance or ſpite. He doth not point out the cauſes of that malicious envy which perſecuted Henichius: but I conjecture, that the peaceable diſpoſition of that profeſſor, furniſhed pretences to ſlander him.

HENRY VI, emperor of Germany, ſon of Frederic Barbaroſſa, was crowned by Pope Celeſtin III [A], the fifteenth day of April, 1191. He marched with a potent army to take poſſeſſion of Naples and Sicily, which fell to the empreſs Conſtantia his wife, after the death of the young William, king of Sicily (a). He found ſo many oppoſitions to his taking poſſeſſion of it, that we may almoſt ſay, that he obtained thoſe two kingdoms by conqueſt. He made himſelf ſo much feared, that the emperor Alexis, ſirnamed The Angel, could not obtain peace of him without paying tribute (b). If he had only done that, his valour might have been praiſed; but all the applauſe he may have merited, on that account, is ſwallowed up by the cruelty and treachery he ſhewed, in exterminating, under falſe pretences, all that remained of the race of the brave Normans who had conquered that part of Italy, which the empreſs, his wife, their heireſs, gave him right to poſſeſs (c). It is ſaid, that this princeſs, to puniſh him for it, made him ſwallow poiſon, whereof he died at Meſſina, in the year 1198, being thirty two years old (d). He left a ſon, who was emperor under the name of Frederic II. Conſtantia was ſo old, when ſhe brought that ſon into the world, that, to avoid all ſuſpicions of impoſture, ſhe was brought to bed publickly [B]. Theſe precautionns did not deſerves to be read: ‘ Conſtantia, queen of Sicily, who ‘ had never ſtirred from the cloyſter, leading all her ‘ youth and life in Veſtal chaſtity, ſetting herſelf at ‘ liberty at the age of fifty, tho' not handſome, but ‘ quite decrepit, had a mind to taſte the pleaſures of ‘ the fleſh; ſhe married, and became with child at ‘ the age of fifty two, which ſhe reſolved to be delivered of publickly in the plains and meadows of ‘ Palermo, having cauſed a tent and pavilion to be erected there for that purpoſe, that no body might ‘ diſtruſt the legitimacy of her fruit, which was one ‘ of the greateſt miracles that has been ſeen ſince ‘ St Elizabeth. The hiſtory of Naples ſays, notwithſtanding, that he was reputed ſuppoſititious: however, he proved a very great man: but moſt baſtards ‘ are brave, as a great man once told me (2).

[C] Theſe precautions did not hinder the world from ſaying, that this child was ſuppoſititious.] Brantôme whom we have juſt quoted tells us this. But here is another author, who will point out the proofs of it better. ‘ It is certain, ſaith he (3), that women fifty ‘ years old and upwards, have born children. We ‘ have an example of it in that renowned nun Conſtantia, the mother of Frederic II, who, being taken ‘ from a cloyſter, was the only heireſs and queen of ‘ Sicily, being with child at the age of fifty two years ‘ compleat, to take away all ſuſpicion, had a pavilion ‘ ſet up in a public place of a certain town in Sicily, ‘ and in the preſence of the greateſt ladies of that country, lay-in in public. Notwithſtanding which many ‘ diſputed that fact; amongſt others the marquis of ‘ Ancona, named Marquardus, who offered to prove, ‘ that that child was not the iſſue of Henry and Conſtantia, and ſo was ſuppoſititious. As it is ſaid by ‘ Pandolfo Collenuccio *. If it may be ſaid, that the moſt exquiſite precautions are uſeleſs againſt love, we may likewiſe ſay, that they are ſo againſt ambition. Do whatever you pleaſe to convince the public that ſuch or ſuch a child-birth was not imaginary, but moſt real, they will always find anſwers ready for you; the expedient which cured St Thomas's incredulity, is the only one that can be proof againſt theſe cavils: unleſs I put my finger, &c. will they ſay to you, as that apoſtle did, I will not believe (4). Nay I know not but after feeling they would ſay, I have ſeen and felt how the child came out, but not how it came in. Was your huſband capable of begetting it.

[D] Some authors . . . . maintain that Conſtantia was neither a nun, nor very old, when ſhe married Henry VI.] It is the common opinion, that ſhe was taken from a cloyſter, and that ſhe obtained a diſpenſation to be married to the emperor Henry VI, and that ſhe conceived about the age of fifty five. But there are hiſtorians who deny this. Let us ſee the ſequel of the paſſage of Camerarius, which I have cited (5). ‘ Poſſibly John Michael Brutus (6) took occaſion ‘ from this ſtory, flatly to deny, that Conſtantia was ‘ ever a nun or abbeſs, or that Pope Celeſtin diſpenſed with her marriage, foraſmuch as according to his ‘ calculation ſhe muſt have been ſixty years old. On ‘ the contrary, he alledges Hugo Falcandus the hiſtorian, who ſaith ſhe was then in the flower of her ‘ age, and married to Henry, in the reign of William, ‘ ſirnamed the Good, when Frederic Barbaroſſa was ‘ yet alive: but that the confuſion of times was the ‘ cauſe of that miſtake. I am of opinion, ſays he, ‘ that ſhe was conveyed from the palace royal to ‘ an abbey of nuns, when the people mutinying, ‘ impriſoned king William, ſirnamed the Bad, and ‘ and that no more convenient place could be found ‘ for her ſecurity, during theſe commotions. When ‘ theſe were appeaſed, that princeſs, who was entirely at liberty, and was neither veiled nor profeſſed, ‘ lived among the nuns, till ſhe married Henry.

HENRY II, king of France, ſucceeded Francis I, his father, the laſt of March 1547. One of the firſt things he did, was to deſpiſe the order his father gave him on his death-bed. I mean, that a few days after he came to the crown, he recalled the conſtable of Montmorenci [A], whom Francis I. had baniſhed for very good reaſons (a). That diſobedience coſt him dear [B]. For it may be affirmed, that the moſt grievous events that were the ſtain of his reign, were owing to the conſtable. It was he that by his evil conduct loſt the famous battle of St Quintin (b); after which he was the cauſe

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) The tenth of Auguſt. 1557.

[A] He recalled the conſtable of Montmorency.] His ‘ father had ſeriouſly recommended to him Annebaut ‘ for his chief miniſter, in whom he had found great ‘ experience, wiſdom, and zeal, and no ſtain of avarice ‘ or ambition; but more eſpecially adviſed him to ‘ beware, if he loved the good of his kingdom, of ‘ recalling the conſtable of Montmorenci . . . . Nevertheleſs, although he had paid a moſt dutiful obedience to his father during his whole life, yet he ‘ paid no dieerence to his commands after his death. ‘ He took the adminiſtration of all affairs, from Annebaut and from the cardinal de Tournon, to give it ‘ to Montmorenci (1). We ſhall ſee, that this moſt dutiful obedience had it's exceptions, which will not permit us to think that Mezerai had reaſon to give it ſo good a character as he has done. ‘ The ‘ precaution of Francis, reached even to the forbidding moſt expreſly the Dauphin, his eldeſt ſon, ‘ who was afterwards king Henry II, from having ‘ any communication with the conſtable . . . . . . ‘ But all that he could obtain of his ſon, was to diſſemble, for ſeven years together, his friendſhip for ‘ the conſtable. And he did not even diſſemble with ‘ ſo much artifice, but that the whole court knew, ‘ that no day paſſed without their receiving letters ‘ from one another. But Francis I. was at no pains ‘ to break off that correſpondence, whether becauſe ‘ the Dauphin, and the conſtable were equally ſucceſſful in concealing it from him: or that having no ‘ other ſon than the Dauphin, he was unwilling to ‘ to diſoblige him (2).’ Theſe are Mr Varillas's words, and they may be very juſtly criticiſed; for firſt, if the Dauphin had diſſembled his friendſhip ſeven years together, he would not ſo often have preſſed his father to re-call the conſtable; and yet Mr Varillas aſſures us, he did this (3). Secondly, how ſhall we reconcile this author's alternative, with what Mezerai, relates (4), that the king was much offended, that the Dauphin, in defiance of his orders, correſponded with the conſtable of Montmorenci.

[B] That diſobedience coſt him dear.] Mr Varillas will furniſh me with a commentary upon this text. I will not content myſelf with citing him for Henry the ſecond's reign, but ſhall take his words ſomething higher; ‘ the diſgraces of conſtable Montmorenci, ‘ ſays he (5), of admiral Chabot, and of chancellor ‘ Poyet, are related in the ninth book in ſuch a manner as not to ſurpriſe thoſe, who have read in Bodin's republic, that Francis I. grew worſe humoured ‘ as he advanced in years; that he had been convinced, ‘ by his own experience, that he could not have ‘ made choice of two men leſs fit for the intrigues ‘ of the cabinet, than Montmorenci and Chabot; and ‘ that tho' he could not charge Poyet with ‘ the ſame defect, yet this chancellor had another as ‘ great, which was to carry things too far; that this ‘ had been the ſource of all the misfortunes which ‘ had happened to his majeſty, and that if he continued the ſame miniſtry, he was not to expect a more ‘ favourable ſucceſs. The event proved, that the three ‘ miniſters, who ſucceded to the places of the diſgraced, were more capable of filling them than they: ‘ and that if Henry II had not been obliged to give up, ‘ Montmorenci, ‘ he would not have reſtored the conſtable ‘ in order to recover him, 198 towns, or ſtrong places, ‘ and almoſt as much extent of ground, as one third ‘ of France.’

cauſe of a treaty of Peace (c), much more ſcandalous to the French monarchy [C], than the loſs of that battle. Poſſibly he would not have been able to have made Henry II conſent to that diſadvantageous peace, had it not been for a ſpirit of perſecution, which had got the maſtery of this prince [D]. The conſtable deſerves alſo much blame, [C] The conſtable was the cauſe of a treaty of peace much more ſcandalous to the French monarchy.] Mr Mezerai, though, of all the hiſtorians of France, he is the higheſt favourer of the ſubjects againſt the court, yet he blames the joy that the people expreſſed for that peace. ‘The people, ſays he (6), who always deſire peace at any rate, greatly rejoiced at this . . . . But the party of the Guiſes, the wiſe politicians, and all the nobility, highly condemned it, as a manifeſt cheat, which made France loſe 198 ſtrong places, only for three that were reſtored, which were Ham, Catelet, and St Quintin.’ He ſpeaks with greater force in his great hiſtory (7). For in relating the articles of that peace, he inſerts after theſe words, that the more ſtrongly to unite the hearts of the princes, this parentheſis (but rather to cover, with ſome honourable pretence, the ſhame and loſs that France received by this unfortunate treaty); and towards the end of the ſame page he ſays as follows. ‘Theſe articles being brought to the king, and communicated by his majeſty to the princes and grandees of his kingdom, there were few but judged them entirely diſadvantageous, and ſhameful to France: all France indeed univerſally condemned them by their murmurs. Briſſac having advice of it, though the articles had been diſguiſed to him, diſpatched Boyvin-Villars to court, he that has left us the memoirs of the war of Piedmont, with inſtructions to lay before the king his moſt humble remonſtrances, and to diſſwade him from ſo diſhonourable a peace. Concluding, that if his majeſty was reſolved to give up what he poſſeſſed in Italy, which was worth the beſt province of his kingdom, and could bring him in, all expences defrayed, a revenue of 300000 crowns into his treaſury, he only begged for all the recompence of his good ſervices, that he would pleaſe to baniſh him, together with all the forces that were beyond the Alps, as rebels, and that he knew how to preſerve the places which he held, at the expence of the Milaneſe, and the republic of Genoa, or at leaſt would die gloriouſly, in a country, where all the forces of Europe had not been able to force him to loſe an inch of ground, in the ten years time that he had the defence of it . . . . The king expreſſed an approbation of his zeal, but having his heart wholly ſet upon peace, he anſwered, that tho' he ſhould make it upon the conditions propoſed to him, he ſhould ſtill retain enough to make himſelf feared by his enemies (8). Whereupon Guiſe, moved either by his own intereſt, or by a ſenſe of honour and conſcience, boldly interrupting him, ſaid, Sir, your majeſty will pardon me, if I ſay, that this is not the right way to do it, and that though you ſhould find for twenty five years to come, as contrary a fortune as that of the laſt year, you would not loſe in all that time, what they would have you give up in one day. It did not coſt the late king, when he was vanquiſhed and a priſoner, but, &c.’ I omit all the reaſons of the duke of Guiſe, but not what follows them in the hiſtorian; ‘he ſaid many other things with ſo much vehemence, as made the king often change his colour, but not his reſolution; the dice were caſt, and whoever was the cauſe of it, either his favourites, or his natural temper, his courage was ſo caſt down, that he could no longer bear the war; he therefore ratiſyed the treaty, and the peace was publiſhed the tenth of April . . . . All the French authors, who have written of that time, have called it the unfortunate and curſed peace. Briſſac hearing that it was made, cryed out often, ah miſerable France, what evils . . . . He remained governour of the five towns and eight caſtles which the king retained, with 8000 foot and 450 horſe, and reſtored the other places, but he firſt demoliſhed the greateſt part of them, and ſold the ammunition according to the king's command; not without much difficulty of receiving the money, and orders that were neceſſary from court, becauſe the conſtable, favouring the duke of Savoy, did all that he could to put the places entire into his hands, and even thoſe which the king had reſerved to himſelf (9).’ We ſhall ſee below (10), that the court of France was ſo weak under Charles IX and Henry III, as to ſuffer itſelf to be perſuaded to evacuate that little it had reſerved; and there is no doubt but that in Charles XIth's time, the conſtable had a great ſhare in that miſmanagement. When we conſider the immenſe wealth he heaped together, we cannot ſay of him, as of many others, that in managing his maſter's affairs well, he managed his own very well; but we muſt ſay, that in managing his own affairs very well, he managed thoſe of his maſter very ill. Did not he, under Charles IX, enter into a league with the Guiſes? was not he the cauſe of that prodigious power they roſe to, that was ſo fatal to the monarchy, and had like to have given to France a fourth race of kings? when Francis I. diſgraced the conſtable, he charged him with ignorance in the two principal parts of his employment, which was war and policy (11). See the character which the partiſans of the Guiſes give of him in Mezerai (12).

Some critics will ſay perhaps, that Mr Mezerai does too much extenuate the advantages granted to Henry II by the treaty of Cateau. Why does he mention only the three towns that were reſtored to France? Why doth he ſuppreſs the conqueſt of Calais, Mets, Toul, and Verdun? but that criticiſm would be a very bad one; for the treaty of Cateau did not grant theſe four places to Henry II. It left the empire at full liberty to redemand the reſtitution of the three laſt; and it ſolemnly engaged France to reſtore Calais to England at the end of eight years. This is a thing which an anonymous hiſtorian has not obſerved who ſpeaks thus (13). ‘The king of France reſtored to the king of Spain, all that he had conquered of him on both ſides the Alps. Item, to the prince of Piedmont, Breſſe, Savoy, and Piedmont, except four towns: to the Genoeſe, the iſle of Corſica; Siena, to the duke of Florence; and retained nothing but Calais, without gaining a foot of any other land in that long and pernicious war, which had laid waſte ſo many provinces, plundered, burnt, ruined ſo many cities, towns, villages, caſtles, and had occaſioned the death of ſo many princes, lords, gentlemen, captains, ſoldiers, citizens, and peaſants, cauſed the rapes and violations of ſo many women and maids; in a word, that had turned all Europe topſy-turvy. The king gave up above 200 (others ſay almoſt twice that number) places, for the conqueſt whereof a ſea of his ſubjects blood had been ſpilt, the treaſures of the kingdom exhauſted, his own demeſns mortgaged, and himſelf indebted on all ſides.’ This hiſtorian ſuppoſes, that Henry II ſaw his dominions enlarged at leaſt by the ceſſion of Calais, but that is a falſehood: all the reſt of his diſcourſe is ſolid. And as it is certain, that one might have repreſented to the king of Spain, what Hannibal repreſented to the Roman general (14), what thunderbolts does that diſcourſe level at the head of Henry II? it might have been ſaid to the king of ſpain, that the countries he had ſtripped France of by this treaty of peace, were not worth the immenſe ſums which that war had coſt him, nor ſo many ſoldiers and officers as he had loſt. If this was capable of leſſening the joy which an advantageous peace made him feel, how muſt it break the heart of the monarch to whom it was diſadvantageous? to return from a long war with empty hands, is a diſgrace, ſaid Homer (15). He would have uſed much ſtronger expreſſions in ſuch a caſe as this.

[D] The ſpirit of perſecution . . . . got the maſtery of this prince.] Henry II was extreamly ſevere againſt the Proteſtants, he put them to death without mercy, and yet they encreaſed much under his reign. If they were not concerned for the extream conſternation which ſeized the court of France, and the city of Paris, after the battle of St Quintin, it was but what nature inſpired them; every ſect which is ill uſed, and which can hope for no relaxation, unleſs the court finds itſelf embarraſſed, will rejoice at the progreſs of an enemy, and be glad to ſee their perſecutors ſo taken up with affairs abroad, as not to know blame, for not having given better advice to his maſter, with relation to the ducheſs of Valentinois, who, at an age ill ſuited to that of Henry II, held him in her chains, and made a very unjuſt uſe of his ſlavery. Inſtead of fortifying this prince againſt the ſnares of that woman, the conſtable intrigued for her, and devoted himſelf to her faction (d). It is pity the reign of Henry II had theſe ſtains in it, for it was otherwiſe remarkable for glorious actions, and for very noble ſucceſſes, which cruelly mortified Charles V. We cannot deny Henry II the glory of being brave, and it is ſaid that queen Elizabeth of England admired him upon that account [E]. But after all, it will be an eternal teſtimony of his weakneſs, and of the dominion which his favourites had over him, that, contrary to the advice of the wiſeſt heads of his kingdom, he ſigned the treaty of peace of Cateau in Cambreſis. A peace, not leſs ſcandalous to France than that which the emperor Jovinian made with the king of Perſia, ſo much decryed by all antiquity (e). A peace, which by one ſtroke of a pen, loſt in one moment all the labours and conqueſts of many years, and an extent of country, equalling one third of the kingdom (f). No body profited ſo much by that diſgrace of France, as the duke of Savoy; for, beſides being reſtored to his dominions, he married the ſiſter of Henry II, a princeſs of great merit [F], and who knew how to bubble the court of France know which way to turn themſelves. Of all the Chriſtian ſects, there is none more diſpoſed to this ſort of conduct, than thoſe of the Romiſh communion. And therefore we need not wonder, though what Mr Maimbourg affirms (16) ſhould be true, namely, that the Proteſtants ‘took advantage of the public affliction after the battle of St Quintin . . . . and ventured to hold their meetings in open day, in the moſt frequented ſtreets of Paris, and even to appear in public, and aſſemble openly in great bodies, in the Pre-aux-Clercs, there to ſing aloud Clement Marot's Pſalms.’ This ought to teach princes, that their perſecuting edicts expoſe them to great inconveniences. This is the cauſe why their bonfires afflict one part of their ſubjects, and why the ſucceſſes of their enemies afford them comfort. If they complain they have bad ſubjects, it ought to be anſwered, it is you who make them ſuch (17); for to pretend, that a perſecuted party will afflict themſelves for the public calamities, which are the ſource of their repoſe, and the foundation of a very plauſible hope of proſperity, is to pretend, that the primitive ages of Chriſtianity ſhould return again; now thoſe times will not come twice. It is to expect, that men ſhould be like thoſe of the Millennium if it ever comes. But let us return to Henry II. When he ſaw that the Proteſtants ‘thought to take advantage of the loſs which he had ſuſtained in the battle of St Quintin, he publiſhed a new edict, forbidding all the judges to moderate the puniſhment of death, and confiſcation of goods, with regard to all thoſe, who ſhould be found not only guilty of Hereſy, but convicted of having brought into France books, printed at Geneva, againſt the doctrine of the Catholic church. Thus they proceeded againſt the Calviniſts more rigorouſly than before (18).’ But as that hindered them not from multiplying, nor even from engaging perſons of the firſt quality in their party, the king ſaw, that, in order to extirpate them, he muſt make peace with the houſe of Auſtria; and this doubtleſs was one of the great motives which made him ſhut his eyes upon the good condition in which he had ſettled his affairs (19). He had ſtopped the progreſs of his enemies, and had even taken ſome very ſtrong places from them. But that ſignified nothing, he choſe rather to grant them all they had a mind to, than not to have his hands at liberty to exterminate the Proteſtants of his kingdom. Thus we have ſeen the ſame court, let ſlip the moſt favourable occaſions of aggrandizing itſelf in the year 1684, in order to apply itſelf ſolely to the ſuppreſſion of the Edict of Nantes. They who ſuffer themſelves to be poſſeſſed with this ſpirit, muſt renounce the title of conquerors. If Henry II had long ſurvived this ignominious peace, which he accepted, we ſhould have ſeen him entirely taken up with tournaments and preſecutions, but he died a little after it was ſigned. Mr Maimbourg is an exceptionable witneſs, as to the joy he ſays the Heretics conceived upon it; his words are theſe (20). ‘Thus he was lamented with moſt unfeigned tears, and infinitely regretted by all his ſubjects, except the Proteſtants alone, who thinking themſelves delivered by his death, from what they called the perſecution of the church, expreſſed in a moſt unworthy manner by their words and actions, and ſcandalous writings, the exceſſive joy which it gave them.’

We may with regard to Henry II make the ſame obſervation which we made concerning Francis I (21). He attacked the party weakly on one ſide, while he made it ſtronger on the other. He put to death ſome inconſiderable private perſons in France, and at the ſame time entered into alliance with the Proteſtants of Germany againſt Charles V, &c. (22). And was fond of the title of protector of the German liberty, which was to ſay at that time, protector of the Proteſtants (23). The other Catholic princes obſerved the ſame conduct (24). I think the following words of Mr le Laboureur are worthy of notice: ‘To pluck the tares from amongſt the wheat (ſays he) (25), GOD will only chuſe princes who are innocent, and of a good life, and will not employ politic hands, as were thoſe of the counſellors of all the Catholic crowns of that time, who only weeded their own fields to caſt the darnel into thoſe of their neighbours, and who perſecuted Hereſy only as a faction againſt authority.’ Charles V, and the kings of Spain his ſucceſſors, have favoured, on many occaſions, the Proteſtants of Germany and France. See the proof of this in the firſt Tome of the Apology for the Catholics (26), compoſed by Mr Arnauld. The Spaniſh ambaſſador ſollicited ſuccours in England for the duke of Rohan. What Grotius writes concerning this is remarkable. ‘Validus eſt rumor, Gonthomerum, & qui in aula Anglica Hiſpanicæ ſunt factionis, apertè profiteri, non debere à Rege Britanniarum deſeri religionis conſortes in Gallia, ne ſi quando vetera jura repetere ipſi ſit animus, deſint, qui partes Anglicas ſequantur (27). —— It is confidently reported, that Gundamor, and thoſe of the Spaniſh faction in the court of England, openly affirm, that the king of Great Britain ought not to deſert thoſe of his own religion in France; leaſt he might want their aſſiſtance, if ever he ſhould think of aſſerting his ancient pretenſions to that crown.’ See in the Political Teſtament of the marquis de Louvois (28), ſome reflexions upon the violences exerciſed in Hungary againſt the Proteſtants, by order of the ſame court, which a little after rendered ſuch great ſervices to the Proteſtants of Great Britain and Holland, whom Lewis XIV and James II were reſolved to oppreſs, as was reported.

[E] Queen Elizabeth of England admired him for his bravery.] Brantôme will inſtruct us about this matter: ‘I have heard, ſays he (29), the preſent queen of England ſay, that he was the king and the prince whom ſhe moſt deſired to ſee, for the great character ſhe had heard of him, and the great renown which he every where had obtained . . . . Being at table, diſcourſing familiarly with thoſe lords, ſhe ſaid theſe words, (after having beſtowed great praiſes on the king) he was a prince that I moſt deſired to ſee of any, and I had already ſent him word that I would quickly ſee him, and for that purpoſe I had given order to have my gallies ſplendidly fitted out (theſe were her words), that I might go over to France on purpoſe to ſee him.’ See the ſame ſtory in the Memoirs of the Dames Galantes, where it is expreſly obſerved, that the queen deſired to ſee Henry II, becauſe he was brave, valiant, generous, and very martial (30).

France very advantageouſly for her huſband [G]. She was not young when ſhe married; for which reaſon the murmurs againſt the peace reached even to her [H]. It is without reaſon that a modern author has attempted to juſtify the conduct of Henry III [I], who paid her, much addicted to ſtudy, and a patroneſs of the learned. She was ſuſpected to have imbibed the new opinions, and to have communicated ſomething of them to Catherine de Medicis (31). See her elogy in Brantôme (32), and in Mr le Laboureur. The latter tells us a paſſage which deſerves to be known. 'Margaret of France, ſays he (33), was married at forty ſix years of age (34), and as ſhe ſeemed to be too old to bear children, it was believed that the noiſe of her great belly was a ſtratagem, to oblige the king to reſtore her more willingly the places he detained. It was on this account that the Sieur Huraut de Bois-Taillé, embaſſador at Venice, wrote a letter of the twenty ſeventh of July 1561, to Bernardin Bochetel, biſhop of Rennes, the French embaſſador in Germany, wherein he had theſe words. It is ſaid that the ducheſs of Savoy is big with child, but I believe, that is done ad aliquid. That report was verified by the birth of Charles Emanuel, grandfather to the preſent duke of Savoy (35).'

[G] Who knew how to bubble the court of France, very advantageouſly for her huſband.] The treaty of Cateau imported 'that in three years the rights which the king pretended to upon the territories of the duke of Savoy, ſhould be examined and regulated by commiſſioners on both ſides (36).' King Francis II, and the duke had named deputies for that purpoſe in the year 1560. The king's deputies made ſix very conſiderable demands; but inſtead of obtaining any thing, France abandoned all the towns ſhe had kept. She ordered by Letters Patents the eighth of Auguſt 1561, 'that there ſhould be reſtored to the duke, Turin, Chivas, Quiers, and Ville Neuve d'Aſt, excepting the ammunition and artillery, in exchange for Pignerol, Savillan, and Perouſe, with their dependencies. Imbert de la Platiere Bourdillon, the king's lieutenant beyond the Alps, formed many difficulties, and ſent great remonſtrances to the council, to hinder the execution of that order; and would not obey it till after three commands, and upon the moſt ſolemn diſcharges imaginable.' The ducheſs plaid her part very well in that negotiation; 'her prudence was praiſed for having obtained by her addreſs the places that ſtill remained undelivered, and which the king's commiſſioners could not guard againſt her gentle way of raiſing an innocent revolt in their hearts, and forcing the moſt impenetrable places.' It is Mr le Laboureur who ſays this (37). Brantôme tells this whole affair at length; the diverſe ſentiments of the miniſters, the oppoſitions formed by Bourdillon, and the manner in which he ſuffered himſelf to be wrought upon. It coſt the duke and ducheſs of Savoy many preſents (38). There remained ſtill three places in Piedmont in the French hands, viz. Pignerol, Savillan, and Perouſe. The ducheſs ſeconded her huſband wonderfully to regain them, when Henry III paſſed by Turin in his return from Poland. I ſhall make uſe of the words of Mr Varillas. 'The duke and ducheſs of Savoy, who propoſed to do what Spain had not been able to accompliſh, when in the moſt flouriſhing condition, that is, to ſend back the French beyond the Alps, made uſe of an artifice wholly new, which was that of diverſions, and feaſts ſucceeding one another ſo faſt that there was ſcarce time left for ſleeping. Some relations that come from very good hands, ſpeak of a magnificent collation which coſt 100000 crowns; the duke and ducheſs were at the expence of it, and to reimburſe themſelves they preſſed Henry III to reſtore to them Pignerol, Savillan, and Perouſe (39).' Henry promiſed to gratify their requeſts, and kept his word: for holding a council at Lyons upon that affair, the evacuation of theſe three places was there concluded on; notwithſtanding the ſtrong reaſons alledged againſt it by the perſon who commanded there. It was the duke of Nevers (§a). 'He had the liberty of ſaying what he pleaſed, and the ſatisfaction that the memorial which he preſented to ſecond his ſpeech, though very long, was read in the preſence of Henry III; but the reſtitution of theſe three places was nevertheleſs reſolved on, and his majeſty gave him orders with his own mouth to evacuate them. He ſhould have ſtopped there, ſince all the world did him the juſtice to believe he had ſatisfied his conſcience and his honour; but he had recourſe to other precautions, which drew upon him the averſion of the court, and hindered him a long time from being re-admitted into the council of ſtate. He obſtinately ſollicited, that the order he had received from the king's mouth ſhould be likewiſe written with the king's own hand; that the queen-mother, the princes of the blood, and the officers of the crown ſhould ſign it, and that it ſhould be regiſtered in the parliament together with the writing, which he had drawn up, deſiring to be diſpenſed with from complying with it, and that the principal cities of the kingdom ſhould inſert it in their archives. All this was almoſt granted him, but not without reproaching him that he affected to ſignalize himſelf at his maſter's coſt, and that he ought to imitate the mareſchal Briſſac, who was content in a like caſe to redouble his moſt humble remonſtrances and to deſire that they would ſend him a ſucceſſor (40).'

[(§a) See his Memoirs, Tom. I. pag. 68. REM. CRIT.]

[H] The murmurs againſt the peace reached even to her.] Brantôme, who lived at that time, tells us very freely ſome circumſtances of theſe murmurs. 'This marriage . . . . coſt France dear, as being obliged to return in one hour all that had been conquered and preſerved in Piedmont and Savoy for the ſpace of thirty years, ſo much king Henry deſired a peace and loved his ſiſter, that he would ſpare nothing in the world to place her well, when yet the greateſt part of France and Piedmont murmured at it, and ſaid it was a little too much. Others thought it very ſtrange, and others very incredible, until they had ſeen it with their own eyes; and even ſtrangers laughed at us for it; and they who loved France and it's intereſt, wept and lamented it, eſpecially thoſe of Piedmont, who did not deſire to return to their firſt maſter. Can the dukes of Savoy juſtly ſtile themſelves maſters and lords of Piedmont, ſince the kings of France were ſo formerly, and are ſtill lawful lords, titulars, and maſters of it, as juſtly belonging to them. As for the ſoldiers who had been a long time accuſtomed to the garriſons, and to the eaſe and delicate ſuſtenance of that country, we need not aſk what they ſaid, how they cried out againſt it, and lamented, and what fine ſpeeches they made upon that occaſion; not only the Gaſcons, but others. Hey-day, ſaid they, muſt ſo many fine and large pieces of ground be given up for one little piece of fleſh about a woman: others cried ſhe had done mighty well to keep her virginity for forty five years (41), to loſe it at laſt for the ruin of France. If they had been as diſorderly, ſeditious, and mutinous, at that time, as we have ſeen them ſince in our civil wars, we may be aſſured every one of them would have taken his ſhare and have ſeized thoſe places, out of which they could not eaſily have been driven (42).' Is it not ſtrange that Mr le Laboureur, who had not long before read theſe words, ſhould come and tell us notwithſtanding, 'that only a few politicians found fault with her being married at ſo dear a rate, and that ALL OTHERS were glad that ſhe carried with her a recompence ſuitable to her merit, and that ſhe had got for her dowry, the territories which had been taken from her huſband (43).' This is the language of a panegyriſt: ſuch a man without any authority, takes upon him notwithſtanding, in the name of the public, to make all the ſteps neceſſary to a panegyric, and is not at all concerned that the fact is refuted by authors of the greateſt credit. Mezerai, who wrote a hiſtory, not a panegyric, agrees much better with the teſtimony of Brantôme, than with le Laboureur (44).

I cannot read theſe words, and even ſtrangers laughed at us for it (45), without crying out, what a happy time was this for the writers of the Low-Countries, and all others, who had no good will to France? What inſults had they not a fair opportunity to make upon it? What gaſconades might they not have publiſhed? For I ſuppoſe they were within a little of the humour of the preſent time.

[I] A modern author has attempted to juſtify the conduct of Henry III.] That modern author is the antagoniſt of Coſtar. The latter was offended that Voiture paid ſo dear for the good reception which that princeſs gave him. The peace of Cateau is not the only monument of the too great weakneſs of Henry II. The impunity of his favourites after the prodigious wealth they had got by ſo unjuſt means [K], is another monument of it. He died of a wound he received in a tournament (g). A ſtrange adventure, and ſtill more extraordinary than fatal, for I do not believe there ever was a monarch who loſt his life on ſuch an occaſion. It would have been infinitely more glorious for him to have loſt his life in a battle, than in theſe mock-fights, or combats of peace; where beſides, he behaved himſelf unſuitably to his dignity, and in a way more becoming a young cavalier, than the royal majeſty [L]. Many reflexions were made upon this ſad deſtiny [M].

ture (46) was cenſured for having ſaid by way of raillery, that he valued a good ſoop more than the panegyric of Pliny, or the longeſt oration of Iſocrates. Monſieur de Girac, adds he, thinks Monſieur de Voiture, is as great a fool as that profane perſon, who ſold his birthright for a meſs of pottage, or that prince of ours, who gave Pignerol for a good meal. To what length doth not one go when carried away by the heat of a diſpute? The ſmalleſt faults which eſcape an adverſary are converted into crimes. Girac, who with regard to another man, would probably have been content to have ſaid, that the word fool was too ſtrong to be employed to expreſs the fault of a prince, accuſeth Coſtar, his enemy, as guilty of treaſon. Conſider well all his words (47). ‘ He has dared, ſays he, by an attempt, which deſerves the ſevereſt puniſhments, to dart his venom and malice againſt the ſacred perſon of our kings. Does not he compare * the liberality of Henry III, to the folly of Eſau, who parted with his birth-right for a meſs of pottage? Does he not call that prince a fool for having reſtored Pignerol to the duke of Savoy, who had the honour to be his uncle, and from whom he expected great ſuccours in the preſſing neceſſity of his affairs? Was ever Lewis XII taken for a fool, who made a preſent of the principality of Bearn to the king of Navarre, and who diſmembered his kingdoms of a part of that importance? Has any body accuſed the people of Rome of folly †, though they frequently gave intire provinces and kingdoms to kings their allies? and if Alexander, as Plutarch ſays, willingly parted with the iſle of Cyprus, as a price for ſome verſes compoſed in his praiſe, can a king of France be looked upon as a mad-man amongſt any that have the leaſt ſhare of common ſenſe, for having reſtored a place to his near relation, who had received him in his dominions with great coſt and magnificence?’ A little after he asks whether Mr Coſtar is not afraid of being puniſhed under the reign of a prince ſo nearly related to Henry, who lived not ſo very long ago? And he cites Guicciardin and Paul Jovius for the extreme veneration the French have for their monarch. He returns often to the ſame accuſation (48); this muſt be attributed to the ſymptoms of a ſort of fever, which ſeizes writers when they are upon replies and rejoinders.

Though he had named all the ſovereigns that gave up cities, or provinces, or even kingdoms from the beginning of the world, he would never have perſuaded men of ſenſe, men verſed in politics, that any one ever made ſuch preſents in circumſtances like thoſe of Henry III, without being guilty of a folly. Henry III gave up Pignerol in favour of a prince, who owed his glorious re-eſtabliſhment to the Spaniards, who in his heart was a violent Spaniard (49), that is, was always ready to favour the moſt formidable enemy France then had. It was to ſuch a duke of Savoy that a place was delivered which opened a way into the kingdom to the enemy, and which kept the ſame duke in awe, and hindered him from leaguing with Spain. But ſome will ſay, that duke had ſo much careſſed Henry III, and been at ſuch vaſt expences to regale him at Turin, was it not reaſonable to regard him as a good and conſtant friend? No, that was not reaſonable: it is only the ignorant who can rely upon the conſtancy of friendſhip among ſovereigns. To ſee the preſents they make and the letters they write in time of peace to one another, one would ſwear they are moſt hearty friends, and would continue ſo all their life: but it is often true that they are negotiating at the ſame time a treaty in order to a rupture, and have no deſign of ſerving one another any farther than till a proper occaſion ſhall preſent itſelf of beginning hoſtilities to advantage. This was never ſo true, as when Henry III was ſo infinitely careſſed at the court of Savoy. The duke was entirely diſpoſed to take advantage of the confuſions he ſaw in France, and to make uſe of the aſſiſtance of the Spaniards to that purpoſe. And he left a ſon who inherited the ſame paſſion and not only ſeized the marquiſate of Saluces, but alſo formed deſigns for the diſmembering of France, and totally ruining the monarchy (50). Can we then ſufficiently blame this blunder of Henry III? See the remark [F] of his article.

[K] His favourites acquired great riches by unjuſt means.] Leſt I ſhould be accuſed of aggravating things, I will make uſe of Mezerai's words. ‘ The expences the diſpoſers of his favour and affairs put him to, a good part whereof they converted to their own advantage, were ſo exceſſive, that he oppreſſed the kingdom with great impoſts, and ran above forty millions of livres in debt. Beſides this, they ruined abundance of families by their damnable avarice. The invention of farmings and monopolies being not then ſo much in uſe, they had another method, which was no leſs pernicious, namely, to accuſe thoſe who were richeſt under the pretence of Hereſy, and other crimes, and to find, or to make, delinquents that they might have their ſpoils, or force them to purchaſe their pardon by their interceſſion (51).’ This hiſtorian had juſt been ſaying that Henry II was not accuſed of any other fault, than of being too eaſy and more capable of being governed than governing himſelf. This is one of the greateſt faults of a king, becauſe generally they who govern him, when he is in that caſe, do more miſchief than if he governed them.

[L] He behaved himſelf unſuitably to his dignity, and in a way more becoming a young cavalier, than the royal majeſty.] This was the judgment of the wiſe, as we learn from an author of that time (52). ‘ A tournament was appointed in St Anthony's ſtreet before the Tournelles, with all the magnificence and pomp imaginable, for as much as the king was one of the combatants, followed by the dukes of Ferrara, Guiſe, and Nemours, which a great many people of good ſenſe thought ſtrange; ſaying, the majeſty of a king ought to be judge of the combat, and not enter the liſts. Even in the old romances, kings, on ſuch occaſions, never attempted acts of common knights, but diſguiſed themſelves, if they had a mind to enter the liſts, or abſtained wholly from it; yet ſuch was the misfortune of the king, that he would have the firſt honour of the juſts. And I believe the deſire he expreſſed for it was to ſhew ſtrangers how dextrous he was at arms, and ſkilled in the management of a horſe. So that thoſe that were near him, durſt not diſſuade him from that enterpriſe. A thing which has ſince opened a diſmal ſcene to France.’

[M] Many reflexions were made upon this ſad deſtiny.] I will not alledge the teſtimony of Proteſtant writers; it is viſible, that of Stephen Paſquier will have greater force (53). ‘ You ſee how our good king Henry died. And as the common people naturally fix their eyes upon the actions of their king, ſo that death did not happen without the commentaries and interpretations of ſome people. For to tell you at large how things happened in France; as ſoon as the peace was concluded, the cardinal of Lorrain, who had been one of the principal mediators of it, declared, in full parliament, that it had been the king's opinion that it ſhould be made on any terms, that he might be more at liberty from thence forward to exterminate and baniſh the Hereſy of Calvin. And in fact on the tenth day of June, he came actually in perſon into parliament to take the opinion of every counſellor concerning the puniſhment of Heretics. Whereupon many gave it with great liberty; ſome being of opinion that he ſhould ſuſpend the puniſhment till the

He never ſpoke after he was wounded [N]; ſo that all the diſcourſes which are aſcribed to him, are only ſtories forged at pleaſure. The ſincerity wherewith the French hiſtorians have confeſſed the faults of this monarch, and the ignominy he brought upon the nation by preferring the counſels of the conſtable before the remonſtrances of the duke of Guiſe [O], is ſcarce to be ſeen in other hiſtorians. The Proteſtants imagined, that they ſhould be gainers by his death, but they experienced ſtill greater ſeverities under Francis II, and humanly ſpeaking they had been intirely ruined in France, if he had lived two years longer [P]. They are accuſed of having expreſſed their joy in too inſulting a manner upon the tragical end of Henry [Q]; but nothing can be more modeſt than Theodore Beza on that ſubject (b). I forgot to obſerve, that this prince, when he was only dauphin, lived in a miſunderſtanding with his brother, decision of a general council, which they ſaid was neceſſary. Whereupon the king was moved with ſo great and juſt a paſſion, that he commanded immediately Montgommery to ſeize ſome of the company, who had given their opinion more freely than he would have them. They were forthwith carried priſoners to the Baſtile. For which reaſon, ſaid theſe new commentators, this diſaſter beſel the king, by God's juſt judgment, as a vengeance upon him for theſe unjuſt impriſonments. That opinions ought to be free, and not ſounded by a king, in order, after hearing them, to commit the counſellors to a cloſe priſon. That God had chaſtiſed him by the hand of that miniſter, who had aſſiſted him in making thoſe impriſonments. Likewiſe that, as on the tenth of June, he had done that diſhonour to the court of parliament, ſo on the tenth of July following, day for day, he loſt his liſe. Thus ſome of the people diſcourſed, according to their particular paſſions, concerning this death; being ignorant, at the ſame time, that the myſteries of God are wholly concealed from us, and ſuch as, by reaſon of our weakneſs, we oſtner refer them to our opinions than to truth.' Anne du Bourg was one of thoſe whom the king ſhut up in the Baſtile, and againſt whom he was moſt enraged, for amongſt other diſcourſe, he ſaid he would ſee him burnt with both his eyes (54). Father Paul obſerves, that the queen-mother was horribly provoked at the Lutherans publiſhing in their manifeſto's, that the wound of the king her huſband in the eye was a puniſhment of GOD for his threats againſt Anne du Bourg, when he ſaid to him, that he would ſee him burnt (55).

[N] He never ſpoke after he was wounded.] Almoſt all the hiſtorians ſay, that a ſplinter of Montgommery's lance flew into the eye of Henry II, and wounded him mortally; but what Mezerai ſays of it, ſeems more probable. 'It happened, ſays he (56), that Montgommery breaking his lance in his breaſt-plate, could not retain his arm, ſo that he gave him a thruſt in the right eye, with the ſtump of it, which remained in his hand, with ſo great violence, that a ſplinter of it paſſed even to the hinder part of his head.' In this manner Montgommery might appear infinitely more criminal, tho' at bottom he had not done it voluntarily. The hiſtorian adds, 'it was not certainly known, even at that time, whether the king ſpoke or not, after he received the wound, the truth being diſguiſed by thoſe that were about him, or rendered uncertain by the different reports, which were ſpread about it, by thoſe who had different intereſts. There are ſome who tell us, the fine remonſtrances he made to his ſon; ſome others add, that when he was carried out of the liſts, he looked towards the Baſtile where the priſoners of parliament were confined, ſaying with a deep ſigh, that he was afraid, he had wrongfully puniſhed innocent men, and that the cardinal of Lorrain, immediately rebuking him exhorted him to reject that thought which was ſuggeſted to him by the tempter. Others maintain, that he loſt his voice and all manner of ſenſe from the moment he was ſtruck (57), which is confirmed by the arguments of many Phyſicians, who ſay that a man becomes neceſſarily dumb, when his brain is wounded or violently ſhaken. Truſt now, after this, to the relations which are ſpread abroad concerning the laſt words of dying men (58).

[O] He preferred the counſels of the conſtable before the remonſtrances of the duke of Guiſe.] The conſtable, who was priſoner from the time of the battle of St Quintin, reſolved to recover his liberty at any price. The Guiſes made too much advantage of his abſence. This was the reaſon, why he negotiated a treaty of peace, in which he granted to the Spaniards all they had a mind to. And he ſo well knew the weak ſide of his maſter, that he eaſily perſuaded him to conſent to that treaty. In vain the duke of Guiſe employed a thouſand demonſtrative reaſons (59), to make him reject a peace which ſacrificed to the Spaniards, the glory of the French name, and more places in one day than they had been able to conquer in an age, the king was deaf to all that. We muſt mention here an obſervation of Brantôme (60); he pretends that Henry II, tired and diſguſted with the inſolence of the Guiſes, reſolved to ſend them home; for which end he was obliged to regain his conſtable, and to terminate the war; he wrote to him therefore, and to the marſhal de St André (61), to negotiate a peace, which they did to our diſadvantage. Let us not forget another artifice; theſe two priſoners and the ducheſs of Valentinois enriched themſelves with the ſpoils of the Heretics, and who can doubt but that, to obtain a peace, they obliged the king to accept of any conditions, that they might more eaſily proſecute the buſineſs of the Inquiſition? it is certain (62) that the cabals of that ducheſs, ſeconded by the conſtable, drew the king into that precipice.

[P] The Proteſtants had been intirely ruined in France, if Francis II had lived two years longer.] It is the opinion of Theodore Beza; for, having drawn out all the reaſons that promiſed them a more proſperous time after Henry's death, he adds (63): 'But God had otherwiſe ordered it, being willing to have the honour that belongs to him, of re-eſtabliſhing his church by his own arm and might alone, which is ſo much the more wonderful, as the reſiſtance of the greateſt men had been moſt furious againſt it. It was therefore in the reign of Francis II, ſucceſſor to Henry, that the rage of ſatan over-flowed beyond all bounds; ſo that it might be ſaid of this reign, which laſted but ſeventeen months, what Jesus Christ ſays in St Matthew, viz. that unleſs thoſe days had been ſhortened, no man could be ſaved: but for the elects ſake they were ſhortened.' The particulars of the meaſures that were taken to ruin that party entirely, are to be ſeen in a few pages of Maimbourg (64). Take notice of the words which he ſets at the head of this detail (65).

[Q] They are accuſed of having expreſſed their joy in too inſulting a manner upon the tragical end of Henry.] I have already cited (66), Maimbourg upon this, and here are the words of Mezerai (67). 'As he was a prince of great goodneſs, he was lamented by all his people, except the new ſectaries, who believed his death would be their liberty and advancement. They were ſo over-joyed at it, that they made ſongs and thankſgivings to God, or rather blaſphemies, daring to ſay, that the Almighty had ſmitten him under the walls of the Baſtile, where he kept the innocent in priſon.' It muſt not be thought ſtrange that, in a great number of people, there are ſome that are indiſcreet; but the hiſtorian of the Reformed churches deſerves to be very much praiſed for obſerving that moderation which the following words expreſs. 'There remained nothing, in all probability, but a moſt horrible ſpectacle of extreme deſolation, when the Lord prevented it. For king Henry, in the midſt of his peaceful triumphs, joined with a marriage . . . . . tilting in the liſts . . . . . . was ſtruck with a counter-blow of a lance . . . . and died the tenth of July following. Strange things were obſerved in the unexpected death of that prince, who in his own nature was gracious and kind, but neither ſaw nor heard but with the eyes and ears of thoſe, who poſſeſſed and governed him at their pleaſure (68).

brother, the duke of Orleans, that coſt France dear [R], and had been more fatal, if the duke had not died. Who knows but the duke of Orleans might have diſputed the ſucceſſion with him [S]. The ladies had the boldneſs to hand horoſcopes about, which could not but foment the jealouſy of theſe two brothers. They had ſhewn thoſe pretended aſtrological predictions to Francis I. Caſtellan confuted them [T], and the event confuted them ſtill more effectually. Several authors ſay, that a famous aſtrologer foretold that Henry II ſhould be killed in a duel [U]. [R] He lived in a miſunderſtanding with the duke of Orleans, his brother, which coſt France dear.] The chief of the Dauphin's faction was Diana of Poitiers, who was his miſtreſs. Which was the reaſon the ducheſs of Etampes ſided with the duke of Orleans. I have ſpoke elſewhere (69) of the prejudice the intrigues of that ducheſs did to the affairs of Francis I.

[S] Who knows whether the duke of Orleans might not have diſputed the ſucceſſion.] Tavanes, who was in his ſervice, and who had a boundleſs paſſion for aggrandizing himſelf, hoped much from the ambition of this prince, ‘ who thought of making himſelf maſter ‘ during the life of the Dauphin, his elder brother. The ‘ emperor Charles V flattered him very much with ‘ hopes, which had much exalted his courage; where- ‘ fore being at the point of death at Farenmonſtier, ‘ where he had raſhly defied death in an infected ‘ houſe, which he choſe on purpoſe, Tavanes, his con- ‘ fident, coming to tell him the news of the exploit ‘ he had performed againſt the garriſon of Calais, ‘ whereof he had killed 800, and taken 400 priſoners ‘ he ſaid to him theſe words; my friend, I am dead, ‘ all our meaſures are broken; my great ſorrow is ‘ that I cannot recompenſe your merit (70).

[T] The ladies had ſhewn Francis I, theſe aſtrological predictions, Caſtallan refuted them. About two years before the death of that prince, ſome ladies, who had a great ſhare in his friendſhip, told him that the ſtars promiſed the duke of Orleans great conqueſts, and prognoſticated that the Dauphin would perform nothing worthy of the quality of a king of France. They talked in this manner becauſe they knew the particular affection of Francis I. for the duke, and they hoped to enrich themſelves by the intereſt of that young prince. They praiſed him, they cryed him up to the skies, and decryed the Dauphin as having a dull and eavy genius, and who had the moſt unfortunate nativity in the world (71). Caſtellan could not bear either their flatteries or ſlanders: but turning to theſe ladies with a ſtern look, he told them that aſtrology was a difficult thing to underſtand, and that it was ſtill more difficult to adjuſt it to human events; he added, that the vanity and impudence of aſtrologers rendered them unworthy of credit; that he had formerly ſtudied thoſe things under Turreau (72), and made as much progreſs in them as another; that for a ſort of amuſement, and for the ſatisfaction of the curious, he had erected the ſchemes of the Dauphin and the duke of Orleans with all poſſible exactneſs; and that according the rules of the aſtrological art, he had found that the duke was to have a good, great, and warlike ſoul; that he was to be ſupported with the forces and friendſhip of the great, and ſhould arrive at a very conſiderable power (73); that the Dau. phin ſhould not be inferior to him either with reſpect to military virtue, or thoſe other qualities that are worthy of a prince; and that he ſhould enjoy a happy reign, and be a moſt ſucceſsful conqueror of his enemies (74). But that all theſe ways of predicting futurities, being vain and dubious, the ſureſt way to gueſs at the fortunes of theſe two princes, was to ground our conjectures upon their manners and genius. The king heard this diſcourſe very favourably; the flatterers of both ſexes were enraged at him. The Dauphin having heard what Caſtellan had ſaid, was extreamly pleaſed with it, not becauſe he had been praiſed, but becauſe his innocence had been declared before Francis I, to whom he afraid leaſt they ſhould render him odious (75), apud quem ne in ſuſpicionem aut odium traheretur metuebat (76). Oh curſed peſts of a court! who can ſufficiently deteſt you? what malice is it to cheriſh by ſo many artifices the jealouſy of two brothers! we muſt not forget that the aſtrology of Caſtellan proved falſe with reſpect to the duke of Orleans. He died a little while after; and yet it had promiſed him a very great power, which Caſtellan conſidered as a thing to come; and he could not conſider it otherwiſe at that time; for this prince died nineteen months or thereabouts before his father, and was not yet twenty four years old.

[U] Many authors ſay, that a famous aſtrologer foretold that Henry II ſhould be killed in a duel.] See what Brantôme ſays of it (77). I have heard, and I have it from good hands, that ſome years before he died, (ſome ſay ſome days) there was an aſtrologer who calculated his nativity and preſented it to him, in which he found, that he was to die in a duel and ſingle combat. The conſtable was preſent, to whom the king ſaid, ſee, friend, what death is foretold me; ah, Sir, anſwered the conſtable, will you believe theſe raſcals, who are only liars and braggadochio's? throw it into the fire. Why ſo, friend, replyed the king? they ſometimes ſpeak truth; I do not care whether I die that death or another, nay, I ſhould rather chuſe it and to die by the hand of any man whatever, provided he was brave and vailant, and I ſhould purchaſe glory by it; and, without minding what the conſtable ſaid to him, he gave that prophecy to be kept by Monſienr de l'Aupeſpine, ordering him to keep it till he asked him for it . . . (78) Now the king was no ſooner wounded, dreſſed, and carried to his chamber, but the conſtable remembering that prophecy, called Monſieur de l'Aupeſpine, and ordered him to go and fetch it, which he did, and as ſoon as he had ſeen and read it, the tears came in his eyes; ah! ſays he, ſee here is the combat and the duel he was to die in, it is done, he is a dead man; it was not poſſible for a diviner to ſpeak better and clearer than this, tho' by their natural temper, or by the inſpiration of their familiar ſpirit, they are always ambiguous, and doubtful, and therefore always ſpeak ambiguouſly, but here he ſpoke very clearly. Curſed be the aſtrologer who propheſied ſo truly and ſo fatally. Thuanus does not, like Brantôme, omit the name of this diviner: he calls him Luke Gauric, and adds, that this ſcheme was erected at the requeſt of Catherine de Medicis, and that it was laughed at till the king received his wound. Thuanus mentions this prediction as a certain matter of fact (79). But they who cite Luke Gauricus's own words, taken from the horoſcope of Henry II, deſerve more credit. Now it is certain by theſe words, that the aſtrologer promiſed a long life to this monarch, and never threatened him with a fatal duel. Gaſſendus has not failed to cite this great example, and to add that Cardan was no leſs miſtaken in the horoſcope of this prince than Gauricus (80). ‘ Conſtat ex Hi- ‘ ſtoriis Henricum II, Galliæ noſtræ Regem obiiſſe ‘ anno ætatis quadrageſimo completo, ex oculari vul- ‘ nere: En autem de eo Gaurici vaticinium in Prog- ‘ noſtico Anni MDLVI. Quoniam in ſui natalis penè ‘ divini ſchemate habuit ſolem ſub gradibus ſuæ alti- ‘ tudinis Veneri ferè partiliter alligatum; quin & Lunam ‘ atque Venerem ſub Arietis Aſteriſmo, per Horoſcopum ‘ progredienteis, vivet fœliciſſimus annos LXX. deductis ‘ duobus menſibus, ſi nutu divino ſuperaverit annos inſalu- ‘ breis LXIII, LXIV, & ſemper vivet in terris pientiſſimus. ‘ Paria ſunt quæ idem Gauricus anteà ediderat, quæ- ‘ que à Sixto (81) referuntur. of that prediction, would be alone ſufficient to make us doubt whether it was made by an aſtrologer [X]. He had ten lawful children, and two natural. Some pretty remarkable particulars are told concerning the mothers of the latter [Y].

Henry II was born at St Germain en Laïe, the thirty firſt of March, 1519. He bore the title of duke of Orleans, when he married Catherine de Medicis, at Marſeilles, the twenty eighth of October, 1533. He was but fourteen years and ſome months old: which made Pope Clement VII, uncle to Catherine, fear that the marriage was not conſummated the wedding-night; and ſome authors pretend, that by the curioſity he had to be

This matter is of ſuch importance, as to deſerve that I ſhould cite a ſecond witneſs; he is not a man who goes upon hear-ſay, he relates what he read in the very writings of Gauricus; he ſaw there the moſt fortunate predictions that could be wiſhed to Henry II. ‘Et memini in Italia quaſdam Ephemerides annuas Lucæ Gaurici, vidiſſe, in quibus cùm pro libertate ſcribendi quæ tunc vigebat, ſingulis principibus Europæis maximas felicitates aut graviſſima damna minaretur, nihil poſtea perinde cecidit, ac ipſe futurum prædixerat. Atque utinam Henricus ſecundus, quem ille extremâ tantum ſenectute, & morbo placidiſſimo fatis conceſſurum dixerat, non ætate potius florenti, & tam acerbo præcipitique fato nobis ereptus fuiſſet (82). —— I remember to have ſeen in Italy, certain annual ephemerides of Luke Gauricus, in which, according to the liberty of thoſe times, he had foretold either great felicity, or terrible diſaſters, to the ſeveral princes in Europe, but nothing happened of all that he had predicted. And would to G O D, that Henry II, who, according to him, was to arrive to an extream old age, and to die of the moſt gentle diſeaſe, had not, on the contrary, been ſnatched away in the flower of his age, by a cruel and violent death.’

[X] The different accounts . . . . . were alone ſufficient to make us doubt whether it was made by an aſtrologer.] Let us ſee Stephen Paſquier's account of it; wherein we do not ſo much as find the name of Gauricus. It turns quite upon other perſons, and other circumſtances. ‘It ſeems that a long time before . . . . this diſaſter had been ſecretly prognoſticated to the king by Hierome Cardan, who, in a ſcheme which he erected of his nativity, promiſed him all things eaſy at the beginning of his reign, but aſſured him in the decline of his life of an unfortunate end, and which, for the Grandeur of a king, he thought himſelf obliged to conceal. There was likewiſe a report ſpread at court, that, upon the cardinal of Lorrain's return from his laſt voyage to Italy, a letter was preſented to him from a Jew of Rome, who was greatly verſed and practiſed in theſe fantaſtical predictions, and divinations, who admoniſhed him carefully to avoid a ſingle combat. Which letters the king having heard read, made no account of them, not imagining, conſidering his high rank, that he ſhould ever fight a duel. Theſe letters were from that time laid up by Monſieur de l'Aubeſpine, who after the king's death ſhewed them to ſeveral lords, as is reported. Beſides it is added (I will not aſſert it for a truth) that the queen remembering theſe letters, and the time that had been prognoſticated, intreated him ſeveral times, that ſince the two preceding days were paſt to his honour and contentment, he would for that third day not enter the liſts, to avoid all accidents, and ſubſtitute ſome other lord in his room. To which however he would not condeſcend. And that on the very day in which he was wounded, the queen ſent a gentleman from her ſeat on purpoſe to intreat him, in her name, to be content with what he had done; he made anſwer, that he would run but once more, in which, as ill fortune would have it, he was wounded (83).’ Obſerve well that Paſquier tells this ſtory only upon an uncertain hear-ſay, of the truth whereof he was not himſelf perſuaded. But takes ſtill more particular notice, that it is not ſaid, that Cardan publiſhed that pretended horoſcope after the death of Henry II. And yet he was vain enough and ſufficiently bigotted to aſtrology (84), to have deſired to take the glory of ſo ſurpriſing a diſcovery. Nothing could have dignified his art ſo much as that, he might have called to witneſs the conſtable of Montmorenci, Catherine de Medicis, Aubeſpine, and other perſons of the higheſt rank. For what cauſe could he have neglected the intereſts of his glory and fortune (85) in ſuch a manner? We have ſeen in the foregoing remark, what Gauricus promiſed Henry II, in the year 1556. Let us ſee what he predicted to him four years before. Inclitiſſimus Gallorum Rex, this is what he put at the bottom of the ſcheme of the king's nativity in the Venice edition, 1552, printed by Curtius Trojanus Navò, ‘Henricus Chriſtianiſſimus, erit Regum quorundam Imperator, ante ſupremos cineres ad rerum culmina perveniet, fœliciſſimamque ac viridem ſenectam, uti colligitur ex Sole Venere & Luna horoſcopantibus, & potiſſimum, Sole in ſuo trono partiliter ſupputato. In civitatibus Arieti ſubjectis maximum ſortietur dominium, ſi forte ſuperaverit ſuæ ætatis annos 56, 63, 64, ad annos 69 Menſes 10 dies 12 facili ac fœlici tramite perducetur (86). —— The moſt Chriſtian king Henry ſhall rule over certain kings, arrive at the height of power, and live to a happy and vigorous old age, as is plain from the Sun, Venus, and the Moon, ſtrong in the aſcendant in partile aſpect, and chiefly from the Sun, being in his exaltation. He ſhall obtain great dominion in the ſtates, lying under Aries, if he ſurvive the fifty ſix, ſixty three, ſixty four, to the ſixty ninth year, ten months, and twelve days of his age, and ſhall enjoy great felicity.’

[Y] Some pretty remarkable particulars are told concerning the mothers of the two natural children.] Read what follows out of Brantôme (87). ‘Henry II who was of an amorous complection, when he went to viſit the ladies, did it in the moſt ſecret manner poſſible to prevent any ſuſpicion of their diſhonour; and if any of them were diſcovered, it was not by his fault, or by his will, but rather by the ladies, as I have heard ſay of one Madam Fleming, a Scotch lady of a good family, who being with child by the king, did not mince the matter, but ſpeaking boldly in her French Scotch, ſaid, I have done all that I could, ſo that by good fortune I am with child by the king, which I take to be a great honour and happineſs; I think there is ſomething ſweeter and more delicate in the blood royal, than in any other, ſo well I find myſelf after it, without reckoning the good preſents that attend it. His ſon whom he had by her then, was the late grand prior of France, who was lately killed at Marſeilles (88), which was a very great loſs; for he was a very honourable, brave, and valiant lord.’ What I have to ſay of the other miſtreſs, is a ſingularity of another nature. ‘The Dauphin, afterwards king Henry II, falling in love, with a young lady of Cony in Piedmont (89), in the journey that he made thither with the conſtable of Montmorenci, his ſervants ſet the houſe on fire in the night; and the danger giving acceſs to all people, they ran there in great numbers, crying ſalva la Donna, and taking her out, they carried her to the Dauphin (90).’ He had a daughter by her, called Diana, who had for her firſt husband, Horatio Farneſe, duke of Caſtro, and for her ſecond, Francis duke of Montmorenci, eldeſt ſon to the conſtable. The ſecond marriage commenced the fifth of May 1557 (91), and ended by the death of her husband, ſixth of May 1579 (92). The only ſon they had, died before his father. The widow lived to the third of January 1619, being above eighty years of age. She mediated a reconciliation between Henry III and Henry IV, and tenderly loved Charles de Valois, her nephew, natural ſon to king Charles IX. She ſaved his life, when Henry IV would have involved him in the affair of the duke of Biron. She repreſented to that prince, that it was too much his intereſt to render ſacred and inviolable the heads of the natural ſons of kings, not carefully to avoid the eſtabliſhing of ſo fatal a precedent againſt them. She married that nephew to Charlotte de Montmorenci, her husband's niece, and left his children heirs of all her eſtate, and of the palace of Engoulême (93), which ſhe had at Paris (94).

be informed about it, he found ſuch proofs as ſatisfied him [Z]. This young prince came to be Dauphin, the tenth of April, 1536, by the death of his elder brother. We have ſeen elſewhere (i), that his wife was barren ſeveral years, and afterwards bore him many children. He perſecuted his ſubjects of the Reformed religion, with the utmoſt cruelty, and yet he forged thoſe arms himſelf, which aided them moſt effectually to maintain their cauſe [AA]; for by his means the Proteſtants of Germany put their affairs in ſo good a poſture, as to be able to ſend great ſuccours to the Calviniſts of France. The compariſon which has been made betwixt his reign, and the latter years of Francis I. teaches us, that a prince which is too liberal of his favours, is more prejudicial to his kingdom, than a prince who is exceſſively ſparing of them [BB]. Henry the ſecond's fault

[Z] Some authors pretend, that by the curioſity which Clement VII had to be informed about it, he found ſuch proofs as ſet his mind at reſt.] I have read this, only in Mr Varillas. 'The interview of his holineſs, ſaith he (95), and of his majeſty, was at Marſeilles, and the nuptials of the duke of Orleans and Catherine were there celebrated with great magnificence. As the bridegroom was but ſixteen years old, and the bride but thirteen, the king, who was unwilling to hazard his ſon's health, would have had the conſummation of the marriage deferred for two or three years. But this did not reliſh with the Pope; who feared, that if he ſhould happen to die before his neice's marriage was conſummated, ſhe would be ſent back to Italy. And indeed he was not ſatisfied, ſays Paul Jovius, till he had ſeen certain proofs of the conſummation of the marriage.' If Paul Jovius has made mention of ſuch a circumſtance, it is not in the place of his hiſtory, where he ſpeaks of that interview of the Pope and Francis I, which yet was the moſt proper place, and the moſt natural occaſion of touching upon that particular, eſpecially conſidering, that the author forgot not to take notice of the tender age of the duke of Orleans. And to make many other obſervations; and even to ſay, that the marriage was conſummated the firſt night. 'Augebant ſuſpicionem maturatæ nuptiæ, quæ impares regio ſanguini viderentur. Siquidem nobiliſſimus adoleſcens Henricus, quanquam ætate tenerior, Catharinam celebratis inſigni ceremonia nuptiis, ex virgine mulierem prima nocte reddiderat (96). —— The haſtening of the nuptials, which ſeemed unſuitable to the royal blood, increaſed the ſuſpicion. For Henry, tho' very young, after celebrating the marriage with great magnificence, enjoyed Katharine the firſt night.'

I confeſs then, that Mr Varillas may be ſuſpected to have cited Paul Jovius wrong. What he ſays of the bridegrom's being ſixteen years old, and the bride thirteen, is not exact. For it is certain, that Henry II was born the thirty firſt of March, 1519, and that he married Catherine de Medicis, the twenty eighth of October, 1533 (97). Father Anſelm, who dates his birth the thirty firſt of March, 1518, adds, that it was before Eaſter, and conſequently, that that year was 1519, new ſtile. He ſays alſo, that Catherine was born the thirteenth of April, 1519. Gauricus ſets down the ſame day and year in that lady's nativity. There was therefore but fourteen days difference betwixt their ages. Spondanus is no leſs miſtaken than Varillas, ſince he ſays, that Catherine was but thirteen years, and that Henry was fifteen years and ſeven months (98).

[AA] He forged thoſe arms himſelf which aided the Proteſtants the moſt effectually to maintain their cauſe.] See what I have ſaid concerning this in the remark [D], and join to it this paſſage of Stephen Paſquier (99), 'we ſaw the emperor Charles V make war upon his German ſubjects, for having embraced hereſy . . . . His affairs went on ſucceſsfully; this made them implore our aſſiſtance. Could there be any thing more plauſible in point of intereſt of ſtate, as politicians judge of it, than to take their cauſe in hand, not to ſuffer a great prince to aggrandize himſelf ſtill more at our very gates, by the ruin of all the princes of Germany? but, on the other hand, could there be any thing more unjuſt than to aſſiſt a ſubject againſt his lawful ſovereign? and eſpecialy to take the part of a Heretic, againſt a Catholic emperor, who fought only for the honour of GOD, and the good of his church? our king was a Catholic prince, as were alſo the lords who had the greateſt ſhare in his favour; yet, notwithſtanding, we take upon us the protection of the German Heretics; and the king in full parliament cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed by the glorious title of protector of the German liberty, that was to ſay of the German hereſy; and as ſuch cauſed money to be coined bearing that inſcription. Under that ſpecious title he undertook this expedition with a powerful army; wherein things ſucceeded in ſuch a manner, that upon the meer fame of our enterprize, when we were on the point of paſſing the Rhine, the emperor was forced to come to an agreement with his ſubjects, and to grant them many privileges againſt the honour of GOD, and his conſcience, whom he would not otherwiſe have tolerated. As for my part, I firmly believe, that GOD afterwards was pleaſed to chaſtiſe us with the ſame rods, wherewith we afflicted the emperor. Having permitted, that, after Henry's deceaſe, his children, while minors, ſhould be made war upon by their ſubjects, for the maintenance of an opinion more violent than that of Luther, and that they ſhould make uſe of the aſſiſtance of the German princes againſt them. And when GOD was pleaſed to exerciſe his vengeance upon us, it was paſt all human power to put a ſtop to it, whence all the remedies that we thought to apply to it, turned to our deſtruction.' Paſquier makes another remark, which doth not appear to me to be good. 'At our return, ſays he, from that fine German expedition (100), Calvin began to ſollicit one after another by letters, who ſuffered themſelves to be eaſily overreached, thinking, probably, that ſince the king and his council had undertaken the protection of the Lutherans, they were in their hearts of the ſame religion. Thus by little and little the ſeeds of a new religion ſpread through France, which at length came to the noble parts, I mean, even to princes and great lords.' The author here commits two faults, he ſuppoſes, that Calvin did not begin to ſollicit the French by letters, till towards the end of the year 1552. Which is falſe; for he had never ceaſed to do it ſince the year 1536; and beſides, it is not true, that the French could believe, that the king and his council were Lutherans in their hearts. They, of the very contrary, could not doubt, ſince they ſaw him perſecute with fire and ſword, thoſe of the new religion over all his kingdom. The protection that he granted, and the good offices he did the Proteſtants of Germany, were of no force to elude this proof of his averſion to their ſect. That only ſhewed, that he ſacrificed the intereſts of his religion to the political intereſts of his ſtate. This is the common courſe of ſovereigns. Though they ſometimes take another, and ſacrifice to the ſpirit of perſecution, not only the conqueſts they might make, but even thoſe they have already made, and the moſt ſolid advantages of their kingdom. Henry II was an inſtance of this, when he accepted of the peace of Cateau.

[BB] A prince too liberal of his favours is more prejudicial to his kingdom, than a prince who is too niggardly of them.] A French civilian (101) has maintained. 'that they are in a great error, who praiſe and adore the goodneſs of a gentle, gracious, courteous, and ſimple prince; for ſuch ſimplicity without prudence, is moſt dangerous and pernicious in a king, and much more to be feared than the cruelty of a ſevere, moroſe, rough, covetous, and inacceſſible prince. And methinks our fore fathers have not uſed this proverb without cauſe, An ill (102) man makes a good king: which may ſeem ſtrange to delicate ears, and which are not accuſtomed to weigh the reaſons on both ſides. By the indulgence and fooliſh ſimplicity of too good natured a prince, it comes to paſs that flatterers and paraſites, and the worſt of men, carry off all of-fault was the ill management of his revenues, by which means he perverted the adminiſtration of them, and contracted immenſe debts [CC]. fices, employments, benefices, and grants, draining the treaſures of a kingdom; by which means the poor people are gnawed to the very bones, and cruelly enſlaved by the great: ſo that for one tyrant there are ten thouſand, &c. To confirm this poſition by examples, he afterwards adds what follows (103). ‘We have ſeen this kingdom great, rich, and flouriſhing in arms and laws, towards the latter end of the reign of Francis I, when he became moroſe and inacceſſible, and when no body durſt approach him to aſk any thing of him; then governments, offices, and benefices, were only given to the merit of men of honour; and penſions were ſo retrenched, that there was found in his treaſury, when he died, a million of gold, and ſeven hundred thouſand crowns, and the March quarter to receive, whilſt there was nothing due, except a little to the Griſons, and to the bank of Lyons, which they did not pay, that they might keep them in their duty: peace was ſettled with all the princes of the earth; the frontiers extended even to the gates of Milan; the kingdom full of great commanders, and the learnedeſt men in the world. We have afterwards ſeen in the twelve years that Henry II reigned, (whoſe bounty was ſo great, as not to be parallelled by any prince of his age) the ſtate almoſt quite changed; for as he was gentle, gracious, and good natured, he could refuſe no body any thing: thus the treaſures of his father in a few months being exhauſted, places of truſt were more than ever expoſed to ſale, benefices given without regard to merit, civil offices ſold to the higheſt bidder, and conſequently to the moſt unworthy: taxes greater than ever they were before; and yet when he died, his Exchequer was found in debt forty two millions: after having loſt Piedmont, Savoy, Corſica, and the frontiers of the Low-Countries. And yet theſe loſſes were but inconſiderable in reſpect of reputation and honour. If the gentleneſs of this great king had been accompanied with ſeverity; if his goodneſs had been mixed with rigour; his facility with auſterity, they had not ſo eaſily drawn from him every thing that they aſked of him.’ The opinion of this learned man ſeems a paradox at firſt ſight, but if it be examined nearly, it will be found to be well-grounded.

[CC] He perverted the adminiſtration of his finances, and contracted immenſe debts.] ‘There was an ordinance of Francis I. confirmed by his ſucceſſor, importing, that there ſhould be four keys to the Exchequer-cheſt, whereof the king ſhould have one, and the others ſhould be in the hands of commiſſioners appointed by him; and the disburſements of the money ſhould be made by order of the king, in preſence of the treaſurer and of the comptroller of the Exchequer. But king Henry II, by an edict ſome time after granted * diſcharges to the commiſſioners and officers of the Exchequer, that no body afterwards might call them to an account: nay, one of theſe commiſſioners had at one time, purely as a gift, an hundred thouſand crowns, given him, if the rumour which went of it every where be true: which was then a very great ſum (104).’ It is Bodin who makes this obſervation, and a little after adds (105), that Francis I. did not make ſo many largeſſes during a reign of thirty two years, as his ſucceſſor did in two. Francis I. had ſcarce cloſed his eyes, but the Tilletage, or money which is given for the renewing of commiſſions, which was then a prodigious ſum, was given to a ſingle perſon (106). See how this is expreſſed in the Latin tranſlation. Nondum juſta Parenti fecerat (Henricus ſecundus) cum Hirudo quædam Palatina Pecuniæ vim infinitam, quam officiarii, accepta confirmatione, regibus initiatis fiſco dependere, ſolent, uno abſorbuit & eodem hauſtu (107). This prince's prodigality was the cauſe doubtleſs of his laying new taxes on his ſubjects, forgetting the promiſes he had made, when he impoſed them. Conſider well theſe words of Bodin (108); ‘When the Taillon was laid on the ſubjects in the year 1549, the king promiſed not to employ or appropriate it to any other uſe beſides the paying the Gendarmery, without confounding this revenue with any other: which was alſo promiſed, when the tax for payment of fifty thouſand foot was impoſed in Francis the firſt's time, which was only to be raiſed in walled towns, and their ſuburbs, which did not ſuffer by the number of ſoldiers; and yet ſince it has been extended equally to cities, towns, and villages, great and ſmall, in the year 1555, by which the poor countrymen are doubly oppreſſed; for they pay and are pillaged on all ſides.’ The bad management of this king, produced another diſorder, which was the borrowing great ſums at high intereſt: ‘When king Henry had occaſion for money, he borrowed at ten, twelve, nay ſixteen, per cent. as he did in the year 1554, of the Caponi, the Albici, and their partners in Germany; and the intereſt was paid at the four fairs, or became part of the principal. The emperor did the like on his part; but it is true, he gave but ten or twelve per cent. at moſt; and the ſame year the king of England borrowed from the German merchants an hundred thouſand crowns, at 12 per cent. And whereas Henry thought, by giving greater intereſt than the emperor, and the king of England, to command a greater ſupply, he began to ſink his credit by it; for the wiſeſt managers concluded, that at long run he would neither be able to pay principal nor intereſt; for as much as 16 per cent. came at leaſt to 18, by means of the intereſt, which he could not pay (109).’ Note, that he was not the inventer of this practice; it began in his father's time. ‘This was alſo a project brought into France in the year MDXLIII by cardinal de Tournon, when he was in favour with Francis I, whom he perſuaded, by the ſuggeſtion of ſome Italians, that there was no way of drawing money into France from all parts, and making a fund for the time to come, to fruſtrate it's enemies, but by eſtabliſhing a bank at Lyons, and taking in money from all hands, paying 8 per cent. But at bottom the cardinal wanted to ſecure a hundred thouſand crowns, which he had in his coffers, and receive as much intereſt as he could for it. The letters-patent having paſſed the ſeals, and the Bank being opened in the manner above related, every one ſtrove who ſhould firſt get there from France, Germany, and Italy: ſo that Francis I, when he died, was indebted to the bank of Lyons five hundred thouſand crowns, which he had in his coffers, and four times as much; and there was a ſettled peace with all the world (110).’ Bodin (111) condemns that invention ſuggeſted to Francis I. He thinks that it ruins the foundation of the finances, and that it proved the origin of a thouſand misfortunes. Let us cite him once more (112). And as to the treaſury, ſays he, it was ſo ill managed, that in leſs than twelve years that Henry II reigned, he (113) owed more intereſt, than all his predeceſſors, forty years before, had raiſed for all their expences.

I am perſuaded theſe citations from Bodin, will not be diſagreeable to ſuch as deſire to know the epochas of taxes, and the original of cuſtoms in general.

[DD] Henry II firſt made Polygamy a capital crime.] This I find in Bodin, ‘Imperatores, ſays he (114), perpetua lege πολυγαμίαν infamiæ pœna ſubjecta vetuerunt †: noſtris vero legib. pœna capitalis Henrici II principatu irrogari cœpit. —— The emperors, by a perpetual law, prohibited Polygamy, under the penalty of infamy: but in the reign of Henry II it was firſt made a capital crime by our laws.’ The author of the Miſcellanies of Hiſtory and Learning was probably ignorant of this particular. For ſee how he expreſſes himſelf, ‘Some parliaments in France, condemn to death thoſe whoſe are convicted of Polygamy, becauſe they ſuppoſe it to be a law

I ſhall add a thing which I find in a letter of Bodin's. Pope Julius III ſummoned this prince to appear before GOD, to anſwer for the wrong he did to him by keeping poſſeſſion of Miranda. The king anſwered that he would appear there, but that he was fully perſuaded that the Pope would not appear (n).

As for me, I believe it is not for Polygamy they ſend theſe people to the gallows, but for the impoſtures, whereby they ſurprize the women which they thus trepan into marriage (115).’

HENRY III, king of France, ſon of Henry II and Catherine de Medicis, had obtained ſo much renown before he was king, and even before he was twenty years old, that the Poles thought him worthy of their crown; but they had ſoon reaſon to repent of that election. The manner in which he ſtole away from Cracow, is one of the moſt ſhameful actions in the world. The reaſon of that flight, was his deſire of inheriting the crown of France after Charles IX. He indeed reigned after him, and in ſuch a manner, that the Poles had no reaſon to regret the loſs of him. It may be ſaid of him, as it was of Galba, that he would have been thought worthy of a crown, if he had never wore one [A]. His life was ſo divided betwixt debaucheries and devotions, that a more ſtrange mixture was never ſeen. He gave himſelf into the hands of his minions, with ſo little reſerve, that all France was offended with it; more eſpecially, becauſe the exceſſive expences he was at for them [B], turned to the charge of the poor people. He incurred the hatred of the ladies, which was very prejudicial to him [C]. The

[A] It may be ſaid of him, as it was of Galba, that he would have been thought worthy of a crown if he had never wore one.] Every body is acquainted with the following ſaying of Tacitus. ‘ Major privato viſus (Galba) dum privatus fuit, & omnium conſenſu capax Imperii, niſi imperaſſet (1). —— Galba was thought more than a ſubject while he was one, and would have been thought worthy of the empire by all, if he had not reigned.’ Suetonius ſays the ſame in other words, ‘ Majore adeò & favore & auctoritate adeptus eſt quam geſſit Imperium (2). —— He obtained the empire with more favour and authority, than he governed it.’ The ſame judgment has been made of the emperor Jovian (3); but the quite contrary was ſaid of Marius (4). Our Henry III verified, to his coſt, this judicious maxim, Magiſtratus virum prodit (5): he ſhewed by wearing a crown, that they were miſtaken, who thought him worthy to wear it. The words of Caſſiodorus cannot reaſonably be applied to him. Hic eſt probatæ conſcientiæ gratiſſimus fructus, ut quamvis ſumma potuerit adipiſci; judicetur tamen ab omnibus plus mereri (6). Much leſs could it be ſaid of him, magna eum præceſſerat fama, qua major inventus eſt (7).

[B] The exceſſive expences he was at for his minions.] ‘ (8) The principal employment, and greateſt pleaſure of the king, conſiſting in pleaſing two favourites (9), he declared that he could not be content till he had made them as great as himſelf, and rendered them, as he ſaid, ſo potent, that it ſhould not be in the power, either of envy or fortune to deſtroy them. He reſolved then, having no daughters to beſtow on them, to marry them to his wife's ſiſters, Margaret, and Chriſtierne, though they were already betrothed to two other heireſſes . . . but in order to honour them with ſome title that might qualify them for ſuch an high alliance as his, he reſolved to make them both dukes and peers of France . . . . In the mean time, the duke of Lorrain brought his nieces with ſuch a train and magnificence, as if he had been to marry them to kings. As for Chriſtierne, being as yet very young, ſhe was only betrothed to the duke of Epernon; and yet ſhe never was married to him, but choſe rather to take the veil. As for Margaret ſhe was betrothed at the Louvre, in the queen's chamber, and the nuptials were celebrated eight days after, in the church of St Germain de l'Auxerrois. It would be ſuperfluous to deſcribe the Maſquerades, Balls, Tournaments, Feaſts, and Muſic, and all the other pomps which luxury invented, for the wedding. In a word, it laſted near ſix weeks; and Paris, the Theatre of Wonders, had never ſeen any thing like it. The king, dreſſed in the ſame manner as his favourite, led the bride to church . . . . after the marriage, he appointed ſeventeen entertainments, which were made in order by the princes and lords who were related to the lady: the leaſt of them came to more than a hundred thouſand livres: at each of which, the gueſts had changes of ſuch rich and precious habits, that gold and ſilver cloth could make no figure there. There were ſuits which coſt ten thouſand crowns for the workmanſhip. In fine, the expence was ſo prodigious, that the king for his part only, ſpent no leſs than four millions of livres; beſides, he promiſed to pay the huſband, for his wife's fortune, four hundred thouſand crowns in two years time; and when he was told, that theſe exceſſive profuſions would ruin him, he anſwered, that after he had married his two children, he would be frugal. He meant Joyeuſe and Epernon.’ The Swiſs embaſſadors ‘ coming to Paris to demand the money that was due to them, and the treaſurers anſwering, that the king had none, and that they muſt have patience, they replied, according to the uſual liberty of their nation, that it was not credible, that a prince, ſo wiſe and ſo prudent, ſhould ſpend 1200000 crowns for his pleaſure at the marriage of a gentleman, and not have much more in his coffers for the public occaſions of his kingdom (10).’

[C] He incurred the hatred of the ladies, which was very prejudicial to him. ‘ The ladies, to whom the minions told all, diſcovered to the duke of Guiſe, all the ſecrets of the cabinet, to revenge themſelves of the king, whom they hated, for certain reaſons which are not told (13).’ Theſe are Mr Maimbourg's words, which ſhew plainly how much the ladies prejudiced the king; but the reaſons of their hatred are intelligibly enough explained by many hiſtorians. See, in the margin, the words of Mezerai (14). The obſervation mentioned by the author of the News from the Republic of Letters, is a meer cavil. Some critics, ſays he (15), have found fault with Maimbourg for ſaying, That the ladies to whom the minions told all, &c. They ſay, that theſe words are highly diſobliging to the fair ſex, becauſe they inſinuate, that women conceive an averſion for men, who make no addreſſes to them. Now, ſay they, if they are chaſt, what is it to them, if they are neglected? They ought ſure to be very indifferent about it. If they are not ſo, it is a manifeſt ſign they do not deſire to be chaſt. But I think myſelf obliged to take Mr Maimbourg's part, againſt ſuch unreaſonable critics: I ſay then, that he ſpeaks only of the ladies that were in the intrigues of the duke of Guiſe (16); and it is not to be doubted, but that women of that character do violently hate, when they have ſuch reaſons for it as are here to be underſtood. Conclude as much as you pleaſe, that if they were virtuous, it would be indifferent to them. Say, if you will, that this concluſion is diſobliging. Mr Maimbourg has taken precautions, in his preface, againſt ſuch ſort of ſubtilties; he declares, that he ſeeks for truth, and not for what may pleaſe, and that if any one finds fault with it, they muſt blame thoſe who

(16) It is certain he means the ladies in general.

The ducheſs of Montpenſier revenged herſelf terribly for ſomething the king had ſaid of her [D]. The duke of Guiſe, by this concurrence of circumſtances, and by the troubles of religion, growing bolder than he would have been otherwiſe, to prepare his way to the throne, found that the weakeſt princes are ſometimes capable of a vigorous reſolution. He was maſſacred by order of Henry III. I have ſpoke elſewhere (a) of the conſequences of that affair; but I have not ſaid, that without the aſſiſtance of the Proteſtants, this monarch would have been oppreſſed at Tours, where the League attacked him (b), ſome months after he had put to death the duke and cardinal de Guiſe. Being delivered from that danger, he laid ſiege to Paris, and had doubtleſs brought that ſeditious city to it's duty, had he not been aſſaſſinated by James Clement, a Dominican. He died the ſecond of Auguſt, 1589, the day after he was wounded (c). I have ſaid in another place (d) that he has been juſtly blamed for yielding ſome towns to the duke of Savoy, who had accompanied him as far as the bridge of Beauvoiſin in September 1574 [E]. He had reaſon to repent of that ceſſion; for it encouraged the ſon of that duke to form ſome enterprizes againſt France [F].

There ſcarce ever was a prince born under a more capricious planet than Henry III. His capricious fortune made him experience a fate, not unlike that of thoſe children, who are firſt educated by a tender mother, and afterwards by a cruel ſtep-mother. The glory of his youth was very ſhining, and procured him the kingdom of Poland in a very glorious and ſhining manner, but that dazling light was quickly eclipſed: He abandoned that crown a little after, more ignominiouſly than he gained it glorioully at his election; for what can be ſeen more ſtrange and ſhameful, than a monarch running away in the darkneſs of the night, and flying out of his own dominions, as ſwiftly as if he had been a criminal who had diſcovered a provoſt-marſhal at his heals? Thus it was that Henry III abandoned Poland (e). If that eſcape could be excuſed, upon the intereſt he had to make haſte to ſucced to an inheritance much better than the ſceptre he wore; we might ſtill juſtly ſay, that he muſt be born under a very unfortunate conſtellation, and Diis iratis, ſince he found himſelf reduced to ſuch extremities, who have formed the laws of hiſtory, who require us to tell things as they are, and not as they ought to be.

There is too much ſubtilty in this reflexion; it is natural for us to deſire, that the talents ſhould not fall into contempt. This, I ſay, is natural, though we deſire not to make an ill uſe of thoſe qualities. The raillery is carried too far in the voyage of Meſſieurs la Chapelle and Bachaumont, upon the ſubject of the anger that is aſcribed to the ladies of Montpellier, againſt the unfortunate Daſſoucy.

[D] The ducheſs of Montpenſier (17) revenged herſelf terribly for ſomething he ſaid of her.] ‘It was told the king, that the League deſigned him no leſs a miſchief than the making him a monk, and that the ducheſs of Montpenſier ſhewed the ſciſſars which ſhe had prepared to cut off his hair. The reaſon was, that he had offended this widow, by holding ſome diſcourſe, which diſcovered ſome ſecret blemiſhes of her's; a more unpardonable affront to the fair ſex, than that which is offered to their honour (18).’ That affront was deeply rooted in that ducheſs's heart, if we judge of it by the active zeal ſhe ſhewed to deſtroy Henry III. ‘She brought a good part of the materials from the invention of her genteel wit, and the labour of her body to build the aforeſaid league; ſo that after it had been well-formed, playing at cards one day at Primero (for ſhe loved play), one ſaying to her, that ſhe ſhould ſhuffle the cards well, ſhe anſwered before a great deal of company, I have ſhuffled them ſo well, that it is impoſſible to ſhuffle, or unſhuffle, them better. This had been well, if her relations had not been killed, the loſs of whom, without being dejected at it, ſhe undertook to revenge. As ſoon as ſhe heard the news in Paris, without ſhutting herſelf up in her chamber to lament and mourn for them, according to the faſhion of other women, ſhe came out of her palace, with her brother's children in her hands, and leading them through the city, ſhe made her lamentation before the people, animating them with tears and cries, with her pitiful and moving diſcourſe, which ſhe made to all, to take up arms, to make a a violent inſurrection, and to inſult the palace, and picture of the king, as we have ſeen, and I hope to relate in his life, to renounce their allegiance, and to enter into rebellion againſt him, which was quickly followed by his murther; from which we may know who are the men and women who adviſed it, and are guilty of it (19).’ It was ſhe who prevailed moſt with James Clement to kill the king. She ſpared nothing to bring it about, not even what, as is ſaid, they call the laſt favour (20).

[E] In September, 1574.] The king arrived the fifth of September, 1574, at the bridge of Beauvoiſin, and not on the twenty firſt of September, 1575, as is ſaid by two or three hiſtorians (21), whom John Aymes de Chavigny cenſures, in the 224th page of the firſt face of his French Janus. Thus he calls his explication of Noſtradamus.

[F] To form enterprizes againſt France.] The author of the firſt Savoiſienne (22) reports (23), that when Henry III returning from Poland paſſed by Savoy, he was asked as a recompence for a collation, the towns of Pignerol and Savillan, and that this prince, whoſe only fault was too much good-nature, granted it; that the duke of Savoy, ſon of him who received this noble preſent (24), took advantage of the confuſions of France in 1588, for ſeeing king Henry III out of his capital city, he invaded the marquiſate of Saluces; that after having ſent an embaſſador to the king, with promiſe to reſtore all into his hands, he degraded, all at once, the officers of his majeſty, and eſtabliſhed others by his ducal authority . . . . and at the ſame inſtant to diſplay every where the trophies of his victory, he cauſed a proud medal to be ſtruck, whereon was the figure of a centaur trampling under foot a crown reverſed, with this device, Oportunè. Which was to ſhew he knew how to take his opportunity (25). We ſee, in the ſecond Savoiſienne, that after the death of Henry III he made himſelf maſter of many places in Provence; which obliged Henry IV to ſeize Savoy, to bring him to reaſon. Obſerve, that in return for his medal (26), the king cauſed another to be ſtruck, on which was a Hercules armed after the antique way, trampling a centaur under foot, over whom he lifts up his club with his right hand, and with his left a crown, which he ſeems to have taken up; and the device, which as a ſoul was to animate this body, was the word, Oportuniùs; to ſhew that he knew better than he how to ſeize an opportunity, and more honourably; ſince he had employed force of arms inſtead of ſurprizes, which the other had practiſed with great ingratitude (27). This repaired the miſchief, which the ceſſion of Pignerol had occaſioned; but the fault of Henry III was not thereby rendered the more excuſable.

The author of a piece that reflects very much on the preſent duke of Savoy (28), has mentioned this affair, but not without ſome errors. Henry III, ſays he (29), being engaged in a war againſt a potent league, Charles Emanuel, grandfather (30) to his royal highneſs, acted much the ſame part he has done at preſent. He conceived great hopes, for his fortune, if he ſhould lay hold on that opportunity of declaring againſt France, and in the year 1588 he actually joined his arms with as not to be able to ſucceed to the king, his brother, but upon thoſe terms. This would always be a ſign, that his fortune maliciouſly led him through perplexed and entangled ways. The world looked for him in himſelf, after his return to France, but could not find him. The duke of Anjou, who had acquired ſo great a reputation (f), was quite loſt in the perſon of Henry III. There was nothing to be ſeen in him then but the humour of a man-hater [G]. Here follow ſome other caprices of this monarch's fortune. He had a brother who was a heavy burthen upon his ſhoulders: death delivered him from this burden; he was overjoyed at that deliverance, and this itſelf ought to be reckoned a misfortune; for what can be more odd, than to be reduced to rejoice at the death of an only brother? But however, this would be ſtill a ſort of advantage, if it was the ſource of many laſting advantages. But it did not prove ſo to Henry III; for he quickly found, that the duke of Alençon's death, whatever advantages attended it, was more prejudicial than uſeful to him [H], ſince it furniſhed a pretext for caballing, and fomented that dangerous faction, which gave ſuch frequent mortifications to the king, and at laſt overwhelmed him. The joy he conceived upon having got rid of the duke of Guiſe, was of the ſame nature. It laſted but a little while; he immediately found, that this deciſive blow, which he thought abſolutely neceſſary thoſe of Henry the third's enemies, and having formed a powerful party, whereof he declared himſelf the head, he entered into Provence, and by ſtratagem ſeized on the towns of Marſeilles and Arles, and grew ſo haughty upon his conqueſts, as to ſtrike a medal to ſerve as an everlaſting monument of his victories. He cauſed himſelf to be repreſented under the emblem of a centaur, &c. The author adds, that Henry IV carrying the war into Italy, in the year 1600, made himſelf maſter of almoſt all Savoy and Piedmont, and that he in his turn cauſed a medal to be ſtruck, &c. This narration is not exact. The junction of the forces of Savoy, with the enemies of Henry III was not made in the year 1588, nor was it in that year, but in the year 1590, that he entered into Provence. He did not ſtrike the medal of the centaur, after making himſelf maſter of Marſeilles, but after the invaſion of the marquiſate of Saluces. Henry IV did not carry the war into Italy in the year 1600, and he conquered nothing in Piedmont. The author perhaps is more judicious in his political reflexions than in his narrations. Henry IV, ſays he (31), after the conqueſt of Savoy and Piedmont, ſuffered himſelf to be wrought upon by the entreaties of Pope Clement VIII, who ſought to reconcile the diſtreſſed duke with the king: though the opinion of all the politicians of that time was, that Henry IV ought to keep Savoy and Piedmont to chaſtiſe the raſhneſs of that imprudent prince, and thereby to have a free paſſage to enter Italy whenever he thought fit. This was the advice of cardinal d'Oſſat, one of the greateſt politicians of his age; but Henry IV on that occaſion ſhewed more generoſity than policy, and reſtored all again to Charles Emanuel. What would cardinal d'Oſſat have ſaid of the imprudence of Henry III in diveſting himſelf of Pignerol, ſince he blames Henry IV for quitting Savoy at a time when he was a hundred times more capable of reſiſting his neighbours, than ever his predeceſſor was? France had been very unhappy, if ſhe had not been poſſeſſed of Pignerol, when the duke of Savoy entered into the alliance with the houſe of Auſtria, England, and Holland in 1690. She was forced to part with it ſix years after, which is no ſmall loſs.

[G] There was nothing to be ſeen in him then, but the humour of a man-hater.] ‘ At his return from Poland he was almoſt inacceſſible, except to three or four, and would eat in private, contrary to the cuſtom of our kings; but it was not liked, and remonſtrances were made to him on that ſubject: wherefore being forced, as it were, by cuſtom to eat in public, he ordered great rails to be ſet round his table, which are ſtill in the hall of the Louvre at Paris, and the following verſes were made on that occaſion, and fixed up in ſeveral places of the Louvre.

‘ He ordered, that no body ſhould enter into his chamber without a bonnet (32).’ I imagine, that the motive of that order, was, that he himſelf wore a little bonnet like a child's, that had a roll cut with ſlaſhes acroſs, and upon it a plume of feathers before, with ſome fine crotchet of ſtones, and a great perriwig, and he never uncovered his head, not even at church, becauſe his head was ſhaved (33). There was a great deal of humour in all this. For the reſt, this will make you underſtand the words I am going to tranſcribe. Even his turbant ſufficiently repreſented his infidelity, being always covered like a Turk, which he never pulled off to do honour to JESUS CHRIST (34). This is what the author of the book, intituled, The Martyrdom of the two Brothers, reproaches Henry III with.

[H] The duke of Alençon's death, whatever advantages attended it, was rather prejudicial than uſeful to him.] I ſtudy not only to ſay nothing without proof, but every where, as much as I can, to bring the teſtimony of cotemporary writers; it is eaſy to imagine therefore that it is with pleaſure that I here make uſe of the words of Stephen Paſquier (35). ‘ He (36) had ſtill a thorn in his foot, which in the midſt of this peace (37) ſeemed to ſtop the courſe of his ſatisfaction: for though in appearance he was in no ill underſtanding with his brother, the duke, yet he was a ſecond king, and had a diſtinct court and favourites, ſometimes in the city of Tours, ſometimes in other towns of his appenage; who differed in their notions ſo much from thoſe of the king, that he never would ſuffer either himſelf, or any of his followers, to be inveſted with the order of the Holy Ghoſt. Beſides, his appenage was ſo great, that it took up a good part of France. He had his chamber of accounts in Tours, his exchequer at Alençon, which judged, without appeal, of the cauſes of the duchy, both civil and criminal. Beſides, this prince preferred to the biſhoprics and abbies of his appenage whom he pleaſed to be nominated to the Pope, by the king, according to the Concordate: all theſe were grandeurs in ſome meaſure like thoſe of the king, and might cauſe jealouſies in his ſoul, but he prudently diſſembled them. Now it happened, that, in the year 1583, the duke died, and by his death his appenage was united to the crown. They who governed the king, rejoiced exceedingly in their hearts; and he himſelf ſufficiently expreſſed, how much he thought his grandeur was thereby increaſed, when he writ with his own hand, the regulations of it, ordering, that the chancellor, ſitting in council, ſhould be cloathed with a gown, and long robe of crimſon-velvet, and the counſellors of ſtate with purple ſatin, and that his uſhers and valets de chambre ſhould have velvet-doublets, and upon them a thick chain of gold hanging about their necks. Then a long ſet of rooms before he could be come to, and a long train of lords that were to walk before him, when he went to church. Indeed, that death at firſt ſight promiſed him a long repoſe, and yet it was the conſummation of his and France's miſery; for if the duke had lived, all pretences had been cut off from the Leaguers ..... Immediately after his death, in the year 1584, the princes of the League made no ſcruple of diſplaying the diſcontents they had been a hatching, covered with the cloak of ceſſary to his own repoſe and ſafety, plunged him into new troubles, and mortal diſquiets [I]. It muſt be confeſſed, that he ſurpaſſed himſelf in the execution of the project of putting the duke of Guiſe to death [K]. He ſhowed a great deal of prudence and reſolution in that action, at leaſt much more than on former occaſions, wherein he behaved himſelf in ſuch a manner, as made him deſpicable to the Pope [L]. One of the greateſt odneſſes of his deſtiny was, that he equally drew on himſelf the enmity of the Papiſts, and Huguenots. Theſe two parties, that are oppoſite in all things both in temporals and ſpirituals, agreed in their averſion to this prince. This was a centre of unity to people, that in every thing elſe found a ſubject of diviſion. Humanly ſpeaking, the Huguenots had juſt reaſons to hate him, for he perſecuted them without meaſure; and he was looked upon as one of the great promoters of the Paris maſſacre, and he gloried

‘ the Catholic, Apoſtolic, Romiſh religion.’ Note, that love-intrigues had ſowed the ſeeds of diſcord betwixt theſe two brothers. They happened to be rivals in love: one of their hearts would diſlodge the other, and not being able to bear partners in love, any more than in authority, they changed the affection of brothers into implacable hatred and ſpite (38). I leave you to conſider, whether that twofold jealouſy, one of love, the other of ambition, betwixt two brothers (39), the one a king, and the other preſumptive heir to the crown, and who both had minds and inclinations ill enough diſpoſed, was not capable of giving them a prodigious antipathy for one another (40).

[I] He found that the death of the duke of Guiſe . . . . plunged him into new troubles and mortal diſquiets.] Paſquier ſhall likewiſe here be my commentator. ‘ As ſoon as the duke of Guiſe was dead, ſays he (41), never was king ſo ſatisfied as ours, ſaying aloud, and clearly to every body, that he had no longer a companion, nor conſequently a maſter; and the next day the death of the cardinal was the accompliſhment of his wiſhes. In this eaſe and ſatisfaction of mind, he enjoyed himſelf ſome days, diſpatching letters to all parts, to declare the reaſons of what he had done, but he reaped little profit by them. Some eight or ten days after receiving no news from Paris, he began to bethink himſelf, and to abate ſomething of that exceſſive joy. And afterwards hearing of that general revolt, he earneſtly wiſhed that what he had done were ſtill to do . . . . The king by degrees began to be diſpleaſed with every thing, even with himſelf. I can ſay it, and write it to you, as one that has been an eye witneſs of it. Diffidence more than ever took poſſeſſion of his heart, as you ſhall preſently hear.’ Paſquier after theſe words gives four or five examples, that clearly expreſs the unſpeakable confuſion of this prince. He had a mind to convey to the caſtle of Amboiſe, ſome perſons whom he had ordered to be arreſted after the death of the Guiſes, and he found no body that he durſt truſt but himſelf. I will tell you frankly, adds Paſquier, that the greateſt part of us, who were at Blois, almoſt burſt with indignation, to ſee the affairs of the king in ſo bad a poſture, that he was forced to be marſhal to his own priſoners. He had ſcarce gone when we received the news that the mareſchal d' Aumont having abandoned the cittadel and raiſed the ſiege of Orleans, upon the march of the Sieur de Mayenne, was retired with his troops to Baugency. Many of his wounded ſoldiers came to Blois. Then it was we all believed, that the conducting of theſe priſoners was a fine and ſtudied pretence of the king, that ſo he might quit the town with leſs diſhonour. And I can aſſure you that if the Sieur de Mayenne had fallen upon us, the fear was ſo great and general, that he would have found no reſiſtance, and being once maſter of Blois, all the river Loire had been his own, eſpecially as all the towns were wavering, and the king would have been wonderfully at a loſs to find a place of retreat. GOD was pleaſed to reſcue us from that misfortune (42). The author adds (43), that Longnac, who firſt induced the king to command that murther, which had proved ſo unſucceſsful, loſt all his favour with him. Some hiſtorians relate, that this brave gentleman not thinking himſelf ſafe at court, asked the king for a place to which he might retire, in order to ſecure himſelf from the reſentments of the league (44). This was to make the king ſenſible, in what a wretched condition his affairs were believed to be; the anſwer that is pretended he made to Longnac, is not unworthy of a great monarch. I mention it in another place (45).

[K] He ſurpaſſed himſelf in the execution of the project of putting the duke of Guiſe to death.] His heart had failed him on the day of the barricadoes, he had given up the day to his rival, he had made his eſcape from Paris, and left the duke of Guiſe all the glory of a triumph. His heart returned to him again at Blois, and there he humbled his haughty enemy. We may apply the words of the Æneid to him:

Quondam etiam victis redit in præcordia virtus,
Victoreſque cadunt - - - - - (46).

And then we might ſee the truth of a ſentence of Homer, I mean the remonſtrance that Calchas made to Achilles, that a king who is irritated againſt his inferior, has the better of him ſooner or later.

Κρείσσων γὰρ βασιλεὺς ὅτε χώσεται ἀνδρὶ χέρηϊ,
Εἴπερ γάρ τε χόλον γε καὶ αὐτῆμαρ καταπέψῃ,
Ἀλλά γε καὶ μετόπισθεν ἔχει κότον ὄφρα τελέσσῃ
Ἐν στήθεσσιν ἑοῖσι.

Potentior enim Rex quando iraſcitur viro inferiori,
Quamvis enim iram vel eodem die decoxerit,
Tamen & poſtea retinet ſimultatem donec perfecerit
In pectoribus ſuis (47).

I have read, in ſeveral authors, the relation of that exploit of Henry III, but I have not ſeen any where the particulars are better connected and proſecuted, than in that which Mr Marcel hath inſerted in the fourth tome (48) of his Hiſtory of France. There one may ſee all the exactneſs of the meaſures that were taken to ſecure that great blow: the king therein diſcovered a great vigilance and reſolution, and a ſoul ſo much maſter of itſelf, as carefully to obſerve the ſmalleſt things, that might be prejudicial (49). Conſider well the encouragement he gave to the ſecretary of ſtate, who was to acquaint the duke of Guiſe that the king would ſpeak with him. ‘ Hereupon his majeſty hearing the duke of Guiſe was in the council, ſaid to Monſieur Revol, ſecretary of ſtate; Revol, go and tell Monſieur de Guiſe, that he muſt come and ſpeak with me in my old cloſet. The Sieur de Nambu having refuſed to admit him, he returned to the cloſet with a frighted countenance, he was a great man, but timorous; Good Lord, ſaid the king, Revol, what ails you? what is the matter. How come you to be ſo pale? you will ſpoil all, rub your cheeks, Revol: there is no harm, Sir, ſaid he, only Monſieur de Nambu would not open the door to me unleſs your majeſty command him. The king orders him from the door of his cabinet to let him come in again, and Monſieur de Guiſe alſo (50). I will on this occaſion cite here, what I have read in the Journal des Savans. What paſſed at Blois, touching the propoſal which was made to the States, not to ſuffer in France any other than the Catholic religion, ſhews ſufficiently that Henry III, was more politic than the generality of the world imagine (51).

[L] He had behaved in ſuch a manner as made him deſpicable to the Pope.] See the General Criticiſm on Maimbourg's Hiſtory Calviniſm; you will there find (52) two exclamations of Sixtus V. One, relating to the temerity he attributed to the duke of Guiſe, and the other the ſimplicity he aſcribed to Henry III. He expreſſed himſelf on this ſubject very cavalierly. Some authors (53) relate, that conſidering one day the conduct this monarch, he ſaid I have done all that I was able, to get out of the condition of a monk, and he doth all that he can to fall into it.

gloried in it (g). This, joined with his zeal for the moſt monkiſh devotions, ought to have purchaſed him the friendſhip of the eccleſiaſtics, and of the moſt vehement bigots of the Romiſh church; and yet he was the object of their hatred more than can be imagined. This is one inſtance of the whimſicalneſs of his fate; and here follows another. Whatever he had moſt ardently loved, at laſt turned to his ruin (h). What we have already ſaid (i) concerning the diſorders, which were occaſioned by Henry the ſecond's prodigality, agrees ſtill better with the reign of Henry III, a prince infinitely more prodigal than his father. So that they ſaw under his reign more impoſts, more pecuniary edicts, and more waſte of the finances, than was ever before known in the kingdom. The miſchief had ſtill been greater, if the king had obtained leave to alienate the crown-lands. But the States-General would not conſent to it [M]. Let us obſerve that Henry III, who, in regard to his favourites, was not jealous of his authority, nor aſpired to independence, paſſionatly deſired to enlarge the royal power [N]. I will ſay ſomething of his devotions [O]: and I will not

[M] The States-General would not conſent to alienate the domains of the crown.] Beſides what I have already ſaid of this in the article BODIN (54), I ſhall ſet down here a paſſage of Mezerai (55). ‘As to the point of alienation of the crown-lands . . . . Emar (56) by order of the aſſembly, anſwered Bellievre, whom the king had ſent there, that the common, and the fundamental, laws of the ſtate abſolutely forbid that alienation; that the crown-lands reſembled the jointure of a wife, which can neither be ſold nor appropriated to any other uſe by her huſband; that they were ſtill more ſacred than thoſe of the church, becauſe they could not be alienated for any reaſon whatſoever, even with ſolemnity; that it was a thing unheard of, that recourſe was ever had to that expedient, even in the greateſt neceſſities of France, and when it was in greater danger than it was at that time; as in the reign of king John, for whoſe deliverance, ſo much money, ſo many towns, and provinces, were given; that, in a word, they were one of the ſtrongeſt pillars that ſupported the crown, upon which portions, dowries, and appennages, were founded, and therefore that the king's demeſn ought rather to be ſtrengthened than weakened, and raiſed higher, rather than be lowered; that as for the reſt, if the third ſtate ſo earneſtly remonſtrated the conſequence s of that alienation, it was becauſe whatever ſhould be taken from the crown-lands, muſt be made good at their expence, and the whole loſs would fall upon it alone, and not on the other two eſtates, who for that reaſon did more eaſily conſent to it.’ If you will ſee the limitations of the royal authority in that reſpect, read what follows. ‘By the edict that was made in the year 1565, at Moulins, where all the princes and great lords were convened, with a great number of preſidents and counſellors of ſovereign courts, it was expreſly enacted, that all the alienations made, or to be made, of the crown-lands, ſhould be null, except in two caſes, namely, for proviſion for the younger children of our kings, and for mortgages neceſſary to raiſe ſufficient ſums for the neceſſities of the war; and that in theſe two caſes, letters-patents ſhould be paſſed and publiſhed, in the courts of parliament, it being expreſly forbid them to have any regard to ſuch letters, for any other cauſe or time whatever, though it were but for a ſingle year (57).’

[N] Henry III who, in regard to his favourites, aſpired not to independence, paſſionately deſired to enlarge the royal power.] Here are two points: I prove the firſt, by an obſervation that was made upon the great intereſts of the duke of Epernon, and on a Fortune of gilt-ſilver which the city of Roüen preſented him (58). This goddeſs ſtrictly embraced him in her arms, and below were theſe Italian words, E per non laſciar ti. — And not to leave thee. A device taken from an equivoque on his name; to ſhew, that that grandeur could never be deſtroyed, as indeed, the king having an exceſſive favour for him, had proteſted to him before, that he would make him ſo great in the midſt of his friends, that he himſelf ſhould not have the power to leſſen him, tho' he ſhould afterwards deſire to do it. This paſſage we have ſince learned from the duke of Epernon, in a very elegant letter, which he writ to the king in his diſgrace (59). They who ſay that kings never love any body, and look upon that as a great fault, are in a double error; for moſt monarchs are ſubject to an exceſs of friendſhip, which cauſes more diſorders than could flow from an indifferent and inſenſible heart. See, above, the compariſon that Bodin has made betwixt the latter years of Francis the firſt's reign, and the reign of Henry II. See alſo the remark [B] of this article. It were perhaps a thing to be deſired, that kings like the Stoics wiſe man, were without love and hatred. It is at leaſt very certain, that the too kind, affectionate, beneficent and prodigal temper of our Henry, was the cauſe of infinite ills. Let us go on to the ſecond point.

The States of the kingdom, in 1576, had reſolved to name twelve deputies to aſſiſt in the king's council, when the papers which would be preſented by the three eſtates to his majeſty, ſhould be examined there. That reſolution was diſagreeable to Henry III, becauſe he feared theſe deputies of the States would hinder him from diſpoſing of affairs to the advantage of his power; but when he was made ſenſible, that he would thereby gain a greater authority, he was glad that the States had taken ſuch meaſures, and he was ſorry that they changed their mind, and was very angry with Bodin, who had been the cauſe of that change (60). It will not be amiſs to hear Thuanus himſelf: ‘Cum Bodinus tertium ordinem, ſi ulterius pergerent, interceſſurum diceret, ſacer ordo, ac mox nobilitas acquievit, ac commune ſuffragiorum votum fuit, ne ulli delegati, qui cum regiis conſiliariis de poſtulatis decernerent, ab Ordinib. elîgerentur, contrarium cum initio placuiſſet, eaque re non mediocriter Rex animo commotus eſſet, ut ſupra oſtendimus, poſtea mutaverat, à Lugdunenſi Archiepiſcopo, ut putatur, inductus, qui principi POTENTIÆ SUÆ AMPLIFICANDÆ SUPRA MODUM CUPIDO, ex quo majeſtati regiæ decrementum metuebat, ex eo incrementum acceſſurum artificioſe perſuaſerat (61). —— Bodin having ſaid, that the third eſtate, would oppoſe it, if they puſhed that matter any further, the eccleſiaſtical eſtate, and ſoon after the nobility, deſiſted, and it was carried, that no deputies ſhould be choſen by the States to deliberate with the king's council, concerning petitions, tho' they had formerly reſolved on the contrary, and thereby had highly offended the king, as we have before related. But the king afterwards changed his ſentiments concerning this matter, by means, as it was thought, of the archbiſhop of Lyons, who artfully perſuaded his majeſty, WHO WAS EXCEEDINGLY DESIROUS OF ENCREASING THE ROYAL AUTHORITY, that, inſtead of leſſening his power, as he apprehended, this would be the means of encreaſing it.’ The archbiſhop of Lyons acted a very politic part on this occaſion.

[O] Somthing of his devotions.] I will make uſe of the words of du Verdier Vau-Privas. ‘He performed ſeveral extraordinary devotions, going ſometimes at ten a clock at night, to the Carthuſian monaſtery, to hear maſs. He inſtituted the fraternity of the White Penitents, of the Annunciation of our Lady in the Auguſtins at Paris, and went in proceſſion like the reſt, with his ſack-cloth, and whip at his girdle. . . . . He would needs likewiſe erect many other fraternities, as that of St Jerome, called the Blew Penitents, in the college of Marmoutier; that of the Crucifix of the Black Penitents, in the college of St Michael; that of the Grey Penitents of St Francis, at St Eloy. He brought the Feuillans, which are certain reformed monks of the order of Ciſteaux, from the abbey of Feuillance, near Tholouſe, and lodged them in the ſuburb of St Honoré, not forget, that he was eloquent, a lover of the ſciences; and that he took great delight in the converſation of learned men; but he was charged with doing this unſeaſonably as alſo with reſpect to the pains he took in ſtudying the Latin tongue [P]. noré, and went often thither to perform his devotions; he had built a houſe near the Capuchins, where, on certain days, he went in like manner, to perform his ſpiritual exerciſes. Every one was porter, and performed the other offices in their turn, and he was called there, Brother Henry; and if any one asked for him, he muſt ask for Brother Henry, as if any courier came there, or any other matter happened whilſt he was in that conclave. He erected another fraternity of Hieronimitans at Vicennes, and at St Mary de vie ſaine [of wholeſome life]. He cauſed a great and noble houſe to be built in the horſe-market, in a fantaſtical manner, with certain little cells, that he might go and paſs ſome days there as a monk (62). He carried at his girdle a pair of beads containing ten Ave-maries (63).'

This author has reaſon to ſay, that many have looked upon all theſe things as grimace (64), for the writers of the League, and others, have much traduced him upon that account. I will content myſelf with relating a paſſage, which I find in a libel of the Leaguers. The cells built by that hypocrite, ſerved only for a cover to his laſciviouſneſs, wickedneſs, ordures, and ſodomies; John d'Eſpernon knows ſomething of them, and cannot give me the lye in this matter. The wiſeſt people have well ſaid, that this was only to amuſe fools, and cages deſigned for other ſort of birds, and not a religious ſimplicity, which has always been the true motive for all the princes and honeſt men to ſequeſter themſelves, who were not (like that ſeeming hermit) touched at their hearts with a ſpirit of hypocriſy (65) Du Verdier obſerves, that the preachers, and, amongſt others, Maurice Poncet, cryed out againſt the fraternities and proceſſions of the king. This Poncet ſeems to me to have been the moſt furious of them all. I will cite what Peter Matthieu has ſaid of him, by which you will ſee, that theſe external acts of devotion were looked upon only as grimace, without any inward amendment. 'On Sunday the twenty ſeventh of March, 1583, the king impriſoned Poncet the friar, who preached in lent at Notredame, for having preached the Saturday before too freely againſt this new fraternity (66), calling it the fraternity of hypocrites and athieſts, and in proof of this (I repeat his very words) I have been informed from very good hands, that laſt night, which was the Friday of their proceſſion, the ſpit was turning for the ſupper of thoſe fat penitents, and that after having eaten good capons, they ^ for their night collations, young virgins that were made ready for them. Ah? wretched hypocrites, do you mock GOD then under a mask, and carry a whip at your girdle, only for faſhion's ſake? it is not there, by GOD, that you ought to carry it; but it ought to be laid on your backs and ſhouldiers, and you ought to be threſhed very well with it; for there is not one of you but hath well deſerved it. For which words the king, without deſiring otherwiſe to ſpeak to him, ſaying he was an old fool, ordered him to be conducted in his coach by the captain of the watch, into the abbey of S. Pere at Melun, without doing him any other harm, than the fear they put him in, that they would caſt him into the river (67).'

[P] He was eloquent, . . . a lover of learning . . . but he was charged with applying to theſe unſeaſonably, and with reſpect to the pains he took in ſtudying the Latin tongue.] Mezerai reports the ſubſtance of the ſpeech which this prince made to the ſtates of Blois, in the year 1576, and he adds (68): 'that fine oration pronounced by the mouth of a king, with an action that was truly majeſtic, and a wonderful grace, was received by all the auditory with a general applauſe; but not without ſome grief by the wiſer part; who, admiring ſo many fine external qualities in that prince, lamented within themſelves, that his education had not been anſwerable to his birth, and they could not praiſe the natural beauty of his genius, without deteſting at the ſame time, thoſe who had miſerably corrupted it.' He gives alſo a ſummary of the ſpeech which the ſame prince made at the opening of the ſtates of Blois, in the year 1588, and he prepares his reader for it by theſe words (69). He made a fine ſpeech to them in which he obſerved this temper, that he was very willing to aſſure them, that he had buried all paſt injuries in oblivion; but it was upon this condition, that, all factions being extinct, his authority ſhould be reſtored to it's full force; this he enlarged upon with ſo much art and politeneſs, that if the queſtion had been only whether he was a good orator, he had doubtleſs carried his point. I will confirm this elogy, with a letter written by one of the deputies (70) of the ſtates of Blois, 'it was the fineſt and learnedeſt ſpeech that was ever heard, not only from a king, but from one of the beſt orators in the world, and he had ſuch grace, ſuch aſſurance, ſuch gravity and ſweetneſs in pronouncing it, that he drew tears from the eyes of many perſons, from which number I cannot exempt myſelf; for I found in my ſoul ſuch a commotion, in hearing this prince ſpeak, that my tears witneſſed it, whether I would or no: he diſplayed with ſo much compaſſion the miſeries of this kingdom, ſet forth his ſorrow for them with ſo much vivacity, compared the felicity, &c. (71).' It would be in vain to object to me, that his ſpeeches were made for him, for that will not prejudice his title to the character of eloquent, conſidering the manner with which he ſpoke. They who fill the firſt places in parliaments; are deſervedly eſteemed ſometimes good orators, tho' they cauſe the diſcourſes, which they make at the opening of their audiences, to be compoſed by others; and how many excellent preachers are there that do not compoſe the ſermons which they deliver; but not to inſiſt upon this, let us recite a paſſage of Mezerai, which will ſhew that this monarch ſpoke very well off-hand (72). 'He rendered himſelf ſo eloquent by the natural diſpoſition that he had for it, that if there could be any exceſs in ſo fine an accompliſhment, we might have reaſon to ſay, that he had too much of it. And indeed he wonderfully delighted in the great aſſemblies, and ſolemnities, where it was found, that his ſpeech was always the fineſt, and that even the anſwers he made without premeditation to the deputies and embaſſadors, were much better than the diſcourſes they had prepared with great art and pains (73).' I do not know, whether this great hiſtorian has ever inſinuated, that this prince's ſpeeches were made by any body elſe. I know indeed, that Thuanus relates that Morvillier was thought to be the author of that which the king pronounced in the ſtates of Blois, in the year 1576 (74). But I am ſure that if that prince did not compoſe thoſe pieces himſelf, he at leaſt contributed his examination, advice, and corrections; I am perſuaded to believe ſo, from what I am going to ſay.

He had a great ambition to underſtand the French tongue perfectly, and to ſpeak it politely and correctly. The pains he took in this, had all the ſucceſs that could be expected from it. 'Noſter Galliæ Rex Henricus III, elegantiæ ſermonis ſui ſtudioſus (aliquot præſertim ante obitum annis, quo tempore plura regia quam multi credunt, habebat) haud infelici & inutili ſtudio, fuit. In eo enim tandem excelluit, & ita quidem ut not minus caſtigatum quàm ornatum eſſe cuperet (75). —— Our king Henry III was exceedingly curious about the elegancy of our language, (eſpecially ſome years before his death, at which time he poſſeſſed more truly royal qualities than is commonly believed) and was very ſucceſsful in that ſtudy. For he at laſt arrived to a great excellency in it, and aimed no leſs at accuracy, than elegance.' He could gueſs at an author by the ſtile of a book; by which he judged, that Henry Stephens was the author of a work that had appeared without any name to it (76), and he was not miſtaken. He was heartily zealous for the intereſts of his language, and having commanded Henry Stephens to ſhew the advantages and excellencies of it, he preſſed him ſo earneſtly to compoſe ſuch a treatiſe, that he was obliged to bring him a copy of it very quickly (77). I have ſaid elſewhere (78), that he deſired that learned man to make a parallel betwixt the Ciceronians of Italy, and the Ciceronians of France. I have ſaid alſo (79) that he loved Bodin for the learned diſcourſes he heard from him. There were many other learned perſons, whoſe converſation he loved. Note, that in the year 1579, he gave three thouſand livres to Henry Stephens, and a penſion of 300 livres per annum (80).

received two very curious memoirs: one relating to the propoſal which he had been perſuaded to approve of, declaring for his ſucceſſor the eldeſt ſon of the duke of Lorrain [Q]. The other relating to what the deputy of the League was ordered to repreſent to the Pope, after the king was aſſaſſinated by James Clement a Dominican [R]. That execrable murder was committed at St Clou, Some Proteſtant writers have taken notice of

It remains for me to prove, that it was the opinion of ſome that he employed that time in thoſe things, which ought to have been employed in more urgent affairs. 'If ever any prince had reaſon to fear, it was then (81), nevertheleſs this new king, as if he had begun his reign in the tranquillity of a profound peace, inſtead of putting on his arms, fell to learning on one hand, grammar and the Latin tongue of Doron, (whom he afterwards made counſellor in the great council) and on the other hand, he held a kind of conference, and academy, with Pibrac, Ronſard, and other wits, on certain days, on which every one diſcourſed upon ſuch ſubjects, as were before marked out. A noble and worthy exerciſe indeed, but not ſuitable to the affairs this prince had then upon his hands. Theſe new leſſons of grammar gave me occaſion to vent, in a paſſion, theſe ſix Latin verſes:

Gallia dum paſſim civilibus occidit armis,
  Et cinere obruitur ſemiſepulta ſuo,
Grammaticam exercet media Rex noſter in aula,
  Dicere jamque poteſt vir generoſus, Amo.
Declinare cupit, verè declinat & ille,
  Rex bis qui fuerat, fit modo Grammaticus. (82).

While France is all inflam'd by civil rage,
And her own ſons in impious war engage,
Immur'd our monarch cons his grammar rules,
Declines and conjugates with bearded fools.
Decline he ſurely doth, who, from twice king,
Is now a ſchool-boy grown a nameleſs thing.

Mr de Pibrac having told Paſquier one day (83), that he had heard, that Marillac (84) was the author of that epigram, added, that if he was ſure of it, he would make him repent it; for it does not belong to a ſubject to play in that manner upon the manners and deportment of his prince (85). 'That would be well enough, replied Paſquier (86), in any one's mouth but your's, who ought to conſider that if a king, that is expoſed to the view of all his ſubjects, does not bridle his actions, it will be very difficult for him, to prevent the diſcontents of thoſe, that moſt reſpect him: he added, that ſuch verſes proceeded not from one that was an enemy to his majeſty, but rather from one who adored him, but at the ſame time was troubled to ſee him fall by that means into the contempt of all his people, and that we ought all to wiſh, as the caſe then ſtood, that that epigram had fallen into the hands of our king, to be a leſſon to him not of Latin grammar, but of what he had to do.'

[Q] They had perſuaded him to declare for his ſucceſſor, the eldeſt ſon of the duke of Lorrain.] Monſieur de Schomberg warded off that blow: I have a copy (87) of a memorial which he drew up on that ſubject, and which, in my opinion, deſerves very well to be inſerted at length.

Memoir of the Sieur de Schomberg.

'Some time after the death of Meſſieurs de Guiſe, which happened at Blois, it was propoſed by the cardinal de . . . . on the part of his holineſs, that if his majeſty would declare the marquis du Pont, his nephew, heir of the crown, and get him acknowledged as ſuch, with all the requiſite ſolemnities; his holineſs aſſured himſelf, that the king of Spain would give the Infanta in marriage to the ſaid marquis, which would bring all the troubles of France to an end. To which the king being ready to conſent, by the perſuaſion of ſome who were then about his majeſty, Mr de Schomberg broke the deſign, by theſe arguments: that this would be to invert the order of France, aboliſh the fundamental laws, and leave to poſterity a certain monument of it's cowardice, and puſillanimity for which his majeſty would be juſtly blamed by hiſtorians, and his ſervants and ſubjects branded with treachery and diſloyalty, with which vice for his part he would not be tainted: that that war was betwixt the French againſt the French, who at firſt ſhew ſome heat, but afterwards of themſelves return to reaſon: that his majeſty ſhould only be ſollicitous to live, and to gain time, and to be upon his guard againſt any reſolute villain, who in theſe firſt furies might undertake ſomething againſt his perſon, as a preſervation againſt which, his majeſty ſhould command a waſtcoat of mail to be made for him that he might ordinarily wear. A thing that was reſolved upon but not executed. The Sieur Schomberg having made the king alter his opinion by the aforeſaid remonſtrance, his majeſty commanded him, to tell him, by what means he thought that he might quell theſe commotions. To which the ſaid Sieur Schomberg immediately gave obedience, and beſeeched the king not to be guided any longer by the maxims that he had hitherto followed, and not to imagine that this affair could be accommodated by his uſual connivance and lenity; that he muſt reſolve to have recourſe to arms and to make himſelf the ſtrongeſt in the field; that for that purpoſe he ſhould countermand Mr de Nevers, who was then before Garnache, and give a pledge to the king of Navarre to march with all his forces to his aſſiſtance, and that he ſhould ſend into Germany, Italy, England, Denmark and to all other potentates, to let them know the juſtice of his cauſe, and the conſequences of it, and deſire their ſuccours, and aſſiſtance to raiſe a great army of foreign troops This propoſal was violently oppoſed, and eſpecially by Mr de Nevers, who went ſo far as to ſay that it was heretical; and that neither the Pope, nor any of the Catholic princes would approve of the king of Navarre's being ſo near his majeſty. On the contrary, Mr de Schomberg ſtedfaſtly maintained that that war did not in any ſort concern religion, but the ſtate, and that his majeſty could not ſo ſafely depend upon any perſon in the world, as the ſaid king, as being himſelf intereſſed in the preſervation of the kingdom, to this he added many other ſtrong reaſons; which had ſo much weight, that from that time the treaty with the ſaid king was ſet on foot at Blois, and was afterwards executed at Tours, where the firſt interview was held betwixt theſe two kings. It is therefore with great reaſon that the ſervice, which the Sieur Schomberg did then to France in theſe two points, particularly to the houſe of Bourbon, was very much celebrated. The king likewiſe then adviſed, that the ſaid Sieur de Schomberg ſhould write to the preſident Jeannin; to keep the duke of Mayenne to his allegiance: but his majeſty having heard of the departure of the ſaid duke from Lyons, and his coming this way, the ſaid letter was never ſent, and it is ſtill among my papers in Germany, full of excellent reaſons and perſuaſions, which ſince have been aſſiſting the reduction of the ſaid duke of Mayenne.'

[R] What the deputy of the League was ordered to repreſent to the Pope, after the king was aſſaſſinated by James Clement a dominican.] Thoſe pieces cannot be too carefully preſerved, which are authentic proofs of the fury moſt of the French were ſeized with, in the reign of Henry III, and ſome years after his death. Some people, will endeavour hereafter to darken the truth of theſe matters of fact: we muſt prevent their wicked atttempts; for the farther men are from the age, theſe things were acted in, the eaſier it is for them to wrangle. Henry III had not been a hundred years dead, when an anonymous author was ſo bold as to publiſh a treatiſe (88), maintaining that James Clement did not kill that prince, which is to deny that it is day at noon. You will find ſome convincing circumſtances againſt that monk in a writing, of which I have received a copy (89), which I here inſert entire.

'It was then (90), moſt holy father, that the evil appeared moſt extreme, and that the prayers as well of the clergy, as of the people, continued with greater perſerveance, and we muſt certainly believe, that they forced the divine majeſty to commiſeration, which would not leave ſo many good men, and ſo zealous for his holy cauſe, in a longer doubt of his goodneſs and mercy; but rather deliver them from their languiſhing, by ſo great and ſo wonderful an event, that the more it is conſidered, the more it raiſes our thoughts to the meditation and admiration of God's incomprehenſible judgments. It is the death of the king that happened in ſo ſtrange a manner, that the truth of the thing and the impoſſibility, that was objected againſt it, were long contending which ſhould carry it. At laſt the news was confirmed by many concurrent advices, and tho' your holineſs has had the particulars of it from other hands, I preſume you will not be fatigued with the account which I ſhall give to your holineſs of it. A monk of the order of St Dominic of the convent of Paris, named Brother James Clement, of twenty three or twenty four years of age, a native of the village of Sorbonne, in the dioceſe of Sens, and the laſt of 300 or 400 which are in the ſaid convent, yet divinely elected, and choſen for ſo generous an exploit, which God has done by his hands, had often boaſted (91) amongſt his brethren, even after the rout of Senlis, that he ſaw the enemies affairs proſpered, that the king ſhould never die but by his hands, at which the reſt took occaſion to laugh at him, calling him, in deriſion, Captain Clement. But this did not make him depart from that opinion and inward motion. But, on the contrary, he confirmed himſelf in ſuch a manner in the deſire of executing it, that he became conſtant in that deſign, thinking only of the means, whereby he might accompliſh it. In that enterprize he muſt reſolve upon death, but what kind of death he could not gueſs, and he was willing to ſuffer the moſt cruel that could be invented for him, which is a conſtancy ſo admirable in a monk, that it is without example in this age. To bring the matter to an iſſue, he found the way to get very ſecretly the letters of ſome politicians, and concerted with them to inform the king of what was doing in the city to the advantage of his affairs. He received ſome words of credence from them, and obtained from the count de Brienne, priſoner in the caſtle of the Louvre, a paſſport that he might have the eaſier acceſs into the enemies army. Now having all that was neceſſary for him, in order to go to the king, he left Paris the laſt day of July, to go to St Cloud, and took leave of all the other monks (92), exhorting them to put up their prayers for him, ſaying that he went for the ſervice of God, to deliver the people from miſery, without any hopes of returning; and he did not deſire it, provided God ſhould give him the grace not to fail in his deſign, of the event whereof they ſhould hear in twenty four hours. The ſame day arriving at St Cloud he could not find means to get an audience of the king; he paſſed the night there which might have given him other counſel. The next day, being the firſt of Auguſt, he addreſſed himſelf to the Sieur de la Gueſle, the king's attorney-general, in the court of the parliament of Paris, which he had relinquiſhed; and acquainting him, that he was ſent intruſted with letters from the king's good ſervants, and with ſome words of credence for things of great importance to the ſervice of his majeſty: he deſired to be introduced by him that he might diſcharge his duty. The king having notice of it, commanded the monk ſhould be brought it, and retiring into his cloſet, he there talked more than a quarter of an hour with him, and in the mean time, he gave him his letters one by one to the laſt; and the king aſking him if that was all, the monk anſwered, I believe not, Sir, and that there muſt be ſome more behind; and putting his hand farther into his ſleeve, he drew out the knife he had in it, ſtriking the king the belly, who perceiving himſelf wounded, cried out, and ſeized the knife in the hand of the Dominican, holding it in the wound by which he hurt himſelf exceedingly, and with it gave the monk a blow in the face, who at the ſame inſtant received numberleſs ſtabs from thoſe who ran in upon hearing the king cry out; and whilſt he was thus maſſacred, it is ſaid, that he ſpoke theſe words, I thank GOD I die ſo eaſy a death, for I did not expect to depart this life in ſuch a manner, and to come off at ſuch a cheap rate. His body was thrown into the open ſtreet, and was afterwards burnt, as it was reported to Mr de Mayenne. Thus the king died, the night after his wound, at two a clock in the morning. Your holineſs may pleaſe to obſerve ſome of the moſt remarkable circumſtances of that fact. It happened on the day on which the church celebrates the feaſt of St Peter in bonds, whom God miraculouſly delivered by his angel, from the hands of Herod, and from all the expectation of the Jews, to whom he was to have been given up; the Catholics may ſay, that on the ſame day God has delivered them from the hands of Heretics, and from the yoak of a prince, who deſigned in his heart to fill all Chriſtendom with deſolation. In what day, moſt holy father, could the monitory of your holineſs againſt an impenitent king, and a deſpiſer of the holy apoſtolical ſee, be better authoriſed with the power of God? when twenty four hours after the aſſaſſination of the duke of Guiſe, the ſaid king, in cold blood, cauſed the cardinal, his brother, to be inhumanly maſſacred; it was obſerved, that the watch-word which he gave the murtherer, was St Clement. Whilſt they were committing that execrable crime, he was in his cloſet, making merry with his minions, and accomplices of the ſaid murther; and God has permitted a monk, named Clement (93), to kill him in his cloſet, in the midſt of a great army, which could not ſecure his deteſtable life. Impiety had ſo poſſeſſed him, after hypocriſy had made way for it, that he abhorred the preachers who had publickly reproved his vices, and for that reaſon he breathed nothing but ruin and revenge againſt them, which he proteſted commonly in his private diſcourſes, wherein every one was allowed to give his opinion about the puniſhment that ſhould be inflicted on them; but he has been prevented in his barbarous deſigns, by a poor monk of the order of the preaching friars, who has inflicted upon him the divine puniſhment that others had foretold him. Theſe things, moſt holy father, are, in my opinion, of ſuch conſequences, as your holineſs will judge worthy of conſideration. Moreover it is notorious, that this is not the work of men: God has applied that great remedy to our miſeries, by the miniſtry of your holineſs. And it is to be hoped, that by your interpoſition he will effectually cure them; and to that end I ſhall make moſt humble requeſts and ſupplications to your holineſs, as I am ordered to do both by the duke of Mayenne, and the aforeſaid lords of the general council, whom I hope your holineſs will ſo far pleaſe to honour as to accept of them.'

This memoir, not only furniſhes us with invincible proofs againſt thoſe, who would deny James Clement to have committed the aſſaſſination, but alſo againſt all thoſe who undertake to juſtify his brethren the Dominicians of Paris. Mr Varillas pretends to give the reaſons of thoſe wretched apologiſts (94), and ſays nothing to confute them. He diſplays at length all that is ſaid in vindication of the Dominicans in general, and then he ſpeaks thus (95): but one of them, who was Father Bernard Guyart, has printed a book to which he durſt not put his name, wherein he offers to juſtify the order of St Dominic from the murther of Henry III. The word but, at the beginning of the period, prepares the reader for a particular apology for James Clement; no body can imagine, that Bernard Guyart deſigned any thing elſe, and yet Mr Varillas ſpeaks only of a general juſtification of the order of St Dominic. Let the grammarians find fault with that hiſtorian, for placing ſo ill the particles that they call adverſatives; I leave that to them, and ſhall content myſelf with cenſuring him upon another point. The treatiſe intituled, La Fatalité de St Clou, is doubtleſs

leſs the ſame work, which, according to Mr Varillas, was publiſhed by Bernard Guyart: now the principal drift of that book, is to ſhew that James Clement did not kill Henry III. Mr Varillas is therefore very much in the wrong, not to repreſent that work under that idea, but under that of a general apology for the Dominicans. This fault appears to me more excuſable, than that of omitting to ſay, that the book intituled La Fatalité de St Clou, ought not to hinder one from holding the general opinion. Mr Maimbourg has done his duty, in ſaying, that notwitſtanding that book, we ought to believe that James Clement was guilty of the parricide, and that it is the beſt way, honeſtly to fall in with the public voice, whatever profeſſion one may be of (96). What he adds, has not ſo much reaſon in it. Eſpecially, ſays he, ſince the honour of the Dominicans does not ſuffer by it; for after all, faults are perſonal, and there is no man of good ſenſe, who would lay the crime of a private perſon to the charge of an order ſo holy as that of St Dominic. This diſcourſe has nothing of ſolidity; the crime of James Clement was not perſonal, but the whole convent of the Dominicans at Paris, were guilty of it. They knew his deſign (97), they did not diſcourage him, but approved of the execution of it. The prior of that convent was puniſhed with death, being fully convicted by many witneſſes of having made an elogy of that aſſaſſin (98) in the pulpit: and ſince the city of Paris, and the preachers eſpecially, beſtowed a thouſand benedictions and praiſes upon the monk who killed the king, and all the other cities of the kingdom, that were in the intereſt of the League, and even the Pope himſelf (99), extolled that infamous action; we may be aſſured, that the crime of Jame Clement, was the crime of the whole League, and of the court of Rome; for the authors, adviſers, and approvers of an action, are reputed to be under the ſame predicament. This I will demonſtrate in ſome other place (100).

[S] Whilſt they leave the obſervations of Peter Victor Cayet unanſwered.] Conſider well his words (101): ‘The Hugenots ſay, Death has carried this king from this world into the other, but (which is a notable circumſtance) it happened in the very chamber where it is believed the reſolution was taken for the furious maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day, in the year 1572. Theſe words are to be found in the additions to the Inventaire de l'Hiſtoire de France, made by Montliard. The book, called the Hiſtory of the five Kings, printed at Geneva, aſſures us of the ſame thing, almoſt in the ſame words. And in the State of the Church, written by John Taffin a miniſter, are theſe words; It is obſerved, that, by the providence of GOD, this happened in the ſame chamber, in which, in the year 1572, that furious maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day was reſolved upon. Thoſe are notable circumſtances, and reflexions on the providence of GOD, raſhly, and, I will dare to ſay, falſly publiſhed. For at the time of the Paris maſſacre, the place where the king was wounded, belonged to a citizen of Paris, named Chapelier and he poſſeſſed it above two years after, into which his majeſty never entered, whilſt he was duke of Anjou, nor a long time after his return from Poland. When the queen, his mother, bought it, it was after the death of king Charles, with intention to build there; but as ſhe found that place was too ſtrait, ſhe gave it, in the year 1577, to the wiſe of the Sieur Jerom de Gondy, who pulled down the houſe, and new modelled it quite, having adorned it with grotto's and fountains, and put it in ſuch a condition, that it has been ſince frequented by lords and princes; which it never was before: now the compiler of the aforeſaid Hiſtory of the five Kings, from whom Montliard and Taffin have taken what they have inſerted in their books (for he wrote before them) has theſe words, It is ſaid, that the conſultation for the maſſacre was held in the ſame chamber, &c. Behold a hear-ſay, invented by the author of the aforeſaid collection. This ſtory of his own invention, was put into the Memoirs, and little Diſcourſes printed at Geneva in the year 1569, concerning what happened at the maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day, where it is ſaid, the thing was reſolved upon at St Clou, and at the Tuilleries. Now we find ſome colour for that calumny, the author of the ſaid Hiſtorical Collections of the ſaid five Kings, from the king's being killed in Gondy's houſe, draws this conjecture, and cunningly ſlips in this word; it is ſaid, that in the ſame chamber, &c. Montliard, who wrote after him, goes farther, and ſays, It is believed, &c. It is not now a meer hereſay; there are ſome that believe it: but Taffin the miniſter, who wrote after them all, is more confident, he aſſures us of it, and ſays, that it was a providence of GOD. What a lye is this? accordingly the attorney-general having made his complaint in court againſt Montliard, theſe words were ſtruck out of his book, as were a great many others, and he himſelf was greatly vexed, excuſing himſelf upon a hear-ſay; but his book being ſince reprinted at Geneva, all this was again inſerted in it, and is believed amongſt the people of that party (102).’ If the facts, which Cayet relates, about the houſe where Henry III, were aſſaſſinated, be true, there is no doubt but the Proteſtant authors whom he confutes, were much in the wrong, and that the myſterious circumſtances they have taken pains to obſerve, are meer illuſions, and the vain imaginations of credulous minds. But if they had been able to prove, that Cayet was miſtaken, it had been a commendable thing in them, to reprint in the Geneva edition, what Montliard had been forced to ſuppreſs. It is certain, that according to order, and the method of an exact proceeding, the public ought to have been acquainted in the Geneva edition, why that paſſage was reſtored; that is to ſay, it ought to have been made out by ſtrong proofs, that the council about the maſſacre, was held at St Clou, in the ſame chamber where the Dominican killed Henry III. My edition of the Inventaire of John de Serres, is of Roüen, 1612 (103), and contains the paſſage which the attorney-general cauſed to be ſuppreſſed. Mezerai ſuppoſes, that the reflexions of the Huguenots deſcended into a more myſterious enumeration of particulars. They wrote, ſaith he, (104) that the king was wounded at the ſame hour, and the ſame day, in the ſame place, and in the very chamber where he had concluded the Paris maſſacre. He ſays nothing againſt it, he quotes no body, and does not imitate Peter Cayet in any thing. That myſterious obſervation is ſtill more ſtrongly urged in a book intituled, a Journal of the remarkable things, that happened in the reign of Henry III king of France and Poland, and which has been printed perhaps above twenty times in Holland, with three or four ſatirical pieces (105); the laſt edition, is that of 1699. The journal is more large in it, than in the edition of 1693. Now theſe words are found at the end of the additions (106). The farther we ſeek for obſervations and particularities, in ſo miraculous an accident (107), the more wonders we find in it, ſo that to poſterity that death will appear a wonder, full of innumerable wonders, amongſt which this has been obſerved, as being moſt worthy of remark, and yet moſt true, that in the ſame place, the ſame houſe, the ſame day, and at the ſame hour, the king returning from his affairs, as he did when he was killed, the Paris maſſacre was concluded on, the late king (who then was called Monſieur) preſided in the council, viz. in the town of St Clou, in Gondy's houſe, the firſt day of Auguſt 1572, in the ſame chamber, at the ſame hour, to wit, at eight of the clock in the morning, the breakfaſt, (which was three ſpits of partridges) being ready below for the conſpirators of that curſed action. Note, That this addition was ſuperfluous; for all that is conſiderable in it, may be ſeen in the ſame words, in the Journal of Henry III, printed in 1693 (108), and 1699, (109), and I believe it is alſo in the editions that went before.

If we could be ſure, that this Journal, ſuch as the Bookſellers of Holland have publiſhed it, was the work of a Catholic, it would be certain, that the reflexions of the Proteſtants upon the circumſtances of Henry the third's death, are not ſo ſtrong as thoſe of a writer of the other party. The three Proteſtant authors which Victor Cayet confutes, go beyond one another; the firſt was contented with an it is ſaid; the ſecond was not ſatisfied with an expreſſion ſo weak, he ſaid, it is believed; and the third expreſſed himſelf ſtill more poſitively. This is the ordinary method in in telling of news; the laſt relater is generally the moſt deciſive, and fulleſt of circumſtances. One would think that here is a ſort of an auction, where people are to bid one higher than another, becauſe the goods are adjudged to him that bids moſt. Be it how it will, the journaliſt of Henry III goes farther than the three Proteſtant bidders. He delivers the fact, not only as moſt worthy of remark, but alſo as moſt true. Father Anſelm (110) aſcribes that journal to Mr Servin; which agrees well enough with the initial letters which have been put in the editions of that book (111). But Mr Pelliſſon affirms (112), that Mr de l'Eſtoille, one of the forty members of the French academy, was the ſon of an Audiencer of Chancery at Paris, 'who had collected many memoirs 'of the affairs of his time, from which one of his 'friends, to whom he had lent them, compoſed the 'book, intituled a Journal of what happened in the 'reign of Henry III.' The queſtion is, to know, whether they into whoſe hands the manuſcript fell, before it was publiſhed, or after the firſt edition of it, have neither added to, cut off, nor altered any thing in it. However it be, thoſe who depend upon that part of the journal, are obliged to anſwer the reaſons of Peter Cayet.

HENRY IV, king of France, was one the greateſt princes mentioned in the hiſtory of theſe laſt ages, and we may ſay, that if the love of women had ſuffered him to diſplay all his fine qualities [A] in their whole extant, he would have ſurpaſſed, or at leaſt equalled, the heroes that are moſt admired. If the firſt time that he debauched the daughter or wife of his neighbour, he had been puniſhed in the ſame manner as Peter Abelard was, he would have been capable of conquering all Europe [B], and might have [A] If the love of women had ſuffered him to diſplay all his fine qualities.] It cannot be ſaid of him, as of ſome great commanders, who were much addicted to their pleaſures (1), that he renounced them, when the exigency of his affairs required it; for he loſt all the advantages of the victory of Coutras to run after a miſtreſs. Read what Mezerai ſays (2). 'The 'valour of the king of Navarre, ſignalized itſelf in 'that battle, more eminently, than his conduct in 'reaping the advantages of it; for ſo far was he from 'marching directly towards the foreign army, as the 'prince of Condé would have had him, promiſing, 'if he would give him troops, to go and poſſeſs him'ſelf of the paſſage of Saumur, that he ſuffered his 'victorious army to ſeparate, being contented to take 'an oath from his officers, that they would be, on 'the twenty ſixth of November, on the confines of 'Angoumois and Perigord, in order to march to'wards the Reiſters. He only kept 500 horſe, and 'taking the count de Soiſſons along with him, forced 'his way into Gaſcogne, whether the violent love 'he had for the beautiful counteſs de Guiche, drew 'him as it were by force (3).' One of the greateſt affairs that Henry IV had ever upon his hands, was doubtleſs the ſiege of Amiens; and yet he took the fair Gabrielle along with him thither, and lodged her cloſe by him; and would have kept her, during all that difficult expedition, had he had his own deſires: but he was quickly obliged to remove that ſcandal from his ſoldiers eyes, not only becauſe of their murmurs, that reached his ears, but alſo by reaſon of the reproaches of the marſhal de Biron (4).

What I have ſaid at the beginning of this remark, that there have been great commanders, who, tho' much addicted to their pleaſures, knew how to quit them when there was occaſion, is not unknown to thoſe who know the characters of Alcibiades and Sylla. See what Salluſt ſaith of the latter. 'Sulla . . . . . 'animo ingenti, cupidus voluptatum, ſed gloriæ cu'pidior, otio luxurioſo eſſe, tamen ab negotiis nun'quam voluptas remorata (5). —— Sylla . . . . . had 'a great ſoul, he loved his pleaſures, but loved glory 'ſtill more, his leiſure hours were ſpent luxuriouſly, 'but his pleaſures never interrupted his affairs.' See what is ſaid of Alcibiades. 'Quum tempus poſce'ret, laborioſus, (Alcibiades) patiens, liberalis, ſplendi'dus non minus in vita, quam victu: affabilis, blan'dus, temporibus callidiſſime inſerviens. Idem ſimul 'ac ſe remiſerat, nec cauſa ſuberat, quare animi la'borem perferret, luxurioſus, diſſolutus, libidinoſus, 'intemperans reperiebatur, ut omnes admirarentur in 'uno homine tantam ineſſe diſſimilitudinem, tamque 'diverſam naturam (6). —— Upon occaſion he (Alci'biades) was laborious, patient, liberal, ſplendid both 'in his equipage and table: affable, courteous, and 'could, in the moſt artful manner, accommodate him'ſelf to all circumſtances. But when once he had un'bent his mind, and his affairs laid him under no 'obligation to fatigue, he was luxurious, diſſolute, leud, 'and intemperate; ſo that all men admired to ſee in 'the ſame perſon ſuch different manners, and contrary 'characters.'

[B] If he had been puniſhed in the ſame manner as Peter Abelard was, he would have been capable of conquering all Europe.] On the contrary, you will ſay, he would have grown a ſluggard and a coward; for the ſame ſpirits that inclined him to the love of women, made him valiant, and we have ſeen few great captains who have not been laſcivious. I anſwer, that though it be certain, that many great generals have been of a very amorous complexion, yet it does not follow, that their courage and luſt flowed from the ſame principle in their conſtitution. Each of thoſe two qualities had it's cauſe, and all that can be ſaid is, that theſe two cauſes concurred in forming the conſtitutions of theſe men. But it is eaſy to prove, that there is no connexion between thoſe two qualities. How many cowards are there, more timorous than hares (7), that have a prodigious vigour in the acts of Venus? Was there ever a man more brave and undaunted than the marſhal de Gaſſion, who had a mortal hatred to women (8)? The count de Tilly, who lived chaſt all his life-time (9), was one of the greateſt commanders of the XVIIth century. Did not Mr de Turenne, though no debauchee, match thoſe thunder-bolts of war, who lived at the ſame time with him, and whoſe leudneſs made almoſt as much noiſe as their triumphs? And to give a ſtill ſtronger proof, do not we know, that the brave Sigiſmund Battori, prince of Tranſylvania, ſirnamed the Invincible (10), for his great exploits, was as great a poltroon in the wars of Venus, as he was brave in thoſe of Mars, and that having confeſſed his impotence (11), his marriage with Mary Chriſtina, daughter of Charles archduke of Grats, was declared null: Some eunuchs have been very brave generals of armies; for not to go ſo high as the famous Narſes, who lived under the empire of Juſtin II, in the VIth century, do not we know, that one of the moſt valiant generals of Solyman, was an eunuch (12). He was not fortunate, I confeſs, in the expedition of Hungary, in the year 1556, and he died with vexation, for not having maintained his reputation, nor anſwered the public expectation (13): but for all that, he had a great ſoul, and his mortal chagrin was a proof of it. See Thuanus, who tells a pleaſant humour of that eunuch, when a piece of ill news was brought him, it was the taking of Gran. A great matter indeed, anſwered he to the meſſenger, that is a ſmall thing; behold here my great loſs, ſhewing him the lower region of his belly. Ejus rei cum trepidus nuncius ad eum veniſſet, ipſa vultus conſternatione magnum aliquod malum profeſſus, purpuratus non ſine circumſtantium riſu conſternationi nuntii illudens, & Strigonii, quod nullo negotio recuperari poſſet, amiſſionem elevans; his verbis eum excepiſſe dicitur. Quam tu mihi cladem ingentem, fatue, quod tantum incommodum narras? ea demum mihi clades deploranda contigit, cum hinc (genitalium ſedem oſtentans) ea membra adempta ſunt, quibus vir eram (§α) (14). Let us conclude from all this, that if Henry IV had been treated as Abelard was, he would have loſt nothing, either of his courage, prudence, or wit. Origen, Photius, and Abelard, are a manifeſt proof, that the loſs of the maſculine organs doth not in the leaſt prejudice the natural talents of the ſoul.

have eclipſed the glory of the Alexanders and the Cæſars. In vain it would be objected to me, that ſuch a puniſhment would have taken away his courage [C]. It was his prodigious incontinence [D], that hindered him from raiſing himſelf to that pitch of of grandeur that he might have done; but notwithſtanding that powerful obſtacle, he has juſtly deſerved the ſirname which he bears (a). To convince us of this, we need only conſider the aſtoniſhing difficulties he ſurmounted, before he was ſettled on the throne; and the flouriſhing condition to which he reſtored his kingdom, which he had found in the moſt diſmal deſolation that can be imagined. He inherited that crown in [C] It would be in vain to object to me, that ſuch a puniſhment would have taken away his courage.] You will find, in the preceding remark, the commentary, or proof, that this may require. However, I will add, by way of Appendix, the following obſervations. Was not Hannibal one of the greateſt generals of antiquity, a chaſt man? ‘ Conſtat Annibalem .... pudicitiam ‘ tantam inter tot captivas habuiſſe, ut in Africa natum ‘ quivis negaret (15). —— It is certain that Hannibal ‘ ... behaved with ſo much chaſtity towards his female ‘ captives, that no body would have thought him an African.’ We do not find, that Scipio Africanus was of a very amorous conſtitution, and he gave a notable example of his chaſtity, during his expedition in Spain; for which he is extremely praiſed by hiſtorians (16). Druſus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and one of the greateſt commanders among the ancients, was extremely reſerved in reſpect to women (17). The bravery of the emperor Aurelian was incomparable, and yet attended with the greateſt chaſtity. We ſhould injure him, ſhould we make the leaſt compariſon betwixt his bravery, and that of the laſcivious Proculus, who ſet up for a tyrant; a letter of whom Flavius Vopiſcus has preſerved to us, which I ſhall only inſert in Latin. ‘ Tacendum non eſt, quod & ipſe gloriatur in ‘ quadam ſua epiſtola, quam ipſam melius eſt ponere quam ‘ de ea plurimum dicere. Proculus Metiano affini S. D. ‘ Centum ex Sarmatia virgines cepi. Ex his una ‘ nocte decem inivi: omnes tamen quod in me erat, ‘ mulieres intra dies xv. reddidi. Gloriatur (ut vides) ‘ rem ineptam & ſatis libidinoſam; atque inter fortes ‘ ſe haberi credit ſi criminum denſitate coaleſcat. Hic ‘ tamen quum etiam poſt honores militares ſe improbe & ‘ libidinoſe, tamen fortiter ageret ... in imperium vocitatus eſt (18).’ You ſee by this, that he was owned to be a good ſoldier, but allow me to ſay that his valour came not near to that of Aurelian. What ſhall we ſay of Alexander, whoſe courage was extraordinary? More praiſes have been beſtowed upon his chaſtity, than he deſerved; yet it muſt be confeſſed, that by his conſtitution he had more indifference than inclination for the fair ſex; and this is ſufficient to confute thoſe who imagine I know not what mechanical connexion betwixt luſt and valour. To the modern examples already alledged (19), I add one of a brave man, who lived in the XVIth century, and who gained the title of the fearleſs and blameleſs knight. It will be eaſily underſtood by this, that I mean Bayard. Love never was his maſter, but he ſhowed that he was maſter of it on ſome dangerous occaſions. See his life. What a catalogue might I not give, if I ſhould reckon up all that have reſembled Sardanapalus; men that were valiant in bed only, but cowards and poltroons every where elſe? Were Caligula, Nero, and Heliogabalus, great warriors? Did not they with the moſt infamous exceſſes, plunge themſelves into the leudeſt debaucheries? Was ever Domitian, who was the author of a new name (20) for theſe baſe exerciſes, wherein he ſignalized his ſtrength, reckoned a good ſoldier, or a good commander? Thoſe ſparks that were called formerly Mignons de Couchette, did ſometimes pretend to make a campaign, in order to avoid the contempt to which the ſuſpicion of cowardice expoſed them among the brave; but they acquitted themſelves ſo ill, that we may apply to them with a great deal of reaſon, what Jupiter anſwered Venus, when ſhe complained to him of the wound ſhe had received in aſſiſting her ſon Æneas in a battle. Do not you pretend to war, which is not your province; your buſineſs is love.

Οὔ τοι τέκνον ἐμὸν δέδοται πολεμήϊα ἔργα·
Ἀλλὰ σύγ᾽ ἱμερόεντα μετέρχεο ἔργα γάμοιο.

Non tibi filia mea commiſſa ſunt bellica opera;
Quin tu deſiderabilia obi munera nuptiarum (21).

Not theſe, Oh daughter, are thy proper cares,
Thee milder arts befit and ſofter wars,
Sweet ſmiles are thine, and kind endearing charms.
POPE.

Helen gives Paris the like advice, as I have obſerved, in another place, where I confute Mezerai (22). That hiſtorian fancies, that the ladies love brave men, becauſe they ſuppoſe them no leſs vigorous in the exerciſe of love, than in war. He does not judge rightly of their motives; glory or vanity are the great ſprings of their prepoſſeſſion in behalf of the brave. Monluc obſerves, that women would rather chuſe to be widows, than ſee their husbands return from the army in good health, but loaded with ſhame and diſhonour. It is plain, that luſt has no ſhare in that, and ſince this is a new proof againſt Mezerai, I ſhall here inſert Monluc's words. He ſpeaks to the governours of a place, and ſhews the prejudice they will do themſelves, if they do not defend it well. ‘ Not only ‘ your maſter, continues he (23), and princes and lords, ‘ will look upon you with an evil eye, but alſo women and children. Nay, to go farther, even your ‘ own wiſe, though ſhe pretends to love you, will ‘ hate you, and eſteem you leſs in her heart. For it ‘ is the nature of all women to hate mortally cowards ‘ and poltroons, though they be never ſo ſprucely ‘ dreſſed. And they love the bold and courageous, ‘ though they be never ſo ugly and deformed. They ‘ ſhare in your diſgrace; and though they are in your ‘ arms a-bed, pretending to be pleaſed with your return; they had rather you had been ſtrangled, or ‘ that a bullet had taken you off. For as we think, ‘ that the greateſt ſhame of a man is to have a whore ‘ to his wife; ſo the women think, that their greateſt ‘ ſhame is to have cowards for their husbands. See ‘ then how you will come off, Mr Governour, if ‘ you loſe your fort, ſince you will be curſed in your ‘ own bed for it.’

[D] His prodigious incontinence.] I may well call it ſo, after the ſtories d'Aubigné has publiſhed of him, eſpecially after theſe words of a very grave hiſtorian. ‘ If it was the buſineſs of hiſtory to make apologies, it might juſtify him from the greateſt part of ‘ theſe reproaches, but not however for his boundleſs ‘ paſſion for gaming .... much leſs could it excuſe ‘ him for his leudneſs with women, which was ſo ‘ public and univerſal, from his youth to his laſt days, ‘ that we can hardly give it the name of love and gallantry (24).’ In what follows Mr de Perefixe tells us ſomething that is very ſtrange. ‘ It were to be ‘ wiſhed, for the honour of his memory, that gaming ‘ had been his only vice. But his continual weakneſs ‘ on the ſcore of the fair ſex was another, much more ‘ blamable in a Chriſtian prince, in a man of his ‘ age, who was married, and whom GOD had ſo highly favoured, and who meditated ſo great enterprizes ‘ in his mind. Sometimes he had deſires that were ‘ tranſient, and which enſlaved him but for a night; ‘ but when he met with beauties that ſtruck him to ‘ the heart, he loved them even to extravagance, and ‘ in thoſe tranſports, he appeared to be nothing leſs ‘ than Henry the Great. We are told, that Hercules ‘ took a diſtaff and ſpun, to pleaſe his fair Omphale; ‘ Henry did ſomething meaner for his miſtreſſes. He ‘ dreſſed himſelf one day in the habit of a peaſant, and ‘ carried a burthen of ſtraw upon his ſhoulders, to get ‘ acceſs by that means to Madam Gabrielle; and it is ‘ ſaid the marchioneſs of Verneuil has ſeen him more ‘ than once at her feet, ſuffering her diſdains and inſults (25).’ It muſt have been a cruel mortification to the good Huguenots, to ſee their Chief lead ſo ſcandalous a life, even in Rochelle. He debauched there the daughter of a gentleman of the long robe, and had a ſon by her. The church had often remonſtrated his ſin to him, which he confeſſed very ingenuouſly; but he could in a very remote degree of kindred [E]. We ſhould probably have known, and admired his merit more if he had lived five or ſix years longer than he did; for he was juſt upon the point of entring upon the execution of a prodigious deſign (b), when he was aſſaſſinated in his coach the fourteenth of May, 1610, by Ravaillac. Some hiſtorians ſay, that this was foretold him the day before [F]; but thoſe who have examined the matter to the bottom, have found it to be falſe. He was of ſo noble a diſpoſition that it is not at all probable that he ever adviſed the duke of Alençon to make away with Catherine de Medicis [G]; yet ſome memoirs affirm it. He had the uſual fate of great men, could not be perſuaded to make a public acknowledgment of it, till a little before the battle of Coutras (26). You will find the circumſtances of this, in the life of Mr du Pleſſis Mornai (27).

[E] He inherited the crown in a very remote degree of kindred.] 'It was doubtleſs an uncommon good fortune, that the crown of France devolved to him; there was never a more remote ſucceſſion in any hereditary ſtate than this: for there were betwixt ten and eleven degrees of diſtance betwixt Henry III and him, and when he was born, there were nine princes of the blood before him; namely, king Henry II, and his five ſons; Antony, king of Navarre his father, and his two ſons, who were elder brothers to our Henry. All theſe princes died to make way for him to the crown (28).'

[F] Some hiſtorians ſay, that this was fore-told him the day before.] We will begin this remark with the words of Peter Matthieu (29). 'Hereupon la Broſſe, a learned Phyſician and Mathematician, ſaid to the duke of Vendôme, by way of concluſion to a long converſation, that if the king could avoid an accident wherewith he was threatened, he would live thirty years longer. No body is willing to tell kings any thing that may diſpleaſe them: the duke of Vendôme thinking it more proper that la Broſſe ſhould be the meſſenger of his advice, beſought the king to hear him: the king aſked him what he would have? Upon that the duke of Vendôme was ſilent, his ſilence encreaſing the king's deſire to know it, he preſſed him, the other excuſed himſelf; at laſt, the king's command drew from him what la Broſſe had told him. You are a fool, ſays the king, you believe him? Sir, anſwered the duke of Vendôme, in theſe caſes, credulity is a fault, but not fear? the ſafety of your majeſty obliges every body, and me more than all the reſt, to make light of nothing: I moſt humbly beſeech you to be pleaſed to hear him. The king refuſed it, and forbad him to ſpeak of it: I cannot, at leaſt, ſays the duke, but tell the queen of it. The king replied to him twice, that if he mentioned it, he would never love him. And ſo la Broſſe was ſent away. I have this converſation word for word from the duke of Vendôme.' This is very poſitive; but here follows ſomething that is no leſs ſo, which yet entirely overthrows this narrative of Peter Matthieu. 'So true it is, it is a philoſopher who ſpeaks (30), that moſt hiſtorians are credulous and liars, and that thereby they always confirm people in the belief of prognoſtications, when they report theſe ſtories without confuting them, But without going farther, why ſhould not the ancients have done it, ſince we often ſee it practiſed in our own time? Has not one of our hiſtorians, ſpeaking of the death of our Henry the Great, ſaid, that being warned of it by a prince that is yet alive, (whom it is not neceſſary to name) the day before that unfortunate ſtroke was given, his majeſty ſlighting the information, anſwered him, that la Broſſe was an old fool of an aſtrologer, &c. I being deſirous to learn this from the mouth of that prince himſelf † above thirty years ago, in the preſence of a princeſs ‡ of great worth, he did me the honour to tell me, that it was falſe. And within theſe two days, only to be farther informed of it, and that I might publiſh nothing of that conſequence without being very ſure of it, I had the honour to ſpeak to him about it again in the preſence of ſeveral perſons of his family, and he confirmed the ſame thing to me, adding beſides, that the hiſtorian ‡ had confounded both the times and the things; and that la Broſſe had indeed told him, after that fatal accident, that he had foreſeen it ~~by~~ by his majeſty's horoſcope, (as aſtrologers always do when things are come to paſs) but that he had not given him notice of it the day before to acquaint his majeſty with it. This however is written by a French author, who lived at the ſame time; who will not believe him then in after times? Will any one think, that a man appointed and paid for writing hiſtory, durſt ſay a thing of this conſequence, and even cite a prince then living who could witneſs it, if it were not true? And yet it is as I ſay. If any one doubts of it, he may inform himſelf about it, and I am not ſorry that I have an occaſion here to mention it, as well to undeceive poſterity, as to ſhew, that there are a great many things of this nature written, which deſerve no ſort of credit.' Obſerve, that Mr Petit doth not relate this altogether ſo faithfully as he ſhould have done. He ſuppoſes that the hiſtorian makes the king give this anſwer, La Broſſe is an old fool of an aſtrologer; but the hiſtorian doth not ſay ſo; for according to him, it was to the duke of Vendôme that the king ſaid, You are a fool.

Let us produce a ſecond witneſs, with the confutation of what he ſays. 'The evening of the ſame coronation, la Broſſe, an excellent Phyſician and Mathematician, ſaid to the duke of Vendôme, that if the king could avoid a dangerous accident, which threatened him, near at hand, he would live thirty years longer, and deſired him to procure him an audience of his majeſty: But the king underſtanding what he deſigned to talk to him about, would neither ſee nor hear la Broſſe (31).' The confutation of this is contained in the words of mareſchal Baſſompierre (32). It is falſe that la Broſſe deſired to ſpeak with the king; but if he had done it, the anſwer that he (33) has invented had been true, that he (34) would have ſcorned to ſpeak with him, for he looked upon him as a fool. We find in a diſcourſe upon the death of Henry IV, printed at the end of the Memoirs of the duke of Nevers, that the duke of Vendôme told ſeveral perſons, that la Broſſe did not ſpeak to him about it.

[G] It is not at all probable that he ever adviſed the duke of Alençon to make away with Catherine de Medicis.] Mr le Laboureur relates, that this queen, 'ſeeing Charles IX near his end, was afraid leſt the duke of Alençon ſhould be adviſed to pretend to the regency, and even to the crown, to the prejudice of his brother the king of Poland. She contrived upon this a pretended conſpiracy, which might give her occaſion to ſecure his perſon, as alſo that of the king of Navarre: She kept them under a good guard in the wood of Vincennes, till the king's death, tho' without declaring them priſoners; in the mean time, ſhe ſpread abroad the report of that conſpiracy, for which ſhe cauſed the marſhals of Montmorenci and Coſſé to be arreſted, and, in order to remove all occaſions of doubting of it, ſhe ſacrificed to this ſtate-intrigue, two favourites of the duke la Molle and Coconnaz . . . the duke of Alençon himſelf betrayed his cauſe, and his domeſtics, in the fear he was in; and he who kept up beſt to the character of a king oppreſſed, but incapable of doing any thing below his dignity, was Henry IV, then king of Navarre. Not but that he feared he was undone, and it was with that deſign, as I have learnt from ſome memoirs, that he was accuſed of having adviſed Monſieur to pretend to be ſick, to oblige the queen to come and ſee him, and under pretence of having both ſomething to ſay to her in private, to cauſe her retinue to withdraw, and then to ſtrangle her. His reaſons for it were, their own ſafety, the opportunity of the king's death, who was ready to expire, the credit that time would give to their friends, and that the ſame policy which made her renounce the laws of nature, to deſtroy her own ſon, and her ſon-in-law, diſpenſed them, upon a ſtronger motive than that of reigning, from abhorring an action, which would preſerve to the ſtate two princes that were neceſſary men, which was to be unfortunate in his family. The two wives whom he ſucceſſively married, the latter, in the former's lifetime, gave him a thouſand vexations [H]. He deſerved it, ſince he had ſo little regard to the ſacred laws of marriage. His ſecond wife was one of thoſe princeſſes againſt whom he had raiſed objections in examining, with Roni, what ſort of a wife was proper for him (c). His notions about marriage are very curious [I], and there are few converſations more ſolid and more pleaſant than that which he had upon that ſubject. It plainly appeared, that religion was only a falſe pretence of the League, and of the king of Spain; this, I ſay, plainly appeared, from the endeavours that were uſed to hinder the Pope from giving him abſolution.

(c) See the remark [I].

'neceſſary to it, by the death of a woman who diſturbed the peace, and cauſed the ruin of it. He had neither the courage to do it, nor the diſcretion to conceal it ſome time after, which was the reaſon of the mortal and implacable hatred of Catherine de Medicis, againſt the king of Navarre; and therefore ſhe did not ſcruple to have a hand in the conſpiracy againſt her own ſon Henry III, and to embroil the ſtate, when ſhe ſaw that he had no children, that ſhe might hinder Henry IV from ſucceeding him, and ſubſtitute, in his room, Henry duke of Lorrain her grand-ſon by her daughter (35). According to theſe memoirs, Henry IV deſigned to be one of the murtherers of the queen-mother.'

[H] His two wives . . . gave him a thouſand vexations.] There is no need of proving this with relation to Margaret de Valois. I will therefore only alledge the proof relating to Mary de Medicis. 'The high eſteem and affection the French had for him (36), prevented their being ſo much offended with his ſcandalous way of living; but the queen, his wife, was extreamly vexed at it, which occaſioned daily diſputes betwixt them, and made her diſdainful and ill humoured. The diſcontent and uneaſineſs of theſe domeſtic quarrels, no doubt retarded the execution of the great deſign he had formed for the good and perpetual repoſe of Chriſtendom, and afterwards for the deſtruction of the Ottoman power (37).'

[I] His notions about marriage are very curious.] I have a very long paſſage to quote, which yet I am confident will ſeem ſhort to curious readers; for it contains a kind of a criticiſm upon many princeſſes and a very ſolid reaſoning of Henry IV, about the choice of a wife. Here follows what he ſaid to Monſieur de Roni, his favourite (38). 'So that nothing more ſeems wanting to the accompliſhment of this deſign, but to ſee whether I can get another wife ſo well qualified, that I may not be expoſed to the greateſt misfortune of this life, which is (in my opinion) to have an ugly, ill-humoured, and quarrelſome wife, inſtead of that eaſe, repoſe, and ſatiſfaction, I ſhould propoſe to my ſelf in that condition: if a wife could be had according to one's wiſhes, that I might have no cauſe to repent of ſo hazardous a bargain, mine ſhould be endowed, amongſt other good qualities, which theſe ſeven principal ones; namely, beauty in her perſon, chaſtity in her life, complaiſance in her humour, ingenuity of mind, fruitfulneſs of body, eminence of birth, and great eſtate in poſſeſſion. But I believe, my friend, that this woman is dead, or rather ſhe is not yet born, nor ready to be born, and therefore, let us conſider a little, what maids or women, which we have heard of, would be fit for me, either within or without the kingdom. And foraſmuch as I have, in my opinion, thought of it more than you, I will tell you briefly, that I could content my ſelf with the Infanta of Spain, as old and ugly as ſhe is, provided I could marry with her the Low-Countries, tho' it ſhould be upon condition of reſtoring to you the county of Bethune; neither would I refuſe the princeſs Reibelle (39) of England, if, as they ſay, that the crown is juſtly her's, ſhe was only declared preſumptive heireſs of the kingdom: but I muſt not expect either the one or the other, for the king of Spain and the queen of England are very far from having ſuch a deſign. Sometimes I have heard mentioned ſome princeſſes of Germany, whoſe names I do not remember; but the women of that country would never agree with me; and I ſhould believe, if I had married one of them, that I muſt always have a barrel of wine by my bed-ſide; beſides, I have heard there was once a queen of France of that nation, who almoſt ruined the kingdom. So that all theſe conſiderations diſguſt me. Some have alſo ſpoke to me of one of the ſiſters of prince Maurice, but beſides that they are all Huguenots, and that ſuch a match might make me ſuſpected at Rome, and amongſt the zealous Catholics, that their mother was a nun, and ſomething elſe, which I will tell you another time, makes me averſe to it. The duke of Florence has a niece, who they ſay is pretty handſome; but he being of one of the leaſt families of Chriſtendom, that bears the name of a prince, it being but ſixty or eighty years ſince his predeceſſors were ranked only among the moſt illuſtrious citizens of Florence, and being of the ſame race with Catherine the queen-mother, who has been the cauſe of ſo much miſery to France, and ſtill more to me in particular, I am apprehenſive of ſuch a match, leaſt it ſhould prove as prejudicial to me, my friends, and my kingdom. Theſe are all the foreign women which I think I have heard of. As to thoſe within the kingdom, my niece of Guiſe is one of thoſe that would pleaſe me beſt, notwithſtanding the report that ſome malicious people have ſpread, that ſhe is a little wanton; for as to my own humour, beſides that I believe it to be falſe, I had rather have a wife given to gallantry, than one that ſhould prove ill-humoured; of which ſhe is not ſuſpected: On the contrary, ſhe is of a very ſweet and agreeable humour, and of a complaiſant converſation, and likewiſe of a good family, handſome, tall, and likely to have fine children ſoon. I fear only the too great paſſion ſhe expreſſes for her family, eſpecially for her brothers, which might poſſeſs her with deſires of raiſing them to my prejudice, and more ſtill to that of my children, if ever the regency of the ſtate ſhould fall into her hands. There are alſo two daughters of the houſe of Mayne, the eldeſt of which, as ſwarthy as ſhe is, would not diſpleaſe me, being modeſt and well educated; but they are too young. There are alſo two in the family of Aumalle, and three in that of Longueville, which are not contemptible for their perſons, but other reaſons hinder me from thinking of them. So much for princeſſes. You have beſides a daughter of the houſe of Luxemburg, one of the houſe Guimené, and my couſin Catherine of Rohan; but ſhe is a Huguenot, and the others do not pleaſe me; and then the daughter of my couſin the princeſs of Conty, of the houſe of Lucé, who is a very fine young lady, and well bred, and who would pleaſe me beſt of any, if ſhe was ſomewhat older. But tho' they ſhould all pleaſe me, as far as I can know them, who can aſſure me, that I ſhall meet with the three principal qualities which I deſire in a woman, and without which I would not marry; namely, that I ſhall have male children by them, that they ſhall be of a ſweet and complaiſant humour, and ſufficiently qualified to help me in ſedentary affairs, and to govern my kingdom and my children well, if I ſhould happen to die before they come to age, ſenſe, and judgment, to endeavour to imitate me: as this is like to happen, if I marry at ſo advanced age. But pray (anſwered you) may it pleaſe your majeſty, what do you mean by ſo many affirmatives and negatives, from which I can conclude only, that you are deſirous to be married, but that there are no women to be found upon earth that are fit for you? At this rate we ſhould implore the aſſiſtance of heaven to make young again the queen of England, and raiſe from the dead Margaret of Flanders, Mademoiſelle de Bourgogne, Jane la Loca, Anne of Bretagne, and Mary Stuart, all rich heireſſes, that you might take your choice of them. For according to the humour that you have expreſſed, ſpeaking of Clara Eugenia, you would like ſome of thoſe ladies who poſſeſſed ſo great eſtates: but laying aſide all theſe impoſſibilities and vain imaginations, let us conſider a little what is to be done, &c.

ſolution. I have related in another place (d) the pleaſantries of d'Aubigné, about the ſtrokes of a ſwitch, which the proxies of that prince received, when he was abſolved at Rome. I will ſay ſomething of it again, in this place [K].

Henry IV was born at Pau in Bern, the thirteenth of December, 1553 (e). Antony de Bourbon, his father, and Jane d'Albret, his mother, brought him to the court of France when he was five years old; but they ſtayed there but a few months, and returned to Bern (f). Antony came again to court after the death of Henry II. He was declared lieutenant-general of the kingdom after Francis the ſecond's death. He ordered the queen, his wife, and the prince, his ſon, to come to him. He died of a wound which he received at the ſiege of Roüen in the year 1562, and then his wife, whom he had uſed pretty harſhly [L], returned to Bern, where ſhe openly profeſſed Calviniſm (g). She left her ſon at the court of France, under the conduct of a prudent tutor, named la Gaucherie. She ſent for him to Pau in the year 1566, and put Florent Chreſtien in the room of la Gaucherie deceaſed (h). This new preceptor, a good Huguenot, brought up the prince in the Proteſtant religion: Jane d'Albret declared herſelf their protectreſs in the year 1569, and came with that intent to Rochelle with her ſon, whom ſhe from that time devoted to the defence of this new religion. In that quality he was declared chief of the party, and his uncle the prince of Condé his lieutenant, with admiral Coligny (i). He was in the army at the battle of Moncontour, and was eager to be in the action, but he was not ſuffered, for fear of hazarding his perſon (k). He followed the army from that time to the peace which was concluded the eleventh of Auguſt, 1570, and then he returned to Bern. His marriage with princeſs Margaret, ſiſter to Charles IX, was celebrated at Paris in Auguſt 1572. His mother arrived there ſome months before, to make preparations for the wedding, and died there as her ſon was on the road thither. He took upon him the title of king, when he received in Poictou the news of her death (l). All the world knows, that the maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day, was committed a few days after the wedding of this new king; and that this prince ſeeing himſelf reduced to chooſe to die, or to go to maſs, choſe the latter. The anſwers that ſome authors aſcribe to him, are only fancies of their own brain [M], and only teſtify their deſire of employing [K] I will again ſay ſomething of the ſtrokes of a ſwitch.] I will make uſe of the words of a Walloon miniſter (40). The pſalm Miſerere was ſung at the reconciliation of Henry the Great, where du Perron and d'Oſſat proſtrated all along on their faces, repreſenting the king of France, in the preſence of the Pope, and the Conſiſtory, received in the king's ſtead his penance decreed by the Holy See, which was to adjuſt to every verſe, a ſtroke of a ſwitch, over head, ſhoulders, and back, down to the feet, from the beginning of the Pſalm to the end. Du Perron in his letters, fol 172. ſhews the verbal proceſs of the abſolution of the king by Pope Clement VIII . . . . d'Oſſat, his companion, in the royal penance, ſhews how gentle it was. In the inſtruction of the Inquiſition, there was this hyperbolical expreſſion (41), when the choriſters ſung miſerere mei, the Pope at every verſe, verberabat & percutiebat humeros procuratorum cujuſlibet ipſorum virga, quam in manibus tenebat. —— Beat and ſmote the ſhoulders of the proxies, with a rod which he held in his hand. It was a ceremony we no more felt, than we could have felt a fly creeping upon our cloaths.

[L] Jane d'Albret whom her husband had uſed pretty harſhly.] The lure made uſe of to bring him off from the new religion, was the promiſe of the kingdom of Sardinia. He was ſo ſimple as to believe theſe promiſes; and he began by degrees to withdraw from the Proteſtants, and to vex the queen, all ſorts of ſnares being laid for him, by which a man given, as he was, to women, might be ſurpriſed; ſo by little and little, forgetting every thing elſe, he had nothing in his head but Sardinia, and women, amongſt which, a maid of honour to the queen began to have a great ſhare of his affection. Mean time, the queen of Navarre, as a moſt wiſe and virtuous princeſs, endeavoured to reclaim him, enduring all that was poſſible, and romonſtrating to him what he owed both to GOD and his people. But all was in vain, he was ſo bewitched. Which the queen ſeeing, ſhe had only recourſe to her prayers and tears, moving compaſſion in every one but the ſaid king her husband. The queen-mother, during theſe tranſactions, endeavoured to perſuade her to bear with the king her husband: To whom ſhe gave this final anſwer; that if the kingdom and her ſon were in her hands, ſhe would throw them both to the bottom of the ſea, that they might be no impediment to her, rather than ever go to maſs, which was the reaſon they troubled her no more upon that ſubject (42),

[M] The anſwers ſome authors aſcribe to him, are only fancies of their own brain.] During the maſſacre, Charles IX ſent for the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, into his cloſet, and declared to them, if they did not renounce their Hereſy, they ſhould be treated as the admiral. The king of Navarre extreamly aſtoniſhed at theſe words, pronounced with a menacing voice, and at the dreadful ſpectacle he had ſeen before his eyes, anſwered with great humility and trembling; that he begged of his majeſty to leave them their life and conſcience undiſturbed, and that in all other things they were ready to obey him (43). Tho' I make uſe of theſe words of Mezerai, yet we may be aſſured it is the ſame thing as if I had uſed the very words of a Calviniſt hiſtorian; for d'Aubigné (44) relates the anſwer of the king of Navarre in the ſame manner: it runs thus in the Inventaire of John de Serres; 'The king of Navarre beſeeches his majeſty, to remember his promiſe, and the conſanguinity ſo lately contracted, and not to do him any violence on account of the religion, which he hath learned from his youth (45).' The author of the Hiſtory of the Memorable Things, ſays no more than that: nor is the author of the commentary de Statu Religionis & Reipublicæ in regno Galliæ more prolix, as to the ſenſe, tho' he uſes more words (46); and note, that he expreſly obſerves, that the anſwer was made with a trembling voice (47). Thus you ſee four Proteſtant writers, who agree with Mezerai; which ſhews, that his ſincerity cannot be queſtioned. Which being ſo, ought we not to laugh at the hiſtorian, who lengthens out the anſwer we are ſpeaking of for three or four pages? 'Our Henry, ſays he (48), made an anſwer, which ſhewed from that time what the heighth of his courage, the depth of his ſenſe, and the great ſweetneſs of his clemency, ſhould be. He beſeeched his majeſty to remember his word that he had given him, the nearneſs of their blood, and their new alliance, and not to offer any violence to the religion which he had ſucked in from his childhood, with his nurſe's milk. He ſaid, that it was a great misfortune that ſo great a king, who had in his ſoul the ſeeds of all great virtues, ſhould be ſo pernicioully counſelled to force his ſubjects by murders and maſſacres, to ſerve God, according to his own fancy. That there was nothing that could ſubdue a courageous people, and particularly the French, but the lenity of their prince, whom they reverence as a God. That this was the method Flaminius took to make the Romans maſters of all Greece: ſo that though he had the ſuperior force in the city of Thebes, yet he uſed as much perſuaſion to gain the people, as an orator would ploying their reading. He was obliged againſt his will to ſtay ſome years at the court of France: He knew very well how to diſſemble his chagrin, and he often drove it away, by the help of ſome gallantry, which his own conſtitution, and the corruption of the ladies made very eaſy to him. The lady de Sauves, married to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, was one of his chief miſtreſſes (m). But he was not ſo taken up with love, as altogether to neglect political intrigues. He had a hand in thoſe that were formed to take away the government from the queen-mother, and to expel the Guiſes from court (n). That queen diſcovering theſe practices (o), cauſed him, and the duke of Alençon to be arreſted, ſet guards upon them, and ordered them to be examined, upon many beinous allegations (p) [N]. Theſe two princes were ſet at liberty by Henry III, before whom Catherine de Medicis carried them as far as Pont Beauvoiſin (q). The king of Navarre at laſt made his eſcape in the year 1576, and retired to Alençon (r). He ſided again with the Huguenots, and again profeſſed his firſt religion (s). The Rochellers received him into their town, and after he had ſtaid with them ſome months, he went to take poſſeſſion of his government of Guienne (t). From that time to the year 1589, his life was a mixture of battles, nagotiations, and love-intrigues. His wife was a great impediment to him, and yet ſhe proved ſometimes uſeful to him [O]. There were frequent ruptures and pacifications betwixt him and the court of France; but at laſt Henry III confederated with him ſincerely, and in good earneſt, to reſiſt the League, which was more furious than ever ſince the death of the duke of Guiſe and of the cardinal, his brother. The reconciliation and confederacy of theſe two kings, was concluded in April 1589. Their interview was at Tours, the thirtieth of the ſame month, attended with great demonſtrations of mutual ſatisfaction. They joined their troops ſome time after, to lay ſiege to Paris. They beſieged it in perſon, and were upon the point of ſubduing that great city, and chaſtiſing it as it deſerved, when the king of France was killed by James Clement at the village of St Clou. The king of Navarre ſucceeded him the ſecond of Auguſt, 1589, but it was not without very great difficulties, and without renouncing the Proteſtant religion, that he forced the Leaguers to acknowledge his title. The city of Paris perſiſted in it's revolt till the twenty ſecond of March 1594. I mean the king did not make his entry into it till that day. He declared war againſt the Spaniards the following year, and had not much reaſon to be pleaſed with it. He loſt much more than he got by it, but by good fortune, unknown to all his predeceſſors, he made a treaty of peace, wherein he indemnified himſelf for his loſſes [P]. This treaty

‘ would have done from his roſtrum, and that he ought to know, that he commanded a people that could neither bear an entire liberty, nor a perfect ſlavery: and that the royal authority was not a ſovereignty over ſlaves, but a government of fellow-citizens. That he had often heard that the Romans had commanded all nations, and made themſelves lords of the world, to ſhow that they were governed by reaſon, and did not give themſelves up to revenge (49) . . . Your majeſty knows, that one example of the Roman humanity was of greater effect to ſubdue the Faliſci, who were foreigners, than all their military power. What might not therefore your majeſty's gentleneſs have done with reſpect to the Proteſtants your natural ſubjects? A great king, as you are, ſhould not do all that he can do; but imitate the ſun, who proceeds more gently, the higher he is raiſed (50) . . . They who have given you ſo ill advice, are more to blame than you; and deſerve an equal puniſhment with thoſe that poiſon the public fountains, cauſing as many to die as drink of them.’ I have omitted the greateſt part of what this compiler of common places has put in the king of Navarre's mouth; but I ſhall take nothing from the the reply which he falſely aſcribes to Charles IX. ‘ Theſe, ſaid the king, are the fine things you have learned of Chreſtien, your tutor. But I know a finer one than any of them, which is, that God has given the ſupream command to the prince, the ſprings of which it is not lawful for a ſubject to meddle with: the glory of obedience is only his. Go and do as I command you upon pain of death. And though I am not bound to give any account of my actions, yet I am willing to let you know, that every great example ſeems to have ſomething of injuſtice in it, which is compenſated by the public good (51).’ Note, that he ſuppoſes, the king ſent for the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé ſeparately; the other hiſtorians relate that Charles IX ſent for theſe two princes at the ſame time.

[N] The queen-mother ordered him and the duke of Alençon to be examined on many beinous allegations.] ‘ (52) The chancellor went about to examine the king of Navarre; but though he was threatened, and a priſoner, he would not do ſo much injury to his dignity, as to anſwer him. However, to ſatisfy the queen-mother, he made a long diſcourſe, addreſſing himſelf to her, in which he gave a deduction of many things concerning the preſent poſture of affairs; but he accuſed no body at all, as the duke of Alençon had weakly done (53).

[O] His wife was a great impediment to him, and yet ſhe proved ſometimes uſeful.] Catherine de Medicis had brought her to him in the year 1578 (54). He kept his little court then at Nerac (55). Neither the husband nor the wife were pleaſed with ſeeing one another. ‘ (56) Margaret, who was fond of the great ſplendor of the court of France, where ſhe ſwam, if we may ſo ſpeak, in a full current of intrigues, thought that living in Guienne was a baniſhment to her; and Henry knowing her humour, and her conduct, wiſhed her rather at a diſtance, than at home. Nevertheleſs, being ſenſible that it was an evil that could not be avoided, he reſolved to ſuffer her, and left her at perfect liberty . . . . (57) and accommodating himſelf to the times, and the neceſſity of his affairs, he endeavoured to draw ſome advantages from her intrigues and intereſt. He obtained a conſiderable one by her means, at the conference that he and the deputies of the Huguenots had at Nerac with the queen-mother. For whilſt ſhe hoped to enchant them by the charms of the handſome young ladies ſhe had with her, and by the eloquence of Pibrac; Margaret played the ſame artifices againſt her, gained the gentlemen of her mother's retinue, by the charms of her own women, and employed ſo dexterouſly her own, that ſhe captivated the ſoul and the heart of poor Pibrac; ſo that he was altogether acted by her ſpirit, and did every thing contrary to the queen-mother's intention, who not ſuſpecting that ſo wiſe a man could be capable of ſuch a folly, was deceived in many articles, and inſenſibly led to grant much more to the Huguenots, than ſhe had reſolved to do.’

[P] By a good fortune, unknown to his predeceſſors, he made a treaty of peace, wherein he indemnified himſelf for his loſſes.] Bodin (58) obſerves, that for 100 years the Spaniards had made no treaty with France, without having the better of it. He had reaſon for what he ſaid; Henry IV was the firſt king of France who gained treaty was concluded at Vervins, the ſecond of May 1598. From that time, till his death, the kingdom was free from civil and foreign wars, excepting the expedition in the year 1600. It was undertaken againſt the duke of Savoy, and laſted but a little while, and was followed by an advantageous treaty (u), as it had been attended with glorious actions. If the valour and great courage of this king had not ſhewn themſelves on a hundred occaſions, the wonderful generoſity he exerciſed towards his moſt mortal enemies, had been looked upon as a weakneſs, and an effect of fear; but ſince he could not be ſuſpected of cowardice, there is great reaſon to believe, that he treated them ſo out of a noble and generous clemency. And it is certain, that even the moſt refined policy required it of him, his enemies not being to be reconciled to him any other way: nay, even he found that way defective, for he gained but a part of the Leaguers: a great many prieſts obſtinately refuſed to pray for him [Q]. It is obſerved in Moreri's Dictionary, that more than fifty Hiſtorians, and five hundred Panegyriſts, Poets, gained any thing by making peace with Spain. He recovered all the places he had loſt in Picardy; and alſo Blavet, which the Spaniards were maſters of. That peace did not eſcape the cenſure of the critics. Some blamed the king of Spain, and others, the king of France. I will cite Mr de Perefixe. 'Many among the French, who were not well acquainted with the miſerable condition, the king of Spain and his affairs were in, could not apprehend how that prince could purchaſe peace ſo dear, as to give up ſix or ſeven good places, amongſt others, Calais and Blavet, which might be called the keys of France. The Spaniards, on the contrary, who ſaw that their king was in a dying condition, his treaſury exhauſted, the Low-Countries tottering, Portugal, and his territories in Italy ready to revolt, the ſon that was to ſucceed him, a good prince indeed, but who loved a quiet life, were aſtoniſhed that the French, who had ſo bravely retaken Amiens, and re-united all their forces after the treaty of the duke of Mercœur, had not made an irruption into the Low-Countries, becauſe in all probability they would have conquered the whole country, or at leaſt part of it. The king anſwered, that if he had deſired peace, it was not becauſe he was tired out with the inconveniencies of war, but to afford Chriſtendom a breathing-time; that he knew very well, that in the preſent conjuncture of affairs, he might have reaped great advantages; but that the hand of GOD frequently overturns princes, in the height of their proſperity, and that a wiſe man ought never, out of an opinion of ſome favourable event, to be averſe to a good peace, nor truſt too much to the appearance of a preſent good fortune, which may be changed by a thouſand unforeſeen accidents; it often happening, that a man overthrown, and wounded, has killed him, who would make him beg his life of him (59).' This anſwer of Henry IV does not agree with what is reported by others, that he told the duke of Epernon, who was preſent at the ſigning of the treaty of peace, With this ſtroke of a pen, I have done more exploits than I could have done in a long time with the beſt ſwords of my kingdom (60). Indeed, there is great probability, that he promiſed himſelf no advantage by the continuation of the war, and I am ſure, that thoſe who were moſt diſintereſſed, and capable of judging of things of this ſort, were equally convinced of the weakneſs which Philip II ſhewed on that occaſion, and of the prudence of Henry IV in accepting ſuch a peace. The Spaniards were aſhamed of their king's weakneſs. The prince, his ſon, paſſionately deſired that ſo ſucceſsful a war might be continued; and he put out of favour Don Chriſtopher de Mora, who had repreſented in a council the moſt forcible arguments for a peace (61). The king of Spain was unmoveable, deſiring peace at any rate; he found no condition in the treaty of Vervins, capable of diſſuading him from approving it, though his council judged the reſtitution of the towns ſo fortunately taken, and ſo hard to be re-taken, ſhameful and prejudicial. He urged that it might be ſworn and executed (62). It is very probable, he would have had very different ſentiments, had he been in the vigour of his age. But how can it be helped? It is one of the faults of old age, to make people timorous.

Multa ſenem circumveniunt incommoda; vel quod
Quærit, & inventis miſer abſtinet, ac timet uti;
Vel quod res omnes TIMIDE GELIDEQUE miniſtrat (63).

An old man's character is hit with eaſe,
For he is pettiſh, and all one diſeaſe.
Still covetous, and ſtill he gripes for more,
And yet he fears to uſe his preſent ſtore;
Slow, long in hope, ſtill eager to live on,
And fond of no man's humour but his own.

CREECH.

I have ſaid elſewhere, that republics have an advantage which kingdoms want: the ſovereign in a common-wealth is never too young, nor ever too old. He is not ſubject either to the infirmities of childhood, or thoſe of old age. Kingdoms have not that good fortune; they experience one while the diſorders of a minority, ſometimes the heat of boiling blood, and at other times the ſlowneſs and heavineſs of a declining age. A king is forced to complain more than once, that the number of his years take away the activity and reſolution which he formerly enjoyed, and which a young prince, his enemy, poſſeſſes.

Unmov'd with fear, and mov'd with martial fame:
But my chill blood is curdled in my veins,
And ſcarce the ſhadow of a man remains.
Oh could I turn to that fair prime again.
That prime of which this boaſter is ſo vain:
The brave who this decrepid age defies,
Should feel my force without the promis'd prize.

DRYDEN.

For the reſt, we muſt not wonder that the critics found fault with the peace of Vervins, and that ſome blamed France, others Spain, and a third ſort Spain and France together. It is the fate of thoſe great negotiations; it was the fate of the treaty of the peace at Ryſwic in the year 1697. Many people blamed the Allies for not having demanded better conditions; others blamed France for having given up ſo great an extent of country. The French repined at it, and the Pariſians refuſed to make bon-fires, till they were forced to it by repeated menaces. They would not have had the nation return to the condition of paſſed ages, in which it might be juſtly ſaid, they knew to make war better than peace, and underſtood as well the art of reſtoring as of taking. They wiſhed the popular diſcourſes of the Flemings had proved falſe. They knew that abundance of ignorant people had ſaid that there was no reaſon to be alarmed at the loſs of ſome towns, but rather to rejoice at it, ſince they would be recovered again fortified, according to Vauban's method. Scholars expreſſed this in another manner: we loſe towns built with brick, they ſhall be reſtored built with marble (65).

[Q] Abundance of prieſts obſtinately reſolved not to pray for him.] The king's attorney-general in the parliament of Toulouſe having notice, that a great number of prieſts in ſaying maſs, omitted the prayer for the king (66), and that it was ſuppreſſed in many printed Miſſals (67), complained of it in parliament. It was there ordered, that all prieſts ſhould be obliged

Poets, or Orators, have mentioned this great monarch with commendation. It is certain, on the other hand, that a great many authors have ſpitefully ſtained his glory, and have made it their buſineſs to extenuate his good actions, and to ſet his faults in the ſtrongeſt light. The duke of Sulli complains of them, and confutes their obloquies, and, among other things, maintains, that it is falſe, that this prince granted every thing to the importunities of his miſtreſſes [R]. Nevertheleſs, I believe, that if he had not had faithful obliged to obſerve the ancient cuſtom of uſing that prayer, in celebrating divine ſervice, and the uſe of thoſe miſſals was forbidden where that prayer was omitted, and all Printers and Bookſellers were commanded to add immediately the leaf that was wanting, and, in caſe of refuſal, threatened them with corporal puniſhment, and the loſs of their copies. That decree was made the ſeventh of June, 1606 (68). If twelve years after the king had abjured Huguenotiſm, and had given a good many tokens of his zeal for Popery, and many teſtimonies of his kindneſs to the Leaguers, there were ſtill ſo many eccleſiaſtics, that mortally hated him, what could he have expected from a contrary conduct? the fury of the bigots and the obſtinate, had been infinitely more terrible, if he had neglected the outward profeſſion of religion, and acted like a prince full of reſentment. One of his hiſtorians (69) gives us, as an Inſtance of admirable policy, what I am going to tranſcribe: that very night (70) he played at cards with the ducheſs of Montpenſier, who was of the houſe of Guiſe, and the ſtrongeſt leaguer that was in the party (71). Undoubtedly this diſpleaſed his ancient ſervants. He would have been leſs forward to have paid ſuch an honour to a Huguenot lady; this is going beyond the parable of the goſpel. Did they perhaps ſay, that ducheſs hath not yet laboured in your vine-yard, and ſhe hath done all that was poſſible to ruin it; and yet ſhe is better paid than we, who have born all the burden and heat of the day (72). In the parable it was thought enough to equal the recompence of thoſe who had laboured but an hour, and had done no prejudices before, with that of thoſe who had laboured all the day. There were doubtleſs a great many murmurs of this ſort, which could not have been ſatisfied by this anſwer of the maſter of the family: is your eye evil, becauſe I am good (73). This would have been but chafing the wound; Henry IV would rather have ſaid for his vindication, that the neceſſity of the times required ſuch a conduct (74). Res dura & regni novitas me talia cogunt Moliri (75).

Mr du Pleſſis Mornaï, in a letter which he writ to Morlas in the year 1594, during the time that they who had followed the League, went off from it upon advantageous terms, uſes theſe remarkable words:
‘ We do not envy your killing the fatted calf for the ‘ prodigal ſon; provided you ſay with a ſincere heart ‘ to the obedient ſon, you know, my ſon, that all that ‘ I have is thine, provided you do not ſacrifice the ‘ obedient ſon to give a better entertainment to the ‘ prodigal one. In ſhort, I am glad of all that is ‘ done, if it be of ſome advantage. But I am afraid
‘ of ſuch bargains, by which things are given away
‘ and nothing is got for them but words; words I ‘ ſay, ſpoken by men, who hitherto never kept their ‘ word (76).’

[R] Mr de Sulli complains of them, and ..... maintains that it is falſe ..... that he granted every thing to the importunity of his miſtreſſes.] He ſpeaks of ſome hiſtoriographers, who had diſtributed their praiſes and cenſures unjuſtly; for they found no blot in thoſe that hired them, and hardly any thing good in Henry the Great, who gave them nothing. And (ſays he) (77) foraſmuch as they cannot deny him ſome praiſes, amongſt an infinite number that are every where publickly beſtowed upon him by the conſent of all nations, they maliciouſly forget the moſt neceſſary to be known, diſguiſe others, and extenuating them all as much as poſſible, they have made uſe of a malice of another ſort, full of impoſture, which is to aſcribe to him, impudently and falſly, deſires, projects, deſigns, enterprizes, and reſolutions about affairs of ſtate, the moſt abſurd, fooliſh, impertinent, and ridiculous that can be imagined. And, on this occaſion, they give themſelves airs, and talk as if they had been the king's greateſt confidents, and had been admitted into all his moſt ſecret thoughts and deſigns, or kept intelligence with one of his moſt familiar ſervants, both for peace and war, who told them all. Then proceeding to ſpeak of his private converſation, domeſtic life, and conduct in it, and, above all, of his recreations, diverſions, ſports, pleaſures, paſtimes, and gaities, tho' they were for the moſt part ordinary, common, and familiar to all men, nay, even to women, and always moſt general, univerſal, tolerated, lawful, and permitted to all kings, potentates, princes, and great lords, there being few to be found among the moſt wiſe, virtuous, debonaire, pious, and holy, who were not delighted with them, and which their people and ſubjects have not gladly ſuffered, when for ſuch pleaſures and paſtimes there has been no injuſtice, rape, murder, violence, extortion, or pillage committed. Yet when they come to diſcourſe of the gaities and mirth of this ſweet and debonaire prince; they ſo exaggerate and miſrepreſent them, with ſo many lyes and fallacious circumſtances, and miſchievous and pernicious conſequences, aſcribing to him ſo many vicious, ſhameful, infamous, nay execrable and ſcandalous paſſions, that to hear them ſpeak, with ſo much boldneſs, impudence, and raſhneſs, one would think, that they were ſearchers of the hearts and thoughts of men ..... or that they had been the king's confeſſors or great penitentiaries ..... Nay, they have been ſo bold, as to place in the number of his miſtreſſes, a lady, whoſe qualities, eminence, virtue, and prudence, would have cautioned him, even though he had thought on her, not to take her for ſuch a one; and conſequently thoſe impudent writers deſerve to be ſeverely puniſhed for having talked at that rate. They ſay likewiſe, that the women had got ſuch dominion over him, becauſe vice was grown natural and habitual to him, by a long uſe, and great familiarity with wicked people, and that he was become ſo deſperately fond of ſome of theſe beauties, that he had no other will but theirs, and that this weakneſs was the cauſe that all his moſt important affairs were managed by their mediation, and that they were refuſed nothing they could deſire. They ſo frequently add ſo many other fooliſh and trifling things, that all theſe impoſtures being too long to be confuted in this preſent diſcourſe, (which is otherways deſigned) we will refer thoſe who are willing to ſee their calumnies expoſed, to what ſhall be ſaid of them in ſeveral places of theſe memoirs, from which it will appear by what means, and for what reaſons, the king never intended to marry a lady of pleaſure; that women diſpoſed of no affairs, and that he had ſervants, who by his own command knew how to tell them their faults, even in his preſence, and to refuſe them ſuch things as they judged unjuſt, or prejudicial to the ſtate, the affairs and revenues of the king, or to his people; and they were obliged to bear it. I will confirm this by ſome words taken from a letter of Henry IV, in which we ſhall ſee the calumnies which were thrown upon him. ‘ Some blame me for being too fond of build‘ ings and coſtly edifices. Others find fault with ‘ my hunting, with my dogs, and hawks; ſome cen‘ ſure me for cards, dice, and other ſorts of games;
‘ others for loving the ladies; others for feaſts, ban‘ quets, and dainties: others find fault with me for ‘ loving of comedies, balls, dances, and running at the ‘ ring, where (ſay they to reproach me) I am ſtill ‘ ſeen with my grey beard, as jocund and vain for ‘ having made a handſome courſe, entered twice or ‘ thrice (as they merrily expreſs it) and carried off the ‘ ring of a fine lady, as I could have been in my ‘ youth, nay, as the vaineſt man in my court. In all ‘ which diſcourſes, I will not deny but there may be ‘ ſomething true. But I ſay, at the ſame time, that ‘ whilſt I exceed not bounds, this ought rather to be ‘ ſaid in my commendation than as a fault; and I ‘ ought ſurely to be excuſed for uſing ſuch diverſions,
‘ as bring no damage or inconvenience to my people,
‘ by way of retribution, for the frequent bitterneſs
‘ I have taſted, and for thoſe many diſquietudes, vexa‘ tions, and dangers, which I have run through from ‘ my childhood to fifty years of age ..... The ſcrip‘ ture does not abſolutely command us to be free

ful ſervants to diſappoint the rapaciouſneſs of thoſe harpies, and whoſe oppoſition he approved of, they had been more deſpotic over him. The inſtances wherein he had the power to diſengage himſelf from the ſnares that were laid for him, by fine ladies [S], were not common, yet ſome there were. Thoſe ſervants whoſe fidelity he had experienced, might give him their advices, without diſguſting him; and it has never been ſaid, that Villeroy fell into diſgrace, for having ſaid a thing, that was likely enough to diſpleaſe him [T]. It cannot be denied but that prince had a vaſt generoſity, which baniſhed from his conduct abundance of artifices, which are but too common among thoſe that govern. We ſhall ſee, upon this head, the judgment [U] he made of an artifice of one of the kings of France.

‘ mities are the inſeparable attendants, of the impetuouſneſs and eagerneſs of humane nature; but only not to be enſlaved by them, and not to ſuffer them to get an empire over our wills. Which is what I have ſtudied to do, not being able to do better. And you can witneſs in abundance of things, relating to my miſtreſſes, (which have been the paſſions the world believes I am moſt ſubject to) whether I have not often maintained your opinions. againſt their fancies, even ſo far as to tell them, when they pretended to make a noiſe, that I had rather loſe ten ſuch miſtreſſes as they, than one ſuch ſervant as you, who was neceſſary to me in honourable and uſeful affairs (78).’

[S] There have been inſtances wherein he had the power to diſengage himſelf from the ſnares which were laid for him by fine ladies.] Catherine de Medicis asking him at the conference of Saint Brix (79), What he would have? he anſwered, looking on the young ladies of her retinue; there is nothing there, Madam, that I am for, meaning, that he deſigned no longer to be caught by ſuch ſort of lures. He was not ſo prudent on other occaſions: for ſome time after the Paris maſſacre (80), ‘ he ſuffered himſelf to be captivated by the charms of ſome young ladies of the court, whom it is ſaid that queen made uſe of on purpoſe to amuſe the princes and lords, and to diſcover all their thoughts (81).’ Behold an abominable queen! every body knows what name is given to ſuch a trade. Good GOD! what a ſchool for young ladies of quality, whom they call maids of honour? obſerve that if this queen had deſired to keep two or three hundred, ſhe would have been ſupplied with them: ſo great was the corruption of that time; for it was well known what uſe ſhe made of theſe maids of honour.

[T] Villeroy ſaid a thing that was likely enough to diſpleaſe him.] There is none ſo ignorant, as not to know, that it is a very rude advice, and that toucheth to the quick, to tell a man he knows not how to keep his rank, and that he forgets the dignity of his character. And yet this was done by Villeroy to king Henry the Great. Naudé praiſes him for it. One of the beſt advices, ſays he (82), that ever Monſieur de Villeroy gave to Henry the Great, who had lived as a ſoldier during the wars, which happened at his coming to the crown, was, that a prince who is regardleſs of the reverence due to his majeſty, permits it to be ſlighted and affronted. That the kings, his predeceſſors, in the greateſt confuſions, had always acted as kings, and that it was time that he ſhould ſpeak, write, and command, as a king.

[U] We ſhall ſee the judgment he made of an artifice of one of the kings of France.] He was ‘ a great obſerver of things, which concerned the preſervation of the reputation of princes, in which he choſe rather to recede from his right and power, than give the leaſt occaſion to doubt his ſincerity, always blaming faithleſs and tricking princes, ſo far as not to ſpare his own predeceſſors, when the converſation fell upon any of their actions, wherein they failed of integrity in their promiſes and public faith, as he did one day, when the great affairs of king Philip de Valois, and his great courage, little ſeconded by his fortune, were the ſubject of diſcourſe. He was great, ſaid the king, but he had ſubtilties in his words, more becoming the wheedlers of little children than ſuch a king, which I do not at all approve. He had made a treaty with the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and by it engaged not to make war with the empire; contrary to which, notwithſtanding, he raiſed armies by ſea and land, which he threw into the Low-Countries, under the conduct of the duke of Normandy, his eldeſt ſon, who was defeated by ſea at Sluys, and having beſieged Thin, the king, his father, was preſent at that ſiege as a ſoldier, fighting under his ſon, being nevertheleſs, one of his counſellors, thinking by that captious equivocation to eſcape the blame of breaking the treaty he had made as king of France, as if it was not the ſame thing to execute any enterprize, ones ſelf, or by another (83). It is not long ſince a doctor, with whom I was walking, told me, that Henry IV, having heard a ſtory of a fallacy of the king of Spain, cried out it muſt be confeſſed, that kings are great knaves: I asked him immediately, whether he had found that in any book; he anſwered me, it was one of the fine ſayings of Henry the Great (§α), in a collection that has been publiſhed of them, at the end of his hiſtory, compoſed by the biſhop of Rhodez (84), preceptor to Lewis XIV. I doubt it much, ſaid I, for I have read that work of Mr Perefixe from one end to the other, and there remains in my mind, no idea of what you tell me; and yet theſe are words ſo like to make an impreſſion, that they are not eaſily forgot. I afterwards found it true, that it was not in the book of the biſhop of Rhodez, and I wrote ſo to the doctor. He ſent me word, that after reflecting more maturely, he believed that exclamation of Henry IV was related in one of the Engliſh letters of Howel. I bring this here, only by way of advertiſement, that we ought not to truſt to hear-ſays, and that facts change very much in paſſing from one writer to another. What a vaſt difference is there betwixt the words of le Grain and thoſe of Howel!

[(§α) We have a collection of them printed, but in it are wanting two repartees, which this prince ſaid while only fifteen years of age, and which have been preſerved to us by his illuſtrious mother, Jane d'Albret queen of Navarre. Catherine de Medicis the queen mother, in concert with the cardinal of Lorrain, had ſent the Sieur de la Motte-Fenelon, to the queen of Navarre, to diſſuade her from joining her forces with thoſe, which the Reformed, were raiſing under the command of the prince of Condé, in the year 1568, at the beginning of the third civil-war. One day la Motte Fenelon addreſſed himſelf particularly to the prince of Navarre, and ſeemed to appear ſurprized, that he, who was ſo young, ſhould intereſt himſelf in a quarrel, which properly concerned only his uncle, the prince of Condé and the Huguenots, who were engaged in a war againſt the king. I do ſo, anſwered the prince, becauſe it being evident, that under pretence of rebellion, with which they falſly charge the prince, my uncle, and the Huguenots, our enemies intend no leſs than the entire diſtruction of the royal branch of Bourbon, we have a mind to dye altogether, to ſave the expences of mourning, which otherways we ſhould be obliged to wear for one after another.

Upon another occaſion, the ſame gentleman, addreſſing his diſcourſe to the ſame prince of Navarre, deplored the miſeries with which the flames of that war were about to devour the whole kingdom, as he expreſſed himſelf. Very well, anſwered the prince, theſe flames may be quenched by one bucket of water. How ſo, replyed la Motte-Fenelon? by making the cardinal of Lorrain, the real, and principal incendiary of France, drink it till he burſt, ſaid the prince. The queen of Navarre relates this in a long and elegant manifeſto, to be found pag. 234, and 235, of a Collection printed in 12mo. in 1570 intituled L'Hiſtoire de noſtre temps &c. REM. CRIT.]

HERACLEOTES (Dionysius), ſo called becauſe he was of Heraclea (a), a city of Pontus, ſtudied under ſeveral maſters, and at laſt he attached himſelf to the founder of the Stoics (b). He learnt of him to ſay, that pain is no evil; that nothing but vice deſerves that name, as nothing but virtue deſerves the name of good, and that all other things are indifferent. He was ſteady in that doctrine, as long as he was in good health; but happening to feel ſome violent pains, he altered his opinion [A], and renounced the ſect of the Stoics; and, which is worſe, he embraced that of the Cyrenaïcs, who placed the Summum Bonum in pleaſure. He reſorted, without ſhame, publickly to the ſtews, and was willing, that the pleaſures he indulged himſelf in ſhould be known to all the world (c). There are ſome that ſay, that he was a debauchee from his youth [B], and that remembring as he was going by a brothel-houſe, that he had left it the day before, without paying what was due to the women of pleaſure, he put

[A] Happening to feel ſome violent pains, he altered his opinion.] This change acquired him the title of ματαθέμενος (1), which we may tranſlate deſerter. Some ſay, that ſore eyes made him change his opinion; others attribute it to the pains of the gravel. Cicero relates both theſe traditions (2). ‘Nobis ‘Heracleotes ille Dionyſius flagitioſe deſciviſſe videtur ‘à Stoicis propter oculorum dolorem. Quis verò hoc ‘didiciſſet à Zenone, non dolere quum doleret? Illud ‘audierat nec tamen didiceret malum illud non eſſe ‘quia turpe non eſſet, & eſſet ferendum viro: Hic ſi ‘peripateticus fuiſſet, permanſiſſet, credo in ſententia, quoniam dolorem dicunt malum eſſe, de aſperitate autem ejus fortiter ferenda præcipiunt eadem ‘quæ Stoici (3) —— This Dionyſius Heracleotes appears to have deſerted the Stoics infamouſly, on account of a pain in his eyes. For to whom did ever Zeno teach that what is painful is not painful? He had heard, but without underſtanding it, that pain is not an evil, becauſe it is not ſhameful, and that a man ought to ſuffer it. If he had been a Peripatetic, I am of opinion, that he would have continued ſo, for they maintain that pain is an evil, but they teach, as to the Stoics do, that a man ought to ſuffer it with courage.’ I have ſet down more words than I needed to prove what I had ſaid, and yet I do not think my labour loſt; for, by the way, I diſcover to my reader, that the controverſies of the Stoics and Peripatetics, upon the nature of pain, was but a diſpute of words. They both agreed, that it ought to be born courageouſly: but the former denied that it ought to be called an evil, and the latter maintained it ought. A matter of conſequence indeed to make ſuch a ſtir about. We diſpute at this day, both in divinity and philoſophy, about things wherein the miſunderſtanding is no leſs viſible. Here is a paſſage of Cicero, which I will ſet down entire, that we may have a full view of the way of reaſoning of our Heracleotes. He preſumed much upon the ſtrength of philoſophy; for he judged, that it being inferior to the force of pain, pain muſt needs be an evil. ‘Homo ſanè levis Heracleotes Dionyſius, cum à Zenone fortis eſſe didiciſſet, à dolore ‘deductus eſt. Nam cum ex renibus laboraret, ipſo ‘in ejulatu clamitabat, falſa eſſe illa, quæ antea de ‘dolore ipſe ſenſiſſet. Quem cum Cleanthes condiſcipulus rogaret quænam ratio eum de ſententia deduxiſſet, reſpondit, Quia cum tantum operæ Philoſophiæ dediſſem, dolorem tamen ferre non poſſem ‘ſatis eſſet argumenti malum eſſe dolorem. Plurimos autem annos in Philoſophia conſumpſi, nec ‘ferre poſſum: malum eſt igitur dolor. Tum Cleanthem, cum pede terram percuſſiſſet, verſum ex Epigonis ferunt dixiſſe:

Audiſne hæc Amphiaraë, ſub terram abdite?

‘Zenonem ſignificabat, à quo illum degenerare dolebat (4). —— Dionyſius Heracleotes, being a man of no conſtancy, after he had been taught hardineſs by Zeno, fell from it, being overcome by pain. For being afflicted with the gravel, in the anguiſh of his pain, he cryed out, that his former opinion concerning pain was falſe. And, when his condiſciple Cleanthes asked him, why he had changed his opinion, he anſwered, ſince I have ſtudied Philoſophy ſo long, yet am not able to ſuffer pain, that is a ſufficient reaſon to believe that pain is an evil. Cleanthes upon this, after ſtamping with his foot on the ground, as the ſtory goes, repeated this verſe out of the Epigonia,

Audiſne hæc Amphiaraë ſub terram abdite?

Amphiaraus, now thou art entomb'd in earth,
Doſt thou hear this?

‘Meaning Zeno, from whom he lamented that Dionyſius ‘had degenerated.’

[B] There are ſome who ſay that he was a debauchee from his youth.] We have juſt now ſeen, that he philoſophized many years upon the auſtere maxims of the Stoics; he himſelf affirms it, if we believe Cicero. What muſt we think then of the ſtory we find in Athenæus? Shall we ſay that this author diverted himſelf with collecting all the ſcandalous ſtories, true or falſe, that he found in the moſt ſatirical writers? I leave the deciſion to my readers. I only inſert the Greek of Athenæus, with Dalecampius's verſion, which ſhould be rectifyed by Caſaubon's notes. Ἦν δὲ ὁ Διονύσιος ἔτι ἐκ νέου, ὥς φησι Νικίας ὁ Νικαεὺς ἐν ταῖς διαδοχαῖς πρὸς τὰ Ἀφροδίσια ἐκμανὴς, καὶ ϖρὸς τὰς δημοσίας εἰσῄει ϖαιδίσκας ἀδιαφόρως. καί ϖοτε πορευόμενος μετὰ τινῶν γνωρίμων, ὡς ἐγένετο κατὰ τὸ ϖαιδισκεῖον εἰς ὃ τῇ ϖροτεραία ϖαρεληλυθὼς ὤφειλε χαλκοῦς, ἔχων τότε κατὰ τύχην, ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα ϖάντον ὁρώντων ἀϖεδίδου. Fuit autem Dionyſius ille, quod ait Niceas Nicæenſis libro de Succeſſionibus, jam ab adoleſcentia, tam immani furioſaque libidine percitus, ut ſine diſcrimine cum plebeiis ancillis ac pediſſequis coiret, & aliquando cum familiaribus inambulans, ubi ad ancillarum ædes venit, quas pridie ingreſſus aliquot obolos quos debebat non ſolverat, caſu tum forte in loculis habens, diſtenta manu coram omnibus numeravit (5). —— Niceas Nicenſis, in his book of Succeſſions, ſays, that this Dionyſius was from his youth ſo abandoned to his pleaſures, that he lay promiſcuouſly with all the wenches he could come at. And that one day walking with ſome of his friends, and paſſing by the houſe of ſome wenches, with whom he had lain the day before, and to whom he owed ſome pence, he having then ſome in his pocket, held out his hand, and publickly paid his debt. They who well remember the ſeventh book of Athenæus, will be eaſily determined on Cicero's ſide, and believe, that Dionyſius did not deſert the Stoics, till he was grown grey amongſt them; for Athenæus gives him the name of old man, at the time of this deſertion, and cites Timon the jeſter, who ſaid, that this wiſe man had begun to devote himſelf to pleaſures, when the ſeaſon of them was over. But let us give the original, it is in the ſixth chapter of the ſeventh book of Athenæus, pag. 281. Περὶ δὲ Διονυσίου τοῦ Ἡρακλεώτου τι δεῖ καὶ λέγειν; ὃς ἀντικρυς ἀποδὺς τὸν τῆς ἀρετῆς χιτῶνα ἄνθινα μετημφιάσατο, καὶ Μεταθέμενος καλούμενος ἔχαιρε, καί τοι γεραιὸς ἀποστὰς τῶν τῆς στοᾶς λόγων, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν Ἐπίκουρον μεταπηδήσας· ϖερὶ οὗ οὐκ ἀχαρίτως ὁ Τίμων ἔφη, put his hand in his pocket, and paid his debts regularly in the face of the world. There was a perplexing objection made to him [C] upon his admitting with all the Dogmatiſts, a rule for diſtinguiſhing of truth and falſhood. He compoſed ſeveral philoſophical works, and alſo ſome poems (d). He brought Heraclides into a ſnare by one of his poems [D]. He lived to the age of eighty years, after which, chooſing not to live any longer, he put an end to his life by refuſing all nouriſhment (e). His laſcivious deſires accompanied him to an age, wherein nature could not ſatisfy them [E]. Mr Moreri is groſsly miſtaken [F].

What ſhall we ſay of Dionyſius Heracleotes? Who, having openly thrown off the robe of virtue, laughed at the title of Apoſtate, that was given him on that account, though he had in his old age deſerted from the Stoics to the Epicurean ſect. Timon pleaſantly wrote concerning him: Heracleotes devotes the dregs of life to Venus. There is a ſeaſon for love, a ſeaſon for marriage, and a time when we ſhould attempt neither.

I add, that Lucian obſerves, that Dionyſius was a a very ſober man, when he quitted the Stoics (6). I dare not affirm, with Mr Menage (7), that he had been in Aſia in Alexander's retinue, and had danced to the ſound of flutes at this conqueror's nuptials. Athenæus indeed ſays this of one Dionyſius Heracleotes but how many people of the ſame name doth he mention, without any mark of diſtinction?

[C] A perplexing objection was made to him.] Antiochus was the man that made this objection; he had embraced a ſect, which admitted no ſcience, that is, no propoſition certainly true, and afterwards he forſook that party, when he had for a long time maintained incomprehenſibility, and written ſubtilly for that cauſe, 'Scripſit de his rebus acutiſſime, & idem 'hoc acrius accuſavit in ſenectute quàm antea de'fenſitaverat. Quamvis igitur fuerit acutus, ut fuit 'tamen inconſtantia elevatur autoritas. Quis, in'quam, etiam iſte dies illuxerit, quæro, qui illi oſten'derit eam quam multos annos eſſe negaviſſet veri '& falſi notam (8)? —— He wrote very acutely on 'theſe ſubjects, and in his old age, impugned his for'mer doctrine with more vehemency than he had be'fore defended it. Therefore tho' he was a very a'cute writer, as certainly he was, yet his authority 'was leſſened by his inconſtancy. For I would ask him 'on what happy day it was that he luckily found, 'that criterion of truth and falſhood, which he had 'ſo long denied.' Now whilſt he was oppoſing certainty, he cruelly teazed our Dionyſius; you believed a long time, ſaid he, that there was no other good but virtue; afterwards you maintained that virtue was a vain name, and that the ſupream good conſiſts in pleaſure. You ought therefore to believe, that falſhood preſents itſelf to our minds, and ſtamps itſelf there in the ſame character, to truth, and conſequently, that the characteriſtic or mark of true and and falſe, which you truſt to in affirming or denying, is fallacious and deluſive. All the force of this objection lay in this, that Dionyſius had ſucceſſively maintained two contradictory propoſitions. Antiochus felt the force of his own objection, when he changed his opinion; for he was beaten with the ſame weapons, that he had employed againſt Dionyſius. Here follow Cicero's words (9): 'Quoque ſolebat uti 'argumento tum, cùm ei placebat, nihil poſſe perci'pi, cùm quæreret, Dionyſius ille Heracleotes, utrum 'comprehendiſſet certa illa nota qua aſſentiri dicitis 'oportere, illudne, quod multos annos tenuiſſet, Ze'nonique magiſtro credidiſſet, honeſtum quod eſſet, id 'bonum ſolum eſſe; an quod poſteà defenſitaviſſet, 'honeſti inane nomen eſſe, voluptatem eſſe ſummum 'bonum: qui ex illius commutata ſententia docere 'vellet, nihil ita ſignari in animis noſtris à vero 'poſſe, quod non eodem modo poſſit à falſo, is cura'vit, quod argumentum ex Dionyſio ipſe ſumpſiſſet, 'ex eo cæteri ſumerent. ———— He uſed the follow'ing argument, while he was of opinion that we 'could not arrive at certainty of truth. Which of 'theſe two opinions, ſaid he, did Dionyſius Heracleotes 'diſcover by that criterion, to which you ſay we ought 'to ſubmit, whether the firſt, which he long main'tained, and which he had learned from his maſter 'Zeno, that nothing is good but what is virtuous; 'or that which he defended afterwards, that virtue 'is an empty ſound, and that pleaſure is the chief 'good: deſigning to ſhow, from Dionyſius's change of 'opinion, that truth makes no other impreſſion on the 'mind, but what it may receive from falſhood. He 'took care that thoſe who came after him, ſhould draw 'the ſame argument, from his inconſtancy, which he 'had drawn from that of Dionyſius.' This objection may perplex thoſe modern Proteſtants, who maintain that the truths of the goſpel enter not into the mind by the way of evidence, but by ſenſe. What will they ſay, if we ſhew them Chriſtians who change their religion, and, like our Dionyſius, for a long time violently eſpouſe the ſame opinions, which afterwards they reject with an equal zeal? Doth not the ſenſe of falſhood, might one ask, imprint itſelf on the ſoul, with all the ſame characters as the ſenſe of truth?

A PYRRHONIAN objection.

[D] He brought Heraclides into a ſnare by one of his poems.] Having written a poem, called Παρθενοπαῖον, Parthenopæum, he publiſhed it, and aſcribed it to Sophocles. Heraclides honeſtly took this work for a production of Sophocles, and cited it as ſuch in one of his books. Then Dionyſius diſcovered the trick to him, and Heraclides would not believe him; he maintained, that it was Sophocles's work; and even when Dionyſius ſent him his manuſcript, he perſiſted in his opinion, and pretended, that chance might cauſe two poets to jump (10). So diſagreeable it is to an author to acknowledge himſelf caught in that manner. Scaliger, being deceived the ſame way by Muretus, was not ſo obſtinate, but he was very much vexed at it.

[E] His laſcivious deſires accompanied him to an age wherein nature could not ſatisfy them.] Upon a great feſtival, which he celebrated as agreeably as he could, he ſent for a courteſan, that nothing might be wanting to the pleaſures of the day; but age had ſo ſubdued him, that his attempts were vain. He confeſſed his infirmity, making uſe of the words (11) which Homer puts in the mouth of one Penelope's galants, who not being able to bend Ulyſſes's bow, cryed out, let another take it, I am not able to do it (12). Dionyſius in like manner declared, that ſince his ſtrength failed him, another ſhould make uſe of the Courteſan. Φησὶ τὸν Διονύσιον τοῖς οἰκέταις συνεορτάζοντα, ἐν τῇ τῶν Χόων ἑορτῇ, καὶ μὴ δυνάμενον διά γῆρας χρῆσθαι ἣ παρειλήφεσαν ἑταίρᾳ, ὑποστρέψαντα εἰπεῖν πρὸς τοὺς συνδειπνοῦντας, ΟΥ δύναμαι τανύσαι, λαβέτο δὲ καὶ ἄλλος. Tradit Dionyſium cum domeſticis, diebus feſtis congiorum, ferias illas agentem, cum ob ſenectutem meretrice quam adduxerant uti non poſſet, ad convivas facie verſa, dixiſſe. Arrigere nequeo, ſumat alius (13) Antigonus Caryſtius related this in the life of our Dionyſius Heracleotes.

[F] Mr Moreri is groſsly miſtaken.] I. He ſays, that Dionyſius of Heraclea . . . . . . having quitted the ſchool of Zeno, followed the Cynics. He ſhould have ſaid Cyrenaïcs, whoſe ſect was extreamly different from that of the Cynics. We may judge of it, from the oppoſite characters, which were found in Ariſtippus and Diogenes. There is not at the bottom any great difference betwixt Diogenes Laërtius, who makes our Dionyſius go over to the camp of the Cyrenaïcs, and Athenæus, who makes him go over to the ſect of Epicurus; for tho' Epicurus gave a more virtuous explication of the word Pleaſure, he agreed with the Cyreniacs, that the laſt end of man, the ſupreme good, the happineſs of man, was pleaſure. II. Theſe words, he did not ſcruple . . to do publickly, what might give him pleaſure, are a conſequence of his firſt error, and a new error. If Dionyſius had embraced Cyniciſm, he would not have been aſhamed to have lain with a woman in the middle of the ſtreets; but as he only went over to the ſchool of Ariſtippus, who was a pleaſant debauchee, and a polite libertine, who knew the world admirably well, and that the Cyrenaïcs, who give nature all it desired, had not however adopted the impudence of the Cynics, it is wrong to pretend, that he had no more reſpect than Diogenes for the eyes of his neighbours. I confeſs he was willing to be ſeen to enter into the public ſtews, and to have it known that he had do with proſtitutes (14), but every body knows, that this doth not ſignify that he knew women publickly, and in the ſight of every body, as was the practice of the Cynics. III. Our Philoſopher's deſerting from the Stoics, could not be more confuſedly repreſented than Moreri has done it. Dionyſius, ſaith he, being exceſſively tormented with a pain in his eyes, would never ſay that pain was indifferent. Is this a true deſcription of the change of this Philoſopher? Is not one tempted to fancy here a man that is put upon the rack, to make him ſay, that pain is indifferent, and who obſtinately perſiſts in denying it? See in the paſſages of Cicero, above quoted (15), the genuine ſtate of this adventure. IV. He ſhould not have taken from Dionyſius ten years of his life; it was at the age of eighty, and not of ſeventy, that he ſuffered himſelf to die with hunger.

HERACLIUS, Patriarch of Jeruſalem, in the XIIth century, was the maker of his own fortune. He was born at Auvergne, without fortune or friends, and yet he was promoted to the archbiſhopric of Cæſarea, and afterwards to the patriarchate of Jeruſalem. His good mein and addreſs brought him into the ſtricteſt intimacy with the king's mother; ſo that the oppoſitions of the archbiſhop of Tyre, proved vain, though he grounded them upon prophecies [A]. In vain he proteſted againſt the election of Heraclius, in vain he appealed to the Pope, and even went to Rome, in order to get it declared void: he had not time to put an end to that affair. Heraclius cauſed him to be poiſoned [B], and afterwards going to Rome, got his election confirmed by the Pope. He ſucceeded the Patriarch Almeric, who died in the year 1180. He led a very ſcandalous life with a merchant's wife of Napoli in Syria, whom he brought to Jeruſalem after the death of her huſband (a). You will ſee, below, ſome circumſtances of it [C]. We muſt not diſtinguiſh him from the Patriarch Heraclius, mentioned in the Hiſtory of the Cruſades; and who expreſſed ſo much paſſion againſt Henry II king of England [D], when he found that that prince excuſed himſelf from going in perſon to the

[A] Though he grounded them upon prophecies.] He ſaid, that the prophecies foretold, that as the croſs was conquered by one Eraclius, it ſhould be loſt under another (1). I believe he would have ſpoke more agreeably to hiſtory, if he had ſaid, that as the Infidels had taken the croſs under one Heraclius, they ſhould retake it under another Heraclius. I know the emperor or Heraclius recovered, by a treaty of peace, the croſs which the Perſians had carried off; but can this be called a conquering of the croſs?

(1) Hiſtoire de la Conquête de Jeruſalem par Saladin. See the remark [C].

[B] The archbiſhop of Tyre had not time to put an end to that affair. Heraclius cauſed him to be poiſoned.] I have found this in a preface, that Bongarſius has placed before the Geſta Dei per Francos. He tells us, that William archbiſhop of Tyre, the ſame that has written the hiſtory of this times, remonſtrated in vain to the canons of the Holy Sepulchre, againſt their nomination of Heraclius to the Patriarchate of Jeruſalem. He alledged to them the abovementioned prophecy; and that they might not think that he aſpired to the vacant dignity, he conjured them neither to nominate Heraclius nor himſelf. Neverthelеſs, they were the two that were nominated. The king, according to the promiſes he had made to his mother, made choice of Heraclius, who immediately publiſhed his mandate, requiring obedience from the archbiſhops and biſhops, depending on the Patriarchate of Jeruſalem. None but the archbiſhop of Tyre refuſed to appear. He appealed to the Pope, and undertook to ſhew that Heraclius was not worthy of the Patriarchate. He immediately ſet out for Rome, and was very well received there, and put things on ſuch a foot, that the depoſition of Heraclius was looked upon as unavoidable; but the new Patriarch prevented the blow, by corrupting a Phyſician, who poiſoned William. He afterwards made a voyage to Rome, and obtained all that he deſired from the Pope. Bongarſius found this only in French authors.

[C] You will ſee, below, ſome circumſtances of it.] The hiſtory of the Conqueſt of Jeruſalem, which I have cited, was publiſhed at Paris in the year 1679. The publiſher had taken it from an old manuſcript which Mr Cabart de Villermont had given him. Theſe words are to be ſeen in it: The Patriarch kept her (2) openly, as if ſhe had been his wife, only ſhe did not live with him, and when the Patriarch went to the church, ſhe was as magnificently dreſſed, as if ſhe had been an empreſs or a queen; and when any body who did not know her, asked who that lady was; thoſe that knew her, anſwered, that ſhe was the Patriarcheſs, the Patriarch's wife. Her name was Paſque de Riveri, and ſhe had many children by the Patriarch. There goes a ſtory, that this Patriarch being in council about important affairs, a madman having thruſt into the room, ran to him and told him, my Lord Patriarch, get a good reward ready for me; for I bring you a piece of good news, your wife, Paſque de Riveri, is happily delivered of a fine girl.

(2) That is, the widow of the merchant of Napoli in Syria.

Bongarſius relates in Latin, the ſame hiſtory, and more at large (3); for he ſays that the French author who reports it, obſerves, that that conduct of the Patriarch ſerved as a model for others, and that the prieſts, the clerks, and the monks, were ſo addicted to leudneſs and adultery, that there was ſcarce a chaſt woman in Jeruſalem, and that JESUS CHRIST ſeeing theſe impurities in a city, where he had ſhed his blood for the redemption of his people, would no more ſuffer them, than thoſe of Sodom and Gomorrah; wherefore, he again ſo well purged it of that abominable filth, that of all thoſe who lived there in the time of Heraclius, there were only two perſons, who eſcaped captivity, when that city was taken by Saladin. The ſame Bongarſius quotes Marinus Sanutus, and Paulus Æmilius, the firſt whereof ſays that the people called Heraclius's concubine Patriarcheſs (4); and the other aſſures us, that this Patriarch and his clergy led a diſorderly life: Sacordotes fuiſſe flagitiis ſceleribuſque obrutos: atque adeo ipſum Patriarcham neque caſte neque integre vitam egiſſe (5).

More than ten were lapſed after that term was expired, and yet he had not 'put himſelf in a capacity to accompliſh his promiſe '(6).' This made Heraclius hope for a good ſucceſs in his negotiation. He made a very pathetical diſcourſe to this monarch after he had preſented to him the keys of Jeruſalem, and of the holy ſepulchre (7). He was made to hope that he ſhould be ſoon ſatisfied, but the king broke his word with him. Henry conſulted his clergy, to know whether in the preſent poſture of affairs, he was obliged to make good his promiſe, and to accompliſh that part of the penance which the Pope had laid on him, and to which he had ſolemnly obliged himſelf (8). The Patriarch Heraclius was preſent at the aſſembly where this caſe of conſcience was examined. All the biſhops and abbots . . . . concluded unanimouſly . . . . . that the ſuccour of Jeruſalem. He was the chief of the embaſſy, which the princes of the Holy-Land ſent into the Weſt to demand aſſiſtance, and had undertaken in Paleſtine to bring back with him, either the king of England, or one of the three princes his ſons (b).

. . . . that not only the king was not at preſent obliged to make a voyage into Paleſtine, but that he would do much better for the ſalvation of his ſoul to remain in his own dominions; becauſe the promiſe he had made in accepting of the penance, from which he might and ought to have been diſpenſed with, could not prejudice that which is abſolutely indiſpenſable, and which he made at his coronation, to govern his ſubjects well, and to defend them from the inſults of domeſtic and foreign enemies; which he could not do in his abſence in the condition affairs were in. They all unanimouſly added, as alſo did the lords, that as to one of the king's ſons, who was demanded in his ſtead, the aſſembly could determine nothing thereupon, ſince they were abſent, and the reſolution they were to take, depended ſolely upon them (9). The Patriarch, who was a man of a violent temper, was ſo provoked at that reſolution, that he had like to have ſpoiled all by loſing altogether the reſpect which he owed to the king, and treating him in a manner which cannot at all be excuſed, whatever attempt may be made to cover it with the name and falſe appearance of zeal (10). He anſwered the king, who offered 50 thouſand marks of ſilver for that war (11). ‘That they had no occaſion for his money but for him; that they had more gold and ſilver than they deſired, and that they did not come ſo far but to find out a man, who had need of money, to make an advantageous war againſt the Infidels, and not to look for money which wanted a man ſkilled in the art of uſing it well in that war. For the reſt, added he, ſpeaking in a very inſolent manner, you have reigned hitherto with great glory; but know, that God, whoſe cauſe you have forſaken, will immediately forſake you. To be ſatisfied of it, you need only compare the benefits you have received from him with the enormous crimes with which you have repaid him by a moſt horrid ingratitude. You have violated the faith, which you owe to the king of France, your ſovereign, and now you alledge the war, which you fear he will declare againſt you as a pretence for your refuſal. You have cauſed the holy archbiſhop of Canterbury to be barbarouſly maſſacred, and you refuſe at preſent to go to the defence of the Holy-Land, after having ſolemnly engaged in it upon the holy ſacrament. And when he ſaw the king changing colour, reddened through indignation and anger, do not believe, continued he thruſting out his neck, that I am afraid of the effects of that fury, which the truth I ſpeak, and you cannot bear, kindles in your ſoul. Behold my head here: treat me as you have done St Thomas: I ſhall be as ſatisfied to die by your hands in England, as by thoſe of the Saracens in Syria: and indeed you are little better than a Saracen (12).’ The king bore all he ſaid patiently, and continued to treat the Patriarch very civilly, even to the conducting him in his own ſhip to Roüen, from whence he carried him to the frontiers, to the end he might be witneſs of the conference he had there for three days with king Philip, on the ſubject of the holy war (13). Heraclius went away without obtaining his deſires, and even without the aſſiſtance that was offered him, which his paſſion made him fooliſhly ſlight againſt all the rules of prudence and good ſenſe, and to the great prejudice of the affairs of his maſter: ſo much it is requiſite that kings ſhould not abandon their intereſts to the diſcretion of thoſe who have hardly any, and who frequently by the violent paſſions that govern them are deprived of the little that they have.

HERALDUS (Desiderius) in French Herault, advocate in the parliament of Paris, has given good proofs of his learning, in ſeveral books that he has publiſhed [A]. He diſguiſed himſelf under the name of David Leidbreſſerus, to write a political diſſertation upon the independence of kings (a), ſome time after the death of Henry IV. He died in June 1649, and left ſome children [B]. Salmaſius and he wrote againſt one another [C].

[A] He gave proofs of his learning in ſeveral books that he has publiſhed.] His Adverſaria appeared in the year 1599. It is a little book which he repented the publiſhing of, if we may believe the Scaligerana. His notes upon Tertullian's Apology, Minutius Felix, and Arnobius have been eſteemed. He has alſo commented upon Martial's epigrams.

[B] And left ſome children.] When Mr Daillé (1) ſpeaks of the Proteſtant writers who condemned the execution of Charles I king of England, he quotes Le Pacifique Royal en deuil, written by Mr Heraud. That author, the ſon of our Deſiderius Heraldus, was miniſter in Normandy when he was called to the ſervice of the Walloon church in London, in Charles the firſt's time, and he was ſo good a royaliſt, that he found himſelf obliged to return into France, to eſcape the fury of the republicans, who were diſpleaſed with his exhortations to ſubmit themſelves to their lawful prince. He returned into England after the reſtoration of the royal family, and again took poſſeſſion of his former ſtation in the Walloon church at London, and ſome time after he obtained a canonry of Canterbury, which he kept till his death. This is what has been lately told me by a perſon who had opportunities of being acquainted with his hiſtory. See alſo the laſt page of Mr Bochart's letter to Mr Morley.

[C] Salmaſius and he wrote againſt one another.] ‘An old and very learned advocate is dead here, called Monſieur Heraut (Deſiderius Heraldus) who had a diſpute with Salmaſius, who had writ againſt him, Obſervationes ad Jus Atticum & Romanum about four years ſince. Monſieur Heraut, who was offended with that book, was writing an anſwer to it in folio; but death having ſurprized him, I think it muſt be ſold, ſuch as it is, and an end muſt be put to it where the author found his own. He ſeemed to be about ſeventy years of age . . . He had the reputation of a very learned man, as well in the civil-law, as in polite learning, and he wrote very eaſily upon what ſubject he pleaſed (2).’ I learn from a letter of Sarravius (3), that after twenty ſeven years ſilence, Heraldus having examined his papers at the inſtance of his friends, was ready to publiſh his book de Autoritate rerum judicatarum. What he had prepared againſt Salmaſius was printed in the year 1650, it is a folio, intituled, Queſtiones quotidianæ, & Obſervationes ad Jus Atticum ac Romanum. There are two books in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, aſcribed to Hier. Herbarius, which certainly were miſplaced by the Printers; they ought to have been a little higher under Deſiderius Heraldus. Theſe are the titles of them, De de Rerum judicatarum autoritate Libri II. at Paris, 1640. Obſervationum & Emendationum Liber unus, ibid.

HERCULES. There have been ſeveral heroes of this name [A]; but he of Thebes has been the moſt famous, becauſe the Greeks have aſcribed to him the actions of the others, and talked very much of him according to the fabulous genius of their nation.

nation. I deſign only to ſpeak of him. He paſſed for the ſon of Jupiter and Alcmena. I have ſaid, in another place (a), how this lady was deceived by that god, and I will neither repeat that, nor what is to be found in Moreri. Our Hercules had a prodigious ſtrength both in the combats of Mars and Venus [B]. He was alſo a great eater [C]. I will mention ſome circumſtances of it that are very ſingular, as alſo his being ‘ Apolline de tripode accepimus. Alter traditur Nilo ‘ natus Ægyptius, quem aiunt Phrygias literas conſcripſiſſe. Tertius eſt ex Idæis Dactylis, cui inferias ‘ afferunt. Quartus Jovis eſt, & Aſteriæ Latone ſororis ‘ quem Tyrii maximè colunt, cujus Carthaginem filiam ‘ ferunt. Quintus in India, qui Belus dicitur. Sextus hic ex Alcumena, quem Jupiter genuit; ſed tertius Jupiter: quoniam, ut jam docebo, plures Joves ‘ etiam accepimus (1). —— I would gladly know which ‘ of the Hercules's we worſhip, for the curious enquirers ‘ into ſecret hiſtory, give us account of ſeveral who have ‘ bore that name; the moſt ancient of all was the ſon of ‘ Jupiter, and of the moſt ancient of the Jupiters too, ‘ for we find likewiſe ſeveral Jupiters in the ancient ‘ Greek writers. It was this Hercules, the ſon of Jupiter and Lyſito, who ſtrove with Apollo about a tripode, as hiſtory informs us. We are told of another ‘ Hercules, an Ægyptian, the ſon of Nilus, who is ſaid ‘ to have invented the Phrygian characters. A third ‘ we owe to the Idæi Dactyli, to whom infernal rites ‘ are paid. A fourth was the ſon of Jupiter and Aſteria, ſiſter to Latona, and is highly worſhipped by the ‘ Tyrians, and, as they tell us, had a daughter named ‘ Carthago. A fifth of India, who is named Belus: ‘ and a ſixth, the ſon of Alcmena by Jupiter, but a ‘ third Jupiter: becauſe, as I ſhall prove, by and by, ‘ we have accounts of ſeveral Jupiters.’ According to this account the Egyptian Hercules will be only the third; but the Egyptians give him the firſt place (2). Diodorus Siculus (3) who mentions but three Hercules's, gives the Egyptian the birth-right, and confeſſes, that the conformity of name and inclinations has been the reaſon, that the actions of the others have been aſcribed to the Theban Hercules, who was the youngeſt of them all. It is ſaid that Varro has reckoned up forty four Hercules's.

[B] He had a prodigious ſtrength . . . in the combats of . . . Venus.] Some ſay (4) that in ſeven days he deflowered the fifty daughters of Theſtius; others (5) will allow but one night for it, and add, that he impregnated them all with boys, and that two of them, the oldeſt and the youngeſt, brought him two ſons a piece. According to ſome (6) the youngeſt would not at all conſent to the loſs of her virginity, and that as a puniſhment for her obſtinacy he condemned her to keep it for her life, and ordered her to ſerve him as a prieſteſs. This was the reaſon why the temple of Hercules at Theſpis was ſerved by a prieſteſs who was obliged to remain a virgin as long as ſhe lived (7). Pauſanias could not perſuade himſelf that Hercules could be ſo much enraged againſt the daughter of his good friend (8): he therefore looked upon the penalty, which Hercules had inflicted upon her as a very ſevere puniſhment. What he ſays of Theſtius's friendſhip for Hercules, agrees very well with what we read in Diodorus Siculus (9), that Theſpius (10) being deſirous that his daughters might give him a poſterity whereof Hercules ſhould be the father, invited him to a noble feaſt, and entertained him magnificently, after which he ſent him his fifty daughters one after another. Vigenere has pleaſantly ſaid, that it was the ſtouteſt battle that Hercules was ever engaged in, in all his life (11). And yet the antients have not placed this in the catalogue of his labours. It has been obſerved that becauſe he made war, ſometimes in one country, and ſometimes in another, being a great lover of the fair ſex, he had diſperſed women in ſeveral provinces of the world, that he might every where find ſome at his diſpoſal. Lactantius was not in the wrong for laughing at the Pagans, who placed in the number of the gods a man who had left every where marks of his leudneſs: ‘ Hercules . . . . nonne ‘ orbem terræ quem peragraſſe ac purgaſſe narratur, ‘ ſtupris, libidinibus, adulteriis inquinavit? nec mirum, cum eſſet adulterio genitus Alcmenæ. Quid ‘ tandem potuit in eo eſſe divini, qui ſuis ipſe vitiis ‘ mancipatus & mares, & fœminas, contra omnes leges ‘ infamia, dedecore, flagitio afficit (12)? —— Did ‘ not Hercules (which they tell us travelled over the ‘ world, and purged it from monſters) pollute it with ‘ whoredoms, leudneſs, and adulteries? And no wonder, ‘ ſince he owed his birth to the adultery of Alcmena. ‘ What could there be in him that was divine, who being ‘ a ſlave to his luſts, contrary to all laws, entailed infamy, diſgrace, and crimes, both on males and females.’ Arnobius very agreeably ridicules the Pagans for making nine nights neceſſary to Jupiter to get one child, and allowing but one night to Hercules to get fifty maids with child. ‘ Quis illum (Jovem) in Alcmena ‘ novem noctibus fecit pervigilaſſe continuis? non vos? ‘ . . . . Et ſane adjungitis beneficia non parva: ſiquidem vobis Deus Hercules natus eſt, qui in rebus hujuſmodi patris ſui tranſiret exuperaretque virtutes. ‘ Ille noctibus vix novem unam potuit prolem extundere, concinare, compingere: at Hercules ſanctus ‘ Deus natas quinquaginta de Theſtio nocte una perdocuit & nomen virginitatis exponere, & genitricum ‘ pondera ſuſtinere (13). —— Who told us that this ‘ Jupiter lay nine whole nights with Alcmena? Was ‘ it not you? And indeed you make him do ſomething ‘ worthy of all this labour; for hence ſprung your ‘ mighty Hercules, who far excelled his father in feats ‘ of this nature. He with much ado could hardly ſtrike ‘ out one child in nine nights: but the good god ‘ Hercules in one night not only deflowered Theſtius's fifty daughters, but made them all mothers.’ Note that Theſtius was amazed at that vigour of Hercules (14).

[C] He was alſo a great eater.] He gloried in being able to eat more than others, and he was extreamly vexed to find a man that could match him in that point. He diſputed the prize of voracity with one Lepreus, and did not get the victory (15). They each of them ſacrificed an ox, and if Hercules eat all his at one meal, his antagoniſt was no leſs expeditious and vigorous upon his victim. Lepreus ſhould have ſtopped there, but he had the boldneſs to provoke Hercules to another ſort of combat, to a duel, wherein he was killed. I ſhall ſpeak more fully of this diſpute at the end of this remark. Here is another ſtory. Hercules travelling with his wife and his little ſon Hyllus, and ſeeing the little boy diſtreſſed with hunger, applied himſelf to a husband-man for ſome food for him; but obtaining nothing he unyoked one of the oxen from his plough, and ſacrificed him to the gods and eat him (16). That canine appetite did not leave him even in heaven; hence it is that Callimachus exhorts Diana not to catch hares, but wild-boars and bulls, becauſe Hercules had not loſt the quality of a great eater amongſt the gods which he had amongſt men.

Οὐ γὰρ ὅγε Φρυγίῃ περ ὑπὸ δρυῒ γυῖα θεωθεὶς

Athenæus cites ſome verſes of Epicharmus, which admirably expreſs the voracity of this heroe.

He cites ſome other poets to prove his poſition that Hercules was a very great eater, ὅτι ἦν καὶ ὁ Ἡρακλῆς ἀδδηφάγος, and he forgets not the competition of Lepreus. Here follows what he ſays of it.

Lepreus challenged Hercules to a tryal of gluttony, and was worſted. Εἰσάγεται δὲ ὁ Ἡρακλῆς καὶ Λεπρεῖ περὶ πολυφαγίας ἐρίζων ἐκείνου προκαλεσαμένου, καὶ νενίκηκε. Inducitur Hercules de voracitate cum Lepreo certans qui eum provocaverat, in qua contentione Hercules victor evaſit (19). —— Hercules is introduced ſtriving with Lepreus for the prize of gluttony, to which the latter had challenged him, and in which he was defeated by Hercules. Zenodotus ſays that Hercules had put in chains Lepreus the grandſon of Neptune, after he had cleanſed Augeas's ſtable; he ſet him at liberty when he had finiſhed his labours, at which time he had three trials of ſkill with him. They plaid at quoits, they ſtrove who ſhould pump water beſt, and who could eat up an ox ſooneſt, in all which Hercules had the victory. At laſt Lepreus, being drunk, challenged Hercules afreſh, and was killed by him. Others ſay they did not diſpute who ſhould eat moſt, but who ſhould drink moſt, and that Hercules had the better of Lepreus (20). Others pretend that the diſpute was, both who ſhould eat up an ox ſooneſt, and who ſhould drink moſt (21). I will mention ſome other facts in the note [H].

[D] And a great drinker.] To be convinced of it, we need only conſider the prodigious bigneſs of his goblet, which required two men to carry it; but as for himſelf he only needed one hand to lift it up and drink it off.

Huic pretium palmæ gemini cratera ferebant
Herculeum juvenes. Illum Tyrinthius olim
Ferre manu ſola, ſpumantemque ore ſupino
Vertere ſeu monſtri Victor, ſeu marte ſolebat (22).

A maſſy cup, the prize, was carry'd high
By two fair youths; this Hercules of old
Was wont, with eaſe, to carry in one hand,
And at one draught to empty, when returning
From his fell labours, or the bloody field.

It apppears by the hiſtory of Alexander, that in feaſts, where there was extraordinary drinking, they drank round in a great cup, which was called the cup of Hercules. It was reſerved for the laſt, as we may infer from Alexander's not having yet drank it, when he fell ſick at table (23) at an entertainment where he had already drank a great deal. Others ſay, he did drink it, and that it was his fatal cup. Alexandrum . . . . intemperantia bibendi atque ille Herculeanus & fatalis ſcyphus condidit (24). Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Alexander having already drunk much, to conclude, drank off Hercules's cup, and immediately fell into a ſwoon (25). To reconcile theſe differences, I believe, we muſt ſuppoſe this prince was ſtruck as he was drinking this cup, and before he had made an end of it. This hiſtorian obſerves this cup of Hercules was very large. But what can be alledged more deciſive hereupon than the words of Macrobius? ‘ Scyphus Herculis poculum eſt ita ut Liberi patris cantharus: Herculem vero fictores veteres non ſine cauſa cum poculo fecerunt & nonnunquam caſabundum & ebrium, non ſolum quod is heros bibax fuiſſe perhibetur, ſed etiam quod antiqua Hiſtoria eſt Herculem poculo tanquam navigio ventis immenſa maria tranſiſſe. Sed de utraque re pauca ex Græcis antiquitatibus dicam, & multibibum Heroa iſtum fuiſſe, ut taceam quæ vulgo nota ſunt, illud non obſcurum argumentum eſt, quod Ephippus in Buſiride inducit Herculem ſic loquentem, &c (26). —— The ſcyphus is the cup of Hercules, as the cantharus is that of Bacchus: It was not without cauſe, that the ancient ſculptors repreſented Hercules with a cup in his hand, in a tottering condition, and drunk, not only becauſe this hero is ſaid to have been a lover of wine; but likewiſe becauſe antient hiſtory informs us, that Hercules made long navigations in a cup inſtead of a ſhip. I ſhall relate a few things concerning both theſe from the antiquities of the Greeks. As to the firſt, that Hercules was a lover of wine, not to mention what is commonly known, we have no obſcure proof of it in Ephippus, who in his Buſiris introduces Hercules ſpeaking thus, &c.’ Athenæus ſeems to point out to us the capacity of this cup, for he ſays (27), that that which was the cauſe of Alexander's death, contained two gallons. The poet Steſichorus can teach us a very notable particular. He ſays that Pholus drank a health to Hercules in a pitcher that held forty eight gallons. Centaurorum & Lapitharum convivium deſcribens (Steſichorus) ait Pholum (quem propterea hoſpitem Alcidæ nuncupat Lucanus) impleviſſe Herculi craterem trium lagenarum capacem, quem prior ipſe obbibiſſet: amplum autem fuiſſe oportuit, qui urnam, hoc eſt, quatuor & viginti ſextarios caperet (28). He drank it off firſt, and was immediately pledged by Hercules.

Σκύφιον δὲ λαβὼν δέπας ἔμμετρον ὡς τριλάγυνον
Πῖεν ἐπισχόμενος, τό ῥά οἱ παρέθηκε Φόλος κεράσας (29).

Hercules (de eo enim loquitur) acceptum in manus ſcyphum plenum, trium lagenarum capacem, ori admovens obbibit, quem Pholus ipſi infuderat.

The bowl capacious in his hand he took,
Which Pholus with a liberal hand had fill'd,
With three lagenæ, and at one huge draught
Empty'd the foaming cup.

Athenæus explains in a very probable manner, why the poets have feigned Hercules to have croſſed the ſeas in a drinking-bowl. That fiction, ſays he (30), is in all likelihood founded upon the delight this heroe took in drinking in great glaſſes; for he was a notable drinker: Ὅτι δὲ εἷς ἦν ὁ Ἡρακλῆς τῶν πλεῖστον πινόντων προείπομεν. Bibacem inter alios Herculem fuiſſe antea nos memoravimus (31).

[E] They curſed him during the ſacrifices which the Lindians offerred to him.] I have told above, that Hercules eat an ox that he took from a countryman; but I add here, that as he was eating it, the countryman poured out a thouſand curſes againſt him, which was only a diverſion to Hercules: ſo that when an altar was built to him he choſe this countryman for his prieſt, and commanded him to repeat the ſame curſes as often as they ſhould offer ſacrifices; for, ſaid he, I never eat with a better ſtomach. Lactantius tells the ſtory at large: ‘ Apud Lindum, quod eſt oppidum Rhodi, Hercules ſacra ſunt, quorum à cæteris longe diverſus eſt ritus. Si quidem non, εὐφημία, ut Græci appellant, ſed maledictis & execratione celebrantur; eaque pro violatis habent, ſi quando inter ſolemnes ritus vel imprudenti alicui exciderit bonum verbum. Cujus rei hæc ratio redditur, ſi tamen ulla eſſe ratio in rebus vaniſſimis poteſt. Hercules, cum eo delatus eſſet, famemque pateretur, aratorem quendam aſpexit operantem, ab eoque petere cœpit, ut ſibi unum bovem venderet. Ille negavit fieri poſſe, quia ſpes ſua omnis colendæ terræ duobus illis jumentis niteretur. Hercules ſolita violentia uſus, quia unum accipere non potuit, utrumque ſuſtulit. At ille infelix, cum boves ſuos mactari videret, injuriam ſuam maledictis ultus eſt, quod homini eleganti & urbano gratiſſimum fuit. Nam dum comitibus ſuis epulas apparat, dumque alienos boves devorat, great atchievements which are aſcribed to him [F]. There is a very particular circumſtance related concerning his voracious way of eating; for it is pretended that he moved his ears (b): that phœnomenon is very rare [G]. I believe it is a miſtake to ſay, that he would devorat, illum ſibi amariſſime convicíantem, cum riſu, & cachinnis audiebat. Sed poſtquam Herculi divinos honores ob admirationem virtutis deferri placuit, à civibus ei ara poſita eſt, quam de facto βούζυγον, id eſt bovis jugum nominavit: ad quam duo juncti boves immolarentur, ſicut illi, quos abſtulerat aratori, eumque ipſum ſibi conſtituit Sacerdotem, ac præcepit, ut iiſdem maledictis ſemper in celebrandis ſacrificiis uteretur, quod negaret, ſe unquam epulatum eſſe jucundius (32). —— At Lindus, a town in the iſland of Rhodes, Hercules is worſhipped with rites very different from thoſe uſed in other places. For the ſacrifice is performed not with praiſes, but with curſes and execrations, and it is thought to be profaned, if a good word ſhould even ignorantly eſcape from any who aſſiſt at the ſolemnity. For this they give the following reaſon, if there can be any reaſon for ſuch fooliſh obſervances. Hercules, ſay they, paſſing that, way, was hungry, and ſeeing a peaſant at plough, deſired him to ſell him an ox. He anſwered, that he could not do ſo, having no other means of ploughing his land but by theſe two oxen. Hercules, making uſe of his uſual violence, ſince he would not give him one, took them both from him. The poor man, ſeeing his cattle ſlain, revenged himſelf by execrations, which were very pleaſing to this polite and elegant traveller. For while he was making ready this entertainment for his companions, and devouring theſe ſtolen cattle, he jeered and laughed at the misfortunate owner, who bitterly curſed him. But when afterwards it was thought fit, in admiration of his virtue, to decree divine honours to him, the inhabitants of that city erected an altar to him, which he actually called the yoke of oxen; at which they were to offer two oxen yoked, as theſe were which he took from the peaſant, whom he appointed his prieſt, and ordered, that he ſhould make uſe of the ſame execrations in celebrating the ſacrifices, affirming that he had never eat with more pleaſure.’

[F] Some have denied that he performed thoſe great atchievements which are aſcribed to him.] Megaclides in Athenæus cenſures the poets that came after Homer and Heſiod, for ſaying that Hercules commanded armies and took towns, when it is certain that he was a man who led a very voluptuous life, having many lawful wives, and getting children clandeſtinely upon a great many young women (33), addicted likewiſe to eating and drinking; ſo that after his example, they who made libations to him, left nothing in the glaſs, they drank it all up. Other proofs are brought (34) of his effeminacy, and it is pretended that Steſichorus was the firſt that armed him with a club, a bow, and a lion's skin. We find in Eraſmus a paſſage that violently ſhakes that tradition of Hercules's effeminacy. It is in the explication of the proverb. Take heed of a man with a black breech (35). Eraſmus tells us, that a mother gave this advice to her two boys, who were unlucky rogues. They had a mind to attack Hercules ſleeping under a tree, but he awaked and tied them to his club (36), and laid them over his ſhoulders witheir heads downwards. That poſture diſcovered to them, that Hercules's back was very hairy, and that the hairs were very black and thick, which made them remember the advice of their mother, and made them fall a laughing. Hercules underſtanding what they laughed at, gave them their liberty. The words of Eraſmus, which I am to cite, are theſe: ‘Melampygus Græcis ſignificat eum qui nigro ſit podice: quo quidem cognomento notatus eſt Hercules quòd eam corporis partem, non Lydorum more vulſam, neque candidam (quemadmodum effœminati ſolent) ſed nigris pilis hirſutam ac ſylvoſam haberet. Nam Græci quemadmodum molles & imbelles, fractoſque deliciis, πυγάργους καὶ λευκοπύγους appellant: itidem è diverſo fortes ac ſtrenuos, μελαμπύγους vocare conſueverunt, ut author eſt Lycophronis interpres. — Melampygus, among the Greeks, ſignifies one who has a black breech. This firname was given to Hercules, becauſe that part of his body was rough with black hair and ſhaggy, and not ſhaved after the manner of the Lydians, or white (as thoſe effeminate people are). For as the Greeks called the effeminate, and weak, and thoſe who were enervated by luxury, white breeched; ſo, on the contrary, they uſually called the brave and ſtrong black breeched, as the interpreter of Lycophron aſſures us.’ See Suidas, in the article μελαμπύγου τύχοις, in Melampygum incidas. See alſo Apoſtolius, Zenobius, & Diogenianus, in their Collections of Proverbs.

[G] That phænomenon is very rare.] The journal of the Academiæ Naturæ curioſorum (37) ſpeaks of a maid who moved her ears. The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, giving an extract of this journal, obſerved (38), that there was not reaſon to doubt of this particular, ‘after what the abbot de Marolles atteſts of the philoſopher Craſſot, in the thirty ſecond page of his Memoirs. He had a great reſemblance, ſays he, to thoſe pictures of the Cynic philoſophers, which are to be found in the cabinets of the curious, being ſlovenly like them, with a long and buſhy beard, and hair ill combed. He had one thing very particular, and which I never obſerved in any one elſe, which was, that he could move his ears backwards and forwards when he would, without touching them. Peter Meſſie relates, in the twenty fourth chapter of his firſt part, that St Auſtin ſaw (39) a man, who not only moved his ears as he pleaſed, but alſo his hair, without any motion of his hands or head.’ Give me leave to join to this ſome paſſages relating to this. I begin with a pretty long one of Caſaubon (40). ‘Iſtud planè communi hominum naturæ contrarium eſt, quibus [ſolis (41) ex omnibus animantibus (niſi forte ſimias excipias)] dedit aureis ἡ πολυποίκιλος τοῦ ΘΕΟΥ σοφία moveri ſuapte ſponte neſcias. [Nam quod ſcribit Martialis, Cinnæ cuidam natum filium auribus ſ longis Quæ ſic moventur, ut ſolent aſellorum, poetica ſine dubio licentia eſt, non rei veritas] Narrat tamen Euſtathius ſacerdotem fuiſſe quendam aureis motitantem. Accepimus etiam à viris fide dignis, viſas manifeſto aures movere viro cuidam eruditiſſimo (42), cum per Allobrogum fines tranſiens, vivicomburii periculum ſibi à magiſtratu imminere intellexiſſet: quòd diceretur nefandi criminis reus Toloſa in Italiam fugere. ——— This is quite contrary to the common nature of men, to whom alone of all animals (unleſs you ſhould except apes) God has given ears which have no ſelf motion. (For what Martial writes of the ſon of one Cinna, who had long ears, which moved like thoſe of aſſes, is undoubtedly rather a poetical invention than a true ſtory). However Euſtathius tells us of a certain prieſt who moved his ears. I have been informed likewiſe by men worthy of credit, that the ears of a certain learned man were plainly ſeen to move, when, paſſing through the confines of Savoy, he underſtood that he was in hazard of being burnt alive by the magiſtrates, upon a report that he was then flying from Toulouſe into Italy, on account of his having been guilty of a heinous ſin.’ Since Caſaubon doth not doubt of the truth of Euſtathius's report, nor of what was told him of the learned man that eſcaped from Toulouſe, why doth he doubt of the ſtory of Cinna's child, in the thirty ninth epigram of the ſixth book of Martial? He would have leſs doubted of it, if he had taken notice of what St Auſtin ſays in the twenty fourth chapter of the fourteenth book, De Civitate Dei: ſunt qui & aures moveant vel ſingulas vel ambas ſimul. —— There are ſome people who move their ears, either ſingly, or both together; but alſo of what Veſalius atteſts. That great anatomiſt affirms (43) that he ſaw at Padua two men, whoſe ears moved. He elſewhere explains the cauſe of this motion. ‘Interdum, ſays he (44), quibuſdam raris fibris carnalis membrana quam carnoſam vocamus ſupra aures augetur, & modice auri proximam cutem, & ipſam quoque aurem motu agit arbitrario. ——— Sometimes by means of certain delicate fibres, the fleſhy membrane, which we call the carnoſa, is enlarged above the ears, and gives a gentle arbitrary motion to the skin next to the ear, and even to the ear itſelf.’ Du Laurent affirms, that he has ſeen people that cauſed their ears to move (45). Valverdus ſaw the ſame thing in a Spaniard at Rome (46). Procopius compares Juſtinian ‘to an aſs, not only becauſe of his dulneſs and ſtupidity, but alſo with reſpect to his moveable ears, which occaſioned his being called in a full theatre

[H] I believe it is a miſtake, to ſay that he would be drawn in that poſture, in one of his moſt famous pictures.] Coſtar ſays ſo in his Dialogues. Let us ſet down the latter part of what he ſays there concerning Hercules. ' In the Anthologia a peaſant praiſes very much ' Mercury's moderation, who is contented with milk ' and fruits, and he complains of Hercules, who would ' have abundance of oxen and ſheep ſacrificed to him. ' And being told, but this god preſerves your flocks and ' herds ſo well. What is the difference, replied he, whe- ' ther my flocks be eaten by the wolves, or by their keeper.

- - - - - Τί τὸ πλέον εἰ τὸ φυλακτὲν
Ὄλλυται ὑπὸ λύκων εἴθ' ὑπὸ τȣ̃ φυλακός (47).

Here is Voiture's anſwer to Coſtar. It is true, that Hercules gladly eat ſheep, and in great quantities. The Argonauts, when they ſailed to Colchos, left him in an iſland. Many pleaſant reaſons are given for it. Some ſay, that he broke all the oars in rowing: others ſay, that he was too heavy; ſome ſay, the Argonauts were afraid, he would carry away all the glory; and others, that it was becauſe he eat too much. I remember I have read in a Greek poet, (that is to ſay Greek and Latin) that he moved his ears in eating, &c (48). Coſtar anſwering his friend, tells him (49), that Hercules eat like a devil, and that, according to Athenæus, he had an ox for every meal. He cites Philoſtratus, in his picture of Theodamas. We there find theſe words, according to Vigenere's verſion, pag. 906 of the firſt tome. You have perhaps found it in Pindar, where, at Coronus's houſe, he eat an ox ſo entire, that he ſcarce left the bones behind him. Coſtar cites alſo Lactantius, in the twenty firſt chapter of the Chriſtian Inſtitution (50), it is to acquaint his friend with the ceremony of the maledictions the Lindians uſed in ſacrificing to Hercules. He tells him, that in that caſe Hercules was of the humour of Fortune, who is never honoured ſo much, as when ſhe is reviled, and accuſed for all the changes and diſorders that happen in the world, cum convitiis colitur, it is a ſaying of Pliny (51). He adds, that ' this Beef-eater (for ſo ' he was ſirnamed βȣφάγος and βȣθοίνης), was in ' ſuch reputation for gluttony, that the ancients con- ' ſecrated a bird to him, called the Glutton: it is ' that which the French call la Foulque, the Latins ' Gavia, or Furica, and the Greeks λάρος.' It may be ſaid of him, continues he, what Martial ſaid of Tucca, that he was not contented to be a glutton, but would have it known and talked off.

Non eſt Tucca ſatis, quod es guloſus,
Et dici cupis, & cupis videri (52).

Once upon a time he appeared to the Painter Parrhaſius, in the ſame ſtate he was in, when his ears moved, and would be painted in that ſame poſture, in which Theodamas had ſeen him. He quotes for that apparition, the twelfth book of Athenæus, and he obſerves, that in the thirty fifth book, and tenth chapter, of Pliny, one Dæmon, an Athenian Painter, brags that he drew this picture. It cannot be denied, that Athenæus reports, that Parrhaſius boaſted to have painted Hercules in the town of Lindus, juſt as he ſaw him in his ſleep: he carried his boaſt ſo far, as to put this in the inſcription of his picture (53), but it doth not follow from thence, that he gave Hercules that mobility of ears mentioned by Coſtar. It is a ſtrange boldneſs to affirm, firſt that Athenæus ſays, that Hercules appeared to Parrhaſius, in the ſame condition he was in when his ears moved. Secondly, that Theodamas had ſeen Hercules in that ſame poſture, but theſe two faults are inconſiderable, in compariſon of the blunder I am going to obſerve. Theſe are the words of Pliny. ' Pinxit Demon Athenienſium, ' argumento quoque ingenioſo. Volebat namque va- ' rium, iracundum, injuſtum, inconſtantem; eundem ' exorabilem, clementem, miſericordem, excelſum, ' glorioſum, humilem, ferocem, fugacemque; & om- ' nia pariter oſtendere. Idem pinxit Theſea . . . . . & ' in una tabula, quæ eſt Rhodi, Meleagrum, Herculem, ' Perſea (54). —— He painted the people of Athens, ' and the deſign of his piece was very ingenious. For ' he intended to repreſent them at once fickle, paſſio- ' nate, unjuſt, inconſtant; exorable, merciful, gentle, ' proud, humble, fierce, and cowardly. He painted like- ' wiſe Theſeus . . . . . and in one piece, which is at ' Rhodes, Meleager, Hercules, and Perſeus.' Pliny there reckons up the works of Parrhaſius; the word Dæmon ſignifies the people of Athens, whoſe contrary paſſions Parrhaſius had ingeniouſly repreſented. But here you ſee Coſtar metamorphoſes that picture of Parrhaſius into a Painter, and pretends, that this chimerical Painter aſcribed to himſelf the picture of Hercules, where that heroe moved his ears. This is a new blunder; for in ſuppoſing that Dæmon was a Painter, no other picture could be aſcribed to him, but that of Rhodes, wherein Meleagar, Hercules, and Perſeus, were painted, and which Pliny manifeſtly diſtinguiſhes from the Hercules at Lindus, which was drawn according to the Painter's dreams; & Herculem qui eſt Lindi talem à ſe pictum, qualem ſæpe in quiete vidiſſet (55). But if we make the pretended Dæmon the author of the Hercules at Lindus, we muſt likewiſe aſcribe to him almoſt all Parrhaſius's paintings.

[I] It is not true that his club was in a chapel at Rome.] A famous Proteſtant divine has ſpoke thus (56): You will frequently hear in our temples, Atheiſm and error aſſaulted and deſtroyed; theſe peſts are driven thence by the odour of the word of GOD, which is purely preached there, as in old time at Rome, Hercules's club kept the dogs and flies from the chapel where it was. He cites the ſecond chapter of Solinus, where there is nothing of this; but here follows what he ſays in the firſt chapter. ' Hoc ſacellum Herculi in boario ' foro eſt, in quo argumenta & convivii & majeſtatis ip- ' ſius remanent. Nam divinitùs illò neque canibus ' neque muſcis ingreſſus eſt. Etenim cum viſceratio- ' nem ſacricolis daret, Myiagrum deum dicitur impre- ' catus, clavam vero in aditu reliquiſſe, cujus olfactum ' refugerent canes: id uſque nunc durat. —— This ' little temple of Hercules is ſituate in the Forum ' Boarium, and there ſtill remain in it proofs both of ' the ſacrifice, and of the majeſty of the god. By ' his divine Power, neither flies nor dogs enter into it. ' For when he gave the bowels to the prieſts, he is re- ' ported to have prayed to the god Myiagrus, and to ' have left his club at the door, the ſmell of which ' made the dogs run from it, and it's influence continues ' to this day.' It is plain, that Solinus doth not affirm, that Hercules's club was ſtill there, he only ſays, that Hercules left it in the entrance of the place, where he gave the prieſts an entertainment after a ſacrifice, and that the ſmell of the club kept off the dogs. This was the club's effect; as to the flies, it was not that club that drove them away, but the prayers that Hercules made to the god Myiagrus. What was obſerved on that occaſion, namely, that dogs and flies kept at a diſtance from this place, continued to ſucceeding ages. This is what Solinus ſays; but it was not neceſſary that the club ſhould be preſerved in the chapel, nor doth Solinus ſay it. If the Proteſtant divine had given us a true matter of fact, that club might be reckoned in the number of Taliſmans, and be compared to the fly which is engraven, as is ſaid, upon the door of the ſhambles of Toledo, and which hinders the flies from entring in. To this purpoſe, I will relate a thing which I have read in a modern author (57), which is, that, at Miſitra, the dogs do not enter into the moſques of the Turks, nor into the churches of the Chriſtians. The Turks explain this by a miracle as to themſelves, and by a natural reaſon as to the Greeks. Let us hear Mr Guillet.

Dogs that do not go into churches.

' The Turks ſpeak of the diſcretion of theſe dogs, ' as of a miracle. Theſe creatures ſometimes ſlip into ' private houſes, when they find the doors open; but ' the moſques need not be ſhut at all, the dogs never ' go into them. The Turks take occaſion to make a ' wonder of it, and call that a miraculous reſpect, which ' is only an imitation of the young dogs, who have al- ' ways ſeen the old ones keep off from the entrance of ' the moſques, where, in all likelihood formerly the ' Turks

It is ſtill leſs trues that he ſet up columns at Cape Finiſterre [K], and placed there a looking-glaſs of a wonderful Virtue [L]. Some ſay, that he lived but fifty years, and that he burnt himſelf at that age, becauſe he was no longer able to bend his bow [M]. He was the laſt child that Jupiter had by mortal women [N]. It is ſaid, that he was three days in the belly of a whale [O], and that he came out ſafe and ſound, having loſt nothing

Turks had ſoundly beat them, to make them loſe the habit of running thither. Neither are dogs to be ſeen in the Grecian churches. The Turks do not wonder at that; but give a reaſon for it, which I find probable enough. I have ſaid before, that when the Greek ſchiſmatics enter into their churches, they make ſo low a bow, that by the inclination of their bodies, they bring their hands to the ground. The Turks ſay, that the dogs, ſeeing them put their hands ſo low, imagine, it is to take up ſtones, to throw at their heads, and that the fear of that drives them from the churches.’

To return to Hercules’s club, a great miracle has been told of it, namely, that being fixed in the ground it took root, and ſhot up into a tree. Πρὸς τȣ́τω τῷ ἀγάλματι τὸ ῥόπαλον θεῖναί φασιν Ἡρακλέα. καὶ (ἦν γὰρ κοτίνȣ) τȣ̃το μὲν (ὅτῳ πιςά) ἐνέφυ τῇ γῇ, καὶ ἀνεβλάςησεν αὖθις. Ei clavam ab Hercule dedicatam perbibent, factam ex oleaſtro. Quod adjiciunt miraculum, haud ſcio an cuiquam fide dignum videri poſſit, eam clavam radicibus actis regerminaſſe (58). I add, that it was the Troezenians, who told this ſtory. They had the image of Mercury Polygius, to whom Hercules had dedicated his club. Every body knows it was made of olive-wood. Pauſanias ſays, that the tree was ſtill ſhewn, from which it was taken. Hercules found it near the marſh of Saronis (59). Here is an article for any one that will undertake the collection of hiſtorical parallels, relating to certain ſtories of the Pagans and Chriſtians; for we are told by travellers, ‘that at the gate of the old fortreſs of Smyrna, there is a great wild cherry-tree, which the Greeks of the country ſay was the ſtaff of St Polycarp, the firſt biſhop of Smyrna, which a moment after it was planted in the earth, ſent out branches (60).

[K] Nor that he erected columns at Cape Finiſterre.] The fable concerning the foundation of Corunna, which I ſhall ſpeak of in the following remark, has perſuaded ſome learned men, that Hercules erected columns in that place. Paul Jovius has fallen into that error; for which he has been thus cenſured by Ludovicus Nonnius. ‘Ab hac fabula perſuaſi nonnulli, credidere arcem Herculis fuiſſe, & alteras columnas ab illo hic fixas, non ſecus ac circa Gades, dictamque urbem hanc Corunna tamquam columnam: quod egregiam etymon apud Paulum Jovium, virum aliàs gravem & doctum, tantùm valuit, ut ab imperito aliquo Hiſpaniæ antiquitatis perſuaſus, huic opinioni etiam ſubſcriberet, cùm in vita Gonſalvi Ferdinandi d’Aguilar, agens de adventu Regis Philippi I. in Hiſpaniam, ita ſcriberet: Nec diu Philippus amicorum ſuorum ſtudia, votaque fruſtratus, ut ſua regna ex arbitrio adminiſtranda ſuſciperet, in Cantabriam Oceano devectus, pervenit in portum, qui vocatur ad Columnas, fortaſſe quod ibi quoque alteræ Herculis columnæ, ſicuti Gadibus, poſitæ fuerunt, quum eo externo litore terræ Haſpanicæ finis. Sed opinio hæc infirmiori tibicine fulta, quàm ut rationibus convelli mereatur (61). ——— This fable has made ſome people believe that it was a fortreſs built by Hercules, and that he erected pillars here, as well as near Cadiz, and that, the town was called Corunna, as it were Columna; this notable etymology weighed ſo much with Paulus Jovius, otherways a learned and judicious man, that, on the authority of ſome perſon ignorant of the antiquities of Spain, he has gone into it. For he writes as follows in the life of Gonſalvo Ferdinando d’Aguilar, ſpeaking of the arrival of Philip I. into Spain. Neither did Philip long fruſtrate the deſires and wiſhes of his friends, that he might take upon himſelf the adminiſtration of his dominions. Having arrived in the bay of Biſcay, he landed in the port of Columna, ſo called, probably, becauſe certain pillars of Hercules were placed here as well as at Cadiz, this being the outmoſt point of Spain. But this opinion is ſo very ill founded, that it do not deſerve a confutation.’

[L] Nor that he placed there a looking-glaſs of a wonderful virtue.] Ludovicus Nonnius having ſaid, that Flavium Brigantium of the ancients, is the preſent Corunna, adds, that the inhabitants attribute the foundation of it to Hercules, and that they ſay he built a tower in it, in which he ſet a mirror, which brought the moſt diſtant ſhips in view (62). The original of this fable is almoſt as ridiculous as the fable itſelf. ‘In tam ridiculam opinionem vocum ignorantia & antiquitatis imperitia ita lapſi ſunt, nam cum turris illa ſpecula dicatur, ſpeculum illud mirandum ſine opifice ullo confinxere (63). ——— They fell into this ridiculous opinion, through their ignorance of language and antiquity, for this tower being called Specula in Latin, they without any artiſt formed this wonderful mirror or Speculum.

[M] He burnt himſelf becauſe he was no longer able to bend his bow.] Ὡς πυρὶ αὑτὸν ἀνεῖλε μὴ δυνηθεὶς τὸ οἰκεῖον ἐντεῖναι τόξον πεντηκοντȣ́της γενόμενος. Ut igne vitam ſibi abſtulerit, quod arcum ſuum intendere non poſſet annos jam natus quinquaginta (64). ——— That he burnt himſelf to death, becauſe being fifty years of age he could not bend his bow. Some who miſpend their time in ſeeking out allegorics, imagine, that in covered words here is ſignified, that Hercules no longer found himſelf capable of contenting a woman, and upon conſideration of that grievous change, fell into ſo deep a melancholy, that he would live no longer. He would at this rate have been more impatient than Milo the wreſtler (65), who ſeeing in his old age the weakneſs of his arms, which had been ſo ſtrong and vigorous in his youth, was contented to lament this change with tears. If we give the article of Penelope, we will ſpeak of theſe allegory-ſeekers; for they explain in the ſame manner, the nemo meo melius arcum tendebat Ulyſſe. ——— None could bend his bow like my Ulyſſes.

[N] He was the laſt child that Jupiter had by mortal women.] Diodorus Siculus makes that obſervation to raiſe the glory of Hercules. He ſuppoſes, that Jupiter renounced all commerce with women, becauſe he would not have his laſt productions inferior to his foregoing (66). He feared then, that the children he ſhould get after Hercules, would not come up to him. Pliny the younger has ſaid ſomething (67) which puts me in mind of this thought. It turns upon Nerva’s dying a little after he had adopted Trajan. I have read in Lactantius, a ſtrong raillery upon the greateſt of the gods at laſt ceaſing to beget children. ‘Cum verò dicantur aliqui (Dii) ex aliquibus nati, conſequens eſt, ut ſemper naſcantur, ſiquidem aliquando ſunt nati; vel ſi aliquando naſci deſierunt, ſcire nos convenit, cur, aut quando deſierint. Non illepide Seneca in libris moralibus Philoſophiæ. QUID ergo eſt (inquit) quare apud Poëtas ſalaciſſimus Jupiter deſierit liberos tollere? Utrum ſexagenarius factus eſt, & illi lex Papia fibulam impoſuit? an impetravit jus trium liberorum? An tandem illi venit in mentem,

‘Et timet, ne quis ſibi faciat quod ipſe Saturno (68)? —— Since ſome gods are ſaid to be born of other gods, it follows, that they ſhould continue to be born if they were once ſo, or if at any time they gave over, being born, it is fit that we ſhould know why, or when, they did ſo. Seneca, in his moral writing, ſays very pleaſantly: For what reaſon, pray, do the poets pretend that Jupiter, who was ſo great a lover of the ſex, has now ceaſed from begetting children? Is it that being now paſt ſixty, the lex papia has put a ſtop to his game? or has he got the privileges ariſing from being father to three children? or does he at laſt remember the proverb,

Expect that what you have done to others, ſhould be done to you.

‘And is afraid leaſt ſome of his own ſons ſhould ſerve him as he ſerved his father Saturn.’

[O] It is ſaid that he was three days in the belly of a whale.] I will make uſe of the words of the commentator nothing but his hair. After his death he was adopted by Juno; but it is ſaid, that he refuſed to be aſſociated in the college of the twelve great gods [P]. We muſt ſay ſomething of the Gallic Hercules [Q].

commentator upon Philoſtratus, to expreſs that adventure, and the occaſion of it. ‘ The gods having on ‘ a time conſpired together to poiſon their ſovereign Jupiter, as he came to diſcover the plot by Themis, he ‘ prevented them, and puniſhed them, ſome in one manner, and ſome in another. As for Neptune and Apollo, he ſent them in his rage to ſerve the maſons, ‘ who were building the walls of Ilion; where being ‘ hired by Laodemon, after the work was finiſhed, he ‘ indeed recompenſed Apollo with abundance of ſacrifices and offerings, but he made no account of ſatisfying Neptune. Whereupon the enraged god ſent a ‘ horrible great whale, which diſgorging great floods ‘ of ſea-water upon the country, drowned it all; and ‘ Laomedon was obliged, by the oracle's advice, in order to deliver himſelf from this calamity, to expoſe ‘ his daughter Heſione, adorned with royal robes, ‘ as a prey to be devoured by this monſter. Hercules, paſſing by chance that way, moved with compaſſion, offered the father to deliver her, if he would ‘ give him the horſes that came of an immortal race, ‘ which he had received of Jupiter, for Ganymede who ‘ was raviſhed and carried away by him to heaven, to ‘ ſerve him as cup-bearer. The terms being agreed ‘ upon, Hercules, armed cap-a-pee, threw himſelf headlong into the throat of this monſter; and deſcending ‘ from thence into his belly, remained encloſed there ‘ three days, hacking and hewing till he had quite ‘ deſtroyed it. Laomedon afterwards not fullfilling his ‘ agreement, Hercules returned to Troy with ſix ‘ ſhips, filled with ſoldiers, and ſacked it; put Laomedon to death, carried Heſione captive, and made ‘ a preſent of her to Telamon, the father of Ajax, ‘ for being the firſt that ſcaled the wall (69).’ Vigenere quotes no body. To ſupply that defect I will ſet down a paſſage of Tzetzes, which Mr Drelincourt has communicated to me (70). Τριέσπερον γὰρ τὸν Ἡρακλέα καλεῖ διὰ τὸ ἐν τῷ κήτει τρεῖς ἡμέρας εἶναι ἃς ἑσπέρας καλεῖ Λυκόφρων διὰ τὸ ἀφότιστον καὶ σκοτεινὴν εἶναι τὴν γαστέρα τοῦ θηρίου (71). The ſcholiaſt upon Homer (72) relates moſt of the things that I have cited from the commentator of Philoſtratus, and tells us this ſtory was to be found in Hellanicus. Hercules did not come out the ſame way he went in; he came out through the breach, I mean through the belly of the whale, I have not been able to verify whether Natalis Comes has faithfully related what he cites from Andrœtas of Tenedos concerning the loſs of Hercules's hair (73): ‘ Ubi vero cetus acceſſiſſet hians in ejus os Hercules irruit, ‘ ubi cùm per triduum fuiſſet, ceto diſrupto exiit omnibus amiſſis capillis capitis, ut ſcriptum reliquit Andrœtas Tenedius in navigatione Propontidis (74). — ‘ When the whale approached with open mouth, Hercules ruſhed into it, where, after continuing three ‘ days, upon the burſting of the whale; he came ‘ out having loſt all his hair, as we are told by Andrœtas of Tenedos, in his voyage to the Propontis.’ Lycophron plainly intimates, that it was the heat of the whale's belly, which made Hercules's hair fall off.

[P] He was adopted by Juno, but it is ſaid that he refuſed to be aſſociated into the college of the twelve great gods.] Juno, who had perſecuted him ſo much while alive, found herſelf much diſpoſed to love him when he was dead. Which verifies theſe verſes of Horace;

- - - - Diram qui contudit Hydram,
Notaque fatali portenta labore ſubegit,
Comperit invidiam ſupremo fine domari (76).

He that kill'd Hydra, he deſign'd by fate,
To quell the monſters rais'd by Juno's hate,
Tho' he, the mighty he, had always try'd,
Found envy vanquiſh'd only when he dy'd.

Here follows what we are told by Diodorus Siculus. After Hercules was placed in the number of the gods, he was adopted by Juno, who loved him afterwards as a good mother. The ceremony of the adoption was this: Juno went to bed, and to imitate a true child-birth, ſhe placed Hercules in ſuch a manner, that he fell to the ground from under her petticoats. The Barbarians ſtill obſerved that ceremony in their adoptions in Diodorus Siculus's time. Hercules was afterwards married to Hebe; but he refuſed the honour which Jupiter would have done him, of aſſociating him in the college of the twelve great gods, and he juſtified his refuſal by this reaſon, that there being no place vacant in that college, he ought not to be admitted into it, and that it would be very unreaſonable to degrade any other God to make room for him (77). Juno had for a long time begun to act as a mother with reſpect to Hercules, but it was without knowing him. The matter of fact was this. Alcmena fearing the jealouſy of this goddeſs, durſt not own herſelf the mother of Hercules, but expoſed him in the middle of a field, as ſoon as he was born. Minerva and Juno paſſed that way ſoon after, and Minerva beheld the infant with admiration, and adviſed Juno to give him ſuck, Juno did it; but the infant preſſed her nipple ſo ſtrongly, as gave her an intolerable pain, ſo that ſhe left him there. Hereupon Minerva took him, and carried him to Alcmena, as to a nurſe, to which ſhe would recommend him (78). Here one might make a parallel betwixt Moſes and Hercules.

[Q] We muſt ſay ſomething of the Gallic Hercules.] A modern author (79) has imitated the Greeks, whilſt he refuted them. He has transferred to this Hercules almoſt all the actions of the others, and has left nothing to the Grecian but moral conqueſts, that is to ſay, triumphs over his paſſions. According to him, the Gallic Hercules built in Gaul, the city Alexia (80), he was attacked by Albion, king of Great Britain, and by Bergiona, both of them ſons of Neptune. He defeated them in Provence, by the ſuccours he received from his father Jupiter, who ſeeing the army of his ſon unprovided with arrows, diſcharged upon his enemies a ſhower of ſtones, which overwhelmed them (81). ‘ In quo (lapideo campo) Herculem contra ‘ Albionem & Bergiona Neptuni liberos dimicantem ‘ cum tela defeciſſent, ab invocato Jove adjutum ‘ imbre lapidum ferunt, credas pluiſſe, adeo multi ‘ paſſim, & latè jacent (82). —— In this ſtony field, we ‘ are told, that Hercules, being engaged againſt Albion ‘ and Bergion, two ſons of Neptune, after having ſpent ‘ all his arrows, invoked Jupiter, who ſent him a ‘ ſhower of ſtones to his aſſiſtance, and indeed you would ‘ believe that it had rained ſtones there, they lie ſo ‘ thick and widely ſpread.’ He was the firſt of the Gauls, who penetrated into Italy thro' the Alps (83). He rendered Ombria habitable, having formed the river Arno out of it's marſhes. He conducted ſome colonies of Gauls beyond the Pyrenees, where Gerion king of Spain was conquered . . . . He died in that expedition into Spain, and was honoured there with a ſtately temple, dedicated to him by the Tyrians, in the city of Gades, where his bones ſtill remained in Pomponius Mela's time, who aſſures us of it (84). ‘ His accoutrements were, ‘ a quiver upon his back, a club in his right hand, ‘ a bow in his left, having the face of an old man, ‘ bald, wrinkled, ſwarthy, but venerable, drawing a ‘ croud of people after him, that were faſtened with ‘ little chains of gold and ſilver hanging from his ‘ tongue, and though the chains were extreamly ſmall, ‘ none of theſe captives endeavoured to break them, ‘ but all, on the contrary, expreſſed by their looks, ‘ that they would be ſorry to be delivered from ſo ‘ ſweet a vaſſalage, as being leſs conquered by the ‘ force of arms of this Gallic Hercules, than by his ‘ eloquence, this is the deſcription Lucian hath left ‘ us of him (85). This deſcription agrees but ill with what Mr Menage has read ſomewhere, which is, that ‘ our old Gauls had a great veneration for Hercules, ‘ becauſe he was GREAT and STRONG, and ‘ having declared upon their turning Chriſtians, that ‘ it

One of the moſt famous Athenian orators obſerves, that writers were extreamly fond of celebrating the combats and courage of Hercules, but made no mention of his other qualities, which might yet have afforded them a very noble theme. He ſays that that part of Hercules's greatneſs which they had ſo much neglected, would require an excellent orator, and that if he had thought of treating of it in his youth, he would have ſhewn that that heroe excelled other men, in prudence, knowledge, and juſtice, ſtill more than in ſtrength of body. Old age, adds he, will not permit me to undertake his panegyric in that light: I find myſelf too weak to handle a ſubject ſo important, and ſo copious (c). The reflexion of this orator may give us an occaſion of reflecting upon the bad taſte of mankind [R]. What this great Rhetorician has ſaid of this hero's knowledge,

'it would be one of their greateſt troubles not to ſee 'his image any more, they were comforted by being 'told, that the Chriſtians had a ſaint, who, for his 'BULK and STRENGTH, was a match for ſix 'Hercules's (86) (§ α).'

REM. CRIT.]

Mr Audiger applies the beſt he can to his hypotheſis a ſtory of Diodorus Siculus. Viz. that a daughter of the king of the Celtæ, proud of her extraordinary ſtature, and great beauty, deſpiſed all who ſought her in marriage; but when ſhe had ſeen Hercules, ſhe was ſeized with a ſtrong deſire to have to do with him by her father's conſent. Her paſſion was gratified. Hercules got a ſon by her, named Galates (87). The hiſtorian doth not tell her name; but others ſay, her name was Galatea (88). This ſtory is told otherwiſe in the Erotica of Parthenius. There we find that Hercules, as he drove Gerion's oxen from Erythia, went through Gaul, and came to Bretannus, the father of Celtina, who fell ſo deeply in love with this heroe, that having ſtole Gerion's oxen from him, ſhe would not reſtore them but upon condition of his lying with her. Hercules as well to recover his oxen, as on the account of Celtina's beauty, agreed to it, and got her with child of a boy called Celtus, from whom the Celtæ took their name. Herodotus (89) tells us that Hercules being in Scythia lay on the ground on his lion's skin and fell aſleep. When he awaked he could not ſee his mares; he ſought them every where; and when he came to the country of Hylæa, he entered into a cave where he found a damſel who had a human ſhape from her head to her waſte, but downwards ſhe had the form of a ſerpent. He asked her whether ſhe had ſeen his mares? yes, ſaid ſhe, I have them in my cuſtody, but I will not reſtore them unleſs you lie with me. He was glad to regain them at that price, but when the ſport was ended ſhe delayed as long as poſſible the reſtitution of the mares, for ſhe vehemently wiſhed to begin it again. At laſt not not being able to retain a man any longer, who was deſirous to be gone with his mares, ſhe ſaid to him I have kept them for you, and you have rewarded me for it; for you have gotten me with child of three boys. Τὴν δὲ φάναι ἑαυτὴν ἔχειν, καὶ οὐκ ἀποδώσειν ἐκείνῳ πρὶν ἢ οἱ μιχθῆναι, τὸν δὲ Ἡρακλέα μιχθῆναι ἐπὶ τῷ μισθῷ τούτῳ. κείνην τε δὴ ὑπερβαλέσθαι τὴν ἀπόδοσιν τῶν ἵππων, βουλομένην ὡς πλεῖστον χρόνον συνεῖναι τῷ Ἡρακλέϊ. Illamque reſpondiſſe, ſe quidem illas habere: ſed non prius reddituram ei quam cum ipſa coiiſſet: Herculem pro ea mercede cum fœmina concubuiſſe. Sed quum illa differet reddere equas, cupida diutiſſime cum Hercule concumbendi &c (90).

Mr Audigier pretends (91) that the Celtic Jupiter, the moſt ancient of the Jupiters, was the father of our Gallic Hercules, and that all the great divinities of Greece, were firſt known in Gaul (92). This is a very ſtrange pretenſion, but not ſo chimerical as that of the learned Rudbeck (93).

[R] A remark of Iſocrates may make us reflect on the bad taſte of mankind.] The prudence, philoſophy, and juſtice of Hercules were qualities infinitely more valuable than the ſtrength of his arms: and yet the orators and poets praiſed him only for the actions he performed by that ſtrength; and they ſuffered the perfections of his mind to fall into oblivion. Καὶ τῇ φρονήσει καὶ τῇ φιλοσοφίᾳ καὶ τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ, πλέον διενεγκόντα πάντων τῶν προγεγενημένων, ἢ τῇ ῥώμῃ τῇ τοῦ σώματος. Et prudentia, & literis, & juſtitia plus antecelluiſſe (Herculem) ſuperiorum temporum hominibus omnibus quam robore corporis (94). They did ſo as well becauſe they themſelves were more affected with what is ſhining, than with what is ſolid, as becauſe they were perſuaded that their auditors and readers would much more applaud ſtories of battles, than a deſcription of virtues which are exerciſed in times of peace. Horace has very well obſerved this in ſuppoſing that the ſhades lent a favourable ear to the poeſies of Sappho and Alcæus, but were more delighted with the latter, becauſe they treated only of war, revolutions of ſtate, baniſhments, &c (95).

Utrumque ſacro digna ſilentio
Mirantur Umbræ dicere: Sed MAGIS
  Pugnas, & exactos tyrannos
  Denſum humeris bibit aure vulgus (96)

With ſilent reverence ghoſts admire
The wondrous fury of his lyre:
The vulgar ſhades throng moſt to hear,
Of kings depoſed, of feats of war,
Aud drink them with a greedy ear.
CREECH.

Beſides, it muſt be obſerved that tyrants overcome and monſters ſubdued, and, in a word, times of confuſion and ſlaughter, are ſubjects more proper to ſhew the wit and eloquence of a writer, than is the conduct of an uniform life led according to the rules of virtue. A hiſtorian who has no great events to deſcribe, falls aſleep over his work, and makes his readers yawn; but a civil-war, two or three conſpiracies, as many battles, the ſame leaders ſometimes humbled, ſometimes exalted, ſharpen his pen, warm his imagination, and always keep his readers in breath. I really believe that if he were commanded to write a hiſtory of a quiet reign, and all of a piece, he would complain of his fate much in the ſame manner with Caligula, who complained that in his reign there did not happen any great misfortunes. 'Queri etiam palam de conditione 'temporum, ſuorum ſolebat: quod nullis calmitatibus publici inſignirentur. Auguſti principatum clade 'Variana: Tiberii, ruina ſpectaculorum apud Fidenas, memorabilem factum: ſui oblivionem imminere 'proſperitate rerum. Atque identidem exercituum 'cædes, famem, peſtilentiam, incendia, hiatum aliquem terræ optabat (97). ——— He uſed openly to 'lament the condition of the times in which he lived, 'becauſe they were not diſtinguiſhed by any public 'calamities. Saying that the reign of Auguſtus would 'ſtill be remembered, on account of the defeat of 'Varius; and that of Tiberius, by the fall of the 'theatre at Fidenæ; but that he was in hazard of 'falling into oblivion, becauſe of the proſperity of the 'times. He would often expreſs his wiſhes for the 'cutting off of armies, for famine, burning of cities, 'and earthquakes.' Deſolations, and public calamities, are an advantage to an hiſtorian, and give luſtre to his writings. He pities, if he be a good man, the illuſtrious Veſtal who was buried alive; he abhors the tyrant who, to make his reign more remarkable, oppreſſed her (98); but yet it is a favourable topic, and very advantageous to his pen, and an ornament to his book. His work is a veſſel that never ſails better ledge, may be confirmed from antiquity, which has owned a moſt intimate relation between the Muſes and Hercules (d). Hence he was ſirnamed Muſagetes, that is, the companion and conductor of the Muſes, and on this account theſe nine goddeſſes were put under his protection in the temple which Fulvius Nobilior cauſed to be built to him [S]. The thought which Poſidonius made uſe of to ridicule a paſſage of Æſchylus's tragedies was not juſt; Strabo, who cenſured him, did not know wherein the real fault of it lay [T]. It concerns a certain ſhower of ſtones, which fell in favour of Hercules when he was fighting the Ligurians.

than in a ſtorm; a tempeſt is his beſt gale: a calm is as diſagreeable to it as to a real ſhip: and when an hiſtorian can begin like Tacitus with 'Opus aggredior opimum caſibus, atrox præliis, diſcors ſeditionibus, ipſa etiam pace ſævum. Quatuor Principes ferro interempti. Tria bella civilia, plura externa, ac plerumque permixta (99), —— I begin a work fruitful in great events, horrid with wars, divided by ſeditions, aud terrible even in peace. Four princes ſlain: three civil wars, more foreign, and for the moſt part both joined together;' he prepoſſeſſes his readers in his favour, and knows very well he has found an advantageous ſubject. But after all, it is a mark of a depraved taſte to prefer an account of warlike actions before that of an equitable conduct; and to admire a man more for the ſtrength of his arms and for his boldneſs, that give him the victory over a wild boar, or a bull, than for his virtue, that makes him maſter of his paſſions, and moves him to eſtabliſh good laws amongſt his neighbours. This virtue, tho' it ſhines leſs than the other, has much more of true grandeur in it; there is more reality in the qualities of Hercules, which writers have paſſed over in ſilence, than in thoſe which they have ſo pompouſly magnified. But what ſhall we ſay, they followed the taſte of the public. Note, that young people are much more delighted with romantic than real hiſtories, and that after age has ripened and rectified our judgment, we would rather read a Thuanus and a Mezerai, than a Calprene or a Scuderi. But few people loſe the taſte of their childhood with reſpect to the deſcription of a peacable reign, and to the hiſtory of one full of troubles and great events.

[S] The Muſes were put under his protection in the temple.] This temple was built by Fulvius Nobilior, who conquered the Ætolians in the year of Rome 565. He was then conſul. The principal of their cities was called Ambracia; he made himſelf maſter of it, and finding the ſtatues of the nine Muſes there, he carried them to Rome, and conſecrated them in the temple which he built to Hercules, and put them under that god's protection. I believe we ſhould not have known theſe circumſtances, had not an orator, who lived five or ſix ages after, made mention of them. His words deſerve to be cited. 'Ædem Herculis Muſarum in circo Flaminio Fulvius ille Nobilior ex pecunia Cenſoria fecit, non id modo ſecutus, quod ipſe litteris & ſumma Poëtæ amicitia duceretur, ſed quod in Græcia cum eſſet imperator, acceperat Herculem Muſagetem eſſe, id eſt comitem ducemque Muſarum, idemque primus novem ſignæ, hoc eſt omnium Camænarum, ex Ambracienſi oppido tranſlata, ſub tutela fortiſſimi numinis conſecravit, ut res eſt, quia mutuis operibus & præmiis juvari ornarique deberent: Muſarum quies defenſione Herculis & virtus Herculis voce Muſarum (100). —— Fulvius Nobilior built a temple to Hercules and the Muſes, in the Circus Flaminius, out of the money ariſing from the office of cenſor, this he did not only becauſe he was a friend to letters and to the Muſes, but becauſe he had learnt, while he was general in Greece; that Hercules was named Muſagetes, or the companion and leader of thee Muſes. It was he likewiſe, who firſt put the ſtatues of the nine Muſes, which he brought from the city of Ambracia, under the protection of this powerful deity. And very properly too, becauſe they ought to aſſiſt and adorn one another with mutual ſervice and rewards. The Muſes ſhould owe their repoſe to the valour of Hercules, and the valour of Hercules ſhould be celebrated by the voice of the Muſes.' This orator has reaſon to ſay that great warriours and the Muſes ſtand in need of one another; it belongs to the former to procure repoſe and ſecurity of the Muſes, and to the latter to immortalize the noble actions of heroes by their ſongs. One might, according to the notion of the ſame orator, apply to our Hercules what has been ſaid, that they who do noble actions worthy to be celebrated by the poets, are lovers of verſe (101). Obſerve that Statius ſuppoſes that Hercules underſtood muſic well.

Dic age Calliope, ſocius tibi grande ſonabit,
Alcides, tenſoque modos imitabitur arcu (102).

Ariſe Calliope and tune the lyre,
Alcides to the air divine ſhall raiſe,
His voice ſublime, and, with his twanging bow,
Shall join in conſort.

Others obſerve that he underſtood Aſtrology: Gabriel Naudé gives this for certain, but he makes uſe of it ſomewhat ignorantly, by his leave. It is in that part of his Coups d'Etat where he ſpeaks of ſome perſons who have uſed fraud to arrive at the honour of diefication: what Hercules did, ſays he (103), was more ingenious; for being well verſed in Aſtrology, witneſs the fables of his life which make him carry the heavens together with Atlas, he choſe exactly the hour and time of the appearance of a great comet, to put himſelf upon the burning pile in which he was to finiſh his days, to the end that this new fire from heaven might be preſent as a witneſs, and make it believed of him, what the Romans afterwards would have the world to believe of their emperors, by means of an eagle which flew up from the midſt of the flames, as it were to carry the ſoul of the deceaſed into the arms of Jupiter. Here is an author who ſuppoſes that the appearance of comets can be foreſeen by Aſtrology. He is miſtaken; his commentator has cenſured him for it (104).

Note, that the temple which Fulvius Nobilior cauſed to be built to Hercules, was almoſt ruined in the time of Auguſtus, but Lucius Martius Philippus (105) cauſed it to be rebuilt, and joined a portico to it. See Ovid at the end of his fixth book de Faſtis and Martial Epigram 51 book 5.

[T] Strabo, who cenſured a thought of Poſidonius, did not know wherein the real fault of it lay.] Æſchylus ſuppoſes (106), that Hercules was admoniſhed, that being to fight the Ligurians he ſhould be deſtitute of arrows, fate having ſo ordained it, and in a place where he could not get a ſingle ſtone; but that in that extremity he ſhould be pitied by Jupiter, who by means of a cloud filled with ſtones would furniſh him with arms with which he ſhould beat the Ligurians. How much better had it been, ſaid Poſidonius, for Jupiter to have darted theſe ſtones upon the Ligurians and deſtroyed them, than to have reduced Hercules to ſuch an indigence, ἢ τοσοῦτον δεόμενον ποιῆσαι λίθον τὸν Ἡρακλέα. Quam ad tot lapidum indigentiam redigere Herculem (107). Strabo has anſwered this cenſure, and ſaid two things, one is, that was need of abundance of ſtones, ſince the buſineſs was to beat a great number of enemies, ſo that in that reſpect the thought of the poet Æſchylus was more probable than that of his cenſor. Τὸ μὲν οὖν τοσοῦτον ἀναγκαῖον ἦν, εἴπερ καὶ πρὸς ὄχλον παμπληθῆ. ὥς τε ταύτῃ γε πιθανώτερος ὁ μυθογράφος τοῦ ἀνασκευάζοντος τὸν μῦθον. At verò tot lapidibus opus erat contra tantam multidudinem, ut hac quidem in parte fabulæ autor probabiliora dixerit, quam fabulæ reprehenſor (108). Secondly, he adds, that the poet having expreſsly ſaid it was a thing ordered by fate, ſhould have ſtopped the mouth of all critics; for if one ſhould attempt to diſpute upon predeſtination and providence, many things would be found both in the moral and phyſical world, which might give occaſion to ſay, that they might have been better ordered in another manner; for example, it had been better to pour rain upon Ægypt than to moiſten it with the the waters of Æthopia; it had been better if Paris had been ſhip-wrecked in going to Lacedæmon, than to ſuffer him to carry away Helen, and to puniſh him for it afterwards to the great damage of the

I believe that Strabo acted more ſubtilly than ſincerely. There is no probability that Poſidonius founded his raillery upon Hercules's wanting ſo many ſtones; yet becauſe his words were capable of that ſenſe, Strabo took advantage of it. But ſtill he has not obſerved the true fault of the criticiſm; he ſhould have anſwered Poſidonius, that if Jupiter had intended only, and in general, to kill the Ligurians in the head, he had better have cauſed the ſhower of ſtones to fall upon their heads, than about Hercules; but deſigning that Hercules ſhould be the author of the defeat of theſe people, it was requiſite that he ſtones ſhould fall near him and not upon his enemies. The critic went upon a notion which is an inexhauſtible ſcource of paralogiſms. He did not conſider that deſtiny includes all at once both the end and the means.

HERLICIUS (David), a Philoſopher, Phyſician, and Aſtrologer, was born at Zeitz in Miſnia the twenty eighth of December 1557. He ſtood in need of the aſſiſtance of his mother's relations to ſubſiſt at ſchool; his father not being in a condition to advance what was neceſſary. He learned to make verſes and to ſing, and he gained ſomething by that means on ſeveral occaſions, when his neceſſities preſſed hard upon him [A]. He ſtaid but a ſhort while in the univerſity of Wittemberg, becauſe Peucer, whoſe lectures he principally deſired to hear, was impriſoned. Not being able therefore to improve under ſo learned a profeſſor, he went to Leipſic, and ſtudied there with very good ſucceſs. He went afterwards to Roſtoc, where the profeſſors permitted him to give private lectures. He acquitted himſelf ſo well in them, that the duke of Mecklenburg made him ſub-principal of the college of Guſtraw. He continued in that ſtation two years, and ſpent all the time he had to ſpare in the practic of Phyſic, and in calculating nativities (a). He ſpent the two following years at Prenſlow (b), where he taught Natural Philoſophy, and afterwards, in the year 1583, he accepted a like employ at Anclam, where he alſo practiſed Phyſic. He publiſhed the following year an Almanack, which was highly applauded [B]. From that time he made one every year for the ſpace of fifty two years. He was called in the year 1585 to teach Mathematics in the univerſity of Gripſwald, and he continued in that employment thirteen years, and publiſhed ſeveral books. He took his doctor of Phyſic's degree with great ſolemnity in that univerſity in the year 1597, and a year after he accepted of the poſt of profeſſor of Natural Philoſophy at Stargard, a town of Pomerania, from whence he removed to Lubec in the year 1606, to exerciſe the ſame profeſſion. He practiſed Phyſic there with great reputation (c), and yet, by I know not what fickleneſs of temper, he left that town in the year 1614, and retired to Stargard, where he ſpent the reſt of his days. He died the fifteenth of Auguſt 1636. He had ſuffered a very grievous loſs the year before, his houſe and all his papers being burnt in the fire that reduced Stargard to aſhes the ſeventh of

[C] Had it not been for that conflagration, the public would have ſeen an infinite number of his aſtrological obſervations.] To ſhew this man's application to the minuteſt particulars of aſtrology, I will here inſert an inſtance which I find in his life. ‘Interea ſuas obſervationis Aſtrologicas publici juris facere decreverat; ſæpe enim ad me ſcripſit, quod ultra mille & ducenta collegerit Themata, quæ ſuo tertio operi Calendariographico & Aſtrologico inſerere, iiſque veritatem aliquot Aphoriſmorum Aſtrologicorum probare nitebatur: e. g. Quod Planetæ benefici, Jupiter, & Venus conjuncti, imprimis in octava domo longam vitam & annos (ultra 70) diuturnos polliceantur. Item quod Fomahant, inſignis ſtella aſteriſmi Aquarii, in octava domo celebrem & glorioſum poſt mortem faciat. Item, quod Cauda Draconis in prima domo Cœli vel altero oculo carentem vel gibboſum fore minetur. Ut complures alios taceam. At hæc cum reliqua ſua inſtructiſſima bibliotheca (cujus ſimilem vix privatus alius tota noſtra in Pomerania quoad Mathematicos, Hiſtoricos, & Medicos libros poſſedit) in communi Stargardienſi excidio flammis conflagrarunt (7). —— In the mean while he had reſolved to publiſh his aſtrological obſervations; for he frequently wrote to me, that he had collected above twelve hundred nativities, which he deſigned to inſert in his third Kelendar and aſtrologic work, intending thereby to prove the truth of ſeveral aſtrologic aphoriſms. Such as, that the benign planets, Jupiter and Venus, in conjunction, eſpecially in the eighth houſe, foretel a long life (of more than ſeventy years). Secondly, That Fomahant, a famous ſtar in the conſtellation Aquarius, in the eighth houſe, makes a perſon famous, and celebrated after his death. Thirdly, that the Dragon's Tail, in the firſt houſe of heaven, threatens that a perſon ſhall want one eye or be crook backed. Not to mention many others. But all theſe, with his large library (which hardly had it's equal in Pomerania for mathematical, hiſtorical, and phyſical books) were burnt in the general conflagration of the town of Stargard.’

[D] He had got money by calculating nativities.] The Bohemians and Polanders were his beſt cuſtomers. ‘Diverſæ ſæpe nationes ad eum conflebant, & ob multa experimenta nominiſque celebritatem judicium de ſuis genituris ab eo poſcebant Germani & exteri, præſertim Bohemi & Poloni, quorum liberalitatem præ reliquis prædicabat (8). —— People of different nations flocked to him, both Germans, and foreigners, becauſe of his many experiments, and great fame, and asked his opinion concerning their nativities, and above all the Bohemians and Poles, whoſe liberality he uſed to extol above all others.’ And being one of thoſe who take care of themſelves, he was very careful of his eyes, that they might be of ſervice to him in his old age; for which reaſon he had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of his friend Eichſtadius, who was likewiſe a lover of Aſtrology: He gave him nativities to calculate, and deſired his judgment on them (9).

[E] He took great care that the uncertainty of his art ſhould not be too much expoſed.] He would never work for thoſe who could not tell the hour of their nativity, chooſing rather to be without their money, than to expoſe his credit (10). What he wrote to Eichſtadius ſhows that he was ſincere, and looked upon Aſtrology as a venerable ſcience, the honour whereof he ought to preſerve, tho' he were a looſer by it. He could not endure that any one ſhould ask him of what colour horſes and cloaths muſt be of to bring good luck. He ſaw plainly, that he run a risk of being deceived in queſtions of that nature. He was angry with ſeveral Aſtrologers, who not uſing the like diſcretion, expoſed judicial Aſtrology to contempt and cenſure; and, at bottom, he would gladly have been ſo rich as not to be neceſſitated to gain a livelihood by this low profeſſion. ‘Sobriè quoque hanc artem tractari volebat: hinc aliquando in ſuis literis ita ad me perſcripſit: Utinam amicis fortuna me intueretur oculis, ut ſine Aſtrologicis gerris ſenectuti meæ (quæ mihi cæcitatem minatur) proſpicere poſſem, nunquam γενέθλια calculo inquirerem. Interim quando multi plura inquirunt, & ſcire deſiderant, quàm Ars noſtra fert, aut patitur, aut habet, aut explicat, malo juxta conſcientiam agere, quàm ſanctam Uraniam noſtram deturpare & velut ſtuprare, eique nigrum ſalem vel atrem notam aſpergere: quum alias tot ſuperſtitionibus Chaldaicis noſtra Ars ſcateat, quas multi ex noſtratibus adhuc mordicus tenent. Multi ex me ſcire laborant, qui colores veſtimentorum & equorum fortunati ſibi ſint futuri? Hac & alia monſtra quæſtionum ſæpè albis dentibus rideo, ſæpè etiam deteſtor. Amo enim virginitatem noſtræ Artis nec patiar eam ita neſario ſtupro pollui, ne Miſaſtrologi hoſce abuſus in contemptum Aſtronomiæ nobis objicere poſſint (11).’ It is hard to imagine how a man, who had ſo much buſineſs in Phyſic (12), and who never had any children ſhould fear to want neceſſaries in his old age, unleſs he calculated nativities. This might give credit to thoſe ſcandalous ſtories that went of him, and make one believe that he was too expenſive in his amours.

[F] The prediction which he publiſhed againſt the Turks had not it's accompliſhment.] Mr Thomaſius made an oration at Leipſic the fifteenth of Auguſt 1665, by way of thankſgiving for the peace concluded betwixt the emperor and the the Ottoman Porte. That peace had very much diſguſted the Millenarians, becauſe they had foretold that the downfal of the Turkiſh empire was near. They founded their predictions upon ſome texts of Scripture, and upon many preſages which they interpreted according to their fancy (13). This is their way, they renew it every day. Thomaſius is amazed that after ſo many falſe prophecies, which have been vended concerning this pretended approaching downfal of the Turks, people are not more cautious in propheſying. It ſeems that the more people have been deceived, the leſs one ought for the future to fear being ſo, ſince, after all, the word of GOD, which cannot lie, has promiſed us the overthrow that potent monarchy. It is this therefore that emboldens the new prophets. The orator doth not ſtop at this reaſon; he thinks that the deſire theſe gentlemen have of enjoying the golden age apon earth ſeduces them. ‘Sed fortaſſe curioſitati huic nihil potentiorem ſtimulum admovet, quàm neſcio cujus aurei ſeculi per mille duraturi annos perſuaſio, ubi profligatis ab omni latere hoſtibus Deo dilecta cohors in otio ſit ſuaviſſimo victura. Trahimur omnes beatæ his in terris vitæ cupiditate. Itaque ſi qua nobis eam fama polliceatur, ei ſitientiſſimas aures adjungimus inque omnes articulos temporis, qui favere huic affectui videntur, enixè vigilamus (14).’ After this he repreſents to his auditory, that there has not been any conſiderable war in the XVIIth century againſt the enemies of the true church, but predictions have been propagated, promiſing an utter ruin of the Pope or the Turk, or of both together. The glory of this defeat was promiſed to Frederic king of Bohemia, afterwards to Guſtavus Adolphus, and then to Charles Guſtavus. ‘Tantæ victoriæ lauream erant qui ſuperioris Germanici belli tempore Friderico Palatino, erant qui Guſtavo Adolpho Suecorum Regi, erant qui Carolo Guſtavo deſtinarent, cùm is Poloniam ‘ante complishment [F]. He was twice married, and was very unfortunate in his firſt wife [G]. It was perhaps his own fault; for he was accuſed of being one of thoſe letchers, who go abroad to ſeek miſtreſſes. His friend makes but an ill apology for him on this ſcore [H]. He ante hos novem annos infeſtaret (15). Afterwards he ſpeaks of our David Herlicius, who promiſed about the end of the XVIth century, that the Turk ſhould be ſoon deſtroyed. ‘Plenus talium in primis eſt, Davidis Herlicii, in aliis fortaſſe prædictionibus, quam in hæc felicioris Aſtrologi, libellus, quem ſub finem ævi ſuperioris, miſerè Pannoniam vexante Turcâ, vulgavit. Ibi Danielem, Apocalypſin, dictum Eliæ, præſagia Johannis Hilteni, Antonii Torquati Ferrarienſis, Turcarum ipſorum, curſus ſiderum, conjunctiones planetarum, quaſi in exercitum unum conſcribi video, quo in animis hominum ultimo prælio cum Turcâ decidatur (16). —— But above all, a book of David Herlicius, (an Aſtrologer who was perhaps more ſucceſsful in ſome of his other predictions than in this) which he publiſhed about the end of the laſt century, when Hungary was miſerably ravaged by the Turks, is full of ſuch predictions. There we find Daniel, the Apocalypſe, the promiſe of Elias, the prophecies of John Hilten, Antonius Torquatus of Ferrara, of the Turks themſelves, the courſes of the ſtars, the conjunctions of the planets, all drawn together, as it were into one army, to fight this final battle againſt the Turks in the minds of men.’

[G] He was very unfortunate in his firſt wife.] God knows why, ſaith the hiſtorian. ‘Anno 1593, honeſtiſſimam virginem Reginam Hungers primarii civis Primiſlavienſis filiam in matrimonium accepit, cum qua tamen non adeo concorditer (cauſam novit Deus) vixit, & ſine fructu matrimonii per 17 annos (17). —— In the year 1593, he married Regina Hungers, daughter to one of the chief citizens of Prenſlow, and lived with her, tho' not ſo amicably, as were to have been wiſhed, (for what reaſon GOD knows) ſeventeen years, without having any children by her.’ Seventeen years to people ill-matched is a pretty long term. We ſeldom find in the writers of the lives of famous men the ingenuity which we ſee here. Since I have been employed in this work, I have run over a great many elogies, and lives of learned men; but I have ſcarce ever read there that they lived ill with their wives: we are generally aſſured that the ſweeteſt agreement imaginable has been the benediction of their hymen. The neighbourhood frequently know the contrary. I remember a ſtory which deſerves ſome attention. A learned Roman (18), who died in the year 1640, had kept his wife in ſo ſevere a captivity as not to ſuffer any body to ſee her, or her to ſee any body (19). He ſuffered not ſo much as the parſon of the pariſh to enter his houſe at Eaſter, to take an account of the perſons in his family, and to ſprinkle holy-water, as is the cuſtom at Rome. He ſaid that the Pope going that way gave his benediction to the houſe, and that it was enough; and if the parſon was importunate the gentleman threatned to cudgel him (20). One day demanding a diſpenſation for his wife from keeping Lent, the prieſt anſwered he would not grant it, unleſs he ſaw with his own eyes the condition of the ſick perſon; the huſband replied aloud that the diſeaſe lay in her matrix: do you want, added he, to ſee the ſeat of the diſtemper? Nicius Erythræus was preſent at this diſcourſe. ‘Atque ipſemet adfui, cum in ſacrario S. Spiritus in Saxia Parocho, neganti, non aliter ſe uxori ejus poteſtatem facturum veſcendi carnibus in quadrageſima, niſi ſuis ipſe oculis, quo morbo affecta eſſet, aſpexiſſet, palam multis audientibus, dixit, Uxori meæ morbus in matrice inhæret, placet ne morbi locum aſpicere?’ It is eaſy to judge whether a man of this humour could live forty five years with his wife, without any ſort of diſpute. And yet this is aſſerted in his epitaph placed in the 275th page of the Bibliotheca Romana of Proſper Mandoſio. ‘Sed quod raro contingit cum Claudia Sebaſtiani Tiburtina uxore ſine querela conjunctiſſime vixit annis XLV. —— But what very ſeldom happens, he lived forty five years with Claudia Sebaſtiani of Tivoli, his wife, in the ſtricteſt amity, without the leaſt miſunderſtanding.’ Neither epitaphs nor elogies are to be truſted to.

[H] His friend makes but an indifferent apology for him on this ſcore.] Some, ſays he, maintain, that Herlicius loved young women, and his ſtars would have it ſo; but if any one would conclude from hence, that the troubles of his firſt marriage roſe from this, I anſwer in his juſtification that he had no child by either of his wives, and that he was uſed to ſay that he ſowed in barren ground; and conſequently he deſired only to be loved by young women, and not to enjoy them. ‘Ferunt nonnulli eum, quum ætas ferret, non abhorruiſſe à puellarum amoribus, id quod in geneſi ejus conjunctio Veneris cum Marte præ ſe ferre videtur. Quod ſi quis hinc eum fortè ſalacem, & hinc multas turbas in priore matrimonio ortas eſſe dixerit, ille ſciat, D. Herlicium ex utraque ſua conjuge nullos liberos vel Herliciolum ſuſcepiſſe, ſed illorum exortem fuiſſe, atque in ſterili agro (ut dicere ſolebat) laboraſſe, & proinde animo juvencularum mutuo potius, quam coitu captum eſſe (21).’ To confirm this apology Cardan is alledged, who has proved himſelf laſcivious by the multitude of his children (22). Never was a more wretched apology; for, in the firſt place, Herlicius did not boaſt of any continence or moderation; he only complained that he had cultivated a barren ſoil. He had therefore laboured, and he confeſſed it. What concluſion will you draw after this, from his having never had any children? Will you hence conclude, that if he endeavoured to get the love of young women, it was only for the pleaſure of being loved by them, without any farther pretenſions? But there are no engines ſtrong enough to draw that concluſion. In the ſecond place a barren wedlock is no proof of a leſſer incontinence; on the contrary, Phyſicians ſay, that too great a laſciviouſneſs is one of the obſtacles to conception; and that the reaſon why there are unfruitful marriages the firſt year, is the two frequent commerce of the new-married couple; ſo that before the firſt fires are over, nature being interrupted and diverted cannot take her meaſures right. Read Ariſtotle cited by Montagne (23). ‘It is requiſite, ſaith Ariſtotle, to approach a wife prudently and ſeverely, leaſt the too irritating pleaſure ſhould carry her beyond the rules of reaſon. What he ſays for conſcience, Phyſicians ſay for health; that an ardent, voluptuous, and too frequent pleaſure, adulterates the ſeed, and hinders conception. On the other hand they ſay, that as to a languiſhing congreſs, ſuch as this is naturally, the uſe of it muſt be rare, and with conſiderable intervals in order to furniſh it with a juſt and fertile heat.

‘Quo rapiat ſitiens Venerem, interiuſque recondat.’

Laurence Joubert, a famous Phyſician, employs one of the chapters (24) of his vulgar errors to oppugn ‘thoſe, who think by frequent embraces to have children, and thoſe who think to have fewer by a contrary method.’ The ignorant vulgar, ſays he (25), ‘miſtake two contrary ways, totally contradicting their intentions; ſome being very deſirous of children, think to obtain them by the frequency of their embraces; and others by much abſtaining from their wives, think to avoid the increaſe of their family. The firſt imagine that if they fail at one time, they ſhall ſucceed at another: but it happens quite otherwiſe; for what might have have been effected by the firſt enjoyment may be deſtroyed by a ſecond. And which is more, theſe frequent returns, without the invitation of nature, give not the ſeed time to elaborate and perfect itſelf, and therefore it is not fecund and prolific, but rather as inſignificant as water.’

It is a true ſaying that it is better not to have one's cauſe pleaded than to commit it to a bad advocate. Eichſtadius deſerves to be compared to him whom the Prætor Scipio recommended to one that was at law. ‘Ille Siculus cui Prætor Scipio patronum cauſæ dabat hoſpitem ſuum, hominem nobilem, ſed admodum ſtultum: Quæſo, inquit, Prætor, adverſario meo da iſtum patronum, deinde mihi neminem dederis (26). —— The Prætor Scipio having aſſigned a gueſt of his, who was a man of quality indeed, but of very mean parts, to be advocate to a Sicilian, in a cauſe which he was proſecuting: I beg, ſaid the Sicilian, that you will give that advocate to my adverſary, and then I ſhall have occaſion for none.’

HERMANT (Godfrey)

HERMANT (Godfrey) one of the moſt famous writers of the XVIIth century, was born at Beauvais the ſeventh of February 1617. ‘ He gave in his childhood proofs of a very lively wit and happy memory, qualities which he preſerved to the day of his death. He learned the Latin and Greek tongues with a wonderful eaſe, and at an age at which others can hardly read and write. He was but twelve years old when Auguſtine Potier, biſhop and count of Beauvais, ſent him to Paris to ſtudy Rhetoric under the Jeſuits. After he had finiſhed his courſe of philoſophy in the college of Navarre, and of Divinity in the Sorbonne, this good prelate, who loved him, called him back to Beauvais to teach the Claſſics and Rhetoric. He ſent him again to Paris in the year 1640, to be tutor to Mr d'Ocquerre, his nephew. That employ did not hinder him from teaching Philoſophy in the college of Beauvais, in order to be admitted into the houſe of Sorbonne. He was made bachelor in 1641, and canon of the cathedral church of Beauvais in 1642. Hitherto his merit was known only to his friends, but the Jeſuits having preſented a requeſt to the king in the year 1643, to be incorporated into the univerſity of Paris, Mr Hermant was made choice of to write againſt it, ’ and he compoſed three or four pieces which got him great reputation. Mr le Camus, biſhop of Bellai, congratulated him upon it, in a manner that deſerves to be related [A]. He repreſented to him the reſentment of the Jeſuits againſt him; but as Mr Hermant was no ambitious man, he did not give them an opportunity to employ their great intereſt to his prejudice. ‘ He was made prior of the Sorbonne in 1644, a licentiate and rector in 1646. It was in the ſecond year of his rectorſhip that there happened one of theſe fortuitous conjunctures, which hinders ſome people from ſeeing the vanity of judicial Aſtrology [B], and from abſolutely condemning

[A] Mr le Camus congratulated him upon it in a manner that deſerves to be related.] Mr Hermant wrote four pieces on that occaſion. I. Obſervations upon the Requeſt of the Jeſuits. II. The firſt Apology for the Univerſity. III. Academical truths. IV. The ſecond Apology, which is a reply to the anſwer which the Jeſuits publiſhed. He did not prefix his name to theſe pieces. ‘ Mr le Camus, biſhop of Bellai, having diſcovered Mr Hermant to be the author of thoſe pieces, made him a viſit at Albiac-Houſe, where he lodged, and, embracing him, ſaid, that he bleſſed God for having not only given him ſo much ſenſe and learning at ſo early an age, but alſo a heart and courage not to fear the hatred and vengeance of ſo terrible a ſociety as that he wrote againſt. Yet all the evil that the Jeſuits could do him whilſt he lived, did only conſiſt in their not loving him, nor ſpeaking of him with eſteem, though he had been their diſciple. His modeſty ſheltered him from their moſt formidable reſentment, and they could not oppoſe him in his pretenſions to the firſt dignities of the church which they diſpoſe of, becauſe he was ſo far from ſeeking them, that he ſincerely ſlighted them, and even refuſed them when he was preſſed to accept of them (1).’ The want of ambition often proves the beſt ſanctuary.

[B] While he was rector, there one of thoſe fortuitous conjunctures, which hinders ſome people from ſeeing the vanity of judicial Aſtrology.] Here are the words of a Memoir which has been imparted to us (2), ‘ Marcellus, profeſſor of Rhetoric in the college of Liſieux, had compoſed in Latin an elogy on mareſchal de Gaſſion, who was killed with a musket-ſhot at the ſiege of Lens, and he was ready to deliver it in public, when an old doctor, who made it his chief buſineſs to read all the papers that were poſted up, being ſurprized to find that which gave notice of Marcellus's oration at two of the clock, ran to complain of it to Mr Hermant, and repreſented to him, that it ought not to ſuffered, that, in a Catholic univerſity, a man ſhould deliver a funeral oration in praiſe of a perſon who died in the Proteſtant religion, and deſired him to call a convocation to determine the matter. Mr Hermant not being able to refuſe this to him, it was reſolved by a majority of votes, that Marcellus ſhould be immediately forbid to deliver the panegyric on Mr de Gaſſion; and the Aſtrologers triumphed upon it, obſerving to every body that in the Almanack of the famous Larrivey, amongſt the predictions of that ſame month, there was written in great characters, LATIN PERDU, Latin loſt.’ That we may the better underſtand the circumſtances of this prohibition I ſhall ſet down a paſſage of du Boulai (3). ‘ Mr Marcel, profeſſor of Rhetoric in Liſieux's college, having advertiſed that he was to pronounce the funeral oration of mareſchal de Gaſſion, the rector forbad him, becauſe the ſaid Gaſſion died a Huguenot; whereupon Mr James Deſperiers, principal of the ſaid college, going with the ſaid Marcel to complain to the chancellor of France, they were ordered to ſubmit to the rector's ſentence. The act taken from the regiſters of the German nation teſtifies it, 22 December (an. 1647.) Ampl. D. Rector habitis Comitiis ex conſilio D. D. Decanorum & 4. Procuratorum prohibuit D. Guill. Marcel. eloquentiæ Profeſſorem in Collegio Lexovæo declamare laudes & præconia demortui Mareſchalli nomine Gaſſion, quod prolixo programmate publico notum fecerat omnibus Studioſis; ſed quia res erat peſſimi exempli & contra Religionem laudare hominem in hæreſi mortuum, noluit Academia acquieſcere inſtantiſſimis precibus D. Marcelli neque D. Deſperiers Gymnaſiarchæ Lexovæi, qui provocarunt ad D. Seguier Franciæ Cancellarium, qui eos auditos ad Ampl. D. Rectorem hujus rei Judicem remiſit. Et ſic ſilentium illis impoſitum eſt. —— December 22. 1647. The rector in convocation, with advice of the Deans, and of the four Procurators, prohibited Mr William Marcel, profeſſor of Eloquence in the college of Liſieux, to pronounce any panegyric on the late mareſchal de Gaſſion, as he had advertiſed that he intended to do; but it being of very bad example, and contrary to religion, to praiſe a perſon who died a Heretic, the univerſity rejected the earneſt ſuit of Mr Marcel, and of Mr Deſperiers, head of the ſaid college of Liſieux, and they having thereupon applied to Mr Seguier, chancellor of France, he, after hearing them, referred the matter to the rector as the proper judge in this caſe. And by that means they were put to ſilence.’

How many reflexions might be made upon that ſpirit of policy, or falſe devotion, which makes the church of Rome deny to Heretics the praiſes that are due to them? But, ſetting reflexions aſide, I ſhall confine my ſelf ſome facts, and ſhall begin with a paſſage in the News from the Republic of Letters, taken from the extract of a book of Daniel Francus de Papiſtarum Indicibus Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum. ‘ He recites the inſtructions that are given to the inquiſitors, wherein we ſee amongſt other things an order to expunge without exception all praiſes given to Heretics. Theſe are things, which we muſt ſee with our own eyes, in order to believe them, it being otherwiſe impoſſible to imagine that religion could give ſuch a turn to our minds. Bellarmine was ‘ condemning it.’ I will give an exact catalogue of the works which he publiſhed [C], and I will ſay ſomething of his difference with Father Maimbourg [D]. He died a ſudden death at Paris in the ſtreet the eleventh of July 1690, as we ſhall ſee in his epitaph. I will inſert it entire, tho’ it was not put upon his tomb [E], his enemies having had malice was ſo perſuaded, that it is part of the character of an orthodox never to praiſe a Heretic, that the author cenſures him for having poſitively ſaid *, that it was never known that the Catholics have praiſed the doctrine or the life of Heretics. However, he ſhews by the commendations which Cochleus, Æneas Sylvius, Poggius Florentinus, the Jeſuit Clavius, Mr de l’Aubeſpine, biſhop of Orleans, and Caramuel, have given to Heretics, that Bellarmine’s touchſtone is not very certain. However, by this we diſcover the ſpirit of the Inquiſition. It is ſomething very ſingular; for the gentlemen of the Inquiſition will have the prefaces of books, epiſtles dedicatory, and, in general, whatever doth any honour to perſons out of the Roman communion, without excepting princes, to be expunged. Hence the Expurgatory Index’s order, that if any hiſtorian has ſaid, ſuch a day Chriſtopher the illuſtrious duke of Wirtemberg was born, Præclarus Dux Wurtenbergenſis, that the word illuſtrious, præclarus, ſhall be ſtruck out, which yet is of ſo little conſequence, that it is given in Latin to the meaneſt ſchool-boy. They order alſo that all the capital letters put before proper names, to ſignify that a Heretic is called Doctor, Maſter, a famous divine, vir clariſſimus, vir reverendus, be immediately expunged. The Jeſuit Serarius affirms in his Minerval, that the praiſes of a Heretic in the book of a Catholic writer, are an abomination to God, like thoſe abominable offerings mentioned in the twenty third chapter of Deuteronomy and eighteenth verſe (4).’ I have read in a Paris Gazette, that, in 1633, the maſter of the ſacred palace publiſhed at Rome ‘ a prohibition againſt the keeping of any proſe, poetry, image, figure, or medal, made in memory of Guſtavus Adolphus king of Sweden (5).’ Mr Sallo, giving an extract of a book of Father Bona, hath the following reflexion: ‘ This author, ſays he (6), is the firſt that hath given the catalogue of the authors whom he cites with his judgment upon each in particular (7). There are in this criticiſm things that are very curious. For the reſt, we need not think it ſtrange that this good Father ſpeaks ſo ill of heterodox authors in this criticiſm, even in things where faith is not concerned, becauſe he wrote at Rome, where it is a crime to like a Heretic’s book.’ Let us add to this the following words of Balzac (8). ‘ Madam de Saumaiſe requeſted me, by Monſieur Conrart, that I would give her ſome lines to be engraved on her huſband’s tomb. But I took care not to promiſe her any thing, being in a condition wherein I could not perform it, and afflicted with a diſtemper which deprives me of reſt, and leaves no room for poetic thoughts. Beſides, interments and whatever concerns funeral obſequies belonging to religion, I thought that the epitaph of a Huguenot could not be compoſed by a Catholic. I ſay an epitaph like this; which muſt be placed in a church; which muſt be written in a Chriſtian ſtile; and in which it would be difficult not to give to underſtand by ſome word favourably explained, that the deceaſed was paſſed from this life to a better. But you know, my lord, that theſe terms are criminal in our church, and that they have been condemned at Rome, in the writings of the greateſt men of our age.’

Note, that this maxim of Rome is not always obſerved; for if you conſult James Laurent, in the ſecond and ſixth chapters of his Prodiga Jeſuitarum liberalitas, you will there find praiſes beſtowed by Catholic authors on the virtue and learning of the heterodox. See the margin (9).

[C] I will give an exact catalogue of the works which he publiſhed.] I call it ſo without any ſcruple, becauſe I take it from a Memoir which has been communicated to us. ‘ He publiſhed in 1644 an apology for Mr Arnaud, his friend, againſt a libel of F. Noüet, intituled, Judicious Remarks upon the book concerning the frequent communion.’ He wrote, in 1651, under the name of St Julian, againſt the viſions of Labadie an apoſtate Jeſuit; and, under that of Hieronymus ab Angelo Forti, three Latin letters to Mr de Saintebeuve, againſt Mr des Marets, miniſter of Groningen, who had taken ſome advantage of a Catechiſm concerning grace, printed by order of a pious biſhop. He publiſhed the life of St Chryſoſtome in 1644, that of St Athanaſius in 1671, the Aſcetics of St Baſil in 1673, the life of St Baſil and of St Gregory Nazianzen in 1674. He printed ſome ſpiritual dialogues upon St Matthew in 1690. Since his death his ſpiritual dialogues upon St Mark, and a little Treatiſe of Silence have been printed. A perſon of quality having begged of him the extracts he had made of the councils, he truſted them to a faithleſs amanuenſis, who kept a copy of them, and publiſhed them at Liſle in 1693, with this title, Clavis Diſciplinæ Eccleſiaſticæ, ſeu Index univerſalis totius juris Eccleſiaſtici. They are diſgraced by ſome additions very unworthy of Mr Hermant, and which might prejudice his memory if the public was not told that they are none of his, eſpecially the collection of letters falſly attributed to our firſt Popes. God grant we may one day ſee his eccleſiaſtical and ſecular hiſtory of Beauvais and Beauvaiſis, and that it may not be loſt in the hands of thoſe who have ſeized upon it, to the prejudice of one of his friends, to whom the truſted it, and by his will appointed him to take care of the impreſſion (10).’

[D] I will ſay ſomething of his difference with Father Maimbourg.] This Jeſuit, ‘ having in his hiſtory of Arianiſm tranſcribed all that was curious and fine in the life of St Athanaſius, thought he had nothing to do but to cry down the author of it by an ill-natured preface, to diſguiſe his plagiariſm, fancying that no body would ever imagine he had vouchſafed to take any thing from a book which he treated with ſo much contempt. He blames Mr Hermant. I. For having inſerted the paſſages of authors. II. For having put ſome illuſtrations at the end of his work upon the moſt difficult points. III. For having ſaid that it is difficult to know any thing more about the order of the ſitting of the council of Nice, except that ſimplicity, modeſty and civility regulated it, and that the probabilities that are urged to the contrary upon this ſubject, are not ſolid reaſons nor ſtrong deciſions. Mr Hermant printing the life of St Baſil and St Gregory Nazianzen in 1674, after having juſtified himſelf in the preface againſt the three complaints of Father Maimbourg, ends his reply thus: But I am perhaps already blamed for having been ſo long in refuting an accuſation which has no ſolid foundation; and in truth I might have intirely neglected it. For it is certain that an author draws upon himſelf the indignation of all equitable judges, when having profited by the labours of other men, and enriched and decked himſelf with their ſpoils, he makes them no other return for it but reproaches. This excuſes me from anſwering in particular, a man who has thought fit to deal with me in this manner, and it ſuffices me that there is nothing more univerſally acknowledged by all the world, than this maxim of the canoniſts, which, in the firſt place, orders that reſtitution be made to thoſe that have been robbed, ſpoliatus ante omnia reſtituendus. I ought to make a better uſe of my time, than to examine his faults, which are perhaps more numerous than he imagines. What he has cenſured in my hiſtory of St Athanaſius, ſubſiſts by the invincible force of truth, and I need not bring new proofs for it, &c (11).’

[E] I will here inſert his epitaph, though it was not put upon his tomb.] Let us make uſe of the very words of the above quoted Memoir (12). ‘ A canon, who was his relation, had made him an epitaph, and the chapter approved of it; but ſome falſe brother having given notice of it to the Jeſuits, they cauſed it to be ſuppreſſed by an order from court, at the ſame time that in the ſight of all Paris, and and to the ſcandal of the church, a chapel was profaned by Lully’s Mauſolæum . . . The epitaph deſigned for him was this:

Here lies expecting the reſurrection, Godfrey Hermant born at Beauvais, famous for his learning, but more ſo for his piety, ſome time rector of the univerſity of Paris and it's ſtenuous defender. Doctor and Fellow of the Sorbonne, and canon of this church, a lover of the holy diſcipline, if ever any man was ſo. Of an elevated genius, prodigious learning, and admirable eloquence. Tho' he deſerved greater honours, he with a ſingular modeſty refuſed thoſe that were offered to him. To the learned he gave his Lives of the holy Fathers. To the pious, his Sacred Exercitations on Matthew and Mark. To his citizens, his Hiſtory of this city and dioceſe. To all men himſelf, in word, converſation, and charity. And to the poor all his poſſeſſions. He was ſnatched away by a ſudden, tho' not an unexpected, death, being ſeized with a violent bleeding in the ſtreets of Paris, of which he died there, in the year of our Lord 1690, 11. July, in the LXXIII year of his age. He was buried near the rails of this chapel, as he had deſired, being of St Ambroſe's opinion, that a prieſt was worthy reſt where he had uſually offered.

HERMIAS, a philoſopher of Alexandria, in the Vth century, ſtudied with Proclus under Syrianus. He had two ſons, Ammonius and Heliodorus, who were of his profeſſion, the firſt whereof became much more famous than the latter. Hermias was a very virtuous man, good-natured and ſincere. He was as laborious as poſſible, but of a mean genius, and he could not invent the ſtrong proofs which are neceſſary in philoſophizing. He had an admirable memory, and recited to a miracle the lectures of his profeſſor, and what he had read in books: his chief talent lay in this; for when he undertook to ſolve the objections and doubts of a diſputant, he quickly expoſed his weak ſide. His morals were wonderful [A]. It is ſaid, that he did not approve the uſe of diminutive and fondling words, which mothers and nurſes uſe to children, and that he ſeverely reprimanded his wife (a) upon that account (b)

[A] His morals were wonderful.] We may judge of them by the maxims upon which he went in his bargains. He maintained, that we ought not to take advantage of the ſeller's ignorance, but acquaint him with the juſt price of the merchandize, if he is ignorant of it. They who did otherwiſe, were, according to him, guilty of a very great injuſtice. They did not rob like highway-men, and at the peril of their lives, but they defrauded the law, and corrupted juſtice. He did not approve the axiom, Volenti non fit injuria. He pretended that beſides the injuries which are done by violence, there is another ſort, which people may be guilty of without forcing the will of thoſe we injure. He practiſed this fine theory; for one day perceiving that a man who was ſelling him a book did not put it at the juſt price, he acquainted him with it, and paid him more than he asked: he did the ſame thing on many other occaſions, and as often as there was opportunity (1). Καὶ ȣ̓χ ἅπαξ τὴν δικαιοσύνην ταύτην, ἧς τοῖς ἄλλοις ȣ̓δέ τις ἐπιστροφὴ· ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλάκις, ὁσάκις συνέβαινεν ἀγνοεῖν τὸν πιπράσκοντα τὸ δίκαιον τίμημα ἐπεδείκνυτο. Nec ſemel hanc juſtitiam, cujus nullam alii rationem habent, verum etiam ſæpius quoties venditorem debitum pretium ignorare contigiſſet oſtendit (2). Is there any thing more worthy of a philoſopher? Chriſtians who do ſo, are very rare.

HEROLD (BASIL JOHN) was born at Hochſtet (a) upon the Danube, in Suabia, in the year 1511. He applied himſelf diligently to learning, and went, in the year 1539, to Baſil, where he ſtudied at the ſame time Divinity and Hiſtory. He married there, and was appoined miniſter of a village of that canton; but as the Bookſellers found him fit for their ſervice, they cauſed him to return to Baſil in the year 1546. His application in preparing work for them, was incredible, and it was in acknowledgment of his long labours, that the magiſtrates of Baſil made him a burgher in the year 1556. From that time he took the name of Baſil: he was alive in the year 1566 (b). I will give the titles of moſt of his books [A]. Lezana, the annaliſt of the Carmelites, has committed a groſs a groſs blunder ſpeaking of this author [B]. Konig has made two writers of John Herold, and Baſil John Herold. They are one and the ſame man. There was, in the XVth century, a Dominican, named John Heroldus, a German. He was an eminent Divine, and a very good preacher. He compoſed ſeveral books, which have been publiſhed in diverſe places. An edition of his works was publiſhed at Mentz in the year 1612, in three volumes in quarto (c).

hodie ſuperſtitum originibus, has been inſerted in the firſt volume of Simon Schardius de ſcriptoribus rerum Germanicarum. Chriſtopher Lehman (3) has cenſured him in the firſt book of his Chronicle of Spire; but an apology has been made for Heroldus. One may ſee how laborious he was, by cousulting the preface (4), which he prefixed to the firſt Tome of the Treaſures of Eugyppius. He there promiſes a Collection of Stratagems, and I ſee in the Epitome of Geſner, that he publiſhed ſix chiliads of them. He compoſed a funeral oration upon the emperor Ferdinand, which was printed at Francfort, in the year 1564. It muſt not be forgot that he publiſhed (5) the writings of ſeventy ſix authors, under the title of Orthodoxography, and a Hæreſeologia, ſeu Syntagma veterum Theologorum tam Græcorum quam Latinorum numero 18 qui graſſatas in Eccleſia hæreſes confutarunt, & præcipua Theologiæ capita tractarunt (6).

[B] Lezana . . . . has committed a groſs blunder ſpeaking of this author.] He ſays under the year 1159, that St Antoninus was in the wrong to ſet down word for word a paſſage of John Heroldus, without confuting him. That paſſage contains a deſcription of the original habit of the Carmelites. The Jeſuit Papebroch took notice of that blunder, by ſaying, that St Antoninus a lived a century before John Heroldus; for, adds he, St Antoninus died in the year 1459, and the Principis juventutis, which Herold dedicated to the archduke Ferdinand, was printed in the year 1557 (7). The difference is not quite a century: we have ſome books of Heroldus printed in the year 1540. Nevertheleſs, Lezana was very much miſtaken. Here is a queſtion which that Jeſuit propoſed to a Carmelite, who wrote againſt him (8): ‘An Joannes Heroldus Hochſtettenſis, continuator belli ſacri, cujus Continuationis ſingulos libros Catholicis Prælatis dedicavit, ſemper cum laude etiam de religioſis mendicantibus locutus, ſed in ſolis Carmelitis explodens enormem quem fingebant ſeſe in Syria habuiſſe, monaſteriorum ac Fratrum numerum; an, inquam Heroldus iſte in] dignus ſit qui citetur, tanquam infeſtiſſimus ſedis Apoſtolicæ hoſtis: eſto juvenis ſub nomine Heroldi Acropolitani ſcripſerit Apologiam pro Eraſmo, inter prohibitos relatam. —— Whether John Heroldus of Hochſtet, the continuator of the Hiſtory of the Holy War, each book of which Continuation he dedicated to Catholic prelates, and who always mentions the friars, even of the mendicant orders, with honour, and only explodes the great number of monaſteries and fryars, which the Carmelites pretended to have in Syria; whether, I ſay, this Heroldus be unworthy of being quoted, as being an inveterate enemy of the holy ſee: tho' we grant that, in his youth, he wrote an Apology for Eraſmus, under the name of Heroldus Acropolitanus, which is in the Index Expurgatorius.’

Compleated by John Frederic Herwart of Hohenburg in Schwindeck, counſellor to the elector of Bavaria, from the unfiniſhed labours of his deceaſed father, at Munich*, 1626, in quarto. This book has a great deal of learning in it. There is a table before it, intituled, Tabula nauticæ & hieroglyphicæ deſcriptionis totius mundi vetuſtiſſima, quæ Theologiam Chaldæorum Babylonis, Ierogrammateon Ægypti, & Orphei Phrygis, nec non Magiæ, Sophiæque Zoroaſtris & Magorum Perſidis oſtendit originem. —— An ancient, nautical, and hieroglyphical deſcription of the World, which ſhows that the Theology of the Chaldeans at Babylon, was the origin of the Hierogrammati of Egypt, of the Phyrygian Orpheus, and alſo of Magic, and of the learning of Zoroaſter, and the Perſian magi. Voſſius's ſilence about the books that I have mentioned may be well wondered at. That learned man doth not ſpeak of them, either in his Collection of Chronologers, or in his great work of the Orgin of Idolatry, where he has heaped together abundance of things concerning the load-ſtone, and where he has not forgotten to ſay, that the winds were worſhipped as gods. Could he be intirely ignorant that Herwart the father, and Herwart the ſon, were authors? that would be wonderful in a man of ſo much reading. Could he have omitted to cite them, when he knew their works? that would be no leſs ſtrange in an author, who was ſo apt to make a ſhew of his reading.

MVSEVM BRITANNICVM

HESHUSIUS.

HESHUSIUS (Tilemannus), a divine of the Augſburg confeſſion, born at Weſel [A] in the year 1526, has been famous for his reſtleſs and impetuous temper. He was very young when he had two conſiderable poſts given him at Heidelberg, that of profeſſor of Divinity, and that of preacher in the church of the Holy Ghoſt. He did not diſcharge them without many troubles; for there aroſe a violent diſpute betwixt him and William Clebitius, concerning the doctrine of the Euchariſt. The elector Palatine, Frederick III, being perſuaded that Melanchthon's ſuffrage would be of great weight to terminate the diſpute, conſulted him upon that ſubject. His anſwer provoked Heſhuſius, who would not bate any thing of Luther's opinions; and as there was no appearance of ſeeing an end of theſe quarrels [B] whilſt he ſtaid at Heidelberg, he was ordered to depart. He retired into Saxony, and publiſhed ſome contentious writings in the univerſity of Jena. Being called into Pruſſia, he taught divinity in Konigſberg, till he was driven thence in the year 1577, with the miniſters of his faction. He had a furious contention with Wigandus, upon controverſies of ſmall importance (a) [C]. He retired with his family to Lubec, and afterwards to Helmſtadt, where he was made profeſſor of Divinity. He died there the twenty fifth of September 1588. He ſtrongly combated the doctrine of Ubiquity, in the conference of Quedlinburg, in the year 1583. [D].

Melchior

[A] Born at Weſel.] According to Moreri he was born at Ober Weſel upon the Rhine, in the dioceſe of Triers; but Quenſted (1) who ſays it was at Weſel in the country of Cleves, ſeems more worthy to be believed.

[B] There was no appearance of ſeeing an end of theſe quarrels.] Melanchthon's anſwer was compoſed in the year 1559, and was publiſhed after his death, contrary to his intention (2). Heſhuſius raged furiouſly againſt him, and forgot all the reſpect that was due to that great maſter. 'Heſhuſius itaque cùm Lutheri de cœna ſacra ſententiam mordicùs retineret ac propugnaret, à principe Electore, ut finis eſſet conviciorum & inſectationem in ſua urbe, dimiſſus offenſoſque vehementer judicio Melanchthonis de ſe acerbè reſpondit, ac ne mortuo quidem & benè merito preceptori pepercit (3). ——— Heſhuſius therefore being very tenacious of Luther's doctrine concerning the Euchariſt, the elector, in order to put an end to quarrels and invectives in the city of his own reſidence, diſmiſſed him, and he being highly offended at Melanchthon, on account of the judgment he had given againſt him, wrote a moſt bitter anſwer againſt him, and did not even ſpare him after his death, tho' he had been his maſter, and had deſerved other treatment from him.' Calvin cenſures him for that fury aganſt Melanchthon. 'Pauliſper expendant lectores, ſays he (4), quam atrociter Philippum Melanchthonem ſuum præceptorem, cujus memoriam ſancte revereri debuerat, ſugillet ac laceret . . . . . Probroſis elogiis, Philippum ita digito monſtrat, ut videri poſſit data opera materiam ejus traducendi in ſcribendo libro captaſſe. —— Let the readers only obſerve how outrageouſly he calumniates and maltreats Philip Melanchthon, his own maſter, whoſe memory he ought to have revered . . . . . He points him out with ſuch ſpiteful elogies, that he ſeems on purpoſe to have laid hold of all occaſions of traducing him in that book.'

[C] He had a furious contention with Wigandus, upon controverſies of ſmall importance.] This is the ground of the quarrel. Heſhuſius, in a book againſt Theodore Beza (5), advanced, that the fleſh of Jesus Christ in abſtracto, is adorable (6). 'Non ſolum in concreto dici debere, filium Dei eſſe adorandum, omnipotentem & vivificum, ſed etiam in abſtracto carnem Chriſti eſſe adorandam: quia majeſtas adorationis ſit carni communicata. ——— We ought not only to maintain in the concrete, that the Son of GOD is adorable, omnipotent, and enlivening, but likewiſe that the fleſh of CHRST is to be adored in the abſtract: becauſe the majeſty of adoration is communicated to the fleſh.' His adverſaries aſſaulted him, pretending that he taught, that the fleſh of Jesus Christ is adorable in itſelf, independently on the hypoſtatic union: 'Quod in abſtracto & in ſua eſſentia caro Chriſti, etiam extra unionem conſiderata, ſit adoranda (7). — That the fleſh of CHRIST is to be adored in the abſtract and it's own eſſence, even conſidered ſeparately from the union.' He denied this to be his opinion, and explained his notion; but his adveſaries were not content with it. Biſhop Wigandus (8), maintained this to be a dangerous propoſition: 'Humanitas Chriſti in abſtracto eſt adoranda omnipotens, vivifica. — The humanity of CHRIST in the abſtract is adorable, omnipotent and enlivening. Heſhuſius maintained that he had not advanced it, and explained himſelf once more, but got nothing by it. A ſynod was called, who rejected Heſhuſius's expreſſion, and Wigandus would even force him to retract it publickly. Heſhuſius refuſing to do it, was expelled the country, tho' he promiſed to correct any improper expreſſions that might have eſcaped him: all the miniſters who ſided with him, had the ſame treatment. The adminiſtator of Pruſſia, in the year 1578, conſulted the divines that met at Hertzberg, for the Formulary of the Concord, and receiving an anſwer that was favourable to Heſhuſius, he ordered Wigandus to ſpeak no more of that diſpute. This was the eleventh ſchiſm of the Lutheran church (9). It is of greater uſe than is imagined, to know this ſort of hiſtories; we therein diſcover the factious ſpirit, which animates the authors of theſe diſputes.

[D] He ſtrongly combated the doctrine of the Ubiquity, in the conference of Quedlinburg in the year 1583.] This conference was held the fourteenth and ſixteenth of January 1583 (10), betwixt the divines of H. E. H. of Saxony, and thoſe of Brunſwic. The latter were headed by Heſhuſius. The acts of this diſpute were publiſhed. 'In eo (colloquio) præcipuæ partes demandatæ à Theologis Brunſuicenſibus Heſhuſio fuerunt, qui διαῤῥήδην negavit dogma illud generalis Ubiquitatis . . . in ſacræ ſcripturæ canone haberi, neque inde poſſe demonſtrari (11). —— The divines of Brunſwic committed the chief part of this conference to Heſhuſius, who poſitively denied that the doctrine of a general Ubiquity was to be found in ſcripture, or could be demonſtrated from thence.' Quenſtedt pretends, that Heſhuſius did not know the ſtate of the queſtion, imputing to his adverſaries a doctrine which they did not hold, and which was a vain phantome of his own imagination. This is very uſual in diſputes of this kind. I ſhall ſet down the words of Quenſtedt; they are hiſtorical, with reſpect to our doctor. 'Veſalia inferior vulgo Unter-Weſel . . . urbs Cliviæ clariſſima, . . . excepit in hanc lucem editum . . . . Tilemannum Heſhuſium Theologum Lutheranum inſignem, multiſque ſcriptis Didacticis & Polemicis contra Calvinianos clarum, qui ante Librum Concordiæ defendit Omnipræſentiam Carnis Chriſti, poſtmodum verò non tam ipſam in Libro Concordiæ de Majeſtate Chriſti hominis doctrinam, quàm præconceptum cerebri ſui idolum impugnavit, talem ſcil. omnipræſentiam, quâ ſubſtantia Carnis Chriſti ſit localiter, extenſivè, diffuſivè & objectivè in omnibus creaturis, cum qua portentoſa ubiquitate noſtris Eccleſiis nihil quicquam fuit commercii. —— Unter-Weſel, a town of Cleves, gave birth to Tilemannus Heſhuſius, a Lutheran divine, famous for his many didactic and polemical writings againſt the Calviniſts; he maintained the omnipreſence of CHRIST's body before the publication of the book of Concord, but afterwards he attacked not the doctrine contained in the book of Concord, concerning the dignity of CHRIST's human nature, but rather a phantom of his own imagination, that is, ſuch an omnipreſence whereby the ſubſtance of the fleſh of CHRIST is locally, extenſively, diffuſively, and objectively, in all creatures, which monſtrous Ubiquity our churches never maintained.' *Vide Concord. Melchior Adam, from whom I borrow what is above, has been very barren in his account of our author's adventures. I adviſe thoſe who would ſee them more at large to conſult the life of Heſhuſius, written by his ſon-in-law [E]. Heſhuſius was baniſhed four times [F]. And he took care, if we may believe Calvin (b), that it ſhould do him no prejudice. He wrote many books [G]. They who ſpeak of the ſect of the Heſhuſians, and impute to him the doctrine of Arius, deſerve the utmoſt contempt [H]. And puted only out of ſpite againſt the doctrine of Ubiquity. An aſſembly met to deliberate upon the apology that was to be made for the book of the Concord, and ſome meaſures were taken that were diſagreeable to Heſhuſius. There needed no more to exaſperate his ſpirit of contradiction, and to engage him to take up arms againſt the Ubiquitarians. ‘Contra Calvinianos ore & calamo omnipræſentiam carnis Chriſti fortiter uſque ad annum Chriſti 1582 defendit. Tandem cum nonnulli theologorum ad conſcribendam pro Formula concordiæ apologiam conveniſſent: ille ſuum ad arbitrium non omnia agi indignatus, majeſtatem Chriſti, libro Concordiæ inſertam, quam ubiquitatem generalem vocant, oppugnare cœpit, & cum Dan. Hoffmanno, collega, orthodoxis eam ſententiam affinxit, ac ſi ſubſtantiam carnis Chriſti extenſivè ac localiter in omnibus creaturis eſſe dicerent. Sic igitur proprii cerebri commentum impugnans, loco omnipræſentiæ introduxit multipræſentiam (13). —— He boldly, both by word and writing, defended the omnipreſence of CHRIST's body againſt the Calviniſts till the year 1582. But ſome-time after, ſome divines having aſſembled in order to write an apology for the form of Concord, and being piqued, becauſe every thing was not done there according to his humour, he began to impugn the doctrine of the book of Concord concerning the majeſty of CHRIST, which is called the General Ubiquity, and together with Daniel Hoffman, his colleague, miſrepreſented the doctrine of the orthodox, as if they maintained that the ſubſtance of the fleſh of CHRIST was extenſively and locally in all creatures. And thus fighting with a phantom of his own brain inſtead of an omnipreſence he introduced a multipreſence.’ Daniel Hoffman vigorouſly ſeconded him, and would bate nothing in the conference of Quedlenburg (14).

[E] Melchior Adam has been very barren . . . I adviſe the reader . . . to conſult the life of Heſhuſius wrote by his ſon-in-law.] The journaliſts of Leipſic had reaſon to obſerve it (15). ‘Tilemanni Heſhuſii vitam conciſam admodum & mancam ad nos tranſmiſit Melchior Adamus Vit. Germ. Theolog. p. 621. ſeq. multo locupletiorem, eamque carmine heroico exaratam, & Heſhuſii commentariis in Eſaiam adjectam gener ejus D. Jo. Olearius: ubi & quarti, quod ſuſtinendum illi fuit, mentionem reperies exilii; cujus hiſtoriam illuſtrabunt egregie quæ (16) Parte II. ſub anno 1565. p. 182. ſeqq. tum in ipſius Heſhuſii, tum in aliorum epiſtolis leguntur. —— Melchior Adam, in his Lives of the German Divines, has given us a very ſhort and imperfect hiſtory of Tilemannus Heſhuſius. We have a much fuller account of him wrote in heroic verſe by his ſon-in-law John Olearius, which is ſubjoined to Heſhuſius's Commentaries on Iſaiah: in it we find a fourth baniſhment of Heſhuſius mentioned, the hiſtory of which is greatly illuſtrated by what we read in the ſecond part, under the year 1565, both in the letters of Heſhuſius himſelf, and in thoſe of others.’

[F] Heſhuſius was baniſhed four times.] This may be ſeen in the paſſage of the Journal of Leipſic, which I have juſt now cited. Here is a diſtich which confirms the ſame thing, and is not very honourable to that doctor's memory.

Quæritur, Heſhuſi, quarta cur pulſus ab urbe;
In promptu cauſa eſt, ſeditioſus eras (17).

Baniſh'd four times! Good doctor, tell us why?
The reaſon's plain, ſedition made you fly.

The deſcription which Calvin (18) gives us of Heſhuſius, wonderfully confirms this diſtich. ‘Illuc (19) eum rapit naturæ intemperies, vel quod videt in moderata docendi ratione nullum ſibi laudis gradum relinqui, qui tamen ambitione totus ad inſaniam uſque flagret. Certè in ſuo libello turbulenti ſe ingenii hominem, præcipitis etiam audaciæ & temeritatis eſſe prodit . . . Concionatur de ingentibus ſuis periculis, qui ſemper non minus ſecurè, quam lautè, delicias ſuas coluit. Prædicat multiplices ærumnas, qui cùm largos theſauros habeat domi repoſitos, ſemper amplis ſtipendiis ſuas operas venderet, omnia tamen ſolus ingurgitat. Verum quidem eſt, quum multis locis tranquillum nidum figere voluerit, ſæpius propria inquietudine fuiſſe excuſſum. Sic Gloſſlario (20), Roſtochio, Heidelberga, Brema pulſus, Magdeburgum nuper conceſſit. Ac laudi quidem danda eſſent exilia, ſi pro conſtanti veritatis confeſſione ſolum vertere ſæpius coactus eſſet: ſed quum homo inexplebili ambitione plenus, contentionibus & rixis deditus, immani verò ferocia ubique fuerit intolerabilis, non eſt cur queratur aliorum injuria ſe fuiſſe vexatum, qui ſua importunitate, moleſtias homini delicato graves exhibuit. Intereà tamen providè ſibi cavit, ne damnoſæ eſſent migrationes: quinetiam divitiæ ipſum magis animoſum reddunt. —— He is hurried on to this by the reſtleſſneſs of his temper, or becauſe he ſees that he cannot diſtinguiſh himſelf by a moderate manner of teaching, which is inſupportable to a man ambitious even to madneſs. In his book he certainly ſhows himſelf to be a perſon of a very turbulent ſpirit, and precipitate boldneſs . . . . He makes great boaſts of the many hazards he has undergone, though he has always taken care to enjoy the pleaſures of life, not only ſecurely, but even opulently. He talks of his manifold ſtraits, who, notwithſtanding his great riches, has always ſold his labours at the higheſt rate, and ſwallowed all up by himſelf. It is true indeed that he has endeavoured to ſettle in many different places, but his own reſtleſs temper has ſtill been the cauſe of his diſgrace. In this manner, after being baniſhed from Gloſſlar, Roſtoc, Heidelberg, and Bremen, he has lately ſettled at Magdeburg. His baniſhments indeed would be honourable, if he had ſuffered them on account of his conſtant profeſſion of the truth: but being inſatiably ambitious, contentious beyond meaſure, and haughty beyond all ſufferance, it is in vain for him to complain of the injuries of others, who has himſelf by his turbulent temper raiſed troubles not to be born by perſons of any delicacy. He has however taken care that theſe migrations of his ſhould not hurt his fortune, nay his riches add to his boldneſs.’ We might infer from this paſſage, that Heſhuſius was baniſhed above four times; for it is not ſaid there, that he was expelled from Jena, and afterwards from Pruſſia; nor could this be ſaid, ſince theſe events were poſterior to this book of Calvin (21). He was expelled from Jena in the year 1573 (22), and went thence into Pruſſia, where he was made biſhop of Samia in Morlin's place.

[G] He wrote many books.] A Commentary on the Pſalms, on Iſaiah, and all the Epiſtles of St Paul: a Treatiſe upon the Lord's-Supper, and Juſtification; Aſſertio Teſtamenti Jeſu Chriſti contra blaſphemias Calviniſtarum: Antidotum contra impium dogma Math. Flacii Illyrici, quo adſerit quod peccatum originis ſit ſubſtantia: de ſervo hominis arbitrio, & converſione ejus per Dei gratiam contra Synergiæ adſertores: de vera Eccleſia ejuſque authoritate, &c. The Teſtament of JESUS CHRIST aſſerted againſt the blaſphemies of the Calviniſts: an antidote againſt the impious doctrine of Matthew Flacius Illyricus, who aſſerts that original ſin is a ſubſtance: on the neceſſity of the will and man's converſion by the Grace of GOD, againſt the maintainers of cooperation. On the true church and it's authority, &c.

[H] They who ſpeak of the ſect of the Heſhuſians deſerve the utmoſt contempt.] I have given my opinion more than once (23) upon thoſe wretched writers of catalogues of Heretics. The only authority they have here, is a dialogue of Lindanus, wherein are theſe words (24): ‘Heſhuſii, à Tilmanno Heſhuſio quem Calvinus Servetianum infamat, Boquinus, Arrianum: Wilhelmus Cleinwitzius vero præter peculatum plurimis de fidei capitibus accuſat: quibus ‘hoc

'hoc anno (25) ſua reſpondit defenſione objecta inficiatus, niſi quod illud Trinitas eſt unitas negat ſe meminiſſe an dixerit in lectionibus: cum ita diſertè doceat de præſentia Chriſti corporis in cœna objectione quinta. —— Heſhuſians, from Tilmannus Heſhuſius, whom Calvin accuſeth of being a follower of Servetus, and Boquinus accuſeth of Arianiſm, and William Cleinwitzius accuſeth him not only of extortion, but alſo with reſpect to ſeveral articles of faith: to all theſe he has anſwered this year, by denying the whole charge, only he ſays that he doth not remember to have ſaid in his lectures, that Trinity is Unity: tho' he has expreſsly taught this in the fifth objection, concerning the preſence of Chriſt's body in the Euchariſt.' There are three things in this paſſage to be animadverted on. I. It is an impertinent piece of injuſtice to charge a man with the hereſies, of which his adverſaries accuſe him in the heat of a diſpute. Has not Hunnius, a Lutheran author, written a pretty large book, in which he boaſts that he has convicted John Calvin of Judaiſm? Who but a madman would infer from thence that Calvin entertained Jewiſh notions? Thus, under pretence that Calvin, Boquin, and other ſuch adverſaries of Heſhuſius, exaſperated by his ſlanders, have imputed Arian doctrines to him, a wiſe man will not think he has ſufficient grounds to call him an Arian. He will judge that ſuch accuſations may eaſily be the fruits of too great leiſure, which is often abuſed to ſift all the words of an enemy and to wreſt them, in order to find hereſies in them, by means of far fetched conſequences. II. This injuſtice, which would be only impertinent, if one were ignorant of Heſhuſius's anſwer, becomes wholly criminal, when one knows that he has publickly denied the things his adverſaries accuſed him of. Now Lindanus himſelf confeſſes that he knew this. III. Though this divine ſhould have taught ſome hereſies, it doth not follow, that there was a ſect of Heſhuſians in Germany. A profeſſor, who teaches particular doctrines, has not always diſciples, much leſs has he always ſome, who ſeparate from the body, which they muſt do to deſerve the name of a ſect.

Prateolus, upon the bare authority of Lindanus, has ranked the Heſhuſians in the catalogue of Heretics. Father Gaultier (26) has done the ſame upon the ſole credit of Prateolus.

O imitatores ſervum pecus, ut mihi ſæpe
Bilem, ſæpe jocum veſtri movere tumultus (27)!

Baſe imitators, ſlaves to others wills,
How oft you move my frowns, how oft my ſmiles.

HIEROCLES, author of a book intituled Φιλίςορες, The Lovers of Hiſtory (a), vented a great many fables, if we may judge of his book by Tzetzes's quotations out of it. He ſaid, that in the Torrid Zone there were men whoſe ears ſerv'd them for umbrello's, and others, whoſe feet did them the ſame ſervice, when they lifted them up. He boaſted to have ſeen theſe, and to have heard ſay, that there were men who wanted heads, and others who had ten heads, four hands, and four feet (b). It is not known at what time he lived, but it is not at all probable that he was the ſame HIEROCLES, who from a Wreſtler became a Philoſopher, and who was a native of Hyllarima, a town of Caria (c).

HIEROCLES, a great perſecutor of the Chriſtians, in the beginning of the IVth century, was preſident in Bithynia, and then governour of Alexandria. He was the chief promoter of the bloody perſecution, in the reign of Diocleſian. He was not ſatisfied with oppreſſing them, by the power which his poſt conferred on him, but would likewiſe ruin them by his pen. To this end he wrote two pieces, which he addreſſed to them, wherein he endeavoured to ſhew that the ſcripture confuted itſelf by the contradictions that it contained, as he pretended. He wrote violently againſt the perſon of our LORD and his Apoſtles, and made a parallel betwixt the miracles of JESUS CHRIST, and thoſe of Apollonius Tyanæus, to ſhew that Apollonius equalled or even excelled our Saviour in that particular (a). Two fathers of the church have confuted him [A]. 'Tis ſaid that the holy martyr Ædeſius, animated with a ſtrong zeal, came up

[A] Two fathers of the church have confuted him. That is to ſay, Lactantius and Euſebius. The firſt relates that at the time when he taught Rhetoric in Bithynia (1), and when the temple of the Chriſtians was demoliſhed there, there were two writers who wrote to inſult the oppreſſed truth. One was a Philoſopher, whoſe work was deſpiſed and quickly fell to the ground: the other was one of the judges, and treated that ſubject more maliciouſly. 'Alius eandem materiam mordaciùs ſcripſit, qui erat tum è numero judicum, & qui auctor in primis faciendæ præſecutionis fuit, quo ſcelere non contentus, etiam ſcriptis eos, quos afflixerat, inſecutus eſt. Compoſuit enim libellos duos non contra Chriſtianos, ne inimicè inſectari videretur, ſed ad Chriſtianos, ut humanè, ac benignè conſulere putaretur; in quibus ita falſitatem ſcripturæ ſacræ arguere conatus eſt, tanquam ſibi eſſet tota contraria; nam quædam capita, quæ repugnare ſibi videbantur, expoſuit, adeo multa, adeo intima enumerans, ut aliquando ex eadem diſciplina fuiſſe videatur .... præcipuè tamen Paulum, Petrumque laceravit, cæteroſque diſcipulos, tanquam fallaciæ ſeminatores, quos eoſdem tamen rudes, & indoctos fuiſſe teſtatus eſt: nam quoſdam eorum piſcatorio artificio feciſſe quæſtum ... (2) Ipſum autem Chriſtum affirmavit à Judæis fugatum, collecta noningentorum hominum manu latrocinia feciſſe .... Item cum facta ejus mirabilia deſtrueret, nec tamen negaret, voluit oſtendere Apollonium vel paria, vel etiam majora feciſſe (3). —— Another writer treated the ſame ſubject in a more ſatirical manner. He was at that time one of the judges, and had been one of the chief adviſers of the perſecution, and not content with that crime he attacked thoſe by his writings whom he had before perſecuted. He compoſed two books, not againſt the Chriſtians, leſt he ſhould be thought to fall upon them as an enemy, but to the Chriſtians, that he might paſs for a humane and benevolent counſellor; in which he endeavoured to prove the falſehood of the holy ſcriptures, by the contradictions of which he accuſeth them; he there produceth certain chapters which ſeemed to him to contradict one another, and advanceth ſo many particulars, and appears ſo well acquainted with them, that he ſeems to have ſome time profeſſed Chriſtianity . . . Above all he inveighs bitterly againſt Peter and Paul, and the other diſciples, as deceivers of mankind, and yet he owns that they were rude and illiterate men: ſome of them fiſhermen by trade . . . . He affirms that CHRIST, being baniſhed by the Jews, gathered together 9000 men, and lived by robbery . . . And in order to invalidate his miracles, which however he doth not deny, he pretends to ſhow that Apollonius performed equal, or even greater.' We do not ſee here the name of this writer; but we need not doubt that Lactantius ſpoke of the ſame judge, whom he calls Hierocles in another book (4), and to confirm this, I obſerve two things; one is the title of the book of this great perſecutor of Chriſtianity, the other is the name which Euſebius gives to the author of it. Auſus eſt libros ſuos up to him, as he preſided at the condemnation of the Chriſtians in Alexandria, and confounded him with ſhame both by words and deeds; I mean that Ædeſius, gave Hierocles a box on the ear upon the tribunal, reproaching him with his infamous barbarities [B]. We will point out ſome errors of Moreri and of Cardinal Baronius [C].

ſuos nefarios, ac Dei hoſtes φιλαληθεῖς annotare. —— He had the boldneſs to name his impious and profane books Lovers of Truth. Theſe are Lactantius's words (5). Now Euſebius has named Hierocles for the author of the book intituled Φιλαλήθης (6). It is therefore certain that he whoſe name is not mentioned in the fifth book of Lactantius, is the ſame whom he calls Hierocles in his tract de Mortibus Perſecutorum. Note, that Euſebius, in refuting this author, inſiſted only on the parallel of the miracles of JESUS CHRIST, and Apollonius Tyanæus, not touching upon other points, but contenting himſelf with ſaying, that Origen had confuted them before in his book againſt Celſus, and that Hierocles was only a bold copier of other mens thoughts and words. Note farther, that with reſpect to this parallel, he contented himſelf with ſlightly running over, and criticizing the life of Apollonius wrote by Philoſtratus. It is certain Euſebius did no great exploits upon that ſubject. See what Dr Cave ſays of it: ‘Poſterioris hujus operis partem de comparatione Apollonii cum Chriſto refutandam in ſe ſuſcepit Euſebius libro contra Hieroclem; quod & SATIS JEJUNE præſtitit, cum potius Philoſtrati libros de vita Apollonii in eo opuſculo breviter percurrit & refellit (7). —— Euſebius, in his book againſt Hierocles, undertook to anſwer the latter part of this work, which contained a compariſon of Apollonius with CHRIST. This he executed very indifferently, giving us only a ſhort confutation of Philoſtratus's book concerning the life of Apollonius.’ Note laſtly, that Lactantius did not undertake a particular confutation of Hierocles, and that he is ſo far from following him ſtep by ſtep, that he never expreſsly anſwers any objections taken from the work of this enemy of our Lord. The end he propoſed to himſelf was, to eſtabliſh in general the foundations of the goſpel, and to ruin thoſe of Paganiſm, and he thought this was ſufficient to overturn at once all that the adverſaries had publiſhed, or ſhould publiſh for the time to come. ‘Ii ergo, de quibus dixi, cum præſente me ac dolente, ſacrilegas ſuas literas explicaſſent, & illorum ſuperba impietate ſtimulatus, & veritatis ipſius conſcientia, & (ut ego arbitror) Deo, ſuſcepi hoc munus, ut omnibus ingenii mei viribus accuſatores juſtitiæ refutarem; non ut contra hos ſcriberem, qui paucis verbis obteri poterant, ſed ut omnes, qui ubique idem operis efficiunt, aut effecerunt, uno ſemel impetu profligarem. Non dubito enim, quin & alii plurimi, & multis in locis, & non modò græcis, ſed etiam latinis literis monumentum injuſtitiæ ſuæ ſtruxerint, quibus ſingulis quoniam reſpondere non poteram, ſic agendam mihi hanc cauſam putavi, ut & priores cum omnibus ſuis ſcriptis perverterem, & futuris omnem facultatem ſcribendi, aut reſpondendi amputarem (8). —— The perſons above-mentioned, having explained their impious letters in my preſence, I heard them with ſorrow, and being ſtimulated by their daring wickedneſs, by the conſciouſneſs of the truth, and (as I verily believe) by GOD himſelf, I undertook this task, to confute to the utmoſt of my abilities the enemies of the truth; not with a deſign to anſwer theſe particular perſons only, who might be eaſily put to ſilence by a very few words, but that I may at one blow confound all thoſe who have been, or are, employed in that impious cauſe in all parts of the world. For I do not doubt but many others, in various places, and in writings, both Greek and Latin, have left monuments of their impiety; ſince therefore it is impoſſible to anſwer them all particularly, I have endeavoured to handle this ſubject in ſuch a manner, that I might not only confute all former writers, but likewiſe take away all poſſibility either of writing, or anſwering, from thoſe who ſhall come after.’

[B] It is reported that Ædeſius gave Hierocles a box on the ear upon the tribunal, reproaching him with his infamous barbarities.] Euſebius doth not expreſs this ſo clearly, but we muſt believe that the thing is implicitely contained in the words he makes uſe of. Λόγοις τε καὶ ἔργοις τὸν δικαστὴν αἰσχύνη καὶ ἀτιμία περιβαλῶν. Cum verbis ſimul & factis illum pudore atque ignominia perfudiſſet (9). —— When he had both by words and deeds covered him with ſhame and ignominy. Here is the note of Valeſius upon this paſſage (10): ‘In hoc Euſebii loco, ἀτιμία quidem deſignat verbera quibus judex affectus eſt ab Ædeſio: αἰσχύνη verò denotat convicia, quibus Ædeſius judicem ipſum appetiit. Utrumque autem indicat Euſebius his verbis: λόγοις τε καὶ ἔργοις τὸν δικαστὴν, &c.’ Euſebius doth not tell us the name of the judge who was thus treated, but we learn from other authors that it was was Hierocles. Read theſe words of Metaphraſtes, you will there find this, and ſome other particulars of the holy zeal of the martyr Ædeſius; you will there find, that he boxed the governor of all Ægypt, threw him upon the ground and redoubled his blows. ‘Poſt hanc calamitatem, incidit in Hieroclem, qui totam Ægyptum adminiſtrabat. Hunc cùm in Dei martyres injuria ſævientem animadvertiſſet, ſanctaſque Dei virgines tradentem lenonibus, nec tantam iniquitatem perferre poſſet, ſimile fraterno facinus aggreditur. Namque Divino repletus zelo procedit, & verbis ac factis Hieroclem confundit. Manu enim ſua plagas illi in os infligit, humique ſupinum proſternit & cædit: ac monet, ne audeat contra naturæ leges, Dei ſervos offendere (11). —— After this calamity, he fell upon Hierocles, the governor of all Egypt. Having obſerved how he raged againſt the martyrs of GOD, and delivered the holy virgins to panders, not being able to ſuffer ſuch wickedneſs, he did an action equal to that of his brother. For, being filled with a divine zeal, he confounded Hierocles both by words and deeds. He ſtruck him on the face with his hand, and, throwing him down to the ground, beat him, admoniſhing him not to dare to injure the ſervants of GOD, againſt the laws of nature.’ Valeſius quotes the Menæum of the Greeks, where it is obſerved that the governor Hierocles was ſtruck in Alexandria by Ædeſius (12).

[C] We will point out ſome errors of Moreri and cardinal Baronius.] I. He gives the title of Platonic Philoſopher to our Hierocles, who was not even a Philoſopher generally ſpeaking. I have not found any author among the antients who makes him of that profeſſion, and I ſee that Dr Cave, amongſt the moderns, doubts whether he ſhould be called a philoſopher (13). II. Mr Moreri ſpeaks of another ‘Hierocles, a Pagan philoſopher, one of the judges of the Areopagus, who undertook to demonſtrate that Apollonius Tyanæus and JESUS CHRIST, where the ſame man.’ He adds, ‘that Euſebius wrote againſt him.’ This is to multiply beings without neceſſity; for the Hierocles whom Euſebius confuted, was the ſame that Mr Moreri mentioned in the preceding article, and called a Platonic Philoſopher. III. Beſides, we do not know any Hierocles that was a judge of the Areopagus. Cardinal Baronius, who miſled Moreri in that, might have eaſily avoided that miſtake; for he grounds himſelf upon Lactantius whoſe words he even ſets down (14). Now Lactantius ſaith expreſsly, that the author who wrote againſt the Chriſtians, was one of the judges in Bythinia. Seeing then Baronius very juſtly ſuppoſed, that this enemy of the Chriſtians was called Hierocles, he might eaſily conceive that he was not to be placed among the judges of the Areopagus. Note, that he ſaith, and with reaſon, that Euſebius and Lactantius wrote againſt the ſame Hierocles, and yet Moreri, who copies him, has given us two Hierocles, one refuted by Lactantius and the other by Euſebius. IV. He has not well underſtood theſe words of Baronius: ‘Nihil magis monſtrare conatus eſt (Hierocles) quam Apollonium æqualem fuiſſe Chriſto (15). —— Hierocles has chiefly endeavoured to prove that Apollonius was equal to CHRIST.’ For he thought they meant that Hierocles pretended to prove that Apollonius was the ſame with JESUS CHRIST (16). What I have further to ſay, doth not ſo much concern him as the cardinal. We have ſeen above that Lactantius makes mention of two heathens, who wrote againſt the Chriſtians. Baronius pretends, that our Hierocles is the ſecond of thoſe authors, and that Porphyrius is the firſt. Moreri mentions this without finding fault with it. It is true he declares that he in this follows the opinion of the cardinal. Let us turn then to Baronius and tell him, that he could not have found Porphyrius in that place of Lactantius, if he had well examined things. The firſt of theſe two heathen authors was at Nicomedia at the ſame time with Lactantius, and there publiſhed his invective againſt the Chriſtians (17). He was a man notoriouſly vicious, covetous, voluptuous, and very ſumptuous at his table. He was very rich, and made his court to the judges very diligently, in order to grow ſtill richer, that is to ſay in order to ſell their ſentences, and to ſtop the proceedings of his neighbours, whom he drove out of their poſſeſſions. The three books he publiſhed againſt the Chriſtians were fooliſh and ridiculous; he underſtood nothing of the matter and knew not what he ſaid. The Chriſtians ridiculed him for it, and he failed miſerably in his attempt (18). This is the character of that author and of his book, if we credit Lactantius. How comes it then that Baronius (19) could diſcover Porphyrius by ſuch marks? Where has he found that this philoſopher made a long ſtay at Nicomedia? Men never ſollicite the favour of the judges to maintain themſelves in poſſeſſion of lands, which they have unjuſtly uſurped about their country-houſes: they never do this, I ſay, upon a journey; it is a way of acting which ſuppoſes a fixed abode and a conſtant ſettlement. Porphyrius then muſt have been thus eſtabliſhed in Nicomedia, if Baronius was in the right; now this is a fact which no body hath mentioned; his abode at Rome and Sicily, took up the greateſt part of his life: beſides, he was never accuſed of having been addicted to a voluptuous life; and after all he did not write fooliſhly againſt the Chriſtians. He has been complained of for his cavils, his malice, and his calumnies; but no body ever ſaid that he wanted wit, or that his books were impertinent and ridiculous (20), and even expoſed him to the cenſure of the Heathens, inſtead of the glory that he promiſed to himſelf. ‘ Verum hic pro ſua inanitate contemptus eſt; qui & gratiam, qurm ſperavit, non eſt adeptus; & gloria, quam captavit, in culpam, reprehenſionemque converſa eſt (21). —— But he was deſpiſed as his folly deſerved; and did not obtain that favour, which he hoped for; and inſtead of the glory which he aimed at, he got only reproof and blame.’ According to Baronius (22) he had been a Chriſtian; ſo that he could not be ſo groſly ignorant of the matter he treated of, as he that is mentioned by Lactantius; for you may obſerve, that when this father tells us that the other writer canvaſſed many particular things, he adds: He ſeems to have been formerly a Chriſtian, ut aliquando ex eadem diſciplina fuiſſe videatur (23). This obſervation might have been of ſome uſe to Baronius, not to have found Porphyrius in the deſcription that Lactantius has given of a Philoſopher, who impertinently and ignorantly attacked the perſecuted Chriſtians.

For the reſt, the preface which that philoſopher prefixed to his book, may teach us the conformity between the Pagan and Chriſtian perſecutions. An intereſted and flattering writer never fails to uſe his pen againſt the perſecuted party: he imagines it a fine opportunity of praiſing his prince, he takes hold of it and diſplays the importance of the ſervice done to God, and ſhews how charitable it is to join inſtruction to the authority of the laws, that erring men, being thus enlightened, may be delivered from the puniſhments to which their obſtinacy would expoſe them. This voluptuous Philoſopher of Nicomedia forgot none of theſe common places: one would think that he has been the model of many French authors, who have written during the perſecution of the Proteſtants. See what a turn he gave to things. ‘ Profeſſus omnia philoſophi officium eſſe, erroribus hominum ſubvenire; atque illos ad veram viam revocare, id eſt, ad cultus Deorum; quorum numine, ac majeſtate (ut ille dicebat) mundus gubernetur, nec pati homines imperitos quorundam fraudibus illici: ne ſimplicitas eorum præde, ac pabulo ſit hominibus aſtutis. Itaque ſe ſuſcepiſſe hoc munus, philoſophia dignum; ut præferret non videntibus lumen ſapientiæ; non modo ut ſuſceptis Deorum cultibus reſaneſcant, ſed etiam ut pertinaci obſtinatione depoſita corporis cruciamenta devitent; neu ſævas membrorum lacerationes fruſtra perpeti velint. Ut autem appareret, cujus rei gratia opus illud elaboraſſet; effuſus eſt in principum laudes; quorum pietas, & providentia (ut quidem ipſe dicebat) cum in cæteris rebus humanis, tum præcipue in defendendis Deorum religionibus claruiſſet; conſultum eſſe tandem rebus humanis, ut cohibita impia, & anili ſuperſtitione, univerſi homines legitimis ſacris vacarent, ac propitios ſibi Deos experirentur. —— Affirming that it was the chief buſineſs of a Philoſopher, to aſſiſt thoſe who err, and to bring them back into the right way, that is, to the worſhip of the gods; by whoſe power and majeſty (ſaid he) the world is governed; and not to ſuffer the ignorant to be deceived by the guile of a few, leaſt their ſimplicity ſhould make them fall a prey to the crafty. That on this account he had undertaken this taſk worthy of a Philoſopher; to hold out the light of wiſdom to thoſe who do not ſee, not only that by returning to the worſhip of the gods, they may be reſtored to health, but alſo, that, laying aſide their pertinacious obſtinacy, they may eſcape the torturing of their bodies, and that they may not without reaſon expoſe themſelves to ſuch cruel mangling of their perſons. But that it might appear to what end he had compoſed this work, he launched out in the praiſe of thoſe princes, whoſe piety and care (ſaid he) had been illuſtrious, not only in governing in humane affairs, but eſpecially in protecting the worſhip of the gods, that at length the welfare of mankind had been provided for, that a ſtop being put to impious and idle ſuperſtition, all men might now enjoy a lawful worſhip and experience the favour of the gods.’ It is eaſier to depart from the method of the perſecutor Diocleſian, than from that of his panegyriſts.

HIEROCLES, the ſon of that Alypius who commanded in England, and whom Julian the apoſtate had ſent to Jeruſalem to rebuild the temple there, was accuſed jointly with his father in the reign of Valens, and ſo many ways tortured that they could no longer tell what member to rack, in order to make him ſpeak through the violence of his pains what they wanted him to declare (a). Order was given at laſt that he ſhould be led to execution; but as he was going thither, the people in a body addreſſed themſelves to the emperor, and ſo earneſtly interceded for him as to obtain his pardon. This we may learn by comparing a paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus with another of St Chryſoſtome [A]. Our Hierocles had been a diſciple of Libanius and was much eſteemed by him [B].

[A] He was pardoned. This we may learn by comparing a paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus with a paſſage of Chryſoſtome.] It is this: ‘ Ipſe quoque Alypius poſt multationem bonorum exſulare præceptus, filium miſerabiliter ductum ad mortem, caſu quodam proſpero revocatum excepit (1) —— Alypius likewiſe, after being condemned to forfeit his eſtate, and to ſuffer baniſhment, had his ſon reſtored to him, who being led out to execution was ſaved from death by a ſingular piece of good fortune.’ The paſſage of St Chryſoſtome is in the third Homily upon the incomprehenſible nature of God. This father deſigning to ſhow to his hearers the force of the united prayers of a whole people, alledges an example that they had ſeen ten years before, when a criminal, who was led gagged to the place of puniſhment, obtained his pardon at the requeſt of all the people of Antioch, who went in a body to beg it of the emperor. Valeſius (2) does not doubt that this criminal was Hierocles the ſon of Alypius.

[B] He was much eſteemed by Libanius.] Libanius writing to Alypius, told him (3) that his ſon, though a child, ſhewed greater wiſdom than grown up perſons; and that many fathers in chiding their ſons exhorted them to take example by the ſon of Alypius. The teſtimony of Ammianus Mercellinus agrees in ſubſtance with that of Libanius (4).

HIEROCLES, a platonic Philoſopher in the Vth century, taught in Alexandria with great reputation; he was admired on account of the ſtrength of his parts, and the readineſs and beauty of his expreſſions (a). He compoſed ſeven books upon Providence and Fate, and inſcribed them to the Philoſopher Olympiodorus, who by his embaſſies did great ſervice to the Roman empire in the reigns of Honorious and Theodoſius junior (b). Thoſe books are not now extant, and we only know them by the extracts which we find in Photius. Theſe extracts teach us, that Hierocles had demonſtrated that there is a perfect agreement betwixt the doctrines of Plato and Ariſtotle, and that they who had denied it did not well underſtand the opinions of theſe two great men (c). He turned his wits a thouſand ways in order to explain the difficulties of providence, fate, and free-will, and pretended that the ground or key of all theſe things conſiſted in the paſſage of ſouls from one body to another, and in the life they had led before they entred into humane bodies. He laid out all his ſtrength on this, and had none left to furniſh him with good arguments to eſtabliſh the doctrine he undertook to prove (d). For which reaſon Photius obſerves, that all that great train of reaſonings dwindled into meer trifles (e). There is one thing very ſingular in the doctrine of this Philoſopher; he maintained that Plato had taught that the world was produced out of nothing [A]. He married only with a view to have children [B]. His wife happened to be poſſeſſed (f): and he employed fair words in vain to deliver her from the demon, that ſpirit having no regard to his compliments; but Theoſebius (g) without any ſkill in magic, exorciſed him in ſuch a manner as forced him to retire. Jonſius, who very ſolidly proves our Hierocles to have lived after Euſebius, is however miſtaken [C] in ſuppoſing him the

[A] He maintained that Plato had taught that the world was produced out of nothing.] Hierocles (1) moſt ſolidly confuted the Platoniſts, who maintained that tho' God ſhould from all eternity employ his power and wiſdom, he would not be able to form a world without the concourſe of an increated matter. Therefore they ſaid that he produced things only by co-operating with matter, whoſe exiſtence did not depend upon him. All things, added they, were virtually contained in matter, and God had nothing to do but to draw them out, and ſet them in order. Hierocles argued with a great deal of judgment againſt that ſuppoſition: he ſaid, that ſuch a work of God would not be ſo much a ſign of his goodneſs, as the effect of a ſuperfluous diligence (2), for why ſhould he go about to diſpoſe and ſet in order what he has not made? Is not good order ſufficiently found in this, that a being ſubſiſts eternally of itſelf? whatever happens to ſuch a being, is it not extraneous to it's nature? And is it not conſequently an imperfection? Τί γὰρ δὴ μαθὼν ἃ μὴ ὑπέστησε διατάττειν πειρᾶται, πάντως που τῆς εὐταξίας αὐτοῖς ἐν τῇ ἀγεννησίᾳ τῆς ἑαυτῶν φύσεως κειμένης, τὸ γὰρ ἀγεννήτως καθ᾽ ἑαυτὸ ὑφεστὼς εἴ τι προσλάβοι, παρὰ φύσιν προσλήψεται. τὸ δὲ παρὰ φύσιν δατεθῆναι, κακὸν τῷ μετατρεπομένῳ ὥστε οὐκ ἀγαθὸν τῇ λεγομένῃ ὕλῃ τὸ κοσμεῖσθαι, εἴπερ ἀγέννητος εἴη μὴ ἀπὸ χρόνου μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ ἀπὸ αἰτίου. Quorſum enim ea, quæ non condidit, digerere conatur, cum omnino bona ordinatio in natura eorum ingenita conſiſtat. Si quid enim ingenito, ac per ſe ſubſiſtenti addatur, præter naturam fiet. Quod autem præter naturam efficitur, vitiatur: quare dictam materiam ornari minimè bonum, ſiquidem non ſolum in tempore, ſed & abſque cauſſa ingenita ſit (3). He concludes from hence, that God would have begun his work with an ill action (4), namely by undertaking to diſpoſſeſs of it's natural ſtate, a ſubſtance that was increated as well as himſelf, and his own ſiſter. Theſe reaſons are ſo ſtrong (5), that whoever conſiders them well, and is concerned for the glory of Plato, will endeavour to ſhew that he did not admit two principles collateral, eternal, and independent of one another, God and matter. This doubtleſs was the reaſon of our Hierocles attributing to him the doctrine of a true creation. I believe he had read it in the Chriſtian writings, and that being ſtruck with the arguments that oppoſe the exiſtence of an increated matter, and joining withal the idea of a creator, which carries the divine power and majeſty to the higheſt point, he ſuppoſed, for the honour of his ſect, that it's founder had known God under the idea of a nature, the ſimple act of whoſe will was ſufficient for the formation of the univerſe. Ὅτι δημιουργὸν θεὸν, φησι, προϋφίστησιν ὁ Πλάτων ἐφεστῶτα πάσης ἐμφανοῦς τε καὶ ἀφανοῦς διακοσμήσεως, ἐκ μηδενὸς προϋποκειμένου γεγενημένης. ἀρκεῖν γὰρ τὸ ἐκείνου βούλημα εἰς ὑπόστασιν τῶν ὄντων. Plato opificem Deum cenſuit ſuſtinere omnem aſpectabilem & inaſpectabilem mundum, nulla prius exiſtente materia productum. Sufficere enim illius voluntatem ad ſuſtinendum univerſum (6). But it were eaſy to ſhew, that this is an officious lie, ſince Plato has clearly maintained the concourſe of an independent and increated matter. We may ſay then, that Hierocles has here ſhewn his induſtry as much as on any other occaſion, I mean the induſtry of giving to the expreſſions of dead authors ſuch a ſenſe as one has a mind to (7), or of finding at leaſt two or three different ſyſtems in their works. He underſtood that game; for the two explications he gave of Plato's Gorgias were in nothing like one another, and yet they ſeemed to agree with the Platonic doctrine. Theſe are ſports of wit, but they require a very fruitful imagination. Ἀντιπαραβαλὼν τὰ πρότερα καὶ τὰ ὕστερα εὗρεν οὐδὲν τῶν αὐτῶν, ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν· ἑκάτερα δὲ ὅμως, ὃ καὶ παράλογον ἀκοῦσαι, τῆς Πλάτωνος ἐχόμενα, καθόσον οἷόν τε, προαιρέσεως. τοῦτο μὲν οὖν ἐπιδείκνυται. τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ἡλίκον ἦν ἄρα τὸ τῶν φρενῶν πέλαγος. Collatis prioribus cum ſecundis, nihil, ut ſic dicam, eorundem invenit. Utraque tamen, quod ſanè auditu novum eſt, Platonis, quod ejus fieri poterat, inſtitutum continebat. Hinc colligitur quanta viri illius in ſententiis copia (8).

[B] He married only with a view to have children.] Damaſcius makes the ſame obſervation, ſpeaking of Theoſebius, Hierocles's ſcholar, which ſhews that the moſt famous Platoniſts were perſuaded, that theſe were the juſt rules and true bounds of marriage, and that whatever went beyond theſe limits was an irregularity, or at leaſt, a liberty which wiſe men ought not to allow themſelves. This Theoſebius ſeeing his wife was barren, made a ring of chaſtity and gave it her. I preſented you, ſaid he, formerly with a ring of generation (9), but now I give you a ring of continence, which will always aſſiſt you to behave chaſtly (10), live with me if you pleaſe, or if you can contain; but if that condition doth not ſuit with you, I am willing you ſhould marry another man, and I only aſk one thing, which is, that we may part good friends. She willingly accepted the condition. My author ſtops there, and leaves us in uncertainty, for we do not know, whether his wife accepted the firſt or the laſt. He ſhould not have left ſuch an ambiguity in his ſtory.

[C] Jonſius who proves . . . . our Hierocles to have lived after Euſebius is however miſtaken.] His firſt proof is taken from the mention Hierocles made of Plutarch the Athenian, who lived after Iamblicus (11). Now the latter flouriſhed under Julian the apoſtate; we have ſtill ſome letters which that emperor wrote to him. The ſecond proof is taken from this, that Olympiodorus, to whom Hierocles dedicated his books, did not precede the reign of Honorius and Theodoſius the younger; for he wrote a hiſtory commencing at the ſeventh conſulſhip of Honorius and the ſecond of Theodoſius the younger, and he continued it to Valentinian, Honorius's, ſucceſſor, or as far as the year 425 (12). Jonſius had reaſon after this to maintain that Euſebius, who the author of a hiſtory of Apollonius Tyanæus, and that the ſeven books of Providence were anſwered by a writer named Euſebius, who was different from him who wrote the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, &c.

who was the author of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, the Evangelical Preparation, &c. did not confute the writings of this Hierocles; but he errs in ſaying that another Euſebius did. The cauſe of his error was this. He imagined that the ſame Herocles who wrote the ſeven books upon Fate, compoſed a hiſtory of Apollonius Tyanæus, intituled Philalethes, the refutation whereof we have in the works of Euſebius. This was to confound Hierocles, the perſecutor of the Chriſtians under the emperor Diocleſian, with Hierocles the philoſopher of Alexandria, under Theodoſius the younger. It is a little ſurprizing that Jonſius, who had a vaſt and exact knowledge of authors who have bore the ſame name, did not know the preſident of Bithynia, and the governor of Alexandria, who did ſo much miſchief to the Chriſtians, and who wrote againſt them, and was called Hierocles. Beſides, this learned man was miſtaken in thinking that Euſebius refutes the opinions of one Hierocles concerning Fate. It is certain that Euſebius only confuted the opinion of Apollonius, as he found it in Philoſtratus (13).

(13) Note, that Dr Cave, Hiſt. Literat. Script. Eccleſ. Part. I, pag. 131, has taken notice of theſe two errors of Jonſius.

HIERO I, king of Syracuſe, was the ſon of Dinomenes, and brother of Gelon, who after he had gained the ſovereignty of Gela, had the good fortune to ſee the city of Syracuſe ſubmit to him, when he intended no more than to reſtore ſome inhabitants that the populace had baniſhed out of it. He was ſo well pleaſed with this new acquiſition, that he voluntarily reſigned Gela to his brother Hiero, and wholly employed himſelf to find out the means of rendring Syracuſe a moſt flouriſhing city (a). He reigned there gloriouſly and happily; he acquired a great reputation by his victories, and the love of his ſubjects by his equity and moderation (b). Hiero, who ſucceeded him, did not tread in his ſteps; he was covetous, violent, and altogether different in his conduct from the virtuous Gelon: which was the reaſon that many were ready for an inſurrection; but the memory of his predeceſſor was ſo dear and glorious, that it kept them in their duty (c). He had a great deſire to put his brother Polyzelus to death, whom he ſaw beloved by the Syracuſans, and whom he ſuſpected of aſpiring to the crown. He would have ſent him to the aſſiſtance of the Sybarites who were beſieged by the Crotoniates, to the end that he might cauſe him to be ſlain in the battle; but Polyzelus who foreſaw the deſign, refuſed that employ; and ſeeing that this furiouſly provoked the king, his brother, he retired to Theron who reigned in Agrigentum. They were afterwards reconciled by the mediation of Theron (d). The latter might have taken advantage of that miſunderſtanding, but he was a good man (e), and would do one good office for another [A]. His ſon Thraſydeus ſucceeded him, and was unfortunate in the war that he undertook againſt the Syracuſans. Hiero with a good army made an irruption into the country of the Agrigentines and gained a battle, whereby Thraſydeus loſt his crown (f). Obſerve here a difference betwixt poets and hiſtorians. The ſame Hiero who appears ſuch an accompliſhed prince in the odes of Pindar [B], is a wicked king in the hiſtory of Diodorus Siculus. I fancy that if the poet flatters him too much, the hiſtorian treats him too ſeverely; for he doth not ſay all the good of him that he might, I mean that Hiero civilized himſelf and reformed many of his vices, by the converſations he had with ſome ingenious men whom he loved and loaded with his favours [C]. He died in the town of Catana in the ſecond year of the LXXVIIIth Olympiad

[A] Theron would do one good office for another.] Whilſt Hiero was preparing to make war againſt Theron, to whom his brother had retired, the inhabitants of Himera ſent him deputies to offer him their ſuccours, and even to declare they would live under his government. Thraſydeus, Theron's ſon, had been made their governor, and was become odious to them by his violences and cruelty. Hiero made uſe of that conjecture not to puſh on his deſign of war, but to turn things towards a pacification. He informed the king of Argigentum of the deſign of the inhabitants of Himera. This intelligence cauſed Theron to take the neceſſary meaſures to fruſtrate the conſpiracy, and to make peace with the king of Syracuſa, and to reconcile the two brothers (1), Moreri, citing the eleventh book of Diodorus Siculus, rmsaffi, that Hiero defeated Theron the tyrant of Agrigentum who deſpiſed him. I have found nothing like this in Diodorus Siculus. Note, that the hiſtorian Timæus had related that Theron, who could not abide that his ſon-in-law Polyzelus ſhould be ill uſed by Hiero, declared war againſt him; but it was immediately terminated before the hoſtilities were begun (2). Let us ſay by the way that Demarata (3), Theron's daughter, was married to king Gelon, who ordered when he died, that ſhe ſhould marry Polyzelus (4).

[B] Hiero appears a very accompliſhed prince in the odes of Pindar.] He won the prize in the horſe-race in the Olympic games. He did the ſame at the Pythic games; and was alſo victor in the chariot-courſe. Theſe victories were magnificently celebrated by the poet Pindar (5), and you may believe that tho' digreſſions take up more than three fourths of his odes, he forgot not to ſay that Hiero had all the virtues of a good and brave king. Note, that the inſcription of his ex voto (6), teſtifies that he won the prize three times at the Olympic games, twice in the horſe-race, and once in the chariot-courſe. John Benedictus, has falſly affirmed in his Commentary on Pindar (7), that Hiero gained the prize of the horſe-race at the Olympic games in the LXXIII Olympiad; for that prince was king of Syracuſe when he gained that prize (8): now he did not begin to reign there till the third year of the LXXVth Olympiad (9). The ſame commentator pretends that he gained a like prize at the games of the LXXVIIth Olympiad. But this is to give him a reign of more than ſixteen years, and groundleſsly to contradict the beſt hiſtorians.

[C] Hiero civilized himſelf, and reformed many of his faults, by the converſations which he had with ſome ingenious men.] He was exceedingly ignorant, and as ruſtical as his brother Gelon; but falling ſick, he ſpent the time which the weakneſs of his body gave him in the converſation of the learned, and became himſelf a learned man; and afterwards recovering his health he continued to love theſe ſorts of converſation, and often diſcourſed with Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchilide (10). The author from whom I have this, adds, that Hiero was a great lover of learning, and very liberal, that he had a great ſoul, lived without jealouſy with his three brothers, whom he affectionately loved, and was mutually beloved by them, and that his inclination to make noble preſents, determined Simonides, tho' very old, to croſs the ſea to wait upon him (11). Some critics (12) pretend that Chronology will not permit us to affirm that Hiero ever ſaw Simonides, but they have been ſhewn their

Olympiad (g) in the twelfth year of his reign (h). It was a town that he had peopled anew, having driven out the inhabitants and ſeated there a colony of Greeks drawn out of Peloponneſus and Syracuſe (i). He changed the name of Catana into that of Ætna, and would himſelf be ſirnamed Ætneus, when he was proclaimed victor in the Pythic games (k). The funeral honours that were paid to him in this new town, were like thoſe paid to heroes (l). His brother Thraſybulus reigned after him, but his tyrannical actions moved the Syracuſans to an inſurrection, and reduced him to ſuch a condition as to be forced to ſubmit to a hard capitulation. He retired into Italy into the country of the Locrians, and there ſpent the reſt of his days in a private life, having reigned but one year. The Syracuſans having reſtored the Republican government, maintained it till the tyranny of Dionyſius, that is for ſixty years (m). For the reſt, it is ſomewhat ſtrange that Dinomenes, Hiero's ſon, did not reign after him. He ſurvived him as we learn from the inſcription of the gifts which his father had vowed to Jupiter Olympius (n). The offerings which the king of Syracuſe conſecrated to the temple of Delphis were magnificent (o). His firſt wife, who was the daughter of Anaxilaus king of Rhegium and couſin to Theron, bore him no children (p); but by his ſecond wife daughter of Nicocles, he had Dinomenes abovementioned (q). Some will have it that he gave him the government of the town of Catana, with the title of king of Ætna [D]. I do not know to which of his two wives we muſt aſcribe the anſwer mentioned by Plutarch (r).

their error (13). All the ancients were perſuaded of their interview and converſations. Xenophon has ſuppoſed a dialogue between them (14), which is a good piece. Hiero ſpeaks in it like a man of wit and very good ſenſe. Timæus the hiſtorian ſaid, that Simonides meditated the peace betwixt Hiero and Theron (15). See alſo Athenæus (16) and Pauſanus (17); and take notice that tho' the elogies which Pindar and Ælian have beſtowed upon this king of Syracuſe had nothing of flattery in them, it could not thence be concluded that what Diodorus Siculus ſaith is falſe; for what he ſays of the avarice and violence of Hiero might be true, with reſpect to the time that preceded his ſickneſs. I do not obſerve this to excuſe him in all reſpects; I ſtill blame him for having paſſed over in ſilence Hiero's reformation, and for having too plainly inſinuated that he never grew a better man (18). This I think is very falſe; and we had better doubtleſs give a little credit to Ælian and Plutarch (19), and give this prince as an example of the truth of Horace's maxim;

Si modo culturæ patientem commodet aurem (20).

CREECH.

The ſickneſs which made our Hiero fond of learned converſation was the gravel. The ſcholiaſt on Pindar (21) cites upon this a work of Ariſtotle that is loſt. Moreri is groſly out in aſcribing to Hiero II what belongs to Hiero I. I mean this learning that he got upon his ſick bed, &c.

[D] Some will have it that he gave him the command of the city of Catana, with the title of king of Ætna.] They go upon theſe words of Pindar (22).

Agedum poſtea Ætnæ regi gratum excogitemus hymnum: cui urbem illam cum divinitus fundata libertate, Doricæ libræ in legibus Hiero condidit.* Benedictus makes this note upon it. Poſtquam poëta laudavit Hieronem ab εὐτεκνίᾳ, & filium Dinomenem à ſtudio in patrem: ad alias ejuſdem Dinomenis laudes digreditur: quem Ætnæ regem appellat: nam illam à ſe conditam Hiero dedit filio adminiſtrandum: eumque ducem Ætnæorum conſtituit. This increaſes our wonder to ſee Thraſybulus ſucceed Hiero. I believe the Syracuſans favoured the brother in prejudice of the ſon, to do greater honour to the memory of Gelon; for Dinomenes, Hiero's ſon, was only Gelon's nephew, but Thraſybulus was Gelon's brother; and thus ſetting thoſe upon the throne who were more nearly related to Gelon, they more plainly ſhewed that they looked upon him as the ground of the pretenſion to the crown.

HIERO II, king of Syracuſe, deſcended from the family of Gelon, who had reigned in the ſame place; but becauſe his mother was a ſervant, Hierocles, his father, looked upon him as a child that diſhonoured his houſe, and abandoned him to the mercy of fortune (a). He was fed many days by bees, and as the ſoothſayers declared, that this was a preſage that he ſhould be king, Hierocles ordered him to be brought back to his houſe, and educated him with all poſſible care. The child improved very much by ſuch an education, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf many ways. He was a man of admirable beauty and ſtrength, a graceful ſpeaker, and he often fought with thoſe that provoked him, and always had the victory. Pyrrhus gave him ſeveral military rewards (b). The Syracuſans made him prætor [A], after the departure of Pyrrhus; and as

[A] The Syracuſans made him prætor.] I have uſed the compendious expreſſions of Juſtin; but I will here clear up this matter, which is ſomewhat maimed in that author's narration. I ſay then, there was a miſunderſtanding betwixt the citizens of Syracuſe and their army, and that the army encamping near Mergana proceeded to the creation of magiſtrates, and conferred that dignity upon two officers, Artemidorus and Hiero. The latter being introduced into Syracuſe by the ſecret intrigues of his friends, ſurmounted the oppoſition of the contrary party, and behaved himſelf with ſo much humanity and greatneſs of ſoul, that the inhabitants agreed to acknowledge him for their prætor, though they looked upon thoſe aſſemblies as unlawful, in which the ſoldiers pretended to confer magiſtracies (1). Polybius, who is here my author, relates two inſtances of Hiero's ability. The firſt was, that he remedied a diſorder which was very prejudicial to the ſtate. The Syracuſans who ſtaid in the town, whilſt the troops and the prætors were in the field, raiſed

as he diſcharged that office with great wiſdom, all the cities unanimouſly agreed to appoint him Captain-general againſt the Carthaginians, and afterwards to raiſe him to the throne (c). He ſoon after carried on the war vigorouſly againſt the Mamertines, whom he had already defeated in ſome engagements, and he reſolved to drive them out of Meſſina, which they had ſeized againſt all right and reaſon. They found themſelves incapable of reſiſting him, and therefore they had recourſe, ſome to the Carthaginians, others to the Romans. The queſtion whether they ſhould be ſuccoured, was warmly debated at Rome, it was carried in the affirmative, and this was the occaſion of the firſt Punic war. The conſul Appius Claudius being ordered to ſuccour the Mamertines, landed his troops in Sicily in the year of Rome 490. They delivered up their town to him, and obliged the Carthaginian general, who commanded in their fortreſs, to leave it. The Carthaginians laid ſiege to Meſſina, and made a treaty of alliance with Hiero, who joined his troops with theirs. The Roman conſul reſolved upon giving battle, and firſt attacked the Syracuſans: the battle was very ſharp; Hiero behaved himſelf there valiantly, but was beaten, and thought it convenient to return to Syracuſe. Appius Claudius having likewiſe gained a victory over the Carthaginians, found himſelf maſter of the field, and advanced as far as Syracuſe, and beſieged it. Hiero ſeeing Sicily in conſternation, and the Carthaginian forces much weakened, ſent propoſals of peace to the Romans: They were accepted, and from that time till his death, he faithfully adhered to their intereſts (d), and gave them all the proofs of the moſt ſincere friendſhip [B]. If he had lived only five or ſix years after this alliance, to judge of things raiſed a thouſand ſeditions, and laboured to introduce innovations. It was therefore neceſſary that in the army's abſence ſome perſons ſhould keep the citizens in their duty. Leptines was a very proper man for this, as having a great many clients, and much credit with the people. For this reaſon Hiero ſecured him, by marrying his daughter, and by that means obtained that the public tranquillity ſhould be preſerved in Syracuſe whilſt he was abroad at the head of the army. His ſecond piece of policy, was his getting rid of the old foreign ſoldiers, who were mutinous and debauched. He took the field under pretence of engaging the Mamertines (2), and when he came in ſight of the enemy, he divided his army into two parts; he placed his Syracuſan ſoldiers on one ſide, and the foreigners on the other; and putting himſelf at the head of the former, as if to make an attack, he left the others expoſed to the Mamertines, who cut them in pieces. He raiſed other troops, and attacked the enemy ſo ſeaſonably, that he obtained a glorious victory. He was created king after that exploit (3).

[B] He gave the Romans all the proofs of a ſincere friendſhip.] In proof of this I ſhall relate what he did, when the Roman affairs were in a great confuſion, after the victory that Hannibal obtained over them, near the lake Thraſymenus (4). It was the third battel they had loſt in Italy from the time Hannibal entered it, that is, in a year's time. Leſs than that now-a-days would incline a prince to quit his allies, and take the conqueror's ſide; a prince, I ſay, whoſe territories ſhould be ſituated as Syracuſe was with reſpect to the republic of Carthage. And yet Hiero proved a generous ally, he ſtood faſt to the intereſt of the Romans, and ſent them good ſupplies. Read theſe words of Livy (5): ‘Per eoſdem dies ab Hierone claſſis Hoſtiam cum magno commeatu acceſſit. Legati Syracuſani in Senatum introducti nunciarunt, cædem C. Funditores, ſagittariique, & frumentum traditum conſulibus. ——— About this time a fleet arrived at Oſtia from Hiero, with large ſupplies. The Syracuſan embaſſadors being introduced to the ſenate, ſaid that Hiero, on receiving the news of the defeat of the conſul Flaminius and his army, was as ſenſibly touched as it was poſſible for him to be for his own, or his kingdoms, misfortunes. That on that account, though he well knew that the Roman greatneſs was rather more admirable in adverſe than in proſperous circumſtances, he had ſent ſuch ſupplies as were uſual from good and faithful allies to one another, when ingaged in war; and moſt earneſtly begged that the ſenate would do him the honour to accept of them. That firſt of all, by way of good omen, they had brought a golden Victory of 320 *pound weight: wiſhing they would receive it, and retain it, as their peculiar property for ever. That they knew that the Romans admitted of no legionary ſoldiers, or cavalry, but their own and thoſe of the Latins, but they had obſerved light armed auxiliaries, even of foreign nations, in the Roman camps; and for that reaſon Hiero had ſent a thouſand archers and ſlingers, which would be of ſervice againſt the Baleares, Mauritanians, and other nations, which uſed miſſive weapons. Together with theſe preſents, they gave the following advice, that the prætor, to whoſe ſhare the province of Sicily ſhould fall, ſhould ſend a fleet to Africa, that the enemy might not only have war in their own country, but might be leſs at liberty to ſend ſuccours to Hannibal. The ſenate ſent the following anſwer to the king. That Hiero had acted like a man of honour, and a faithful ally, had ſhown an uninterrupted fidelity, from the time he had firſt joined in amity with the Roman ſtate, and had at all times, and on all occaſions, liberally aſſiſted them in their affairs: that the Romans had ſuch ſentiments of theſe favours as they deſerved. That gold had been brought by ſome other ſtates, and had, after returning them thanks, been refuſed by the Romans, but that they accepted the Victory, and the omen: and had appointed the capitol, the temple of Jupiter, for the abode of that goddeſs. things by the preſent age, we ſhould have reaſon to wonder at his conſtancy. How great therefore ought our admiration to be, when we conſider that he lived near fifty years after? This long reign was a very happy one; for Hiero's conduct was attended with ſo much prudence, that it preſerved him ſecure amongſt his own ſubjects, procured him a great reputation abroad, and gave ſucceſs to all his public and private affairs. He cultivated the friendſhip of the Greeks, and was proud of ſharing in the prizes which they beſtowed on the victors in their games (e). His ſons erected him a ſtatue on horſe-back, and another on foot in Olympia (f); his ſubjects erected others alſo in the ſame place (g). The money he gave to the Rhodians, and the preſents he ſent them after that great earthquake, which had made havock of their iſland, and over-turned their Coloſſus, is a very noble inſtance of his liberality, and magnificence (h). He ordered a ſhip to be built which was one of the moſt famous veſſels in antiquity; Archimedes (i) was the director of the work. You will find the deſcription of it in Athenæus (k), who cites a book written purely upon that ſubject by one Moſchion. The 16th Idyl of Theocritus is addreſſed to this king of Syracuſe, and the author ſeems to complain of having praiſed him without obtaining a recompence. Hiero compoſed ſome books of Agriculture (l), and died at the age of ninety [C], in the ſecond year of the CXLIſt Olympiad, and the 539 (m) of Rome. He out-lived his ſon Gelon (n), who was married to Nereis, daughter of Pyrrhus (o), by whom he left a ſon, named Hieronymus (p). He obſerved that this Hieronymus was vain, and he feared leſt the good condition in which he had ſettled his kingdom, would quickly change under ſuch a prince. This made him deſirous to reſtore the Syracuſans to their liberty; but his daughters hindered him [D], and in his great Hieronis propoſitum & conſtantiam in ſuſcepta ſemel amicitia Romanorum, non Reguli calamitas, non Claudii naufragium, non Thraſymenus, non Trebia, poſtremo ne Cannenſis quidem dies potuit labefactare. Manſit inconcuſſa illi fides, etiam tunc quum & in Italia & extra Italiam omnes Po. Ro. ſocii & amici ad Pœnos fortunam ſecuti inclinabant: ne domus quidem Hieronis tota (verba ſunt Livii) ab defectione abſtinuit, namque Gelo maximus ſtirpis contempta ſimul ſenectute patris, ſimul poſt Cannenſium cladem Romana ſocietate ad Pœnos defecit. Hiero tamen nihilo ſecius immotus ſtetit, ceu Marpeſia quædam cautes, eique etiam tunc fides conſtitit: quam etiam ad extremum vitæ conſtantiſſime ſervavit (6). —— 'The extraordinary fidelity and conſtancy of Hiero in preſerving the majeſty of Rome, cannot be ſufficiently praiſed; eſpecially if we conſider that then, and frequently afterwards, there happened conjunctures, which put his conſtancy to very ſingular trials. Every body knows how great, and how many diſaſters the Romans ſuffered in the firſt Punic war, and in the beginning of the ſecond. Adverſity uſually diſcovers peoples inclinations, and ſtrips the mind of all diſguiſes. Neither the calamity of Regulus, the ſhipwrack of Claudius, neither Thraſymene, nor Trebia, nor even Cannæ itſelf, could ſhake the reſolution and conſtancy of Hiero in the alliance he had contracted with the Romans. It continued firm even when all the allies and friends of Rome, both in Italy and out of it, following fortune, inclined to the Carthaginians. Even Hiero's own family (to uſe the words of Livy) was not free from this defection, for his eldeſt ſon Gelo, deſpiſing at once the old age of his father, and the alliance of the Romans after the battle of Cannæ, went over to the Carthaginians. Hiero, notwithſtanding, remained unmoved, and continued in that fidelity, which he conſtantly preſerved to the end of his life.' Let us add another obſervation. This prince's fidelity to the Romans was ſometimes very burdenſome to him; for ſometimes the Carthaginian veſſels made great ravage in his country (7). Laſtly, let us obſerve that on his death-bed he recommended it to the tutors of his grandſon, who was to be his ſucceſſor, not to ſuffer any change in the alliance he had ſo faithfully kept with the Romans (8).
